PHRENOLOGY. The literal signification of this term is, a discourse concerning the mind. By phrenology, however, is usually understood that system of mental and moral philosophy, which recognises the brain as the congeries or collection of organs, by which the mental and moral faculties are manifested, during the connexion of the mind and the body. It makes no pretensions to ascertain the nature of the mind itself, nor to determine whether it be material or immaterial, destined to immortality, or to perish with the body. Wisely does it leave these interesting inquiries to be solved by knowledge of a different kind, derived from divine revelation.

As phrenology, in its influence upon other branches of science, such as morals, theology, medicine, legislation, and education, is by many regarded as the greatest and most important discovery of modern times, it may be proper here to introduce the history of its origin and progress. The honor of the discovery is unquestionably due to Dr. Gall, of Vienna. Dr. Spurzheim and Mr. Combe, however, merit the praise of having been the most successful cultivators of the science.

Dr. GALL, from an early age, was disposed to observation. He noticed the fact, that his brothers, and sisters, and school-fellows, were each distinguished by some peculiarity of talent or disposition. He found that the scholars with whom he had the greatest difficulty in competing, were those who learned by heart with much facility; and such individuals frequently gained from him, by their repetitions, the places of honor and commendation, to which he had justly gained a title by the merit of his original compositions. His school-fellows so gifted were observed to have prominent eyes; and subsequently, in similar cases, he found this to be uniformly true. This fact, we are told, suggested to him the propriety of looking to the heads around him for the organs, either of intellect or of sentiment. From the first, he referred the cause to the brain, and not to the bones of the head, as has been sometimes represented by the opponents of the system.

Dr. Gall studied the metaphysical writers with but little satisfaction. Being fully convinced there was a natural difference between individuals as to talents and dispositions, and finding those writers not acknowledging this principle, but speaking of all men as born with equal mental faculties and moral susceptibilities, and maintaining that the differences observable between them were owing either to education or to accidental circumstances, he laid aside all reliance upon their theories, and devoted himself to the study of nature. "He visited prisons, and resorted to schools; he was introduced to the courts of princes, to colleges, and the seats of justice; and wherever he heard of an individual distinguished in any particular way, either by remarkable endowment or deficiency, he observed and studied the development of his head.

In this manner, by an almost imperceptible induction, he conceived himself warranted in believing that particular mental powers are indicated by particular configurations of the head." Anatomical investigations next occupied his attention, and he made several important discoveries respecting the structure of the brain and nerves. The fibrous constitution of the brain has, by him and Dr. Spurzheim, been demonstrated to the satisfaction of all anatomists, even of those who continue opposed to the peculiar doctrines of phrenology.

Dr. GASPER SPURZHEIM began the study in 1800, as a student of Dr. Gall, and has been an indefatigable laborer in the field of phrenological investigation, and at all events a successful advocate of truth and humanity. He has lectured in France, Great Britain, Ireland, and the United States. He arrived in New York in July, 1832, and proceeded to Boston, where, after lecturing several weeks, he fell a victim to his generous ardor. His powers of analysis were great; and much of the order and harmony of the science may be fairly attributed to him. Nor were his moral sentiments less valuable or endearing. In this country, he was received with enthusiasm, entertained with cordiality, and lamented with sincere esteem and heartfelt sorrow. His writings however still live.

Phrenology, it should be repeated, does not assent nor imply that the mind is material, or that it cannot exist and act separately from the body. It only states that while united with the body, it employs material organs for its manifestation. It is impossible to define the nature of the soul, or to decide upon its duration merely by philosophic research. Would we know the truth on these recondite subjects, we must consult a higher source; and by faith in divine revelation, we may have our desires gratified in the most satisfactory manner, Matt. 10: 28.

We may believe that the mind uses the eye to see, the ear to hear, the hand to feel, and the brain to think; and if so, why not one part of the brain to enjoy the pleasures of friendship, another part to raise the emotion of benevolence, and still another to quicken the energy of resentment?

The brain is, therefore, a congeries of organs: these are numerous and multifarious: phrenology collects and arranges them in three great classes. The first class embraces those organs which give rise to the animal propensities, and are nine or ten in number. The second class contains those of the moral feelings or sentiments, twelve in number. The third class comprehends the intellectual organs or faculties, which are subdivided into the knowing and the reflecting organs. Generally speaking, it is said the animal propensities are situated in the lower and posterior parts of the head, the moral sentiments in the superior lateral parts, and the intellect in front. All arise from the medulla oblongata at the base of the skull, and are mostly extended to the surface of the cranium. The following are the various organs in their order; which, it should be remembered, are all double; that is to say, that one of each name exists on either side of the brain.

PHRYGIA, was the largest kingdom of Asia Minor: it had Bithynia north; Pisidia and Lycia south; Galatia and Cappadocia east; and Lydia and Mysia west. Christianity was planted in this country by Paul, Acts 16: 6. 18: 23.—Calmet.

PHRYGIANS, or CATAPHRYGIANS; a sect in the second century, so called, as being of the country of Phrygia. They were orthodox in the main, setting aside this, that they took Montanus for a prophet, and Priscilla and Maximilla for true prophetesses, to be consulted in every thing relating to religion; as supposing the Holy Spirit had abandoned the church. (See MONTANISTS).—Hend. Buck.

PHUT, the third son of Ham, (Gen. 10: 6.) is thought to have peopled either the canton of Phtemphu, Phtemphi, or Phtembuti, of Pliny and Ptolemy, whose capital was Thara, in Lower Egypt, inclining towards Libya; or the canton called Phtenotes, of which Butas was the capital. The prophets often speak of Phut. In the time of Jeremiah, (46: 9.) this province was subject to Necho, king of Egypt; and Nahum (3: 9.) reckons them among those who ought to come to the assistance of No-Ammon.—Calmet.

PHYLACTERY, in general, was a name given by the ancients to all kinds of charms, spells, or characters which they wore about them, as amulets, to preserve them from dangers or diseases.

Phylactery particularly denoted a slip of parchment, wherein was written some text of Holy Scripture, particularly of the decalogue, which the more devout people among the Jews wore on the forehead, the breast, or the neck, as a mark of their religion.

The primitive Christians also gave the name Phylacteries to the cases wherein they inclosed the relics of their dead. Phylacteries are mentioned in the New Testament, and appear to have been very common among the Pharisees in our Lord's time.

The phylacteries used by the modern Jews are of three kinds; of each of which there is a specimen in the library of the duke of Sussex. They are used for the head, the arm, and attached to the door-post. They consist of portions of Scripture, taken from the Pentateuch, selected according to the situation for which they are destined, written upon very fine vellum, in a very small square character, and with a particular kind of ink. (See FRONTLETS; and MEZUZIM.)

It seems the Pharisees used to "make broad their phylacteries." This some understand of the knots of the thongs by which they were fastened, which were tied very artificially in the form of Hebrew letters; and that the pride of the Pharisees induced them to have these knots larger than ordinary, as a peculiar ornament. The Pharisees are farther said to "enlarge the borders of their garments," ta kraspeda ton himation, Matt. 23: 5. These kraspeda were the fringes which the Jews are commanded to wear upon the borders of their garments, Num. 15: 38, 39. These were worn by our Savior, as appears from the following passage: "Behold, a woman, which was diseased with an issue of blood twelve years, came behind him, and touched the hem of his garment," kraspedon tou himation, Matt. 9: 20. 14: 36. It should have been rendered "the fringe." The Pharisees are censured by our Savior for enlarging these fringes of their garments, which we may suppose they did partly from pride, and partly from hypocrisy, as pretending thereby an extraordinary regard for the precepts of the law. It is reported by Jerome, as quoted by Godwin, that they used to have fringes extravagantly long; sticking thorns in them, that, by pricking their legs as they walked, they might put them in mind of the law. *Bibliotheca Susexiana.—Hend. PHYSICIAN; (1.) One who practises medicine, Mark 5: 26. (2.) An embalmer of dead bodies, Gen. 50: 2. (3.) Such as comfort and relieve from distress by their advice and counsel, Job 13: 4. Jesus Christ is called a physician; by the application of his word, his blood, and his Spirit, he removes the guilt, the ignorance, hardness, and other spiritual diseases of men's souls, Matt. 9: 12.

Among the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Egyptians, Libyans, and Greeks, we have hints of skilful physicians; but till Hippocrates the Coan, about A. M. 3540, digested medicine into a kind of system, it was very little considered. Aretæus the Cappadocian long afterward further improved it. Galen, who lived in the second century of the Christian era, put the art into a still clearer order; but by pretending to found every thing on the four elements, and the humors, and by his cardinal qualities, and the like, he embarrassed it with unintelligible jargon. Between the sixth and ninth centuries of Christianity, the art of medicine was in a manner lost; but from that to the thirteenth, the Arabs cultivated it with a great deal of pomp. It was not, however, until within these two centuries past, that it was handled in a proper manner; nor is it so even now, except among the Europeans of the Christian name. (See the following article; and MEDICINE.)—Works of Robert Hall, vol. ii. p. 485; Brown.

PHYSIOLOGY, (HUMAN.) By etymology and original acceptance, physiology means the doctrine of nature, and is not very appropriately applied to that limited division of natural science, which has for its object the various forms and phenomena of life, the condition and laws under which this state exists, and the causes which are active in producing and maintaining it. A foreign writer has proposed for this division the more accurate term of "biology," or science of life.

I. Importance of the study.—The importance of this science to all classes of mankind is most obvious. The wisdom of the injunction, know thyself, has been admitted for ages, and yet, so far as a knowledge of the human frame is concerned, the maxim is forgotten in practice. No science is more neglected than this. The term physiology is used (we follow Dr. Alcott) to include much that in strictness of language belongs to anatomy.

The person who should occupy a dwelling seventy, eighty, or a hundred years, and yet be unable to tell the number of its apartments, or the nature, character, &c. of its materials,—perhaps even the number of its stories,—would be thought inexcusably ignorant. Yet, with the exception of medical men, and here and there an individual belonging to the other professions, there is scarcely one person in a thousand who knows any thing about the elementary materials, the structure, or even the number of apartments in the present habitation of his mind. But is it not strange, that during the progress of a life which is often protracted nearly a hundred years, while we become acquainted with thousands of fellow-beings, and millions of objects in the vegetable and mineral world, we should remain profoundly ignorant of our own physical frame, and die even without being once introduced to ourselves?

How an education ever came to be regarded as either liberal or complete without a knowledge of physiology, is inconceivable. We know, indeed, what obstacles ignorance and prejudice have thrown in the way of improvement generally, and we know how these obstacles have always been met; but the question will still recur, "Why have individuals been found ready and willing to sacrifice property, and health, and reputation, and life, for every thing else, rather than the knowledge of themselves?"

Is it because there is nothing in the human structure and economy to gratify curiosity, or excite wonder? There are few who are not fond of natural science in most of its departments; especially natural history. And is there no pleasure to be derived from the study of that animal which has been represented to be, above all others, "fearfully and wonderfully made?" Does it afford no pleasure to study the structure and functions of the stomach and liver, and other organs concerned in changing a mass of beaten food—perhaps some of the coarser vegetables—into blood?—of the heart, and arteries, and veins, which convey this fluid, to the amount of three gallons, through all parts of the body once in four minutes?—of the lungs, which restore the half-spoiled blood to its wonted purity, as fast as it is sent into them, and enable it to pursue a healthful course through its ten thousand channels?—of the brain, and especially the nerves, which, by their innumerable branches, spread themselves over every soft part of the human system, (and some of the harder parts,) which they can possibly penetrate, in such numbers that we can nowhere insert the point of the finest needle without piercing them?—of the skin, every square inch of which contains the mouths or extremities of a million of minute vessels?—Is all this uninteresting?

Is it for want of a connexion with other sciences? Does it illustrate none of the mechanical laws? What then shall we say of the joint by which the head is united to the neck in a way which human art never originated, if it could even imitate it?—of the joints at the elbows and wrists which admit of such numerous and complicated motions?—of the structure and motion of the lungs and their bony covering?—of the heart, the muscles, &c.? Even the wonders of the human hand, an instrument which we constantly put in requisition, have rarely been told, or its functions understood.

Have we no interest in observing the chemical laws, which, to some extent, operate within the system in the formation and combination of those fluids which we call the saliva, the gastric juice, the bile, the pancreatic fluid;—in the changes of food into chyme, of chyme into blood, of blood, or the particles which it holds in solution, into solid masses;—in the change which the blood undergoes in the lungs, and many other mysterious processes?

Above all, is there nothing to arrest our attention in the manner by which that unknown principle which we call life, is able to resist—often successfully, for seventy or eighty years—the tendency of the solids and fluids to decomposition and putrefaction, and the delicate membranes of the body to bear the weight of the incumbent atmosphere, resting upon them at the rate of fifteen pounds to the square inch? Is there no wisdom displayed in the construction of so complicated, and yet so wonderful a machine, and in endowing it with the power of retaining an average heat of ninety-six or ninety-eight degrees, whether the surrounding atmosphere be heated to one hundred degrees or cooled to thirty-two, or even to a much lower point? Is there, moreover, no mental discipline involved in the study of physiology? Is it the exclusive province of mathematical science to invigorate and discipline the mental powers

Half the labor, to speak quite within bounds, of every educator of our race, from the mother and infant school teacher to the magistrate and the minister of religion, is lost, and worse than lost, for want of a thorough knowledge of this subject.

If man is ever to be elevated to the highest and happiest condition which his nature will permit, it must be, in no small degree, by the improvement, I might say, the redemption of his physical powers. But knowledge on any subject must always precede improvement.

It is probably owing to ignorance of the nature, structure, powers and purposes of the digestive apparatus, more than to any other single cause, that so much mischief is done to the young by excess, or impropriety in eating and drinking. Not that correct information on this point would lead at once to correct practice; but no reform can be expected until there is a conviction of its necessity; for we cannot appeal to the conscience with any prospect of success, so long as that conscience remains unenlightened. The morning star that must usher in this day of real improvement, and lead man to the highest and happiest condition of which he is susceptible, by shedding light around and within him, and, under God, leading him home to himself, is physiology, or a thorough knowledge of his own nature. (See M.A.S.)

Do parents feel the force of those arguments derived from a regard to the welfare of the generations that are to follow them, whose every characteristic of body or mind is to be affected by themselves and their conduct; and whose happiness must be graduated by the measure of attention which we, of the present generation, pay to the development of our physical frames?

Dr. Rush supposed, that merely as friends to our country, we ought, in the formation of habits as well as in every individual action, to have a wise and sacred regard to the welfare of the hundredth generation that may succeed us; and he believed that we were no more justifiable in doing or neglecting to do any thing which should have a tendency to injure the species, however remotely, than if the effects of our conduct were confined to the very next generation. He probably supposed that the evils which are entailed on our offspring by excessive or improper eating or drinking, or by improprieties in dress, affected every successive generation; and unless corrected, must continue to be transmitted; aggravated, perhaps, by a continuance of the same habits and causes which began the mischief, until our physical natures shall be greatly degenerated. And is not this doctrine sound? But if so, is it not to a community, as Christians, that the appeal is strongest?

There are very few individuals to be found, adds Dr. Alcott, who do not sometimes yield to indulgences or excesses, either at the solicitation of their own appetite, or in compliance with the customs which prevail around them, the tendency of which is to diminish their vigor, if not to impair their health for life. I am just now speaking of errors in diet, drink, exercise, &c., without the remotest reference to those grosser errors to which I wish it was no part of my business to advert. On the latter subject much might be said. I might speak of the prevalence of solitary, as well as social vice, in boarding and high schools, and even in too many instances in colleges. There is too much evidence, that some of these supposed sources of moral purity are little more, to many of their inmates, than hotbeds of physical and moral pollution; and this, too, in spite of all the efforts which instructors at this period of their pupils' age, and under the circumstances which often exist, can possibly make. Some striking facts might here be presented; facts which should awaken every teacher and parent to renewed effort to devise means for meeting this tremendous and increasing evil.

It is not supposed that a knowledge of physiology would be the means of correcting either common or gross errors at once; but, until a knowledge of the laws which govern the human frame becomes so common that every parent and teacher can perceive how every abuse of the constitution must, of necessity, sooner or later bring punishment upon him who commits it, or upon his posterity, no radical or effectual reformation can be expected. There must be a familiarity between parents and children, on these subjects, which has rarely, if ever, yet existed; and the child must be trained to see the sword of the avenger stretched out by permission of his Father in heaven, against every form of abuse of that body which was intended to be a "temple of the Holy Spirit;" and of its every passion and appetite. We have no other safeguard.

Next to the mother, a knowledge of the human frame is important to the teacher. This is true, whether his office be to instruct merely, a few hours in the day, or to educate. Those who have their pupils constantly under their care, as in some of our boarding or select schools, may be considered as substitutes for the time for parents; any remarks which go to show the obligations which parents are under, to understand the physical constitutions of their children, would be equally applicable to their circumstances.

Those, also, who are concerned in the instruction either of the young or the old on the Sabbath merely, should not remain ignorant on this subject. Some of the greatest mistakes, arising from ignorance of physiology, are here made. A minister might almost as well wear out a fine pair of lungs in preaching to the wind, as in attempting to gain the attention of a set of hearers who have just eaten a hearty dinner, on the Sabbath, especially if they are people who are in the habit of using a great deal of exercise in the progress of their ordinary occupations. Would he labor with any considerable hope of doing good, his first step must be to try to break up the wretched custom of gorging ourselves with food on this day; whether by an increase of variety to tempt the palate, or simply an increase of quantity. Laboring people often say they feel a keener appetite on Sunday than on other days; but it arises rather from ennui; at least, it is a morbid feeling, and should never be indulged. (See ATTENTION.)

In the appendix to the "First Annual Report of the Society for promoting Manual Labor in Literary Institutions," a valuable work, every page of which goes to prove the necessity of a knowledge of our own physical frames, we find the following eloquent language on this subject: "Modern education conducts the student round the universe; bids him scale the heights of nature, and drop his fathom line among the deep soundings of her abyss, compassing the vast, and analyzing the minute; and yet never conducts him over the boundary of that world of living wonders which constitutes him man, and is at once the abode of his mind, the instrument of its action, and the subject of its sway. Why, we ask, shall every thing else be studied, while the human frame is passed over as a noteless, forgotten thing—that masterpiece of divine mechanism, pronounced by its author 'wonderfully made,' and 'curiously wrought':—a temple fitted up by God, and gloriously garished for the residence of an immortal inhabitant, bearing his own image, and a candidate for a 'building of God, eternal in the heavens?'"

There is one objection to the study of physiology, which deserves a moment's consideration. It is said that so certainly as people begin to attend to this subject, they begin to fancy themselves diseased, and to regulate their diet, take medicine, &c. Now that it should lead them to regulate their diet so far as to form judicious habits, is no objection to its introduction, but the contrary; for few things are more necessary. But it is a mistake to suppose that the study of our own frame induces us to fancy ourselves sick, and to take medicine. It is the study of dis cases, or rather, the mere reading of books on practice, and on the nature and power of medicine, BEFORE WE KNOW ANY THING ABOUT OUR OWN STRUCTURE, that produces these results.

In short, there are no weighty objections to the course of study here recommended. For so long as we have bodies, it is our duty to understand them. If there be among us any individuals who have so far become ethereal as not to require food, drink, rest, air, warmth, and exercise, these, and these alone, are justified in neglecting the study of physiology.

II. Objects and method of study.—In investigating the nature of living beings, various objects of inquiry present themselves, and various modes of proceeding may be adopted. We may examine their structure; the number, form, size, relative position and connexion of the organs, by the assemblage of which they are constructed; their texture; that is, the primary animal tissues which compose the various organs, and their mode of union; their elementary composition; or the number, nature, and combinations, of the elements into which they can be resolved: lastly, their living phenomena; the vital properties with which all the primary tissues are endowed, the offices or functions executed by the organs, and the mutual influences and diversified dependencies, which, regulating the order and succession of these living operations, combine so many partial and subordinate motions into one beautiful and harmonious whole.

It is the business of the anatomist to demonstrate the structure and unravel the texture of animal bodies; their composition falls within the department of the chemist; and their vital phenomena occupy the labors of the physiologist. Anatomy, therefore, teaches the organization of animals, while physiology unfolds the nature of life. The third division forms a kind of border territory, lying between the domains of chemistry and physiology, alternately occupied and cultivated by both. Under the name of animal chemistry, it has received, of late years, a constantly increasing share of attention, and produced important accessions to our knowledge of the composition and operations of animal bodies.

Anatomy and physiology should be cultivated together: we should combine observation of the function with examination of the organization. It should be borne in mind, that every organ has its living phenomena and its use, and that the chief ultimate object, even of anatomy, is to learn the nature of the function. Strictly speaking, structure alone is learned by dissection: the vital properties of organic textures, and the functions of organs, are found out by observation. Anatomy, however, unfolds facts, of which the knowledge is absolutely necessary in appreciating the results of observation. It affords the only clue capable of guiding us through the multiplied and varied movements all going on together in the living microcosm, and of thus enabling us to discriminate the proper share of each organic apparatus.

Haller, the father and founder of modern physiology, has furnished the best example, both for the method of cultivating the subject, and of treating it in writing. He had devoted thirty years to the dissection of human bodies and those of animals, and to observation, and to every variety of experimental research, before he began to compose his Elementa Physiologiae. In this matchless work, a full anatomical description of every organ, drawn from his own dissections, precedes the history of its functions. I know no anatomical descriptions, says Dr. Lawrence, superior to these; none deserving of more implicit confidence. To regard this work as a mere register of opinions has always appeared to me very unjust: it contains new and accurate information on almost every part of the subject. It is no slight proof of its merits, that, although published in the middle of the last century, it yet remains the book of authority.

Anatomy and physiology are the ground-work of pathology, or the science of disease. Disease is a relative term, implying a comparison with a state of health, and presupposing a knowledge of that state. To anatomy, or science of healthy structure, is opposed morbid anatomy, or science of diseased structure; to physiology, or doctrine of healthy functions, pathology, or doctrine of diseased manifestations. Morbid anatomy shows us the diseases; pathology, their external signs or symptoms. Often, no change of structure is observable; the deviations from the healthy condition elude our means of inquiry. The organ is then said to be functionally disordered.

Thus we find that anatomy, physiology, morbid anatomy, and pathology, are mutually related and intimately connected. Although called separate sciences, they are, in truth, parts of one system; and we must never lose sight of their mutual bearings. On the foundation of these four departments of knowledge or science, is raised the practice of medicine, or the healing art; overlooking the artificial distinctions of physic, surgery, and so forth.

Mr. Hunter, of whom we here present an engraving, was the first in England who investigated disease in a strictly philosophic method: bringing to bear on it the clear and steady lights of anatomy and physiology. He began by discarding all the doctrines of the schools, and resorted at once to nature. Instead of creeping timidly along the coast of truth, he boldly launched into the great ocean of discovery, steering by the polar star of observation, and trusting to the guidance of his own genius.

III. Religious tendency of the study.—No subject has been more warmly contested, Dr. Lawrence observes, than the doctrine of final causes; which, however, has suffered more from the ill-judged efforts of its friends, than from the attacks of its enemies.—We can hardly conceive that any person, who did not feel a difficulty in believing that a watch was formed for the purpose of showing the hour, could seriously doubt that our stomachs were expressly constructed for digestion, our eyes for seeing, and the rest of our organs for the purposes which they so admirably fulfil. The philosophic naturalist, guided by comparative anatomy, discovers, at every step, striking peculiarities in the economy of animals, founded on corresponding arrangements of organization. We must take refuge either in verbal quibbles, or in an exaggerated and unreasonable scepticism, if we refuse to recognise in this relation between peculiarity of structure and function those designs and adaptations of exalted power and wisdom, in testimony of which all nature cries aloud through all her works.

Many things are, indeed, at present, inexplicable to us: the offices of many parts, even in the human body, are still hidden from us. But the ends, or final purposes of the Creator, will be placed in the strongest light by selecting any animal of marked peculiarity in its economy, and comparing together its structure and mode of life. Let a person who knows the natural history of the mole, attentively contemplate its skeleton: and if he should still withhold his belief in final purposes, he would probably coincide in opinion with a celebrated member of the French academy of sciences, who declared that it was as absurd to suppose the eye intended for seeing, as to imagine that stones were created for breaking heads! American Annals of Education; Combe's Principles of Physiology; Paxton's Anatomy; Anatomical Class Book; Physiological Class Book; Dunglison's Physiology; Combe on the Constitution of Man; Lawrence's Lectures; Spurzheim on Education; Porter's Catechism of Health; Levison on Mental Culture; Cuvier's Animal Kingdom; Paley's Natural Theology.

PICARDS; a sect which arose in Bohemia, in the fifteenth century. Picard, the author of this sect, from whom it derived its name, drew after him, as has been generally said, a number of men and women, pretending he would restore them to the primitive state of innocence wherein man was created; and accordingly he assumed the title of New Adam. (See ADAMITES.)

Such is the account which various writers, relying on the authorities of Æneas Sylvius and Varillas, have given of the Picards. Some, however, doubt whether a sect of this denomination, chargeable with such wild principles and such licentious conduct, ever existed. It appears probable that the reproachful representations of the writers just mentioned, were calumnies invented and propagated in order to disgrace the Picards, merely because they deserted the communion, and protested against the errors of the church of Rome. Lasinius informs us that Picard, together with forty other persons, besides women and children, settled in Bohemia, in the year 1418. Balbinus, the Jesuit, in his "Epitome Rerum Bohemicarum," lib. ii., gives a similar account, and charges on the Picards none of the extravagances or crimes ascribed to them by Sylvius. Schlecta, secretary of Ladislaus, king of Bohemia, in his letters to Erasmus, gives a particular account of the Picards. From this account it appears that they were no other than the Vaudois, or Waldenses, that fled from persecution in their own country, and sought refuge in Bohemia. M. De Beausobre has shown that they were both of the same sect, though under different denominations. Besides, it is certain that the Vaudois were settled in Bohemia in the year 1178, where some of them adopted the rites of the Greek, and others those of the Latin church. The former were pretty generally adhered to till the middle of the fourteenth century, when the establishment of the Latin rites caused great disturbance. On the commencement of the national troubles in Bohemia, on account of the opposition of the papal power, the Picards more publicly avowed and defended their religious opinions; and they formed a considerable body in an island by the river Launitz, or Lausnecz, in the district of Bechin, and, recurring to arms, were defeated by Zisca. See Jones' History of the Christian Church.—Hend. Buck.

PIETISTS, (CATHOLIC.) The Brethren and Sisters of the Pious and Christian Schools, founded by Nic. Barre in 1678, were so called. They devoted themselves to the education of poor children of both sexes. Mosheim's E. H. vol. v. p. 175.—Williams.

PIETISTS, (PROTESTANT;) a denomination in the seventeenth century, which owed its origin to "the pious and learned Spener," as Dr. Mosheim calls him, who formed private devotional societies at Frankfort, in order to cultivate vital and practical religion; and published a book, entitled "Pious Desires," which greatly promoted this object. His followers laid it down as an essential maxim, that none should be admitted into the ministry but those, who not only had received a proper education, but were also distinguished by their wisdom and sanctity of manners, and had hearts filled with divine love. Hence they proposed an alteration in the schools of divinity, which embraced the following points:—1. That the scholastic theology, which reigned in the academics, and was composed of intricate and disputable doctrines, and obscure and unusual forms of expressions, should be totally abolished. 2. That polemical divinity, which comprehended the controversies subsisting between Christians of different communions, should be less eagerly studied, and less frequently treated, though not entirely neglected. 3. That all mixture of philosophy and human science with divine wisdom, was to be most carefully avoided; (i. e. that pagan philosophy and classical learning should be kept distinct from, and by no means supersede, biblical theology.) But, 4. That, on the contrary, all those students who were designed for the ministry, should be accustomed from their early youth to the perusal and study of the Holy Scriptures, and be taught a plain system of theology, drawn from these unerring sources of truth. 5. That the whole course of their education was to be so directed as to render them useful in life, by the practical power of their doctrine, and the commanding influence of their example.

Such in substance is Mosheim's account of the meditative reforms in the public schools. But it was not intended to confine these reforms to students and the clergy. Religious persons of every class and rank were encouraged to meet in what were called biblical colleges, or colleges of piety, (we might call them prayer meetings,) where some exercised in reading the Scriptures, singing, and prayer, and others engaged in the exposition of the Scriptures; not in a dry and critical way, but in a strain of practical and experimental piety, whereby they mutually edified each other. This practice, which always more or less obtains where religion flourishes, (as, for instance, at the Reformation,) raised the same sort of outcry as at the rise of Methodism; and those who entered not into the spirit of the design, were eager to catch at every instance of weakness or imprudence, to bring disgrace on that, which, in fact, brought disgrace upon themselves, as lukewarm and formal Christians. "In so saying, Master, thou reproachest us also."

This work began about 1670. In 1691, Dr. Spener removed from Dresden to Berlin, where he propagated the same principles, which widely spread, and were well supported in many parts of Germany by the excellent professor Francke, and others. This raised a considerable controversy, in which the Pietists were charged with many errors: of these, the chief was, that "divine influence is necessary to the right understanding of the Scriptures;" a proposition, which is either false or true, as it is differently understood. For if it be referred to a literal, critical, or even mystical, understanding of them, it is manifestly false, and certainly was not maintained in this sense by any judicious Pietist: but they taught, that without such help, no man can enter into the spirit of them; no man can relish or enjoy those parts which relate to the divine life, and the experience of the Christian: for so saith St. Paul:—"The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." See 1 Cor. 2: 12—14. (See AFFECTATIONS.)

Another thing which gave great offence was, that they renounced the vain amusements of the world. Thus, dancing, pantomimes, public sports, theatrical diversions, the reading of humorous and comical books, with several other kinds of pleasure and entertainment, were prohibited by the Pietists, as unlawful and unseemly; and, therefore, by no means of an indifferent nature.

The will of God is to Christians the only rule of morals, and to this it is evident that their opponents, with all their clamor, dared not appeal.

The term Pietist, which at first was given to these good people in derision, "was afterwards," says Mosheim, "applied to all who, distinguished by excessive severity of manners, or who, regardless of truth and opinion, were only intent upon practice, and turned the whole vigor of their efforts towards the attainment of religious feelings and habits." This sentence, very unworthy of Dr. Mosheim, is neither consistent with itself nor with fact. If they were "only intent on practice," how could they turn their whole vigor towards the attainment of religious feelings and habits? Or, if their "whole vigor were turned to these, how could they be only intent upon practice?" But that they were regardless of truth, is manifestly false: for, as Dr. Haweis observes, "no men more rigidly contended for, or taught more explicitly, the fundamental doctrines of Christianity;" particularly in the articles of justification by faith, and sanctification.

But the most offensive of all their errors, real or supposed, was, "that no person that was not himself a model of piety and divine love, was qualified to be a public teacher of piety, or a guide to others, in the way of salvation." This was so offensive to the carnal clergy of the Lutheran church, who, it seems, at this time were not a few, that they raised the cry of heresy, and charged them (strange as it may seem) with making void the efficacy of the divine word! PIETY, or godliness; another name for personal religion. It consists in a firm belief, and in right conceptions of the being, perfections, and providence of God; with suitable affections to him, resemblance of his moral perfections, and a constant obedience to his will. The different articles included in this definition, such as knowledge, veneration, love, resignation, &c. are explained in their proper places in this work.—Hend. Buck.

PIETY, EARLY. Youth, says Mr. Jay, is a period which presents the fewest obstacles to the practice of godliness, whether we consider our external circumstances, our nature, powers, or our moral habits. In that season we are most free from those troubles which impedit, those schemes which engross, those engagements which hinder us in more advanced and connected life. Then the body possesses health and strength; the memory is receptive and tenacious; the fancy glows; the mind is lively and vigorous; the understanding is more docile; the affections are more easily touched and moved; we are more accessible to the influence of joy and sorrow, hope and fear; we engage in an enterprise with more expectation and ardor and zeal. Under the legal economy, the first was to be chosen for God; and the first-born of man, the first-born of beasts, the first-fruits of the field. It was an honor becoming the God they worshipped, to serve him first. This duty the young alone can spiritualize and fulfil, by giving Him who deserves all their lives the first-born of their days, and the first-fruits of their reason and their affection. And never have they such an opportunity to prove the goodness of their motives as they then possess. See an old man: what does he offer? his riches? but he can use them no longer. His pleasures? but he can enjoy them no longer. His honor? but it is withered on his brow. His authority? but it has dropped from his feeble hand. He leaves his sins; but it is because they will no longer bear him company. He flies from the world; but it is because he is burnt out. He enters the temple; but it is as a sanctuary; it is only to take hold of the horns of the altar; it is a refuge, not a place of devotion, he seeks. But they who consecrate to him their youth, do not profanely tell him to suspend his claims till the rest are served; till they have satisfied the world and the flesh, his degrading rivals. They do not send him forth to gather among the stubble the gleanings of life, after the enemy has secured the harvest. They are not like those, who, if they reach Immanuel's land, are forced thither by shipwreck: they sail thither by intention.

Consider the beneficial influence of early piety over the remainder of our days. Youth is the spring of life, and by this will be determined the glory of summer, the abundance of autumn, the provision of winter. It is the morning of life; and if the sun of righteousness does not dispel the moral mists and fogs before noon, the whole day generally remains overspread and gloomy. Piety in youth will have a good influence over our bodies; it will preserve them from disease and deformity. Sin variously tends to the injury of health; and often by intemperance the constitution is so impaired, that late religion is unable to restore what early religion would have prevented. Early piety will have a good influence to secure us from all those dangers to which we are exposed in a season of life the most perilous. Conceive of a youth entering a world like this, destitute of the presiding, governing care of religion; his passions high, his prudence weak, impatient, rash, confident without experience; a thousand avenues of seduction opening around him, and a syren voice singing at the entrance of each; pleased with appearances, and embracing them for realities, joined by evil company, and ensnared by erroneous publications: these hazards exceed all the alarm I can give. How necessary, therefore, that we should trust in the Lord with our hearts, and lean not to our own understanding; but in all our ways acknowledge him, that he may direct our paths!

Early piety will have a beneficial influence in forming our connexions, and establishing our plans for life. It will teach us to ask counsel of the Lord, and arrange all under the superintendency of Scripture. Those changes which a person who becomes religious in manhood is obliged to make, are always very embarrassing. With what difficulty do some good men establish family worship, after living, in the view of children and servants, so long in the neglect of it! But this would have been avoided, had they early followed the example of Joshua:—"As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." How hard is it to disentangle ourselves from associates with whom we have been long familiar, and who have proved a snare to our souls! Some evils indeed are remediless; persons have formed alliances which they cannot dissolve: but they did not walk by the rule, "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers;" they are now wedded to misery all their days; and repentance, instead of visiting them like a faithful friend, to chide them when they do wrong, and withdraw, is quartered upon them for life. An early dedication to God, therefore, renders a religious life more easy, pleasant, and safe. It is of unspeakable advantage also under the calamities of life. It turns the curse into a blessing; it enters the house of mourning and soothes the troubled mind; it prepares us for all, sustains us in all, sanctifies us by all, and delivers us from all. Finally, it will bless old age: we shall look back with pleasure on some instances of usefulness; to some poor traveller, to whom we have been a refreshing stream; to some deluded wanderer, we guided into the path of peace. We shall look forward, and see the God who has guided us with his counsel, and be enabled to say, "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them that love his appearing." Jay's Ser., vol. i. ser. 5; Jennings', Evens', Doddridge's, Jerment's, and Thornton's Sermons to Young People; Bryson's Address to Youth; Buck's Young Christian's Guide; Pike's Persuasives to Early Piety; John Foster's Essay on the Importance of Religion; Remains and Sermons of Charles Wolfe; Works of Hannah More; Philip's Manly Piety; Hawes' Lectures to Young Men; Young Man's Own Book.—*Hend. PIGEON. (See DOVE.)

PI-HAHIROTH. The Hebrew pi answers to the modern Arabic word fum, signifying "mouth;" and is generally applied to the passes in the mountains. In the English and Septuagint versions, Hahiroth is taken as a proper name; and the whole word would imply the mouth or pass of Hahiroth or Hiroth, whatever particular origin or signification may belong to that word. The name, however, sufficiently explains the situation of the children of Israel; who were hemmed in at this place, between the sea in front, and a narrow mountain-pass behind; which no doubt encouraged Pharaoh to make his attack upon them in so disadvantageous a position; thinking that they must inevitably fall an easy prey into his hands, or be cut to pieces: when their deliverance, and his own destruction, were unexpectedly wrought by the parting of the waters of the sea. The place where this miracle is supposed to have happened, is still called Bahral-Kolsum, or the sea of Destruction; and just opposite to the situation which answers to the opening called Pi-hahiroth, is a bay, where the north cape is called Ras Musa, or the cape of Moses. That part of the western or Heroopolitan branch of the Red sea where, from these coincidences, the passage most probably took place, is described by Bruce as about three leagues over, with fourteen fathoms of water in the channel, nine at the sides, and good anchorage everywhere. The farther side is also represented as a low sandy coast, and an easy landing-place. (See RED SEA.)—IVatson.

PILATE. It is not known of what country or family Pontius Pilate was, but it is believed that he was of Rome, or, at least, of Italy. He was sent to govern Judea in the room of Gratus, A. D. 26, or 27. He presided over this province for ten years, from the twelfth or thirteenth year of Tiberius, to the twenty-second of the same emperor.

He is represented, both by Philo and Josephus, as a man of an impetuous and obstinate temper, and, as a judge, one who used to sell justice, and, for money, to pronounce any sentence that was desired. The same authors make mention of his rapines, his injuries, his murders, the torments that he inflicted upon the innocent, and the persons he put to death without any form of process. Philo, in particular, describes him as a man that exercised an excessive cruelty during the whole time of his government; who disturbed the repose of Judea; and was the occasion of the troubles and revolt that followed.

St. Luke acquaints us, that Pilate had mingled the blood of the Galileans with their sacrifices; and that the matter having been related to Jesus Christ, he introduced the subject into his discourse, Luke 13. The reason why Pilate treated them in this manner, while sacrificing in the temple, is not known. At the time of our Savior's passion, Pilate made some attempts to deliver him out of the hands of the Jews. He knew the reasons of their enmity against him, Matt. 27: 18. His wife also, having had a dream that alarmed her, requested he would not stain his hands with the blood of that just person, verse 19. He therefore attempted to appease the wrath of the Jews by scourging Jesus; (John 19: 1. Matt. 27: 26.) and also tried to take him out of their hands by proposing to deliver him or Barabbas, on the day of the passover. Lastly, he thought to discharge himself from pronouncing judgment against him, by sending him to Herod, king of Galilee, Luke 23: 7, 8. When he saw all this would not satisfy the Jews, and that they even threatened him in some manner, saying, he could be no friend to the emperor if he suffered Jesus to be set at liberty, (John 19: 12—15.) he caused water to be brought, and washed his hands before all the people, and publicly declared himself innocent of the blood of that just person, Matt. 27: 23, 24. Yet at the same time he delivered him to his soldiers, that they might crucify him.

This was enough to justify Jesus Christ, as Calmet observes, and to prove that he held him as innocent; but it was not enough to vindicate the conscience and integrity of a judge, whose duty it was as well to assert the cause of oppressed innocence, as to punish the guilty. He ordered the inscription to be placed over the head of our Savior, (John 19: 19.) and when requested by the Jews to alter it, he pre-emptorily refused. He also gave leave for the removal of our Lord's body, and to place a guard over the sepulchre, Matt. 27: 65. These are all the particulars that we learn concerning Pilate from the writers of the gospels.

The extreme reluctance of Pilate to condemn Christ, considering his merciless character, is signally remarkable, and still more his repeated protestations of the innocence of his prisoner; although, on occasions of massacre, he made no scruple of confounding the innocent with the guilty. But he was unquestionably influenced by the overruling providence of God, to make the righteousness of his Son appear as clear as the noonday, even when condemned and executed as a malefactor, by the fullest, the most authentic, and the most public evidence: 1. By the testimony even of his judges, Pilate and Herod, after examination of evidence. 2. By the message of Pilate's wife, delivered to him on the tribunal. 3. By the testimony of the traitor Judas, who hanged himself in despair, for betraying the innocent blood. 4. By the testimony of the Roman centurion and guard, at his crucifixion, to his divinity and righteousness. 5. And, 5. Of his fellow-sufferer on the cross. Never was innocence so attested as his innocence.

Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Eusebius, and after them several others, both ancient and modern, assure us that it was formerly the custom for Roman magistrates to prepare copies of all verbal processes and judicial acts, which they passed in their several provinces, and to send them to the emperor. And Pilate, in compliance with the custom, having sent word to Tiberius of what had passed relating to Jesus Christ, the emperor wrote an account of it to the senate, in a manner that gave reason to judge that he thought favorably of the religion of Jesus Christ, and showed that he should be willing for them to confer divine honors upon him; but the senate was not of the same opinion, and so the matter dropped. It appears by what Justin says of these acts, that the miracles of Christ were mentioned there, and even that the soldiers had divided his garments among them. Eusebius insinuates that they spoke of his resurrection and ascension. Tertullian and Justin refer to these acts with so much confidence, as would make one believe they had read and handled them.

However, neither Eusebius nor Jerome, who were both inquisitive and understanding persons, nor any other author who wrote afterwards, seems to have seen them, at least not the true and original acts. For as to what we have now in great number, they are not authentic, being neither ancient nor uniform. There are also some pretended letters of Pilate to Tiberius, giving a history of our Savior; but they are universally allowed to be spurious.

Pilate being a man who, by his excessive cruelties and rapine, had disturbed the repose of Judea, during the whole time of his government, was at length deposed by Vitellius, the proconsul of Syria, A. D. 36, and sent to Rome, to give an account of his conduct to the emperor. But, though Tiberius died before Pilate arrived at Rome, yet his successor Calpurnia banished him to Vienne in Gaul, where he was reduced to such extremity that he laid violent hands upon himself. The evangelists call him governor, though in reality he was nothing more than procurator of Judea, not only because governor was a name of general use, but because Pilate, in effect, acted as one, by taking upon him to judge in criminal matters, as his predecessors had done, and as other procurators in the small provinces of the empire, where there was no proconsul, constantly did.—Watson.

PILGRIM; in an ecclesiastical sense, one who travels through foreign countries to visit holy places, and to pay his devotion to the relics of dead saints. The word is formed from the Flemish pelgrim, or Italian pelegrino, which signifies the same; and those originally from the Latin peregrinus, a stranger or traveller.—Hend. Buck.

PILGRIMAGE; a kind of religious discipline, which consists in taking a journey to some holy place, in order to adore the relics of some deceased saint. Pilgrimages began to be made about the middle ages of the church, but they were most in vogue after the end of the eleventh century, when every one was for visiting places of devotion, not excepting kings and princes; and even bishops made no difficulty of being absent from their churches on the same account. The places most visited were Jerusalem, Rome, Tours, and Compostella.

As to the latter place, we find that in the year 1428, under the reign of Henry VI., abundance of licenses were granted for the crown of England to captains of English ships, for carrying numbers of devout persons thither to the shrine of St. James; provided, however, that those pilgrims should first take an oath not to take any thing prejudicial to England, nor to reveal any of its secrets, nor to carry out with them any more gold or silver than what would be sufficient for their reasonable expenses. In that year nine hundred and twenty-six persons went from England on the said pilgrimage. Of late years the greatest numbers have resorted to Loretto, in order to visit the chamber of the blessed virgin, in which she was born, and brought up her son Jesus till he was twelve years of age!

In almost every country where popery has been established, pilgrimages have been common. In England the shrine of Thomas-a-Becket was the chief resort of the pious; and in Scotland, St. Andrew's, where, as tradition informs us, was deposited a leg of the holy apostle. In Ireland they have been continued even down to modern times; and many parts of that country are sacred to extraordinary worship and pilgrimage. From the beginning of May till the middle of August every year, crowds of popish penitents resort to an island near the centre of Lough Fin, or White lake, in the county of Donegal, to the amount of three or four thousand. These are mostly of the poorer sort, and many of them are proxies for those who are richer; some of whom, however, together with some of the priests and bishops on occasion, make their appearance there. When the pilgrim comes within sight of the holy lake, he must uncover his hands and feet, and thus walk to the water side, and is taken to the island for sixpence. Here there are two chapels, and fifteen other houses; to which are added confessionals, so contrived, that the priest cannot see the person confessing. The penance varies according to the circumstances of the penitent; during the continuation of which (which is sometimes three, six, or nine days) he subsists on oatmeal, sometimes made into bread. He traverses sharp stones on his bare knees or feet, and goes through a variety of other forms, paying sixpence at every different confession. When all is over, the priest bores a gimblet hole through the top of the pilgrim's staff, in which he fastens a cross peg; gives him as many holy pebbles out of the lake as he cares to carry away, for amulets to be presented to his friends, and so dismisses him, an object of veneration to all other papists not thus initiated; who no sooner see the pilgrim's cross in his hands, than they kneel down to get his blessing.

Pilgrimage is not peculiar to Roman Catholic countries. The Mahometans place a great part of their religion in it. Mecca is the grand place to which they go; and this pilgrimage is so necessary a point of practice, that, according to a tradition of Mahomet, he who dies without performing it, may as well die a Jew or a Christian; and the same is expressly commanded in the Koran. What is principally revered in this place, and gives sanctity to the whole, is a square stone building, called the Kaaba. Before the time of Mahomet this temple was a place of worship for the idolatrous Arabs, and is said to have contained no less than three hundred and sixty different images, equalling in number the days of the Arabian year.

They were all destroyed by Mahomet, who sanctified the Kaaba, and appointed it to be the chief place of worship for all true believers. The Mussulmen pay so great a veneration to it, that they believe a single sight of its sacred walls, without any particular act of devotion, is as meritorious in the sight of God as the most careful discharge of one's duty for the space of a whole year in any other temple.

To this temple every Mahometan who has health and means sufficient, ought once, at least, in his life, to go on pilgrimage; nor are women excused from the performance of this duty. The pilgrims meet at different places near Mecca, according to the different parts from whence they come, during the months of Shawal and Dhu'lkaada, being obliged to be there by the beginning of Dhu'lhajja; which month, as its name imports, is peculiarly set apart for the celebration of this solemnity.

The men put on the ibram, or sacred habit, which consists only of two woollen wrappers, one wrapped about the middle, and the other thrown over their shoulders, having their heads bare, and a kind of slippers which cover neither the heel nor the instep, and so enter the sacred territory in their way to Mecca. While they have this habit on, they must neither hunt nor fowl; (though they are allowed to fish;) which precept is so punctually observed, that they will not kill vermin if they find them on their bodies: there are some noxious animals, however, which they have permission to kill during the pilgrimage, as kites, ravens, scorpions, mice, and dogs given to bite. During the pilgrimage, it behoves a man to have a constant guard over his words and actions; to avoid all quarrelling or ill language, all converse with women, and all obscene discourse; and to apply his whole attention to the good work he is engaged in.

The pilgrims having arrived at Mecca, immediately visit the temple, and then enter on the performance of the prescribed ceremonies, which consist chiefly in going in procession round the Kaaba, in running between the mounts Safa and Meriva, in making the station on mount Arafat, and slaying the victims and shaving their heads in the valley of Mina.

In heathen countries, the two most memorable places of resort are the temple of the grand Lama in Thibet, and the temple of Juggernaut at Orissa, in Bengal. (See LAMAISM, and HINDOOISM.)—Hend. Buck.

PILLAR, properly means a column raised to support a building; but in Scripture the term mostly occurs in a metaphorical or figurative sense. Thus we have a pillar of cloud, a pillar of fire, a pillar of smoke, &c.; signifying a cloud, a fire, a smoke raised up towards heaven in the form or shape of a pillar, Exod. 13: 21. Judges 20: 40. Job speaks of the pillars of heaven and the pillars of the earth; (Job 9: 6. 26: 11.) which are strong metaphorical expressions, that suppose the heavens and the earth to be an edifice raised by the hand of the Almighty Creator, and founded upon its basis. St. Paul speaks of the Christian church under the similitude of a pillar or column, on which the truth, or doctrine of the glorious gospel, is inscribed, 1 Tim. 3: 15. See Robinson's Bibl. Repos. for 1832.—Watson.

PILLOWS. The prophet speaks of "sewing pillows to arm-holes." There is here, probably, an allusion to the easy indulgence of the great. To this day in the East they cover the floors of their houses with carpets: and along the sides of the wall or floor, a range of narrow beds or mattresses is often placed upon these carpets; and, for their further ease and convenience, several velvet or damask bolsters are placed upon these carpets or mattresses; indulgences that seem to be alluded to by the stretching of themselves upon couches, and by "the sewing of pillows to arm-holes," Ezek. 13: 18. Amos 6: 4. (See Dr. VAN.)—Watson.

PINE-TREE. The pine appears in our translation three times, Neh. 8: 15. Isaiah 41: 19. 60: 13. Nehemiah, (8: 15,) giving directions for observing the feast of tabernacles, says, "Fetch olive branches, pine branches, myrtle branches, and branches of thick trees, to make booths." The Hebrew phrase oits shemin means literally "branches of oily or gummy plants." The LXX. say cypress. Schencher says the Turks call the cypress zemin. The author of "Scripture Illustrated" says, "I should prefer the whole species called jasmin, on account of its verdure, its fragrance, and its flowers, which are highly esteemed. The word jasmin and jasemin of the Turks, resembles strongly the shemen of the Hebrew original here. The Persians also name this plant semen and simsyk." The authority, however, of the Septuagint must prevail.

In Isaiah (41: 19. 60: 13.) the Hebrew word is shedher, a tree, says Parkhurst, so called from the springiness or elasticity of its wood. Luther thought it the elm, which is a lofty and spreading tree; and Dr. Stock renders it the ash. After all, it may be thought advisable to retain the pine. La Roche, describing a valley near to mount Lebanon, has this observation:—"La continuelle verdure des pins et des chênes verts fait toujours sa beauté."—Watson.

PINNACLE of the temple, Matt. 4: 5. This pinnacle Calmet supposes to be the gallery, or parapet, on the top of the buttresses, which surrounded the roof of the temple, properly so called; and he remarks, that in Palestine the roofs of all houses were covered with terraces, or platforms; around which was a low wall, to prevent any one falling down, Deut. 22: 8. Josephus too says, the roof of the temple was defended by tall golden spikes, to hinder birds from alighting upon it, that they might not defile it with their dung. It is by no means probable, however, that the temptation of Jesus to throw himself down among the people at worship, took place on any part of the roof of the temple. It is much more likely that the place was in some more accessible, though elevated part, to which there was a passage by stairs; for, as to the very vague, though common, notion of the person of Jesus being carried through the air by the power of the devil, it is by no means probable. The account given by Hegesippus of the death of James the Less, may illustrate this incident of the temptation. He went up into a gallery, whence he could be heard by the people, and from whence he was thrown down, without being instantly killed.—Calmet.

PIOUS FRAUDS. (See FRAUDS.)

PISGAH; a part of mount Nebo; so called, being, in all probability, a distinct, and most likely the highest, summit of that mountain. Here Moses climbed to view the land of Canaan; and here he died. (See NEBO.)—Watson.

PISIDIA; a province of Asia Minor, having Lycania north, Pamphylia south, Cilicia and Cappadocia east, and the province of Asia west. Paul preached at Antioch, its capital, (Acts 13: 14.) and throughout Pisidia, 14: 24.—Calmet.

PISON, or PAISON; one of the four great rivers that watered Paradise, Gen. 2: 11, 12. (See EDEN.)—Calmet.

PITCH. In the English Bible there are two Hebrew words which are rendered "pitch"—zepheth, (Exod. 2: 3. Isa. 34: 9.) and chemer; (Gen. 6: 14.) the latter of which is again rendered slime, in Gen. 11: 3. and 14: 10. They are both thought to be used for asphaltum or bitumen, a brittle substance, of a black or brownish color, and of a consistence somewhat harder than pitch.

The ancients were well acquainted with this substance, which is nothing more than mineral tar in an indurated or hardened state. It is found on the surface of volcanic productions; and it floats in solid pieces, and in considerable abundance, on the Asphaltic lake, which has thence received its name.

It is also found near ancient Babylon, and there is reason to suppose that the mortar so celebrated among the ancients, and with which the walls of Babylon were cemented, was nothing more than a preparation of this substance, Gen. 11: 3. We are informed by Herodotus, that a composition of heated bitumen mixed with the tops of reeds, was used by the ancients as a cement. This account is confirmed by modern travellers, who assert that the remains of buildings have been discovered, in which bitumen was formerly thus employed. It was doubtless the pitch used by Noah for closing the interstices of the ark; (Gen. 11: 14.) and by the mother of Moses, to render the vessel in which she placed her infant son on the Nile (Exod. 2: 3.) water-proof. The Arabs still use it for similar purposes. (See BABYLON.)

Josephus states that bitumen was used among the ingre-lients for embalming the dead.—Abbott's Scripture Natural History.

PITHOM; one of the cities built by the children of Israel for Pharaoh in Egypt, during their servitude, Exod. 1: 11.—This is, probably, the Pithomus mentioned by Herodotus, (lib. ii.) which he places on the canal made by the kings Necho and Darius, to join the Red sea with the Nile. We find also, in the ancient geographers, that there was an arm of the Nile called Phatmeticus, Phatmicus, Phatnicus, or Phatniticus. Marsham makes Pithom the same as Pelusium, or Damietta.—Calmet.

PITY, is generally defined to be the uneasiness we feel at the unhappiness of others, prompting us to compassionate them, with a desire of their relief.

God is said to pity them that fear him, as a father pitieth his children. The father, says Mr. Henry, pities his children that are weak in knowledge, and instructs them; pities them when they are froward, and bears with them; pities them when they are sick, and comforts them; (Isa. 66: 13.) when they are fallen, and helps them up again; when they have offended, and forgives them; when they are wronged, and rights them. Thus the Lord pitieth them that fear him, Ps. 103: 13. (See COMPASSION OF GOD.)—Hend. Buck.

PLAGUES OF EGYPT. The design of these visitations, growing more awful and tremendous in their progress, was to make Pharaoh know, and confess, that the God of the Hebrews was the supreme Lord, and to exhibit his power and his justice in the strongest light to all the nations of the earth; (Exod. 9: 16. 1 Sam. 4: 8, &c.) to execute judgment upon the Egyptians, and upon all their gods, inanimate and bestial, for their cruelty to the Israelites, and for their grovelling polytheism and idolatry, Exod. 7: 14—17. 12: 12.

1. The Nile was the principal divinity of the Egyptians. According to Heliodorus, they paid divine honors to this river, and revered it as the first of their gods. They declared him to be the rival of heaven, since he watered the country without the aid of the clouds and rain. His principal festival was at the summer solstice, when the inundation commenced; at which season, in the dogdays, by a cruel idolatrous rite, they sacrificed red-haired persons, principally foreigners, to Typhon, or the power that presided over tempests, at Busiris, Heliopolis, &c., by burning them alive, and scattering their ashes in the air, for the good of the people, as we learn from Plutarch. Hence Bryant infers the probability, that these victims were chosen from among the Israelites, during their residence in Egypt. The judgment then inflicted upon the river, and all the waters of Egypt, in the presence of Pharaoh and of his servants, as foretold,—when, as soon as Aaron had smitten the waters of the river, they were turned into blood, and continued in that state for seven days, so that all the fish died, and the Egyptians could not drink of the waters of the river, in which they delighted as the most wholesome of all waters, but were forced to dig wells for pure water to drink—was a significant sign of God's displeasure for their senseless idolatry in worshipping the river and its fish, and also "a manifest proof of that bloody edict whereby the infants were slain," Wisd. 11: 7.

2. In the plague of frogs, their sacred river itself was made an active instrument of their punishment, together with another of their gods. The frog was one of their sacred animals, consecrated to the sun, and considered as an emblem of divine inspiration in its inflations.

3. The plague of lice, which was produced without any previous intimation to Pharaoh, was peculiarly offensive to a people so superstitiously nice and cleanly as the Egyptians; and, above all, to their priests, who used to shave their whole body every third day, that neither louse, nor any other vermin, might be found upon them while employed in serving their gods, as we learn from Herodotus; and Plutarch informs us, that they never wore woolen garments, but linen only, because linen is least apt to produce lice. This plague, therefore, was particularly disgraceful to the magicians themselves; and when they tried to imitate it, but failed, on account of the minuteness of the objects, (not like serpents, water, or frogs, of a sensible bulk that could be handled,) they were forced to confess that this was no human feat of legerdemain, but rather "the finger of God." Thus were "the illusions of their magic put down, and their vaunting in wisdom reproved with disgrace," Wisdom 17: 7. "Their folly was manifest unto all men," in absurdly and wickedly attempting at first to place the feats of human art on a level with the stupendous operations of divine power, in the two first plagues; and being foiled in the third, by shamefully miscarrying, they exposed themselves to the contempt of their admirers.

Philo, the Jew, has a fine observation on the plagues of Egypt: "Some, perhaps, may inquire, Why did God punish the country by such minute and contemptible animals as frogs, lice, flies, rather than by bears, lions, leopards, or other kinds of savage beasts which prey on human flesh? Or, if not by these, why not by the Egyptian asp, whose bite is instant death? But let him learn, if he be ignorant, first, that God chose rather to correct than to destroy the inhabitants; for, if he desired to annihilate them utterly, he had no need to have made use of animals as his auxiliaries, but of the divinely inflicted evils of famine and pestilence. Next, let him further learn that lesson so necessary for every state of life, namely, that men, when they war, seek the most powerful aid to supply their own weakness; but God, the highest and the greatest power, who stands in need of nothing, if at any time he chooses to employ instruments, as it were, to inflict chastisement, chooses not the strongest and greatest, disregarding their strength, but rather the mean and the minute, whom he induces with invincible and irresistible power to chastise offenders."

The first three plagues were common to the Egyptians and the Israelites, to convince both that "there was none like the Lord;" and to wean the latter from their Egyptian idolatries, and induce them to return to the Lord their God. And when this end was answered, the Israelites were exempted from the ensuing plagues; for the Lord severed the land of Goshen from the rest of Egypt; whence the ensuing plagues, confined to the latter, more plainly appeared to have been inflicted by the God of the Hebrews, (Exod. 8: 20—23.) to convince both more clearly of "the goodness and severity of God;" (Rom. 11: 22.) that "great plagues remain for the ungodly, but mercy embraceth the righteous on every side," Ps. 32: 10.

4. The visitation of flies, of the gad-fly, or hornet, was more intolerable than any of the preceding. (See FLIES.) Egypt, we learn from Herodotus, abounded with prodigious swarms of flies, or gnats; but this was in the heat of summer, during the dogdays; whence this fly is called by the Septuagint kunomia, the dog-fly. But the appointed time of this plague was in the middle of winter; and, accordingly, this plague extorted Pharaoh's partial consent.

5. A second breach of promise on the part of Pharaoh drew down a plague of a more deadly description than the preceding. The fifth plague of murrain destroyed all the cattle of Egypt, but of "the cattle of the Israelites died not one." It was immediately inflicted by God himself, after previous notification, and without the agency of Moses and Aaron, to manifest the divine indignation at Pharaoh's falsehood. And though the king sent and found that not one of the Israelites was dead, yet his heart was hardened this sixth time also, and he would not let the people go, Exod. 9: 1—7.

6. At length, after Pharaoh had repeatedly abused the gracious respites and warnings vouchsafed to him and his servants, a sorer set of plagues, affecting themselves, began to be inflicted; and Moses now, for the first time, appears as the executioner of divine vengeance; for in the presence of Pharaoh, by the divine command, he sprinkled ashes of the furnace towards heaven, and it became a boil, breaking forth with blains upon man and upon beast. And the magicians could not stand before Moses because of the boil, which affected them and all the Egyptians, Exod. 9: 8—11. This was a very significant plague: the furnace from which the ashes were taken aptly represented "the iron furnace" of Egyptian bondage; (Deut. 4: 20.) and the scattering of the ashes in the air might have referred to the usage of the Egyptians in their Typhonian sacrifices of human victims; while it converted another of the elements, and of their gods, the air, or ether, into an instrument of their chastisement. And now "the Lord," for the first time, "hardened the heart of Pharaoh," after he had so repeatedly hardened it himself, "and he hearkened not unto them, as the Lord had foretold unto Moses," Exod. 9: 12. Though Pharaoh probably felt the scourge of the boil, as well as his people, it did not soften nor humble his heart; and when he wilfully and obstinately turned away from the light, and shut his eyes against the luminous evidences vouchsafed to him of the supremacy of the God of the Hebrews, and had twice broken his promise when he was indulged with a respite, and dealt deceitfully, he became a just object of punishment; and God now began to increase the hardness or obduracy of his heart. And such is the usual and the righteous course of his providence; when nations or individuals despise the warnings of Heaven, abuse their best gifts, and resist the means of grace, God then "delivers them over to a reprobate" or undiscerning "mind, to work all uncleanness with greediness," Rom. 1: 28.

7. In the tremendous plague of hail, the united elements of air, water, and fire, were employed to terrify and punish the Egyptians by their principal divinities. This plague was formally announced to Pharaoh and his people: "I will at this season send all my plagues upon thine heart, and upon thy servants, and upon thy people, that thou mayest know that there is none like me in all the earth. For now I could stretch out my hand, and smite thee and thy people with pestilence," or destroy thee at once, like thy cattle with the murrain, "and thou shouldest be cut off from the earth; but, in truth, for this cause have I preserved thee, that I might manifest in thee my power, and that my name might be declared throughout the whole earth," Exod. 9: 13—16. This rendering of the passage is more conformable to the context, the Chaldee paraphrase, and to Philo, than the received translation, "For now I will stretch out my hand, that I may smite thee and thy people with pestilence;" for surely Pharaoh and his people were not smitten with pestilence; and "they were preserved" or kept from immediate destruction, according to the Septuagint, diēterēthēs, "to manifest the divine power," by the number and variety of their plagues. Still, however, in the midst of judgment, God remembered mercy; he gave a gracious warning to the Egyptians, to avoid, if they chose, the threatened calamity. And this warning had some effect: "He that feared the word of the Lord among the servants of Pharaoh, made his servants and his cattle flee into the houses; and he that regarded not the word of the Lord, left his servants and his cattle in the field," Exod. 9: 17—21. But it may be asked, If all the cattle of the Egyptians were destroyed by the foregoing plague of murrain, as asserted Exod. 9: 6, how came there to be any cattle left? Surely the Egyptians might have recruited their stock from the land of Goshen, where "not one of the cattle of the Israelites died." And this justifies the supposition, that there was some respite, or interval, between the several plagues, and confirms the conjecture of the duration of the whole, about a quarter of a year. And that the warning, in this case, was respected by many of the Egyptians, we may infer from the number of chariots and horsemen that went in pursuit of the Israelites afterwards, Exod. 9: 27—35. In this instance, there is a remarkable suspension of the judicial inflictation. Pharaoh had humbled himself, and acknowledged his own and his people's guilt, and the justice of the divine plague: the Lord, therefore, forbore this time to harden his heart. But he abused the long-sufferance of God, and this additional respite; he sinned yet more, because he now sinned wilfully, after he had received information of the truth; he relapsed, and hardened his own heart a seventh time. He became, therefore, "a vessel of wrath fitted to destruction," Heb. 10: 26. Rom. 9: 22.

8. The design of the eighth and the ensuing plagues, was to confirm the faith of the Israelites: "That thou mayest tell in the ears of thy son, and of thy son's son, what I have wrought in Egypt, and my signs which I have done among them; that ye may know how that I am the Lord." This plague of locusts, inflicted on the now devoted Egyptians and their king, completed the havoc begun by the hail; by this "the wheat and rye were destroyed, and every herb of the land, and all the fruit of the trees which the hail had left: and there remained not any verdure in the trees, nor in the herbs of the field, throughout the land of Egypt. Very grievous were they; before them were no such locusts as they, neither after them shall there be such," Exod. 10: 3—15. (See Locusts.)

9. The awful plague of darkness over all the land of Egypt, for three days, "a thick darkness which might be felt," in the emphatic language of Scripture, was inflicted on the Egyptians, and their chief god, the sun; and was, indeed, a most significant sign of the divine displeasure, and of that mental darkness under which they now labored. Their consternation thereat is strongly represented by their total inaction; neither rose any from his place for three days, petrified, as they were, with horror, Ps. 78: 49. This terrific and horrible plague compelled Pharaoh to relax; he offered to let the men and their families go; but he wished to keep the flocks and herds as security for their return: but Moses peremptorily declared, that not a hoof should be left behind. Again "the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, so that he would not let them go," Exod. 10: 21—27.

10. The tenth plague was announced to Pharaoh with much solemnity, Exod. 11: 4—8. Such a threat, delivered in so high a tone, both in the name of the God of Israel and of Moses, did not fail to exasperate the infatuated Pharaoh, and he said, "Get thee from me; take heed to thyself; see my face no more: for in the day thou seest my face, thou shalt die. And Moses said, Be it so as thou hast spoken; I will see thy face no more. And he went out from Pharaoh in great anger," Exod. 10: 28, 29. 11: 8. "And at midnight the Lord smote all the first-born in the land of Egypt; and there was a great cry in Egypt, for there was not a house in which there was not one dead," Exod. 12: 1—30. It is evident, from the extreme urgency of the occasion, when all the Egyptians apprehended total destruction, if the departure of the Israelites was delayed any longer, that Pharaoh had no personal interview with Moses and Aaron, which would have wasted time, and was quite unnecessary; he only sent them a peremptory mandate to be gone on their own terms. "And the children of Israel did according to the word of Moses; and they (not borrowed, as the word is wrongly rendered in the common English version) asked of the Egyptians jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment. And the Lord gave the people favor in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they freely gave what they required, and they spoiled the Egyptians," (Exod. 12: 31—36.) as originally foretold to Abraham, (Gen. 15: 14.) and to Moses before the plagues began. This was an act of perfect retributive justice, to make the Egyptians pay for the long and laborious services of the Israelites, whom they had unjustly enslaved, in violation of their charter. (See Borrow.)

The Israelites were thrust out of Egypt on the fifteenth day of the first month, "about six hundred thousand men on foot, besides women and children. And a mixed multitude went up also with them; and flocks and herds, every very much cattle," Exod. 12: 37, 38. Num. 11: 4. 33: 3. "And they went out with a high hand; for the Lord went before them by day, in a pillar of a cloud, to lead them the way; and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light, to go by day and night. He took not away the pillar of the cloud by day, nor the pillar of fire by night, from before the people," Exod. 13: 22. Num. 9: 15—23. And the motion or rest of this divine guide regulated their marches, and their stations or encampments, during the whole of their route, Num. 10: 33—36. (See RED SEA.)—Watson.

PLASTIC NATURE; an absurd doctrine, which some have thus described: "It is an incorporeal created substance, endued with a vegetative life, but not with sensation or thought; penetrating the whole created universe, being coextended with it; and, under God, moving matter, so as to produce the phenomena which cannot be solved by mechanical laws: active for ends unknown to itself, not being expressly conscious of its actions, and yet having an obscure idea of the action to be entered upon."

To this it has been answered, that as the idea itself is most obscure, and, indeed, inconsistent, so the foundation of it is evidently weak. It is intended by this to avoid the inconvenience of subjecting God to the trouble of some changes in the created world, and the meanness of others. But it appears that, even upon this hypothesis, he would still be the author of them; besides, that to Omnipotence nothing is troublesome, nor those things mean, when considered as part of a system, which alone might appear to be so. Doddridge's Lectures, lect. 37; Cudworth's Intellectual System, pp. 149, 172; Morc's Immortality of the Soul, l. iii. c. 12; Ray's Wisdom of God, pp. 51, 52; Lord Monboddo's Ancient Metaphysics; Young's Essay on the Powers and Mechanism of Nature.—*Hend. PLATONICS, New. (See NEW PLATONICS.)

PLATONISTS. The Platonic philosophy is denominated from Plato, who was born about B. C. 426. He founded the old academy on the opinions of Heraclitus, Pythagoras, and Socrates; and by adding the information he had acquired to their discoveries, he established a sect of philosophers, who were esteemed more perfect than any who had before appeared in the world. (See ACADEMY.)

The outlines of Plato's philosophical system were as follows—that there is one God, eternal, immutable, and immaterial; perfect in wisdom and goodness, omniscient, and omnipresent: that this all-perfect Being formed the universe out of a mass of eternally pre-existing matter, to which he gave form and arrangement: that there is in matter a necessary, but blind and refractory force, which resists the will of the supreme Artificer, so that he cannot perfectly execute his designs; and this is the cause of the mixture of good and evil which is found in the material world: that the soul of man was derived by emanation from God; but that this emanation was not immediate, but through the intervention of the soul of the world, which was itself debased by some material admixture: that the relation which the human soul, in its original constitution, bears to matter, is the source of moral evil; that when God formed the universe, he separated from the soul of the world inferior souls, equal in number to the stars, and assigned to each its proper celestial abode: that these souls were sent down to earth to be imprisoned in mortal bodies; hence arose the depravity and misery to which human nature is liable: that the soul is immortal; and by disengaging itself from all animal passions, and rising above sensible objects to the contemplation of the world of intelligence, it may be prepared to return to its original habitation: that matter never suffers annihilation, but that the world will remain forever; and that by the action of its animating principle it accomplishes certain periods, within which every thing returns to its ancient place and state. This periodical revolution of nature is called the Platonic, or great year.

The Platonic system makes the perfection of morality to consist in living in conformity to the will of God, the only standard of truth, and teaches that our highest good consists in the contemplation and knowledge of the Supreme Being. In this divine Being Plato admitted a sort of Trinity, of three hypostases. The first he considers as self-existing, calling him, by way of eminence, to ðn, the Being, or to hen, the One. The only attribute which he acknowledged in this person was goodness; and therefore he frequently styles him, to agathon, the Good. The second he considered as nous, the Mind, or logos, the Wisdom or Reason of the former, and the demiourgos, maker of the world. The third he always speaks of as psuche, the Soul of the world. He taught that the second is a necessary emanation from the first, and the third from the second, or perhaps from both; comparing these emanations to those of light and heat from the sun.

From the above use of logos for the second person of the Platonic trinity, it has been thought that St. John borrowed the term from Plato; but it is not likely that this apostle was conversant with his writings, and therefore both L'clerc and Dr. Campbell think it more probable that he took it from the Old Testament.

The end of all knowledge, or philosophy, according to Plato, was to make us resemble the Deity as much as is compatible with human nature. This likeness consists in the possession and practice of all the moral virtues. After the death of Plato, many of his disciples deviated from his doctrines. His school was then divided into the old, the middle, and the new academy. The old academy strictly adhered to his tenets. The middle academy partly receded from his system, without entirely deserting it. (See ACADEMY.) The new academy almost entirely relinquished the original doctrines of Plato, and verged towards the sceptical philosophy. (See NEW PLATONICS.)

An infusion of Platonism, though in a perverted form, is seen in the philosophy most prevalent in the times of the apostles. It was judaized by the contemplative Hellenists, and, through them, their native Judaism was platonized. The eclectic philosophy added other ingredients to the compound, from the Oriental systems. All however issued in pride, and the domination of bewildering and monstrous imaginations, Rom. 1: 21. 1 Cor. 1: 19—31. (See PHILOSOPHY).—Watson.

PLAY. This word is in frequent use in Scripture, and is made to express all kinds of diversions, as dancing, sportive exercise, toying, and amusements proper for recreating and diverting the mind. The word zathak, which signifies to play, is also commonly used for laughing, mocking, jeering, insulting.

There is no mention in Scripture of any particular sorts of plays; neither games of hazard, nor theatrical representations, nor races either of horses or chariots, nor combats of men or of beasts. The Israelites were a laborious people, who confined almost all their diversions to the pleasures of the country, and to those of the festivals of the Lord, their religious journeys, and their enjoyments in the temple.

This observation, however, refers to the time when the law was maintained; the ancient periods of the Hebrew republic. For when they grew irregular, they adopted the utmost excesses of idolatrous nations; their wicked and shameful sports and diversions. From the time of the Grecians, after the death of Alexander the Great, under the government of the kings of Syria and Judah, they began to study the sports and exercises of the Grecians. There were gymnasias, or schools of exercise, in Jerusalem, and places where they practised the exercises of the Greeks, wrestling, racing, quoits, &c., 1 Mac. 5: 16. 2 Mac. 4: 13—15. And when the Romans succeeded the Greeks, Herod built theatres and amphitheatres in the cities of Palestine, and instituted all sorts of games. (See GAMES).—Calmet.

PLAYFAIR, (JOHN) an eminent mathematician and natural philosopher, was born, in 1749, at Dundee; was educated at St. Andrew's; resigned a living, and became mathematical professor at Edinburgh; and died July 20, 1819. Playfair was celebrated as a geologist, and a strenuous defender of the Huttonian system. Among his works are, Elements of Geometry; Outlines of Philosophy; Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory; and a System of Geography.—Davenport; Encyc. Amer.

PLEASURE, the delight which arises in the mind from the contemplation or enjoyment of something agreeable. (See HAPPINESS).—Hend. Buck.

PLEDGE; a security or assurance given for the performance of a contract. When a man of veracity pledges his word, his affirmation becomes an assurance that he will fulfil what he has promised. But as the word of every man is not equally valid, in matters of importance, it becomes necessary that a valuable article of some kind should be deposited, as a bond on his part. So Judah gave pledges to Tamar, Gen. 38: 17. Under the law the taking of pledges was regulated: the millstone was not to be taken in pledge, (Deut. 24: 6.) nor was the person taking a pledge to enter the house to fetch it, (ver. 10.) nor to detain necessary raiment after sunset; (ver. 12.) nor was the widow's raiment to be taken in pledge, ver. 17. How mild, how benevolent are these directions. We find some reproached that they take their brother's pledge, (Job 22: 6.) that they take the widow's ox in pledge, (24: 3, 9.) that they do not restore the pledge, (as the law directed, Deut. 24: 18.) Ezek. 18: 7, 12. 33: 15.—Calmet.

PLEIADES; seven stars, anciently in the Bull's tail, but on modern globes in the shoulder, and which appear at the beginning of spring. Job speaks of the Pleiades: (chap. 38: 31. 9: 9.) "Canst thou bind the sweet influence of the Pleiades?" Hebrew Chima: Can you hinder the Pleiades from rising in their season? He gives them the name—the sweet influences of Chima, because of the agreeableness of the spring season. Jerome has translated Chima by Hyades, (Job 9: 9.) and by Pleiades, (Job 38: 31.) and by Arcturus, the Bear's tail, Amos 5: 8. Aquila sometimes translates it in the same manner. The Bear is one of the most northern constellations; but Chima rather signifies the Pleiades.—Calmet.

PLENARY INSPIRATION. (See INSPIRATION.)

PLINY, (the YOUNGER,) or CAIUS CÆCILIUS PLINIUS SECUNDUS, the nephew and adopted son of the elder PLINY, was born, in A. D. 61 or 62, at Como; was a pupil of Quintilian; and pleaded successfully as an advocate in his nineteenth year. He was, successively, tribune of the people, prefect of the treasury, consul, proconsul in Pontus and Bithynia, and augur; and died, universally esteemed, in 115. His Letters, and his Panegyric on Trajan, are the only parts of his writings that remain.—Davenport.

PLOUGH. The Syrian plough, which was probably used in all the regions around, is a very simple frame, and commonly so light, that a man of moderate strength might carry it in one hand. Volney states that in Syria it is often nothing else than the branch of a tree cut below a bifurcation, and used without wheels. It is drawn by asses and cows, seldom by oxen. And Dr. Russell informs us, the ploughing of Syria is often performed by a little cow, at most with two, and sometimes only by an ass.

In Persia it is for the most part drawn by one ox only, and not infrequently even by an ass, although it is more ponderous than in Palestine. With such an imperfect instrument, the Syrian husbandman can do little more than scratch the surface of his field, or clear away the stones or weeds that encumber it, and prevent the seed from reaching the soil.

The ploughshare is a "piece of iron, broad, but not large, which tips the end of the shaft." So much does it resemble the short sword used by the ancient warriors, that it may, with very little trouble, be converted into that deadly weapon; and when the work of destruction is over, reduced again into its former shape, and applied to the purposes of agriculture. In allusion to the first operation, the prophet Joel summons the nations to leave their peaceful employments in the cultivated field, and buckle on their armor: "Beat your ploughshares into swords, and your pruning-hooks into spears," Joel 3: 10. This beautiful image the prophet Isaiah has reversed, and applied to the establishment of that profound and lasting peace which is to bless the church of Christ in the latter days: "And they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more," Isa. 2: 4.

The plough used in Syria is so light and simple in its construction, that the husbandman is under the necessity of guiding it with great care, bending over it, and loading it with his own weight, else the share would glide along the surface without making any incision. His mind should be wholly intent on his work, at once to press the plough into the ground, and direct it in a straight line. "Let the ploughman," said Hesiod, "attend to his charge, and look before him; not turn aside to look on his associates, but make straight furrows, and have his mind attentive to his work." To such careful and incessant exertion our Lord alludes in that declaration, "No man having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God," Luke 9: 62.—Watson.

PLURALIST; one that holds more than one ecclesiastical benefice with cure of souls. Episcopalians contend there is no impropriety in a presbyter holding more than one ecclesiastical benefice. Others, on the contrary, affirm that this practice is exactly the reverse of the primitive churches, as well as the instructions of the apostle, Tit. 1: 5. Instead of a plurality of churches to one pastor, they say, we ought to have a plurality of pastors to one church, Acts 14: 23. The system of pluralities, which obtains to such an extent in England, arose out of an obsolete law, by which a poor clergyman was enabled, if he obtained the bishop's consent, to hold two or more livings under the nominal value of eight pounds sterling. By the canon law, thirty miles was prescribed as the greatest distance at which two livings could be held together; but the practice which has prevailed for more than a century, is to consider the thirty miles as forty-five. In consequence of the operation of this system, upwards of two thousand parishes are deprived of their right of possessing resident incumbents.—Hend. Buck.

PNEUMATOLOGY; the doctrine of spiritual existence. (See SOUL).—Hend. Buck.

PNEUMATO-MACHISTS; a name given to Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, and his adherents, in the middle of the fourth century, who denied that the Holy Spirit was equal in essence and dignity to God the Father. They were condemned as teachers of heresy by the council of Alexandria, in 362.—Hend. Buck.

POCOCKE, (EDWARD, D. D.), an eminent orientalist, was born, in 1604, at Oxford; was educated at Thame school, and at Magdalen hall and Corpus Christi college, Oxford; twice visited the Levant, on one of which occasions he was chaplain to the British factory at Aleppo; was Hebrew professor at Oxford, rector of Chirdrey, and canon of Christ church; and died in 1691. Among his works are, Specimen Historiæ Arabum; Abulfaragius Historia Dynastiærum; and Commentaries on the Minor Prophets.—Davenport.

POCOCKE, (Bp. RICHARD,) a clergyman and oriental traveller, distantly related to the subject of the foregoing article, was born at Southampton, in 1704, where his father was master of a free school. He received his education at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, and took the degree of doctor of laws in 1733. He undertook a voyage to the Levant in 1737; and after visiting Egypt, Arabia, Palestine, and other countries, he returned home through Italy and Germany, in 1742. He published, in 1743-5, "A Description of the East," two volumes folio, comprising an account of those parts of the world in which he had travelled, and containing much curious information. He obtained preferment in Ireland, being promoted to the see of Ossory in 1756; whence, in 1765, he was translated to Elphin and Meath. He died of apoplexy, the same year. Aikin's Gen. Biog.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

POETRY, (HEBREW.) (See MUSIC.) That a collection of writings, substantiating their claims to the most remote antiquity, and containing subjects of the most inspiring, and devotional kind, should exhibit specimens of the poetic art, is what we might naturally be prepared to expect; yet, it does not appear that the subject excited that attention, or produced that admiration, and that minute investigation to which it is entitled, till the time of bishop Louth, who has illustrated it with singular elegance, ability, and success.

According to that learned prelate, there are four principal characteristics of Hebrew poetry. First, the alphabetical, in which certain lines or verses begin with the same letter of the alphabet, or with the letters of the alphabet in regular succession. Secondly, the parabolic; the constituent principles of which are the sententious, the figurative, and the sublime. Thirdly, the parallelism; consisting in a certain equality or resemblance between the members of each period, so that in two lines, or members of the same period, things for the most part shall answer to things, and words to words, as if fitted to each other by a kind of rule or measure.

Of this parallelism there are three species: the synant-

mous, when the same sentiment is repeated in different but equivalent terms, which is done in a great variety of forms; the antithetic, when a thing is illustrated by its contrary being opposed to it—sentiments being opposed to sentiments, words to words, singulars to singulars; and the synthetic or constructive, to which he refers all that does not come within the two former classes. It generally consists of verses somewhat longer than usual, and in which the sentences answer to each other, not by the iteration of the same image or sentiment, or the opposition of their contraries, but merely by the form of construction. Others have divided the parallelism into parallel lines gradational, parallel lines antithetic, parallel lines synthetic, and parallel lines introverted. See Bishop Jebb and Horne's Introd., vol. ii. p. 424; the former of whom has, at considerable length, attempted to show that much of these species of construction are found in the New Testament as well as the Old.

Bishop Lowth further reduces the various productions of the Hebrew poets to the following classes:—1. Prophetic poetry; 2. Elegiac poetry; 3. Didactic poetry; 4. Lyric poetry; 5. Idyllic poetry; 6. Dramatic poetry.

On the nature of the Hebrew metre much has been written, but nothing like a satisfactory result has yet been arrived at. This may, in a great measure, be ascribed to the difficulties under which we labor in endeavoring to ascertain and fix the true pronunciation of the Hebrew language. Attempts have been made to determine the nature of the rhythm or quantity by Meibomius, Gomarus, Leclerc, and others on the continent, and especially by bishop Hare in England; but they have all failed to prove that the poetical compositions of Scripture are constructed on any principles similar to those of Latin and Greek verse; and it has been well remarked by bishop Lowth, that since the regulation of the metre of any language must depend upon these two particulars—the number and length of the syllables—the knowledge of which is utterly unattainable in the Hebrew, he who attempts to restore the true and genuine Hebrew versification, erects an edifice without a foundation.

The Hebrew poets were men inspired of God; and among them we find kings, lawgivers, and prophets. David was a poet, as appears from his farewell benediction on his sons. And it appears to be extremely probable that the honorable appellation Nebi, equally denoted a prophet, a poet, and a musician, as the poets principally were. Moses, Barak, David, Solomon, Hezekiah, Job, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and most of the prophets, composed poems, or pieces in verse; the most beautiful, the most majestic, and the most sublime! The expression, the sentiments, the figures, the variety, the action, every thing is surprising!

Paul gives a pagan poet the name of prophet; (Tit. i. 12: "One of themselves, even a prophet of their own, said," &c.) because, among the heathen, poets were thought to be inspired by Apollo. They spoke by enthusiasm. Oracles were originally delivered in verse. Poets were interpreters of the will of the gods.* The poet quoted by Paul, is Epimenides, whom the ancients esteemed to be inspired, and favored by the gods.

The same apostle quotes the poet Aratus, a native, as well as himself, of Cilicia. Acts 17: 28: We are the children (of the race) of God. This is part of a longer passage, whose import is, "We must begin from Jupiter, whom we must by no means forget. Every thing is replete with Jupiter. He fills the streets, the public places, and assemblies of men. The whole sea and its harbors are full of this god, and all of us in all places have need of Jupiter." It was certainly not to prove the being or to enhance the merit of Jupiter, that Paul quotes this passage. But he has delivered out of bondage, as we may say, a truth which this poet had uttered, without penetrating its true meaning. The apostle used it to prove the existence of the true God, to a people not convinced of the divine authority of the Scriptures, and who would have rejected such proofs as he might have derived from thence.

Poets, like other men, could only draw comparisons from objects with which they were conversant; hence we have in Scripture many allusions to the phenomena of nature, as extant in the countries where the writers resided; storms, tempests, earthquakes, thunder and lightning, &c. The shepherd king describes the Lord as his shepherd, who leads him in security; not as his steersman, who brings him safely into port; for he was little acquainted with nautical affairs. Very few are the descriptions of the sea, or its inhabitants, in Job, although the writer ransacks earth, and heaven, with wonderful science. Poets who dwell in tents have little reference to extensive architecture.—But, to understand their language, it is necessary to acquire as intimate a knowledge as possible of the things they knew; and even when they treat of things spiritual or celestial; because they are signified by means of terrestrial objects or incidents; and the just understanding of one may lead to a just understanding of the other. Divine inspiration itself, however superhuman it may be, must, nevertheless, speak to men in the language of men, or the instruction it means to convey will continue a perfect blank.

Of the longer poems of Sacred Writ, Solomon's Song is a beautiful performance; while the book of Job, the longest of all the Hebrew poems, is most sublime. Late writers have done much to illustrate it; yet much remains to be done. We must here conclude these brief and imperfect hints on the subject of Hebrew poetry. Those who desire further information, may consult bishop Hare's Metrical Version of the Psalms, supported by Drs. Grey, Edwards, &c., and opposed by bishop Lowth, whose Lectures on Hebrew Poetry deservedly enjoy an established reputation: to these we should add bishop Jebb's Sacred Literature, Sir W. Jones' Dissertation on the Asiatic Poetry, with others.—Calmet. See also N. A. Review, Oct. 1830.

POGGIO BRACCIOLINI, an Italian writer of the fifteenth century, who contributed powerfully to the revival of classical studies, was born, in 1380, at Terranova, in Tuscany; was educated at Florence; was appointed apostolical secretary by Boniface IX., and held that office under seven other popes; discovered many ancient manuscripts in monasteries; was appointed chancellor of the Florentine republic, and died in 1459. Poggio was a man of eminent talent, but of licentious morals, and a satirical and quarrelsome disposition. His principal works are, a History of Florence; Dialogues on Nobility; and Funeral Orations.—Davenport.

POLE, (Cardinal REGINALD,) a statesman and ecclesiastic, descended from the royal family of England, was born, in 1500, at Stourton castle, in Staffordshire; was educated at Sheen monastery, and Magdalen college, Oxford; opposed the divorce of Henry VIII. from Catharine of Arragon; was papal legate to England, archbishop of Canterbury, and chancellor of both universities, during the reign of Mary; and died in 1558, shortly after that queen. He wrote various controversial and theological works.—Davenport.

POISON, VENOM; whatever substance violently deranges the healthful functions of the animal system, and tends, if unchecked, to produce death. That there is a great variety of vegetable and mineral poisons, as hemlock, arsenic, &c., is sufficiently known; but what the Scripture usually calls poison is that liquor which asps, serpents, dragons, vipers, &c. convey by their bite, for the killing of other animals. What is poisonous and destructive to some animals, however, is harmless and medicinal to others.

Wickedness in false doctrine, wicked language, or evil courses, are likened to poison or venom: how hurtful and deadly to men's souls and bodies! how sinners delight in it, and are fond of infecting others with it! how they have it in or under their lips or tongue, in their heart, and ever ready to be vented! Deut. 32. 33. Ps. 58: 4. Rom. 3: 13. James 3: 8. The destructive judgments of God are likened to poison; how often they come insensibly on men! how they spread, torment, and destroy them! Job 6: 4, and 20: 16.—Brown.

POLL; a HEAD, NUM. 1: 2. Ezekiel's visionary priests polling or cutting short the hair of their heads, but not shaving them, may import their avoiding every mark of effeminacy, on the one hand, and every heathenish and monkish custom of superstition on the other, Ezek. 44: 20. This idea is however conjectural.—Brown.

POLLOK, (ROBERT, A. M.,) a distinguished Christian poet, was born at Muirhouse, parish of Eaglesham, about eleven miles south-east of Glasgow, October 19, 1798.

In 1813, he commenced study with reference to the Christian ministry; and in 1815, entered the university of Glasgow, where, having attended the classes five years, he received the degree of master of arts. In the autumn of 1822, he became a student of theology, in the seminary of the United Secession church, and after the usual attendance at the hall, in 1827, was licensed to preach. In all his literary course he was very assiduous; and though he suffered considerably from impaired health, does not seem to have suspected that he was preparing to be a victim of intense application. About the time he completed his studies, he published that poem which fixed his title to distinction,—“The Course of Time.”

His first public discourse, which was delivered on the 3d of May, 1827, is spoken of as a most brilliant and interesting effort; which, while it discovered a mind of extraordinary power and promise, at the same time gave indications that the church would too soon be deprived of its service. Such was the fatigue occasioned by this single exertion, that he was immediately confined to his bed; and although in a few days he was partially restored, he preached afterwards only three times.

It was soon manifest that consumption was preying upon his constitution. He now devoted himself to the pursuit of health, and received kind attentions from gentlemen of high distinction. While on a journey to Italy, having proceeded as far as Plymouth, (Eng.) he found his health inadequate to the exertion, and therefore took up his residence at Devonshire place, Shirley common, near Southampton. He here expired on the 18th September, 1827. His death was that of the true Christian; characterized by a calm faith in that religion he had preached, and a cheerful hope in that redemption which had been the theme of his song.

The reception which the “Course of Time” has met with from the public, is a sufficient testimony to the talents of its lamented author. His name is now recorded among the list of those illustrious Scotsmen, who have done honor to their country; who, from obscurity, have secured for themselves an unfading reputation; and who will be remembered by distant generations with enthusiasm and admiration.—Fiske's Memoir of Pollok.

POLLUX; a tutelary deity of mariners in ancient times, (Acts 28: 11.) whose image was placed either at the prow or stern of the ship.—Watson.

POLONES FRATRES. (See SOGINIANS.)

POLYCARP; one of the apostolical fathers, and a Christian martyr under Antoninus. He was for more than eighty years pastor of the church of Smyrna, to which he appears to have been recommended by St. John; who, according to archbishop Usher, directed one of the seven apocryphical epistles to him, under the title of the Angel of the Church of Smyrna.

The persecution growing violent in that city, a general outcry was raised for the blood of Polycarp. On this, he withdrew privately into a neighboring village, where he lay concealed for some time, continuing night and day in prayer for the peace of the church. The most diligent search was, in the mean time, made for him, without effect. But when his enemies proceeded to put some of his brethren to the torture, with the view of compelling them to betray him, he could no longer remain concealed. “The Lord’s will be done,” was his pious ejaculation; on which, he made a surrender of himself to his enemies, saluting them with a cheerful countenance, and invited them to refresh themselves at his table, only soliciting, on his own behalf, one hour for prayer. His request was granted, and his devotions were prolonged to double that period, with such sweetness and fervor, that all who heard him were struck with admiration, and the soldiers repented of their errand. Having ended his prayer, he was set upon an ass, and conveyed to the place of judgment. He was met on the way by some of the magistrates, who took him into their carriage, and tried to persuade him to abjure his profession; but he was unyielding. On his approaching the place of execution, the proconsul, ashamed of putting to death so aged and venerable a man, urged him to blaspheme Christ. It was then that he answered, “Eighty-six years have I served him, during all which time he never did me injury; how then can I blaspheme my King and my Savior?” When further urged, his answer was, “I am a Christian!” When threatened with wild beasts, he said, “Bring them forth.” When with fire, he reminded them of the eternal fire that awaited the ungodly. His last address to God had more of praise in it than of prayer. He expired at the stake, A. D. 166.—Clissold's Last Hours, &c., p. 3; Fuller's Works, vol. ii. p. 21.

POLYGYAMY; the state of having more wives than one at the same time. (See MARRIAGE.)

The circumstances of the patriarchs living in polygamy, and their not being reproved for it, has given occasion for some modern writers to suppose that it is not unlawful; but it is answered, that the equality in the number of males and females born into the world intimates the intention of God that one woman should be assigned to one man: “for,” says Dr. Paley, “if to one man be allowed an exclusive right to five or more women, four or more men must be deprived of the exclusive possession of any; which could never be the order intended. The equality, indeed, is not quite exact. The number of male infants exceeds that of females in the proportion of nineteen to eighteen, or thereabouts; but this excess provides for the greater consumption of males by war, sea-faring, and other dangerous or unhealthy occupations. It seems also a significant indication of the divine will, that he at first created only one woman to one man. Had God intended polygamy for the species, it is probable he would have begun with it; especially as by giving to Adam more wives than one, the multiplication of the human race would have proceeded with a quicker progress.

“Polygamy not only violates the constitution of nature, and the apparent design of the Deity, but produces to the parties themselves, and to the public, the following bad effects: contests and jealousies amongst the wives of the same husband; distracted affections, or the loss of all affection in the husband himself; a voluptuousness in the rich, which dissolves the vigor of their intellectual as well as active faculties, producing that indolence and imbecility, both of mind and body, which have long characterized the nations of the East; the abasement of one half of the human species, who, in countries where polygamy obtains, are degraded into instruments of physical pleasure to the other half; neglect of children; and the manifold and sometimes unnatural mischiefs which arise from a scarcity of women. (See MARRIAGE.)

“To compensate for these evils, polygamy does not offer a single advantage. In the article of population, which it has been thought to promote, the community gain nothing; (nothing, I mean, compared with a state in which marriage is nearly universal;) for the question is not, whether one man will have more children by five or more wives than by one; but whether these five wives would not bear the same or a greater number of children to five separate husbands. And as to the care of children when produced, and the sending of them into the world in situations in which they may be likely to form and bring up families of their own, upon which the increase and succession of the human species in a great degree depend, this is less provided for and less practicable, where twenty or thirty children are to be supported by the attention and fortunes of one father, than if they were divided into five or six families, to each of which were assigned the industry and inheritance of two parents. Whether simultaneous polygamy was permitted by the law of Moses seems doubtful; (Deut. 17: 16. 21: 15.) but whether permitted or not, it was certainly practised by the Jewish patriarchs, both before that law and under it. The permission, if there were any, might be like that of divorce, ‘for the hardness of their heart,’ in condescension to their established indulgences, rather than from the general rectitude or propriety of the thing itself.

“The state of manners in Judea had probably undergone a reformation in this respect before the time of Christ; for in the New Testament we meet with no trace or mention of any such practice being tolerated. For which reason, and because it was likewise forbidden amongst the Greeks and Romans, we cannot expect to find any express law upon the subject in the Christian code. The words of Christ (Matt. 19: 9.) may be construed by an easy implication to prohibit polygamy; for if ' whoever putteth away his wife, and marieth another, committeth adultery,' he who marieth another, without putting away the first, is no less guilty of adultery; because the adultery does not consist in the repudiation of the first wife, (for however unjust or cruel that may be, it is not adultery,) but entering into a second marriage during the legal existence and obligation of the first. The several passages in St. Paul's writings which speak of marriage, always suppose it to signify the union of one man with one woman, Rom. 7: 2, 3. 1 Cor. 7: 12, 14, 16. The manners of different countries have varied in nothing more than in their domestic constitutions. Less polished and more luxurious nations have either not perceived the bad effects of polygamy, or, if they did perceive them, they who in such countries possessed the power of reforming the laws, have been unwilling to resign their own gratifications. Polygamy is retained at this day among the Turks, and throughout every part of Asia in which Christianity is not professed. In Christian countries it is universally prohibited. In Sweden it is punished with death. In England, besides the nullity of the second marriage, it subjects the offender to transportation or imprisonment and branding for the first offence, and to capital punishment for the second. And whatever may be said in behalf of polygamy, when it is authorized by the law of the land, the marriage of a second wife, during the lifetime of the first, in countries where such a second marriage is void, must be ranked with the most dangerous and cruel of those frauds by which a woman is cheated out of her fortune, her person, and her happiness." Thus far Dr. Paley. We shall close this article with the words of an excellent writer on the same side of the subject:—

"When we reflect," says he, "that the primitive institution of marriage limited it to one man and one woman; that this institution was adhered to by Noah and his sons, amidst the degeneracy of the age in which they lived, and in spite of the example of polygamy which the accursed race of Cain had introduced; when we consider how very few (comparatively speaking) the examples of this practice were among the faithful; how much it brought its own punishment with it; and how dubious and equivocal those passages are in which it appears to have the sanction of the divine approbation; when to these reflections we add another, respecting the limited views and temporary nature of the more ancient dispensations and institutions of religion; how often the imperfections and even vices of the patriarchs and people of God in old time are recorded, without any express notification of their criminality; how much is said to be commanded, which our reverence for the holiness of God and his law will only suffer us to suppose were for wise ends permitted; how frequently the messengers of God adapted themselves to the genius of the people to whom they were sent, and the circumstances of the times in which they lived; above all, when we consider the purity, equity, and benevolence of the Christian law, the explicit declarations of our Lord and his apostle Paul respecting the institution of marriage, its design and limitation; when we reflect, too, on the testimony of the most ancient fathers, who could not possibly be ignorant of the general and common practice of the apostolic church; and, finally, when to these considerations we add those which are founded on justice to the female sex, and all the regulations of domestic economy and national policy, we must wholly condemn the revival of polygamy." *Paley's Mor. POLYGLOTT. (See BIBLE, POLYGLOTT.)

POLYTHEISM; (from polus, many, and theos, God;) the doctrine of a plurality of gods, or invisible powers superior to man. (See GODS, IDOLATRY, PAGANS.)

From the accounts given us by the best writers of antiquity, it seems that though the polytheists believed heaven, earth, and hell, were all filled with divinities, yet there was one who was considered as supreme over all the rest, or, at most, that there were but two self-existent gods, from whom they conceived all the other divinities to have descended in a manner analogous to human generation. It appears, however, that the vulgar pagans considered each divinity as supreme, and unaccountable within his own province, and therefore entitled to worship, which rested ultimately in himself. The philosophers, on the other hand, seem to have viewed the inferior gods as accountable for every part of their conduct to him who was their sire and sovereign, and to have paid to them only that inferior kind of devotion which the church of Rome pays to departed saints. The vulgar pagans were sunk in the grossest ignorance, from which statesmen, priests, and poets exerted their utmost influence to keep them from emerging; for it was a maxim, which, however absurd, was universally received, "that there were many things true in religion which it was not convenient for the vulgar to know; and some things which, though false, it was expedient that they should believe." It was no wonder, therefore, that the vulgar should be idolaters and polytheists. The philosophers, however, were still worse; they were wholly "without excuse, because that, when they knew God, they glorified him not as God; neither were thankful, but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves wise, they became fools, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is God, blessed forever," Rom. 1: 20, 21, 22, 25. POMEGRANATE; (reman, Num. 13: 23. 20: 5. 1 Sam. 14: 2, &c.) a low tree, growing very common in Palestine, and in other parts of the East. Its branches are very thick and bushy: some of them are armed with sharp thorns. They are garnished with narrow spear-shaped leaves. Its flowers are of an elegant red color, resembling a rose. It is chiefly valued for the fruit, which is as big as a large apple, is quite round, and has the general qualities of other summer fruits, allaying heat and quenching thirst.

The high estimation in which it was held by the people of Israel, may be inferred from its being one of the three kinds of fruit brought by the spies from Eschcol to Moses and the congregation in the wilderness, (Num. 13: 23. 20: 5) and from its being specified by that rebellious people as one of the greatest luxuries which they enjoyed in Egypt, the want of which they felt so severely in the sandy desert. The pomegranate, classed by Moses with wheat and barley, vines and figs, oil-olive and honey, was, in his account, one principal recommendation of the promised land, Deut. 8: 8. The form of this fruit was so beautiful, as to be honored with a place at the bottom of the high-priest's robe; (Exod. 28: 33. Ecclus. 45: 9.) and was the principal ornament of the stately columns of Solomon's temple. The inside is full of small kernels, replenished with a generous liquor. In short, there is scarcely any part of the pomegranate which does not delight and recreate the senses.—Watson.

POMORYANS; certain Russian dissenters, who believe that Antichrist is already come; reigns in the world unseen, that is, spiritually; and has put an end in the church to every thing that is holy. This, by the way, seems no more than is asserted by St. John: (1st Ep. ch. 4: 3.)—"This is that spirit of Antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it should come, and even now already is it in the world." It is probable, that Russian dissenters, as well as others, consider the secular spirit of their church establishment as the very spirit of Antichrist, blasting every thing that is truly spiritual and holy. They are zealous in opposing the innovations of Nikon, with regard to the church books; prefer a life of celibacy and solitude, and rebaptize their converts from other sects. (See RUSSIAN CHURCH, and RASKOLNIKS.) Pinkerton's Greek Ch., p. 330.—Williams.

POMPONIA, (GRÆCINA), the wife of Plautius, a Roman general, who commanded in England, in the year 45, is thought, from a sentence in the Annals of Tacitus, to have been a Christian, and the first in Britain. Tacitus says, "Also Pomponia Græcina, an illustrious woman, married to Plautius, (who, on his return from Britain, entered the city with the pomp of an Ovavian,) but accused of a foreign superstition, was left to the decision of her husband." The wife of Plautius, and Claudia Rufina, are supposed to be of the saints that were in Cesar's household, mentioned by Paul, Phil. 4: 22. Claudia is celebrated by Martial for her admirable beauty and learning, in the following epigram:—

"From painted Britons how was Claudia born!
The fair barbarian! how do arts adorn!
When Roman charms a Grecian soul commend,
Athens and Rome may for the same contend."

Speed, a very ancient British author, says that "Claudia sent Paul's writings, which she calls spiritual manna, unto her friends in Britain, to feed their souls with the bread of life; and also the writings of Martial, to instruct their minds with those lessons best fitting to produce moral virtues;" which Speed thinks was the occasion of this line in Martial's works:—

"And Britons now, they say, our verses learn to sing."

Gildas, the most ancient and authentic British historian, who wrote about A. D. 564, in his book called De Vict. Aurelii Ambrossii, affirms, that the Britons received the gospel under Tiberius, the emperor under whom Christ suffered; and that many evangelists were sent from the apostles into this nation, who were the first planters of the gospel; and which, he elsewhere says, continued with them until the cruel persecution of Diocletian the emperor, about A. D. 290.—Ivimey's Hist. of the English Baptists.

POMPEY, surnamed the Great, was one of the most celebrated generals of the Roman commonwealth. His relation to the Jewish history will be found stated in the articles ARISTOBULUS, and HYRCANUS.—Calmet.

PONET, or POWNET, (JOHN,) bishop of Winchester, was born 1516, in the county of Kent, (Eng.) and received his education in King's college, Cambridge. In 1551, he was consecrated bishop of Rochester, and within a year after, through the favor of king Edward VI, was preferred to the see of Winchester. He is spoken of as a man of great ingenuity, extensive erudition, and eminent piety. In sentiment he was a decided Calvinist.

He was the author of "King Edward's Catechism," a manual of great repute in its day. He published several other works also, both in English and in Latin.

When queen Mary came to the crown, he retired to Stratsburgh, in Germany, where he died in 1556, aged forty years.—Middleton, vol. i. p. 469.

PONTIFF, or HIGH-PRIEST; a person who has the superintendance and direction of divine worship, as the offering of sacrifices, and other religious solemnities. The Romans had a college of pontiffs, and over these a sovereign pontiff, instituted by Numa, whose function it was to prescribe the ceremonies with which each god was to be worshipped, compose the rituals, direct the vestals, and for a good while to perform the business of augury, till, on some superstitious occasion, he was prohibited intermeddling therewith. The Jews, too, had their pontiffs; and among the Romanists the pope is styled the sovereign pontiff.—Hend. Buck.

PONTIFICATE, is used for the state or dignity of a pontiff, or high-priest; but more particularly, in modern writers, for the reign of a pope.—Hend. Buck.

PONTUS; a province in Asia Minor, having the Euxine sea north, Cappadocia south, Paphlagonia and Galatia east, and the Lesser Armenia west. It is thought that Peter preached here, because he addresses his first epistle to the faithful of this and of the neighboring provinces.—Calmet.

POOLE, (MATTHEW,) an eminent non-conformist minister, was born in York, (England,) 1624. He received his education, and took his degree at Emmanuel college, Cambridge. Having attached himself to the Presbyterians, he entered into the ministry, and about the year 1648, became rector of St. Michael le Querne, in London. In 1657, when Richard Cromwell succeeded his father in the chancellorship at Oxford, Mr. Poole was incorporated master of arts in that university. In 1660, after the restoration of Charles II., he published a sermon upon John 4: 23, 24, preached before the mayor of London, against re-establishing the liturgy of the church of England; and refusing to comply with the act of uniformity, in 1662, he was ejected from his rectory. He submitted to the law with a commendable resignation; and sat down to his studies upon his paternal estate, resolving to employ his pen in the service of religion in general, regardless of the particular disputes among Protestants. He now devoted himself to a laborious and useful work, entitled "Synopsis Criticorum Bibliorum," which was published in 1669, and the following years. In the midst of this employment, he testified his zeal against popery in a number of works. His name was in the list among those that were to be cut off, printed in the depositions of Titus Oates, concerning the popish plot; and an incident having happened, which gave him great apprehension of danger, he retired into Holland, where he died in 1679.

His works were numerous, consisting principally of annotations on the Scriptures; his "Synopsis;" and publications against popery. He is spoken of as profound in learning, strict in piety, and universal in his charity. He was more especially distinguished as a commentator. Mr. Cecil observes, "Commentators are excellent where there are but few difficulties; but they leave the harder knots still untied; but after all, if we must have commentators, as we certainly must, Poole is incomparable, and I had almost said, abundant of himself."—Middleton, vol. iii.

POOR. This word often denotes the humble, afflicted, mean in their own eyes, low in the eyes of God. Not so much a man destitute of the good things of the earth, as a man sensible of his spiritual misery and indigence, who applies for succor to the mercy of God. In this sense the greatest and richest men of the world are on a level with the poorest, in the eyes of God.

One of the characters of the Messiah was, to judge the poor, (Ps. 72: 2, 4.) and to preach the gospel to them, Isa. 11: 4. Matt. 11: 5. Hence, Jesus chose disciples that were poor, and the greater part of the first believers were really poor men, as we may see in their history.

Solomon says, (Prov. 22: 2.) "The rich and poor meet together;" and they are like each other in one thing—God created them both; and both riches and poverty are of his bestowing. Hence the rich should not be supercilious, nor the poor despondent; both are equal in the eyes of God, Prov. 29: 13. Amos (8: 6.) reproaches the Israelites with having sold the poor for a contemptible price; as for shoes and sandals. Probably the rich actually thus sold their poor debtors, for things of no value. It is never allowed a Christian to prefer a rich before a poor man, only because he is rich, and to think better of him, to judge him more worthy of esteem and consideration, rather than he who has not the same advantages of the goods of fortune, James 2: 1.

Poverty was considered by the Jews as a great evil, and a punishment from God. Job speaks of it as of a prison, and a state of bondage, chap. 36: 8. And Isaiah (48: 10.) compares it to a furnace or crucible, wherein metals are purified.

Nothing is more earnestly recommended in Scripture than alms and compassion to the poor. (See ALMS.)—Calmet.

POOR PILGRIMS; an order that started up in the year 1500. They came out of Italy into Germany bare-footed and bareheaded, feeding all the week, except on Sundays, upon herbs and roots sprinkled with salt. They stayed not above twenty-four hours in a place. They went by couples, begging from door to door. This penance they undertook voluntarily; some for three, others for five or seven years, as they pleased, and then returned home to their callings.—Hend. Buck.

POPE; the title of the supreme pontiff, or head of the Romish church. It is derived from a Greek word, signifying father, and was, at an early period, given to all bishops, as appears from the ancient ecclesiastical writers, and is still given to every priest in Russia. But about the end of the eleventh century Gregory VIII., in a council held at Rome, ordered that the title should be applied exclusively to the bishop of Rome. What was thus arrogantly claimed has long been conceded, and is now enjoyed without dispute, and without envy. He is commonly addressed as Most Holy Father. (See ANTICHRIST.)

Pope, electors of.—The first five centuries the people and clergy together, and sometimes the clergy alone, with the consent of the people, chose the pope by plurality of voices; until after the death of pope Simplicius, in 483. Odoacer, king of the Herules and Italy, made a law, that none should be chosen without first acquainting the prince whom they had a mind to choose. This law was abolished about twenty years after, in the fourth council of Rome, under pope Symmachus, by the consent of king Theodoric, in 502. But that prince, turning Arian, afterwards reassumed the right, and did himself name pope Felix IV. The Gothic princes followed his example, only allowing the clergy to choose; but he was not to ascend the chair till confirmed by them. Justinian, who overturned the empire of the Goths, and also his successors, retained the same privilege, and demanded money of the pope elect to confirm his election. But Constantius Pogonatus freed them from this imposition in 681. Nevertheless the emperors did still keep a share in the election; so that the popes were not consecrated without their consent: until the French emperor, Louis le Debonnaire, in 824, and his successors, Lotharius I. and Louis II., in 864, restored the popes to their former liberty. In the tenth age, the marquis of Etruria and count de Tuscanella, with the grandees of Rome, chose and deposed popes as they pleased, as did the emperor Otho the Great, and his son and grandson in that same age. St. Henry, duke of Bavaria, their successor, restored the popes to their privileges again in 1014, leaving the election to the clergy and people of Rome; but his son and grandson, Henry III. and IV., reassumed the power of choosing or deposing the popes, which occasioned wars between them and the emperors about the investitures, the emperors setting up anti-popes, which occasioned a schism in the church of Rome. But after the time of Innocent II., and that the controversy between Peter de Leon, called Anaclete, and Victor IV. was extinguished, the cardinals and principal of the clergy of Rome chose pope Celestine II. by their own authority in 1143; and the rest of the clergy having parted with their pretensions, Honorius III., in 1216, or, according to others, Gregory X., in 1274, ordered that the election should be made in the conclave, since which time the cardinals have still kept possession.

Pope, made of election.—Nine or ten days after the funeral of the deceased pope, the cardinals enter the conclave, which is generally held in the Vatican, in a long gallery, where cells of boards are erected, covered with purple cloth, one for each cardinal, who is, during this time, allowed only two servants, except in case of sickness. They are guarded by the militia of Rome, who hinder all intercourse of letters from without, and the dishes also are inspected by a master of the ceremonies, lest any letters should be concealed in the meat. At length it hath obtained among them to premise certain articles, which they think necessary for the better government of the church, and every one swears to observe them if he should be chosen.

The election is made by scrutiny, access, or adoration. The first is, when the cardinal writes the name of him whom he votes for in a scroll of five pages, on the first whereof he writes, "Ego eligo in summum pontificem reverendissimum Dominum meum cardinalem." But this is written by one of his servants, that the cardinal may not be discovered by his hand. On this fold two others are doubled down, and sealed with a private seal. On the fourth the cardinal writes his own name, and covers it with the fifth folding. Then sitting in order on benches in the chapel, with their scrolls in their hands, they ascend to the altar by turns; and, after a short prayer on their knees, throw the scroll into a chalice upon the table; by it the first cardinal bishop sitting on the right, and the first cardinal deacon on the left side; and the cardinals being returned to their places; the cardinal bishop turns out the scrolls into a plate, which he holds in his left hand, and gives them as they come to the cardinal deacon, who reads them with an audible voice, while the cardinals note down how many voices every person hath; and then the master of the ceremonies burns the scrolls in a pan of coals, that it may not be known for whom any one gives his voice; and if two-thirds of the number present agree, the election is good; and he on whom the two-thirds falls is declared pope.

When the choice is made by access, the cardinals rise from their places, and going towards him whom they would have elected, each says, "Ego accedo ad reverendissimum Dominum." And the adoration is much in the same manner, only the cardinal approaches him whom he would have chosen with a profound reverence; but both the one and the other must be confirmed by the scrutiny. There was another way, of choosing by compromise: when the differences rose so high that they could not be adjusted in the conclave, they referred the choice to three or five, giving them leave to elect any, whom all, or the majority, should choose, provided it were determined within the time that a candle lighted by common consent should continue.

There is yet a fifth way of election, called by inspiration, viz., when the first cardinal arises in the chapel, and after an exhortation to choose a capable person, names such an one, to which if two-thirds agree, he is reckoned legally chosen. Which being performed by any of these methods, he is led into the vestry clothed in his pontificalibus; then carried into the chapel, seated on the altar, and the cardinals, performing the ceremony of adoration, kiss his feet, hands, and mouth; after which all the doors and gates of the conclave are opened, and the pope, showing himself to the people, blesses them; the cardinal deacon proclaiming with a loud voice to them in these words: "Anuncio vobis gaudium magnum, papam habemus. Reverendissimus Dominus cardinalis—electus est in summum pontificem, et elegit sibi nomen." This being done, he descends into St. Peter's church, the cardinals with a cross going before him; and then coming to the high altar, takes off his mitre, kneels and prays awhile, and returns thanks to God and the blessed apostles, &c.

Pope, inauguration of.—When one of the cardinals is chosen pope, the masters of the ceremonies come to his cell to acquaint him with the news of his promotion; whereupon he is conducted to the chapel, and clad in the pontifical habit, then receives the adoration, that is, the respects paid by the cardinals to the pope. After which he is carried to St. Peter's church, and placed upon the altar of the holy apostles, where the cardinals come a second time to the adoration; from thence he is conducted to his apartment; and some days after is performed the ceremony of his coronation, before the door of St. Peter's church, where is erected a throne, upon which the new pope ascends, has his mitre put off, and a crown put on his head in presence of all the people. Afterwards is the cavalcade, from St. Peter's church to St. John de Lateran, whereat all the ambassadors, princes, and lords assist, mounted on horseback, and richly clad. Next before the pope go the two cardinal deans with their red caps; and the other cardinals come after, two and two, followed by the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, and prothonotaries. When the pope is come to St. John de Lateran, the archbishop of that church presents him with two keys, one of gold, and the other of silver; then all the canons paying their obeisance, and kissing his feet, he gives the general benediction.

Pope, jurisdiction of.—The pope's jurisdiction extends to all the provinces called the Ecclesiastical Estate, which takes in Campagna di Roma, the patrimony of St. Peter, Terra Sabina, Umbria or duchy of Spoleto, the marquise of Ancona, the duchy of Urbino, Romagna, Boulonois, the duchy of Ferrara, the territory of Perugia, Le Contado de Citta Castello. In the patrimony of St. Peter are, the duchy of Castro, the cities of Caprarola, Ronciglione, &c., which belong to the duke of Parma; and the duchy of Bracciano, which has its particular duke. Between Romagna and the duchy of Urbino is the little republic of St. Marin. But to return to the dominion of the pope: la Campagna di Roma hath for principal cities Rome, Ostia, Palestrina, Frascati, Albano, Tivoli, Terracina, &c. The patrimony of St. Peter, the cities of Porto, Civita-Vecchia, Viterbo, &c. The principal cities of Terra Sabina are, Magliano, Vescovio, &c. Umbria, in the duchy of Spoleto, has Spoleto, Apisa, Todi, &c. The marquise of Ancona contains the cities of Ancona, Fermo, Our Lady of Loretta, Ascoli, Jesi, &c. The duchy of Urbino hath four considerable cities, Urbino, Senigaglia, St. Leo, &c. La Romagna hath Ravenna, Cervia, Faenza, &c. The principal city of the Bonlonois is Bologna la Grasse. The duchy of Ferrara comprehends Ferrara, Comachio, &c. The territory of Orvietta hath Aquapendente, Orvietta, &c.; and that of Perugia takes in Perugia, Citta de Pieve, &c.; and in Contado stands Citta di Castello.

As to the government of the pope's dominion. He governs the province of Rome himself; but all the other provinces are governed by legates or vice-legates. Besides which, every province has a general, who commands the soldiers; and each city a governor, chosen by the pope. But the podestas and other officers are chosen by the inhabitants; except the forts, castles, and ports, whose officers, as well as governors, depend upon the pope's choice.

POPEs, works relating to.—The principal writers who record the lives and transactions of the popes, are,—Anastasius, surnamed the Bibliothecarius, or the Librarian, who lived in the ninth century, and records the lives of the popes from Peter to Nicholas I., who died in 867. His work is full of legendary stories. It was first published at Mentz, in 1602. The best edition is that of Bianchini, at Rome, 1718—1735, four vols. folio and quarto; Platina, who wrote in the fifteenth century, who follows Anastasius, and others, and brings down the lives to 1471. His work was published at Venice in 1479; an abridgment of it in English, by Sir Paul Ricaut, appeared about 1700. They were brought down by Onuphrius Passevinus to the year 1566. His work was published in 1567.

In English, the reader will find much information respecting them in Dupin's Ecclesiastical History. Bowyer's History of the Popes, which began to be published in 1743, and was finished in a very imperfect manner, in 1751, in quarto, is the only original work entirely devoted to this department of ecclesiastical history in our language. Unfortunately, it is not always to be depended on, especially in the last volumes. Baronius, Bellarmine, and the other church historians, are full of references to the lives and transactions of the popes. One of the best epitomes of lives of the popes, is a work in German, by C. W. J. Watch, of Göttingen, which appeared in English, under the title of "A Compendious History of the Popes, from the Foundation of the See of Rome to the Present Time;" Lond. 1759, 8vo. It is brief, but impartial, and the fruit of much research. Sir Paul Ricaut's Introd. to Platina; Onuphr. Passevin.—Hend. Buck.

POPERY, comprehends the religious doctrines and practices adopted and maintained by the church of Rome. The following summary, extracted chiefly from the decrees of the council of Trent, continued under Paul III., Julius III., and Pius IV., from the year 1545 to 1563, by successive sessions, and the creed of pope Pius IV. subjoined to it, and bearing date November, 1564, may not be unacceptable to the reader. One of the fundamental tenets strenuously maintained by popish writers, is the infallibility of the church of Rome; though they are not agreed whether this privilege belongs to the pope or a general council, or to both united; but they pretend that an infallible living judge is absolutely necessary to determine controversies, and to secure peace in the Christian church. However, Protestants allege, that the claim of infallibility in any church is not justified by the authority of Scripture, much less does it pertain to the church of Rome; and that it is inconsistent with the nature of religion, and the personal obligations of its professors; and that it has proved ineffectual to the end for which it is supposed to be granted, since popes and councils have disagreed in matters of importance, and they have been incapable, with the advantage of this pretended infallibility, of maintaining union and peace.

Another essential article of the popish creed is the supremacy of the pope, or his sovereign power over the universal church. (See SUPREMACY.)

Further, the doctrine of the seven sacraments is a peculiar and distinguishing doctrine of the church of Rome: these are, baptism, confirmation, the eucharist, penance, extreme unction, orders, and matrimony.

The council of Trent (sess. 7, can. 1.) pronounces an anathema on those who say that the sacraments are more or fewer than seven, or that any one of the above number is not truly and properly a sacrament. And yet it does not appear that they amounted to this number before the twelfth century, when Hugo de St. Victore and Peter Lombard, about the year 1144, taught that there were seven sacraments. The council of Florence, held in 1438, was the first council that determined this number. These sacraments confer grace, according to the decree of the council of Trent, (sess. 7, can. 8.) ex opere operato, by the mere administration of them: three of them, viz. baptism, confirmation, and orders, are said (can. 9.) to impress an indelible character, so that they cannot be repeated without sacrilege; and the efficacy of every sacrament depends on the intention of the priest by whom it is administered. (Can. 11.) Pope Pius expressly enjoins that all these sacraments should be administered according to the received and approved rites of the Catholic church. With regard to the eucharist, in particular, we may here observe, that the church of Rome holds the doctrine of transubstantiation; and the necessity of paying divine worship to Christ, under the form of the consecrated bread or host; the propitiatory sacrifice of the mass, according to their ideas of which, Christ is truly and properly offered as a sacrifice as often as the priest says mass; it practises, likewise, solitary mass, in which the priest consecrates, communicates, and allows communion only in one kind, viz. the bread to the laity. (Sess. 14.)

The doctrine of merits is another distinguishing tenet of popery; with regard to which the council of Trent has expressly decreed, (sess. 6, can. 32.) that the good works of justified persons are truly meritorious; deserving not only an increase of grace, but eternal life, and an increase of glory; and it has anathematized all who deny this doctrine. Of the same kind is the doctrine of satisfactions; which supposes that penitents may truly satisfy, by the afflictions they endure under the dispensations of providence, or by voluntary penances to which they submit, for the temporal penalties of sin to which they are subject, even after the remission of their eternal punishment. (Sess. 6, can. 30, and sess. 14, can. 3 and 9.) In this connexion we may mention the popish distinction of venial and mortal sins: the greatest evils arising from the former, are the temporary pains of purgatory; but no man, it is said, can obtain the pardon of the latter, without confessing to a priest, and performing the penances which he imposes.

The council of Trent (sess. 14, can. 1.) has expressly decreed, that every one is accused who shall affirm that penance is not truly and properly a sacrament instituted by Christ in the universal church, for reconciling those Christians to the Divine Majesty, who have fallen into sin after baptism; and this sacrament, it is declared, consists of two parts—the matter and the form: the matter is the act of the penitent, including contrition, confession, and satisfaction; the form of it is the act of absolution on the part of the priest. Accordingly it is enjoined, that it is the duty of every man who hath fallen after baptism, to confess his sins once a year, at least, to a priest; that this confession is to be secret; for public confession is neither commanded nor expedient; and that it must be exact and particular, including every kind and act of sin, with all the circumstances attending it. When the penitent has so done, the priest pronounces an absolution, which is not conditional or declarative only, but absolute and judicial. This secret or auricular confession was first decreed and established in the fourth council of Lateran, under Innocent III., in 1215. (Cap. 21.) And the decree of this council was afterwards confirmed and enlarged in the council of Florence, and in that of Trent, which ordains, that confession was instituted by Christ; that by the law of God it is necessary to salvation, and that it has always been practised in the Christian church. As for the penances imposed on the penitent by way of satisfaction, they have been commonly the repetition of certain forms of devotion, as paternosters, or Ave-marias, the payment of stipulated sums, pilgrimages, fasts, or various species of corporeal discipline. But the most formidable penance, in the estimation of many who have belonged to the Roman communion, has been the temporary pains of purgatory. But under all the penalties which are inflicted or threatened in the Romish church, it has provided relief by its indulgences, and by its prayers or masses for the dead, performed professedly for relieving and rescuing the souls that are detained in purgatory.

Another article that has been long authoritatively enjoined and observed in the church of Rome, is the celibacy of her clergy. This was first enjoined at Rome by Gregory VII., about the year 1074, and established in England by Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, about the year 1175; though his predecessor Lanfranc had imposed it upon the prebendaries and clergy that lived in towns. And though the council of Trent was repeatedly petitioned by several princes and states to abolish this restraint, the obligation of celibacy was rather established than relaxed by this council; for they decreed, that marriage, contracted after a vow of continence, is neither lawful nor valid; and thus deprived the church of the possibility of ever restoring marriage to the clergy. For if marriage, after a vow, be in itself unlawful, the greatest authority upon earth cannot dispense with it, nor permit marriage to the clergy who have already vowed continence. (See CELIBACY.)

To the doctrines and practices above recited, may be further added, the worship of images, of which Protestants accuse the papists. But to this accusation the papist replies, that he keeps images by him to preserve in his mind the memory of the persons represented by them, as people are wont to preserve the memory of their deceased friends by keeping their pictures. He is taught, he says, to use them, so as to cast his eyes upon the pictures or images, and thence to raise his heart to the things represented, and there to employ it in meditation, love, and thanksgiving, desire of imitation, &c., as the object requires.

These pictures or images have this advantage, that they inform the mind, by one glance, of what in reading might require a whole chapter; there being no other difference between them than that reading represents leisurely and by degrees, and a picture all at once. Hence he finds a convenience in saying his prayers with some devout pictures before him, he being no sooner distracted, but the sight of these recalls his wandering thoughts to the right object; and as certainly brings something good into his mind, as an immodest picture disturbs his heart with filthy thoughts. And because he is sensible that these holy pictures and images represent and bring to his mind such objects as in his heart he loves, honors, and venerates, he cannot but upon that account love, honor, and respect the images themselves.

The council of Trent likewise decreed, that all bishops and pastors who have the care of souls do diligently instruct their flocks, "that it is good and profitable to desire the intercession of saints reigning with Christ in heaven." And this decree the papists endeavor to defend by the following observations. They confess that we have but one Mediator of redemption, but affirm that it is acceptable to God that we should have many mediators of intercession. Moses (they say) was such a mediator for the Israelites; Job for his three friends; Stephen for his persecutors. The Romans were thus desired by Paul to be his mediators; so were the Corinthians; so the Ephesians; (Ep. to Rom. Cor. Eph.) so almost every sick man desires the congregation to be his mediators, by remembering him in their prayers. And so the papist desires the blessed in heaven to be his mediators; that is, that they would pray to God for him. But between these living and dead mediators there is no similarity: the living mediator is present, and certainly hears the request of those who desire him to intercede for them; the dead mediator is as certainly absent, and cannot possibly hear the requests of all those who at the same instant may be begging him to intercede for them, unless he be possessed of the divine attribute of omnipresence; and he who gives that attribute to any creature is unquestionably guilty of idolatry. And as this decree is contrary to one of the first principles of natural religion, so does it receive no countenance from Scripture, or any Christian writer of the three first centuries. Other practices peculiar to the papists are, the religious honor and respect that they pay to sacred relics; by which they understand not only the bodies and parts of the bodies of the saints, but any of those things that appertained to them, and which they touched; and the celebration of divine service in an unknown tongue: to which purpose the council of Trent hath denounced an anathema on any one who shall say that mass ought to be celebrated only in the vulgar tongue: (sess. 25, and sess. 22, can. 9.) though the council of Lateran, under Innocent III., in 1215, (can. 9.) had expressly decreed, that, because in many parts within the same city and diocese there are many people of different manners and rites mixed together, but of one faith, the bishops of such cities or dioceses should provide fit men for celebrating divine offices, according to the diversity of tongues and rites, and for administering the sacraments.

We shall only add, that the church of Rome maintains, that unwritten traditions ought to be added to the Holy Scriptures, in order to supply their defect, and to be regarded as of equal authority; that the books of the Apocrypha are canonical Scripture; that the Vulgate edition of the Bible is to be deemed authentic; and that the Scriptures are to be received and interpreted according to that sense which the holy mother church, to whom it belongs to judge of the true sense, hath held, and both hold, and according to the unanimous consent of the fathers.

Such are the principal and distinguishing doctrines of popery, most of which have received the sanction of the council of Trent, and that of the creed of pope Pius IV., which is received, professed, and sworn to, by every one who enters into holy orders in the church of Rome; and at the close of this creed we are told, that the faith contained in it is so absolutely and indispensably necessary, that no man can be saved without it.

It is one of the worst properties of popery that it has no natural tendency to improve; that it evidently stands still in the career of ages; that whilst other orbs are brightening more and more unto the perfect day, it remains the same cheerless, changeless, and opaque spot on the face of an illuminated sky.

POPOFTCHINS; a name given to the different sects of Russian dissenters who recognise the validity of ordination as given in the established church, and receive most of their priests from that communion. Those who have no priests at all, or who do not acknowledge the validity of church ordination, are termed Bez-Popofschins, or No-Priesters.—Hend. Buck.

PORPHYRY, or PORPHYRUS, a philosopher, whose original name was Malchus, was born, A. D. 233, at Tyre; studied under Origen and Longinus; became a disciple of Plotinus; and died, in 304, at Rome. His works against the Christians, to the number of fifteen, are lost. Among his extant productions are, a Life of Pythagoras; a Treatise on Abstinence from Animal Food; and Questions on Homer.—Davenport.

PORSON, (RICHARD,) an eminent hellenist and critic, was born, in 1759, at East Ruston, in Norfolk; was educated at Eton, and at Trinity college, Cambridge; was elected Greek professor in 1793; became librarian of the London institution; and died September 19, 1808. In profound knowledge of Greek, critical powers, and acuteness, Porson had few equals. Among his works are, Letters to Archdeacon Travis; editions of Æschylus, and some of the plays of Euripides; and Tracts and Miscellaneous Criticisms.—Davenport.

PORTER, (EBENEZER, D. D. ; ) late president of the theological seminary, Andover, Mass. Dr. Porter was connected with the seminary from 1814 to the time of his death, April 8, 1834. He was previously pastor of a Congregational church in Washington, Conn. Dr. Porter bequeathed a handsome property to religious uses ; among other bequests, he gave fifty thousand dollars to the American Education society. An account of his life, and many of his manuscripts, will probably be published. He published several valuable Sermons, the Young Preacher's Manual, a Rhetorical Reader, an Analysis of Rhetorical Delivery, and Lectures on Homiletics and Preaching ; also an abridgment of Owen on Spiritual Mindfulness, and on the one hundred and thirtieth Psalm.—Boston Recorder, 1834 ; Am. Quar. Observer, 1834.

PORTERS OF THE TEMPLE. The Levites discharged the office of porters of the temple both day and night, and had the care both of the treasure and offerings. The office of porter was in some sort military ; properly speaking, they were the soldiers of the Lord, and the guards of his house, to whose charge the several gates of the courts of the sanctuary were appointed by lot, 1 Chron. 26 : 1, 13, 19. " They waited at every gate ; and were not permitted to depart from their service ; " ( 2 Chron. 35 : 15 ) and they attended by turns in their courses, as the other Levites did, 2 Chron. 8 : 14. Their proper business was to open and shut the gates, and to attend at them by day, as a sort of peace-officers, in order to prevent any tumult among the people ; to keep strangers, and the excommunicated and unclean persons, from entering into the holy court ; and, in short, to prevent whatever might be prejudicial to the safety, peace, and purity of the holy place and service. They also kept guard by night about the temple and its courts ; and they are said to have been twenty-four in number, including three priests, who stood sentry at so many different places.

There was a superior officer over the whole guard, called by Maimonides, " the man of the mountain of the house ; " he walked the round as often as he pleased ; when he passed a sentinel that was standing, he said, " Peace be unto you ; " but if he found one asleep, he struck him, and he had liberty to set fire to his garment. This custom may, perhaps, be alluded to in the following passage :— " Behold, I come as a thief ; " that is, unawares ; " blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments ; " Rev. 16 : 15. Psalm 134. seems to be addressed to these watchmen of the temple, " who by night stand in the house of the Lord ; " in which they are exhorted to employ their waking hours in acts of praise and devotion.—Watson.

PORTESSE, PORTASSE, PORTOUS, for the word is variously spelled in the old English writers, was the breviary, which contained not only the office of the mass, but all the services of the church, except the form of marriage.—Hend. Buck.

PORTEUS, (BEILBY,) an eminent and beloved prelate, of the church of England, was born, in 1731 at York, and entered as a sizer at Christ college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. After having been chaplain to archbishop Secker, he was, successively, rector of Hunton, prebendary of Peterborough, rector of Lambeth, king's chaplain, and master of St. Cross hospital, near Winchester. To Hunton he was much attached, and enjoyed with peculiar pleasure the delights of retirement ; but, though retired, he was not indolent. He discharged with zeal all the duties of his parish ; preached almost every morning ; lectured almost every afternoon ; and by his visits, alike to the poor and the rich, he gained the affections of all his parishioners. On the 20th of December, 1776, he kissed the king's hand, on his promotion to the see of Chester ; a preferment on his own part perfectly unsolicited, and so entirely unlooked for, that till a short time before it happened, he had not the smallest expectation of it.

The time however arrived, when the bishop of Chester was destined to fill a still more distinguished situation in the English church. The high character he had long maintained ; his zeal, his activity, his judgment, his powers of usefulness in every branch of his profession, and all these illustrated and adorned by a most unblemished life, and the most conciliating and attracting manners, naturally marked him out as the person best qualified to supply the vacancy, which had for some time been expected, in the see of London. Accordingly, the very next day after the death of Dr. Louth, which took place at the palace at Fulham, the 3d of November, 1787, the bishop, who was then at Hunton, received, by a king's messenger, a letter from Mr. Pitt, appointing him to that dignity. This appointment, like all that he had before filled, was, on his own part, perfectly unsought for and unsolicited. He now prosecuted a plan, which he had long had much at heart, for improving the condition of the negro slaves employed in the cultivation of the West India islands, and particularly for their better instruction in religious knowledge. In 1798, he prepared and delivered his admirable course of lectures on the gospel of St. Matthew.

It is well known that a society has been long established, under the title of " The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge," which the bishop zealously and actively supported. Of the British and Foreign Bible society, he was also a vice-president. He died in 1808. Among his works are, Sermons ; a Life of Secker ; and a Seatonian prize poem on Death.—Davenport ; Jones' Chris. Biog.

POSITIVE INSTITUTES. The nature of a positive law essentially differs from that of a moral law. The matter of a moral law, whether it be of the nature of a requirement or of a prohibition, commends itself as holy, just, and good, and must, therefore, be unchangeable, and of perpetual obligation ; but a positive law, whether to do or to omit, has nothing either of good or evil in itself, and is binding only by virtue of its being enacted ; and, therefore, may be changed at the will of the lawgiver.

" Moral precepts," says bishop Butler, " are precepts, the reason of which we do not see ; positive precepts are precepts, the reason of which we do not see. Moral duties arise out of the nature of the case itself, prior to external command ; positive duties do not arise out of the nature of the case, but from external command ; nor would they be duties at all, were it not for such command, received from him whose creatures and subjects we are."

" Positive precepts," says president Edwards, " are the greatest, and most proper trials of obedience ; because in them the mere authority and will of the legislator is the sole ground of the obligation, and nothing in the nature of the things themselves ; and, therefore, they are the greatest trial of any person's respect to that authority and will." (SEE INSTITUTIONS.)

Dr. Gerard observes, " A total disregard to the positive and external duties of religion, or a very great neglect of them, is justly reckoned more blamable, and a stronger evidence of an unprincipled character, than even some transgressions of moral obligation. Even particular positive precepts, as soon as they are given by God, have something moral in their nature. Suppose the rights which are enjoined by them perfectly indifferent before they were enjoined ; yet, from that moment, they cease to be indifferent. The divine authority is interposed for the observance of them. To neglect them is no longer to forbear an indifferent action ; or to do a thing in one way rather than another, which has naturally no greater propriety : it is very different ; it is to disobey God ; it is to despise his authority ; it is to resist his will. Can any man believe a God, and not acknowledge that disobedience to him, and contempt of his authority, is immoral, and far from the least heinous species of immorality."

POSSESSION OF THE DEVIL. (See DEMONIACS.)

POST; a messenger or regulated courier, appointed to carry with expedition the dispatches of princes, or the letters of private persons in general, Job 9: 25. Jer. 51: 31. 2 Chron. 30: 6. Esther 3: 13, &c. It is thought that the use of posts is derived from the Persians. Diodorus Siculus observes, that the kings of Persia, in order to have intelligence of what was passed through all the provinces of their vast dominions, placed sentinels at eminences, at convenient distances, where towers were built. These sentinels gave notice of public occurrences from one to another, with a very loud and shrill voice, by which news was transmitted from one extremity of the kingdom to another with great expedition. But as this could not be practised, except in the case of general news, which it was expedient that the whole nation should be acquainted with, Cyrus, as Xenophon relates, appointed couriers and places for post-horses, building on purpose, on all the high-roads, houses for the reception of the couriers, where they were to deliver their packets to the next, and so on. This they did night and day, so that no inclemency of weather was to stop them; and they are represented as moving with astonishing speed. In the judgment of many they went faster than cranes could fly. Herodotus owns, that nothing swifter was known for a journey by land. Xerxes, in his famous expedition against Greece, planted posts from the Ægean sea to Shushan, or Susa, to send notice thither of what might happen to his army; he placed these messengers from station to station, to convey his packets, at such distances from each other as a horse might easily travel.—Watson.

POSTIL; a gloss or marginal note. It is a word that came into use in the middle ages. It is compounded of the Latin preposition post, after, and the pronoun illa, that, and signifies that it follows after the text. The postilla seem originally to have been short explanations of the gospel or epistle of the day. These sometimes found their way into writing, and appeared either as marginal notes, or short explanatory notes. Dupin says, "they for the most part give grammatical explanations of the words, and take notice of any little trifle." Nicholas de Lyra entitles his commentary on the whole Scriptures, "Postilla Perpetuale; sive brevia Commentaria in Universa Biblia." These postils, however, are not entitled to Dupin's censure.—H. Buck.

POTAMIENA; a Christian martyr under Severus, in the beginning of the third century. She was a slave, of great beauty; but for not reciprocating the passion of her master, she was given up as a Christian to the prefect of Egypt. She was scourged; and, unmoved by threats, was led to the fire and burnt, together with her mother Marcella. Scalding pitch was poured upon her body, which she bore with great patience. Basilides, her executioner, became her convert, and suffered martyrdom.

POTIPHAR; an officer of the court of Pharaoh, king of Egypt (Gen. 37: 26.) general of his troops, according to the Vulgate; but chief of his victuallers, or cooks, according to the Hebrew.—Calmet.

POTSHERD; a broken fragment, or piece of an earthen vessel; not a brittle pot only, but a piece of a pot; a pot already broken, Isa. 45: 9.—Calmet.

POTTER; a maker of earthen vessels, of which there is frequent mention made in Scripture. Jeremiah (18: 3.) represents him while at work as sitting on two stones. Homer says that the potter turns the wheel with his hands; but at the present day it is turned by another. When God would show his rightful dominion over sinful men, and his power over their hearts, he has recourse to the similitude of a potter, who makes what he pleases of his clay; of this a vessel of honor, of that a vessel of dishonor: now forming it, then breaking it; now preserving it, and then rejecting it. See Ps. 2: 9. Rom. 9: 21. Jer. 18: 2, 3, &c.—Calmet.

POTTER'S FIELD. (See ACCLAMATA.)

POTTER (JOHN), a learned prelate, was born, about 1672, at Wakefield; was educated at the free school there, and at University college, Oxford; was made bishop of Oxford in 1715, and archbishop of Canterbury in 1737, and died in 1747. He wrote Archæologia Græca; and various theological works; and edited Clemens Alexandrinus, and Lycophron's Alexandra.—Davenport.

POTTER, (ROBERT), a divine and poet, was born in 1721; was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge; and was for some years vicar of Searning, after which he obtained the livings of Lowestoff and Kessingland, and a prebend in the cathedral of Norwich. He died in 1801. His original poetry consists of a volume of Poems, and two Odes from Isaiah, and is much above mediocrity. But he is best known by his spirited versions of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides.—Davenport.

POVERTY is that state or situation opposed to riches, in which we are deprived of the conveniences of life. Indigence is a degree lower, where we want the necessaries, and is opposed to superfluity. Want seems rather to arrive by accident, implies a scarcity of provision, rather than a lack of money, and is opposed to abundance. Need and necessity relate less to the situation of life than the other three words, but more to the relief we expect, or the remedy we seek; with this difference between the two, that need seems less pressing than necessity.

Poverty has been sanctified by Christ in his own person, and in that of his parents; in that of his apostles, and of the most perfect of his disciples. Solomon besought the Lord to give him neither poverty nor riches, (Prov. 30: 8.) looking on each extreme as a dangerous rock to virtue.

2. Poverty of mind is a state of ignorance, or a mind void of religious principle and enjoyment, Rev. 3: 17.

3. Poverty of spirit consists in an inward sense and feeling of our wants and defects; a conviction of our wretched and forlorn condition by nature; with a dependence on divine grace and mercy for pardon and acceptance, Matt. 5: 3. It must be distinguished from a poor spiritedness, a sneaking fearfulness, which bringeth a snare. It is the effect of the operation of the divine Spirit on the heart; (John 16: 8.) is attended with submission to the divine will; contentment in our situation; meekness and forbearance as to others, and genuine humility as to ourselves. It is a spirit approved of by God, (Isa. 66: 2.) evidential of true religion, (Luke 18: 13.) and terminates in endless felicity, Matt. 5: 3. Isa. 57: 15. POWER; the ability of performing a thing. It is in a sovereign degree an attribute of Deity. God is all-powerful. It means sometimes a right, privilege or dignity; (John 1: 12.) sometimes absolute authority; (Matt. 28: 18.) sometimes the exertion, or act of power, as of the Holy Spirit, (Eph. 1: 19.) of angels, or of human governments, magistrates, &c.; (Rom. 13: 1.) and perhaps it generally includes the idea of dignity, superiority. So, the body is sown in weakness, but raised in power.—Calmet.

POWER OF GOD. (See OMNIPOTENCE.)

POWERS OF THE MIND, are those faculties by which we think, reason, judge, &c. (See PHRENOLOGY, and SOUL.)

"They are so various," says Dr. Reid, "so many, so connected, and complicated in most of their operations, that there never has been any division of them proposed which is not liable to considerable objections. The most common division is that of understanding and will.

Under the will we comprehend our active powers, and all that lead to action, or influence the mind to act, such as appetites, passions, affections.

The understanding comprehends our contemplative powers, by which we perceive objects; by which we conceive or remember them; by which we analyze or compound them; and by which we judge and reason concerning them. Or the intellectual powers are commonly divided into simple apprehension, judgment, and reasoning." PRACTICAL WORKS; such books as treat of and tend to promote Christian practice. With some great exceptions, works of this class are, from their very nature, of a more temporary character than any other theological production. Generally speaking, they are, and must be, adapted to the peculiar circumstances of their own age; they must be specially addressed to correct its prevailing evil tendencies; they must pre-eminently promote those parts of the Christian character which are least cultivated. They must also, in their external form, partake in some measure of the habits of the times. Such as are founded on a deep knowledge of human nature, and animated with genuine piety, must indeed benefit other ages, since human nature remains essentially the same; but their most direct influence belongs to the age in which they are written. Subsequently they may often form individuals: transfused into their minds, they are reproduced in other shapes, but are themselves withdrawn from circulation. Their body perishes; while the soul which gave it life migrates into another and another frame, and thus continues often to diffuse an extensive blessing, when the very name under which they originally appeared is forgotten. Pusey's Historical Inquiry, p. 11—180.—Hend. Buck.

PRASE; an acknowledgment made of the excellency or perfection of any person or action, with a commendation of the same.

"The desire of praise," says an elegant writer, "is generally connected with all the finer sensibilities of human nature. It affords a ground on which exhortation, counsel, and reproof can work a proper effect. To be entirely destitute of this passion, betokens an ignoble mind, on which no moral impression is easily made; for where there is no desire of praise, there will also be no sense of reproach; but while it is admitted to be a natural, and in many respects an useful principle of action, we are to observe that it is entitled to no more than our secondary regard. It has its boundary set, by transgressing which, it is at once transformed from an innocent into a most dangerous passion. When, passing its natural line, it becomes the ruling spring of conduct; when the regard which we pay to the opinions of men encroaches on that reverence which we owe to the voice of conscience and the sense of duty; the love of praise, having then gone out of its proper place, instead of improving, corrupts; and, instead of elevating, debases our nature." Young's Love of Fame; Blair's Sermons, vol. ii. ser. 6; Jortin's Diss., diss. 4, passim; Witberforce's Pract. View, ch. 4, sec. 3; Smith's Theory of Moral Sent., vol. i. p. 233; Fitzosborne's Letters, let. 18; *Foster's Essays; Buckminster's Sermons; Works of Hannah More; Abercrombie on the Moral Feelings; Am. PRASE OF GOD; the acknowledging his perfections, works, and benefits. Praise and thanksgiving are generally considered as synonymous, yet some distinguish them thus:—Praise properly terminates in God, on account: of his natural excellencies and perfections, and is that act of devotion by which we confess and admire his several attributes; but thanksgiving is a more contracted duty, and imports only a grateful sense and acknowledgment of past mercies. We praise God for all his glorious acts of every kind, that regard either us or other men; for his very vengeance, and those judgments which he sometimes sends abroad in the earth; but we thank him, properly speaking, for the instances of his goodness alone, and for such only of these as we ourselves are some way concerned in. (See THANKS GIVING.) Bishop Atterbury's Sermon on Psalm 1: 14; Saurin's Sermons, vol. i. ser. 14; Tillotson's Sermons, ser. 146; Works of Robert Hall.—Hend. Buck.

PRAYER has been well defined, the offering up of our desires unto God, for things agreeable to his will, in the name or through the mediation of Jesus Christ, by the help of the Holy Spirit, with a confession of our sins, and a thankful acknowledgment of his mercies.

1. Prayer is in itself a becoming acknowledgment of the all-sufficiency of God, and of our dependence upon him. It is his appointed means for the obtaining of both temporal and spiritual blessings. He could bless his creatures in another way: but he will be inquired of, to do for them those things of which they stand in need, Ezek. 36: 37. It is the act of an indigent creature, seeking relief from the fountain of mercy. A sense of want excites desire, and desire is the very essence of prayer. "One thing have I desired of the Lord," says David: "that will I seek after." Prayer without desire is like an altar without a sacrifice, or without the fire from heaven to consume it. When all our wants are supplied, prayer will be converted into praise; till then Christians must live by prayer, and dwell at the mercy-seat. God alone is able to hear and to supply their every want. The revelation which he has given of his goodness lays a foundation for our asking with confidence the blessings we need, and his ability encourages us to hope for their bestowment. "O thou that hearest prayer; unto thee shall all flesh come," Ps. 65: 2.

2. Prayer is a spiritual exercise, and can only be performed acceptably by the assistance of the Holy Spirit, Rom. 8: 26. "The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord, but the prayer of the upright is his delight." The Holy Spirit is the great agent in the world of grace, and without his special influence there is no acceptable prayer. Hence he is called the Spirit of grace and of supplication: for he it is that enables us to draw nigh unto God, filling our mouth with arguments, and teaching us to order our cause before him, Zech. 12: 10.

3. All acceptable prayer must be offered in faith, or a believing frame of mind. "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him. But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering: for let not the wavering man think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord," James 1: 5—7. "He that cometh unto God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him," Heb. 11: 6. It must be offered in the name of Christ, believing in him as revealed in the word of God, placing in him all our hope of acceptance, and exercising unfeigned confidence in his atoning sacrifice and prevalent intercession.

4. Prayer is to be offered for "things agreeable to the will of God." So the apostle says: "This is the confidence that we have in him, that, if we ask any thing according to his will, he heareth us; and if we know that he hear us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of him," 1 John 5: 14, 15. Our prayers must therefore be regulated by the revealed will of God, and come within the compass of the promises. These are to be the matter and the ground of our supplications. What God has not particularly promised, he may nevertheless possibly bestow; but what he has promised he will assuredly perform. Of the good things promised to Israel of old not one failed, but all came to pass; and in due time the same shall be said of all the rest.

5. All this must be accompanied with confession of our sins, and thankful acknowledgment of God's mercies. These are two necessary ingredients in acceptable prayer. "I prayed," says the prophet Daniel, "and made confession." Sin is a burden, of which confession unloads the soul. "Father," said the returning prodigal, "I have sinned against heaven and in thy sight." Thanksgiving is also as necessary as confession; by the one, we take shame to ourselves; by the other, we give glory to God. By the one, we abase the creature; by the other we exalt the Creator. In petitioning favors from God, we act like dependent creatures; in confession, like sinners; but in thanksgiving, like angels.

The reason on which this great and efficacious duty rests, has been a subject of some debate. On this point, however, we have nothing stated in the Scriptures. From them we learn only, that God has appointed it; that he enjoins it to be offered in faith, that is, faith in Christ, whose atonement is the meritorious and procuring cause of all the blessings to which our desires can be directed; and that prayer so offered is an indispensable condition of our obtaining the blessings for which we ask. As a matter of inference, however, we may discover some glimpses of the reason in the divine mind on which its appointment rests. That reason has sometimes been said to be the moral preparation and state of fitness produced in the soul for the reception of the divine mercies which the act and, more especially, the habit of prayer must induce. Against this stands the strong and, in a scriptural view, fatal objection, that an efficiency is thus ascribed to the mere act of a creature to produce those great and, in many respects, radical changes in the character of man, which we are taught, by inspired authority, to refer to the direct influences of the Holy Spirit. What is it that fits man for forgiveness, but simply repentance? Yet that is expressly said to be the "gift" of Christ, and supposes strong operations of the illuminating and convincing Spirit of Truth, the Lord and Giver of spiritual life; and if the mere acts and habit of prayer had efficiency enough to produce a scriptural repentance, then every formalist atteaching with ordinary seriousness to his devotions must, in consequence, become a penitent. Again: if we pray for spiritual blessings aright, that is, with an earnestness of desire which arises from a due apprehension of their importance, and a preference of them to all earthly good, who does not see that this implies such a deliverance from the earthly and carnal disposition which characterizes our degenerate nature, that an agency far above our own, however we may employ it, must be supposed? or else, if our own prayers could be efficient up to this point, we might, by the continual application of this instrument, complete our regeneration, independent of that grace of God, which, after all, this theory brings in. It may indeed be said, that the grace of God operates by our prayers to produce in us a state of moral fitness to receive the blessings we ask. But this gives up the point contended for, the moral efficiency of prayer; and refers the efficiency to another agent working by our prayers as an instrument. Still, however, it may be affirmed, that the Scriptures nowhere represent prayer as an instrument for improving our moral state, in any other way than as the means of bringing into the soul new supplies of spiritual life and strength. It is therefore more properly to be considered as a condition of our obtaining that grace by which such effects are wrought, than as the instrument by which it effects them. In fact, all genuine acts of prayer depend upon a grace previously bestowed, and from which alone the disposition and the power to pray proceed. So it was said of Saul of Tarsus, "Behold, he prayeth!" He prayed in fact then for the first time; but that was in consequence of the illumination of his mind as to his spiritual danger, effected by the miracle on the way to Damascus, and the grace of God which accompanied the miracle. Nor does the miraculous character of the means by which conviction was produced in his mind, affect the relevancy of this to ordinary cases. By whatever means God may be pleased to fasten the conviction of our spiritual danger upon our minds, and to awaken us out of the long sleep of sin, that conviction must precede real prayer, and comes from the influence of his grace, rendering the means of conviction effectual. Thus it is not the prayer which produces the conviction, but the conviction which gives birth to the prayer; and if we pursue the matter to its subsequent stages, we shall come to the same result. We pray for what we feel we want; that is, for something not in our possession; we obtain this either by impartation from God, to whom we look up as the only Being able to bestow the good for which we ask him; or else we obtain it, according to this theory, by some moral efficiency being given to the exercise of prayer to work it in us. Now, the latter hypothesis is in many cases manifestly absurd. We ask for pardon of sin, for instance; but this is an act of God done for us, quite distinct from any moral change which prayer may be said to produce in us, whatever efficiency we may ascribe to it; for no such change in us can be pardon, since that must proceed from the party offended. We ask for increase of spiritual strength; and prayer is the expression of that want. But if it supply this want by its own moral efficiency, it must supply it in proportion to its intensity and earnestness; which intensity and earnestness can only be called forth by the degree in which the want is felt; so that the case supposed is contradictory and absurd, as it makes the sense of want to be in proportion to the supply which ought to abate or remove it. And if it be urged, that prayer at least produces in us a fitness for the supply of spiritual strength, because it is excited by a sense of our wants, the answer is, that the fitness contended for consists in that sense of want itself which must be produced in us by the previous agency of grace, or we should never pray for supplies. There is, in fact, nothing in prayer simply which appears to have any adaptation, as an instrument, to effect a moral change in man, although it should be supposed to be made use of by the influence of the Holy Spirit. The word of God is properly an instrument, because it contains the doctrine which that Spirit explains and applies, and the motives to faith and obedience which he enforces upon the conscience and affections; and although prayer brings these truths and motives before us, prayer cannot properly be said to be an instrument of our regeneration, because that which is thus brought by prayer to bear upon our case is the word of God itself introduced into our prayers, which derive their sole influence in that respect from that circumstance. Prayer simply is the application of an insufficient to a sufficient Being for the good which the former cannot otherwise obtain, and which the latter only can supply; and as that supply is dependent upon prayer, and in the nature of the thing consequent, prayer can in no good sense be said to be the instrument of supplying our wants, or fitting us for their supply, except relatively, as a mere condition appointed by the Donor.

If we must inquire into the reason of the appointment of prayer, and it can scarcely be considered as a purely arbitrary institution, that reason seems to be, the preservation in the minds of men of a solemn and impressive sense of God's agency in the world, and the dependence of all creatures upon him. Perfectly pure and glorified beings, no longer in a state of probation, and therefore exposed to no temptations, may not need this institution; but men in their fallen state are constantly prone to forget God; to rest in the agency of second causes; and to build upon a sufficiency in themselves. This is at once a denial to God of the glory which he rightly claims, and a destructive delusion to creatures, who, in forsaking God as the object of their constant affiance, trust but in broken reeds, and attempt to drink from "broken cisterns which can hold no water." It is then equally in mercy to us, as in respect to his own honor and acknowledgment, that the Divine Being has suspended so many of his blessings, and those of the highest necessity to us, upon the exercise of prayer; an act which acknowledges his uncontrollable agency, and the dependence of all creatures upon him; our insufficiency, and his fullness; and lays the foundation of that habit of gratitude and thanksgiving which is at once so ameliorating to our own feelings, and so conducive to a cheerful obedience to the will of God. And if this reason for the injunction of prayer is nowhere in Scripture stated in so many words, it is a principle uniformly supposed as the foundation of the whole scheme of religion which they have revealed.

To this duty objections have been sometimes offered, at which it may be well at least to glance. One has been grounded upon a supposed predestination of all things which come to pass; and the argument is, that as this established predestination of all things cannot be altered, prayer, which supposes that God will depart from it, is vain and useless. The answer which a pious predestinarian would give to this objection is, that the argument drawn from the predestination of God lies with the same force against every other human effort, as against prayer; and that as God's predestination to give food to man does not render the cultivation of the earth useless and impertinent, so neither does the predestination of things shut out the necessity and efficacy of prayer. It would also be urged, that God has ordained the means as well as the end; and although he is an unchangeable Being, it is a part of the unchangeable system which he has established, that prayer shall be heard and accepted. Those who have not these views of predestination will answer the objection differently; for if the premises of such a predestination as is assumed by the objection, and conceded in the answer, be allowed, the answer is unsatisfactory. The Scriptures represent God, for instance, as purposing to inflict a judgment upon an individual or a nation, which purpose is often changed by prayer. In this case either God's purpose must be denied, and then his threatenings are reduced to words without meaning; or the purpose must be allowed, in which case either prayer breaks in upon predestination, if understood absolutely, or it is vain and useless. To the objection so drawn out it is clear that no answer is given by saying that the means as well as the end are predestinated, since prayer in such cases is not a means to the end, but an instrument of thwarting it; or is a means to one end in opposition to another end, which, if equally predestinated with the same absoluteness, is a contradiction. The true answer is, that although God has absolutely predetermined some things, there are others, which respect his government of free and accountable agents, which he has hypothetically predetermined. The true immutability of God consists, not in his adherence to such purposes, but in his never changing the principles of his administration; and he may therefore, in perfect accordance with his preordination of things, and the immutability of his nature, purpose to do, under certain conditions dependent upon the free agency of man, what he will not do under others; and for this reason, that an immutable adherence to the principles of a wise, just, and gracious government requires it. Prayer in Scripture made one of these conditions; and if God has established it as one of the principles of his moral government to accept prayer, in every case in which he has given us authority to ask, he has not, we may be assured, entangled his actual government of the world with the bonds of such an eternal predestination of particular events, as either to reduce prayer to a mere form of words, or not to be able himself, consistently with his decrees, to answer it, wheoever it is encouraged by his express engagements.

A second objection is, that as God is infinitely wise and good, his wisdom and justice will lead him to bestow "whatever is fit for us without praying; and if any thing be not fit for us, we cannot obtain it by praying." To this Dr. Paley very well replies, "that it may be agreeable to perfect wisdom to grant that to our prayers which it would not have been agreeable to the same wisdom to have given us without praying for." This, independent of the question of the authority of the Scriptures which explicitly enjoin prayer, is the best answer which can be given to the objection; and it is no small confirmation of it, that it is obvious to every reflecting man, that for God to withhold favors till asked for, "tends," as the same writer observes, "to encourage devotion among his rational creatures, and to keep up and circulate a knowledge and sense of their dependency upon him." But it is urged, "God will always do what is best from the moral perfection of his nature, whether we pray or not." This objection, however, supposes that there is but one mode of acting for the best, and that the divine will is necessarily determined to that mode only; "both which positions," says Paley, "presume a knowledge of universal nature, much beyond what we are capable of attaining." It is, indeed, a very unsatisfactory mode of speaking, to say, God will always do what is best; since we can conceive him capable in all cases of doing what is still better for the creature, and also that the creature is capable of receiving more and more from his infinite fulness forever. All that can be rationally meant by such a phrase is, that, in the circumstances of the case, God will always do what is most consistent with his own wisdom, holiness, and goodness; but then the disposition to pray, and the act of praying, add a new circumstance to every case, and often bring many other new circumstances along with them. It supposes humility, contrition, and trust, on the part of the creature; and an acknowledgment of the power and compassion of God, and of the merit of the atonement of Christ: all which are manifestly new positions, so to speak, of the circumstances of the creature, which, upon the very principle of the objection, rationally understood, must be taken into consideration.

But if the efficacy of prayer as to ourselves be granted, its influence upon the case of others is said to be more difficult to conceive. This may be allowed without at all affecting the duty. Those who bow to the authority of the Scriptures will see, that the duty of praying for ourselves and for others rests upon the same divine appointment; and to those who ask for the reason of such intercession in behalf of others, it is sufficient to reply, that the efficacy of prayer being established in one case, there is the same reason to conclude that our prayers may benefit others, as any other effort we may use. It can only be by divine appointment that one creature is made dependent upon another for any advantage, since it was doubtless in the power of the Creator to have rendered each independent of all but himself. Whatever reason, therefore, might lead him to connect and interweave the interests of one man with the benevolence of another, will be the leading reason for that kind of mutual dependence which is implied in the benefit of mutual prayer. Were it only that a previous sympathy, charity, and good-will, are implied in the duty, and must, indeed, be cultivated in order to it, and be strengthened by it, the wisdom and benevolence of the institution would, it is presumed, be apparent to every well-constituted mind. That all prayer for others must proceed upon a less perfect knowledge of them than we have of ourselves, is certain; that all our petitions must be, even in our own mind, more conditional than those which respect ourselves, though many of these must be subjected to the principles of a general administration, which we but partially apprehend; and that all spiritual influences upon others, when they are subject to our prayers, will be understood by us as acting in harmony with their free agency, must also be conceded; and, therefore, when others are concerned, our prayers may often be partially or wholly fruitless. He who believes the Scriptures will, however, be encouraged by the declaration, that "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man," for his fellow-creatures, "availeth much;" and he who demands something beyond mere authoritative declaration, as he cannot deny that prayer is one of those instruments by which another may be benefited, must acknowledge that, like the giving of counsel, it may be of great utility in some cases, although it should fail in others; and that as no man can tell how much good counsel may influence another, or in many cases say whether it has ultimately failed or not, so it is with prayer. It is a part of the divine plan, as revealed in his word, to give many blessings to man independent of his own prayers, leaving the subsequent improvement of them to himself. They are given in honor of the intercession of Christ, man's great "Advocate;" and they are given, subordinately, in acceptance of the prayers of Christ's church, and of righteous individuals. And when many or few devout individuals become thus the instruments of good to communities, or to whole nations, there is no greater mystery in this than in the obvious fact, that the happiness or misery of large masses of mankind is often greatly affected by the wisdom or the errors, the skill or the incompetence, the good or the bad conduct, of a few persons, and often of one. Wilkins, Henry, Watts on Prayer; Townsend's Nine Sermons on Prayer; Paley's Moral Phil., vol. ii. p. 31; Mason's Student and Pastor, p. 87; Wollaston's Religion of Nature, pp. 122, 124; Paley's Works; Price's Works; Magee on Atonement, notes; *H. PRAXEANS; the followers of Praxeas, a man of considerable talents, about the end of the second century. He was the founder of the Monarchians, or Patripassians, as they were called by the orthodox; but it does not appear that he ever allowed, in any proper sense, that God the Father suffered. Dr. Lardner thinks, that his system very nearly resembled that of the indwelling scheme. (See PRE-EXISTENCE.) Lardner's Heretics, pp. 412—414.—Williams.

PREACHER; one who discourses publicly on religious subjects. (See articles DECLARATION, ELOQUENCE, MINISTER, and SERMON.)—Hend. Buck.

PREACHING, is publicly discoursing on any religious subject. It is impossible, in the compass of this work, to give a complete history of this article from the beginning down to the present day. This must be considered as a desideratum in theological learning. Mr. Robinson, in his second volume of "Claude's Essay," has prefixed a brief dissertation on this subject, an abridgment of which we shall here insert, with a few occasional alterations.

From the sacred records we learn, that when men began to associate for the purpose of worshipping the Deity, Enoch prophesied, Jude 14, 15. We have a very short account of this prophet and his doctrine; enough, however, to convince us that he taught the principal truths of natural and revealed religion. Conviction of sin was in his doctrine, and communion with God was exemplified in his conduct, Gen. 5: 24. Heb. 11: 5, 6. From the days of Enoch to the time of Moses, each patriarch worshipped God with his family; probably several assembled at new moons, and alternately instructed the whole company. Noah, it is said, was a preacher of righteousness, 2 Pet. 2: 5. 1 Pet. 3: 19, 20. Abraham commanded his household, after him, to keep the way of the Lord, and to do justice and judgment; (Gen. 18: 19.) and Jacob, when his house lapsed to idolatry, remonstrated against it, and exhorted them, and all that were with him, to put away strange gods, and to go up with him to Bethel, Gen. 10: 25: 2, 3. Melchizedek, also, we may consider as the father, the prince, and the priest of his people, publishing the glad tidings of peace and salvation, Gen. 18. Heb. 7.

Moses was a most eminent prophet and preacher, raised up by the authority of God; and by whom, it is said, came the law, John 1: 17. This great man had much at heart the promulgation of his doctrine; he directed it to be inscribed on pillars, to be transcribed in books, and to be taught both in public and private by word of mouth, Deut. 28: 8. 6: 9. 21: 19. 17: 18. Num. 5: 23. Deut. 4: 9. Himself set the example of each; and how he and Aaron sermonized, we may see by several parts of his writings. The first discourse was heard with profound reverence and attention; the last was both uttered and received in raptures, Exod. 4: 31. Deut. 33: 7, 8. Public preaching does not appear under this economy to have been attached to the priesthood: priests were not officially preachers; and we have innumerable instances of discourses delivered in religious assemblies by men of other tribes besides that of Levi, Ps. 68: 11. Joshua was an Ephraimite; but being full of the spirit of wisdom, he gathered the tribes to Shechem, and harangued the people of God, Deut. 34: 9. Joshua 34. Solomon was a prince of the house of Judah, Amos a herdsman of Tekoa; yet both were preachers, and one at least was a prophet, 1 Kings 2. Amos 7: 14, 15. When the ignorant notions of pagans, the vices of their practice, and the idolatry of their pretended worship, were in some sad periods incorporated into the Jewish religion by the princes of that nation, the prophets and all the seers protested against this apostasy, and they were persecuted for so doing. Shemaiah preached to Rehoboam, the princes, and all the people at Jerusalem, 2 Chron. 12: 5. Azariah and Hanani preached to Aza and his army, 2 Chron. 15: 1, &c. 16: 7. Michaiah to Ahab. Some of them opened schools, or houses of instruction, and there to their disciples they taught the pure religion of Moses. At Naioth, in the suburbs of Ramah, there was one where Samuel dwelt; there was another at Jericho, and a third at Bethel, to which Elijah and Elisha often resorted. Thither the people went on Sabbath days, and at new moons, and received public lessons of piety and morality, 1 Sam. 19: 18. 2 Kings 2: 3, 5. 4: 2, 3. Through all this period there was a dismal confusion of the useful ordinance of public preaching. Sometimes they had no open vision, and the word of the Lord was precious or scarce: the people heard it only now and then. At other times they were left without a teaching priest, and without law. And, at other seasons, again, itinerants, both princes, priests, and Levites, were sent through all the country to carry the book of the law, and to teach in the cities. In a word, preaching flourished when pure religion grew; and when the last decayed, the first was suppressed. Moses had not appropriated preaching to any order of men: persons, places, times, and manners, were all left open and discretionary. Many of the discourses were preached in camps and courts, in streets, schools, cities, and villages, sometimes with great composure and coolness, at other times with vehement action and rapturous energy; sometimes in a plain, blunt style, at other times in all the magnificent pomp of eastern allegory. On some occasions, the preachers appeared in public with visible signs, with implements of war, yokes of slavery, or something adapted to their subject. They gave lectures on these, held them up to view, girded them on, broke them in pieces, rent their garments, rolled in the dust, and endeavored, by all the methods they could devise, agreeably to the customs of their country, to impress the minds of their auditors with the nature and importance of their doctrines. These men were highly esteemed by the pious part of the nation; and princes thought proper to keep seers and others, who were scribes, who read and expounded the law, 2 Chron. 34: 29, 30. 35: 15. Hence false prophets, bad men who found it worth while to be good, crowded the courts of princes. Jezebel, an idolatress, had four hundred prophets of Baal; and Ahab, a pretended worshipper of Jehovah, had as many pretended prophets of his own profession, 2 Chron. 18: 5.

When the Jews were carried captive into Babylon, the prophets who were with them inculcated the principles of religion, and endeavored to possess their minds with an aversion to idolatry; and to the success of preaching we may attribute the reconversion of the Jews to the belief and worship of one God; a conversion that remains to this day. The Jews have since fallen into horrid crimes, but they have never since this period lapsed into idolatry, Hos. 2, 3. Ezek. 2, 3, 34. There were not wanting, however, multitudes of false prophets among them, whose characters are strikingly delineated by the true prophets, and which the reader may see in the thirteenth chapter of Ezekiel, fifty-sixth of Isaiah, and twenty-third of Jeremiah. When the seventy years of the captivity were expired, the good prophets and preachers, Zerubbabel, Joshua, Haggai, and others, having confidence in the word of God, and aspiring after their natural, civil, and religious rights, endeavored by all means to extricate themselves and their countrymen from that mortifying state into which the crimes of their ancestors had brought them. They wept, fasted, prayed, preached, prophesied, and at length prevailed. The chief instruments were Nehemiah and Ezra: the first was governor, and reformed their civil state; the last was a scribe of the law of the God of heaven, and addressed himself to ecclesiastical matters, in which he rendered the noblest service to his country, and to all posterity. He collected and collated manuscripts of the sacred writings, and arranged and published the holy canon in its present form. To this he added a second work, as necessary as the former: he revived and new-modelled public preaching, and exemplified his plan in his own person. The Jews had almost lost in the seventy years' captivity their original language: that was now become dead; and they spoke a jargon made up of their own language and that of the Chaldeans and other nations with whom they had been confounded. Formerly preachers had only explained subjects; now they were obliged to explain words; words which, in the sacred code, were become obsolete, equivocal, or dead. Houses were now opened, not for ceremonial worship, as sacrificing, for this was confined to the temple; but for moral obedience, as praying, preaching, reading the law, divine worship, and social duties. These houses were called synagogues: the people repaired thither morning and evening for prayer; and on Sabbaths and festivals the law was read and expounded to them. We have a short but beautiful description of the manner of Ezra's first preaching, Neh. 8. Upwards of fifty thousand people assembled in a street, or large square, near the water-gate. It was early in the morning of a Sabbath day. A pulpit of wood, in the fashion of a small tower, was placed there on purpose for the preacher; and this turret was supported by a scaffold, or temporary gallery, where, in a wing on the right hand of the pulpit, sat six of the principal preachers; and in another, on the left, seven. Thirteen other principal teachers, and many Levites, were present also on scaffolds erected for the purpose, alternately to officiate. When Ezra ascended the pulpit, he produced and opened the book of the law, and the whole congregation instantly rose up from their seats, and stood. Then he offered up prayer and praise to God, the people bowing their heads, and worshipping the Lord with their faces to the ground; and, at the close of the prayer, with uplifted hands, they solemnly pronounced, Amen, amen. Then, all standing, Ezra, assisted at times by the Levites, read the law distinctly, gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading. The sermons delivered so affected the hearers, that they wept excessively; and about noon the sorrow became so exuberant and immeasurable, that it was thought necessary by the governor, the preacher, and the Levites, to restrain it. "Go your way," said they; "eat the fat, drink the sweet, send portions unto them for whom nothing is prepared." The wise and benevolent sentiments of these noble souls were imbibed by the whole congregation, and fifty thousand troubled hearts were calmed in a moment. Home they returned, to eat, to drink, to send portions, and to make mirth, because they had understood the words that were declared unto them. Plato was alive at this time, teaching dull philosophy to cold academics; but what was he, and what was Xenophon, or Demosthenes, or any of the pagan orators, in comparison with these men? From this period to that of the appearance of Jesus Christ, public preaching was universal: synagogues were multiplied, vast numbers attended, and elders and rulers were appointed for the purpose of order and instruction.

The most celebrated preacher that arose before the appearance of Jesus Christ, was John the Baptist. He was commissioned from heaven to be the harbinger of the Messiah. He took Elijah for his model; and as the times were very much like those in which that prophet lived, he chose a doctrine and a method very much resembling those of that venerable man. His subjects were few, plain, and important. His style was vehement, his images bold, his deportment solemn, his actions eager, and his morals strict; but this bright morning star gave way to the illustrious Sun of Righteousness, who now arose on a benighted world. Jesus Christ certainly was the prince of preachers. Who but can admire the simplicity and majesty of his style, the beauty of his images, the alternate softness and severity of his address, the choice of his subjects, the gracefulness of his deportment, and the indefatigableness of his zeal? Let the reader charm and solace himself in the study and contemplation of the character, excellency, and dignity of this best of preachers, as he will find them delineated by the evangelists.

The apostles exactly copied their divine Master. They formed multitudes of religious societies, and were abundantly successful in their labors. They confined their attention to religion, and left the school to dispute, and politicians to intrigue. The doctrines they preached they supported entirely by evidence; and neither had nor required such assistance as human laws or worldly policy, the eloquence of the schools or the terror of arms, the charms of money or the tricks of tradesmen, could afford them.

The apostles being dead, every thing came to pass as they had foretold. The whole Christian system underwent a miserable change: preaching shared the fate of other institutions, and this glory of the primitive church was now generally degenerated. Those writers whom we call the fathers, however held up to view by some as models of imitation, do not deserve that indiscriminate praise ascribed to them. Christianity, it is true, is found in their writings; but how sadly incorporated with pagan philosophy and Jewish allegory! It must, indeed, be allowed, that, in general, the simplicity of Christianity was maintained, though under gradual decay, during the first three centuries. The next five centuries produced many pious and excellent preachers both in the Latin and Greek churches, though the doctrine continued to degenerate. The Greek pulpit was adorned with some eloquent orators. Basil, bishop of Caesarea, John Chrysostom, preacher at Antioch, and afterwards patriarch (as he was called) of Constantinople, and Gregory Nazianzen, who all flourished in the fourth century seem to have led the fashion of preaching in the Greek church: Jerome and Augustine did the same in the Latin church. For some time, preaching was common to bishops, elders, deacons, and private brethren, in the primitive church; in process, it was restrained to the bishop, and to such as he should appoint. They called the appointment ordination; and at last attached I know not what ideas of mystery and influence to the word, and of dominion to the bishop who pronounced it. When a bishop or preacher travelled, he claimed no authority to exercise the duties of his function, unless we were invited by the churches where he attended public worship. The first preachers differed much in pulpit action; the greater part used very moderate and sober gesture. They delivered their sermons all extempore, while there were notaries who took down what they said. Sermons in those days were all in the vulgar tongue. The Greeks preached in Greek, the Latins in Latin. They did not preach by the clock, (so to speak,) but were short or long as they saw occasion, though an hour was about the usual time. Sermons were generally both preached and heard standing; but sometimes both speaker and auditors sat, especially the aged and the infirm. The fathers were fond of allegory; for Origen, that everlasting allegorizer, had set them the example. Before preaching, the preacher usually went into a vestry to pray, and afterwards to speak to such as came to salute him. He prayed with his eyes shut, in the pulpit. The first words the preacher uttered to the people, when he ascended the pulpit, was, "Peace be with you," or, "The love of our Lord Jesus Christ, the grace of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with you all;" to which the assembly at first added, "Amen;" and, in after times, they answered, "And with thy spirit." Degenerate, however, as these days were in comparison with those of the apostles, yet they were golden ages in comparison with the times that followed, when metaphysical reasonings, mystical divinity, yea, Aristotelian categories, and reading the lives of saints, were substituted in the place of sermons. The pulpit became a stage, where ludicrous priests obtained the vulgar laugh by the lowest kind of wit, especially at the festivals of Christmas and Easter.

But the glorious Reformation was the offspring of preaching, by which mankind were informed: there was a standard, and the religion of the times was put to trial by it. The avidity of the common people to read Scripture, and to hear it expounded, was wonderful: and the papists were so fully convinced of the benefit of frequent public instruction, that they who were justly called "unpreaching prelates," and whose pulpits, to use an expression of Latimer, had been "bells without clappers" for many a long year, were obliged for shame to set up regular preaching again.

The church of Rome has produced some great preachers since the Reformation, but not equal to the reformed preachers; and a question naturally arises here, which it would be unpardonable to pass over in silence, concerning the singular effect of the preaching of the reformed, which was general, national, universal reformation.

In the darkest times of popery there had arisen, now and then, some famous popular preachers, who had zealously inveighed against the vices of their times, and whose sermons had produced sudden and amazing effects on their auditors; but all these effects had died away with the preachers who produced them, and all things had gone back into the old state. Law, learning, commerce, society at large, had not been improved. Here a new scene opens: preachers arise less popular, perhaps less indefatigable and exemplary; their sermons produce less striking immediate effects; and yet their auditors go away, and agree by whole nations to reform.

Jerome Savonarola, Jerome Narni, Capistran, Connecte, and many others, had produced by their sermons great immediate effects. When Connecte preached, the ladies lowered their head-dresses, and committed quilled caps by hundreds to the flames. When Narni taught the populace in Lent, from the pulpits of Rome, half the city went from his sermons, crying along the streets, "Lord, have mercy upon us; Christ, have mercy upon us!" so that in only one passion-week, two thousand crowns-worth of ropes were sold to make scourges with; and when he preached before the pope to cardinals and bishops, and painted the crime of non-residence in its own colors, he frightened thirty or forty bishops who heard him instantly home to their dioceses. In the pulpit of the university of Salamanca, he induced eight hundred students to quit all worldly prospects of honor, riches, and pleasures, and to become penitents in divers monasteries. Some of this class were martyrs too. We know the fate of Savonarola, and more might be added; but all lamented the momentary duration of the effects produced by their labors. Narni himself was so disgusted with his office, that he renounced preaching, and shut himself up in his cell to mourn over his irreclaimable contemporaries; for bishops went back to court, and rope-makers lay idle again.

Our reformers taught all the good doctrines which had been taught by these men, and they added two or three more, by which they laid the axe to the root of apostasy, and produced general reformation. Instead of appealing to popes, and canons, and founders, and fathers, they only quoted them, and referred their auditors to the Holy Scriptures for law. Pope Leo X. did not know this when he told Prierio, who complained of Luther's heresy, "Friar Martin had a fine genius!" They also taught the people what little they knew of Christian liberty; and so led them into a belief that they might follow their own ideas in religion, without the consent of a confessor, a diocesan, a pope, or a council. They went farther, and laid the stress of all religion on justifying faith. This obliged the people to get acquainted with Christ, the object of their faith; and thus they were led into the knowledge of a character altogether different from what they saw in their old guides; a character which it is impossible to know, and not to admire and imitate. The old papal popular sermons had gone off like a charge of gunpowder, producing only a fright, a bustle, and a black face; but those of the new learning, as the monks called them, were small hearty seeds, which, being sown in the honest hearts of the multitude, and watered with the dew of heaven, softly vegetated, and imperceptibly unfolded blossoms and fruits of inestimable value.

These eminent servants of Christ excelled in various talents, both in the pulpit and in private. Knox came down like a thunder-storm; Calvin resembled a whole day's set rain; Beza was a shower of the softest dew. Old Latimer, in a coarse frieze gown, trudded afoot, his Testament hanging at one end of his leathern girdle, and his spectacles at the other, and without ceremony instructed the people in rustic style from a hollow tree; while the courtly Ridley, in satin and fur, taught the same principles in the cathedral of the metropolis. Cranmer, though a timorous man, ventured to give king Henry VIII. a New Testament, with the label, "Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge;" while Knox, who said "there was nothing in the pleasant face of a lady to affray him," assured the queen of Scots, that, "if there were any spark of the Spirit of God, yea, of honesty and wisdom in her, she would not be offended with his affirming in his sermons, that the diversions of her court were diabolical crimes; evidences of impiety or insanity." These men were not all accomplished scholars; but they all gave proof enough that they were honest, hearty, and disinterested in the cause of religion.

All Europe produced great and excellent preachers, and some of the more studious and sedate reduced their art of public preaching to a system, and taught rules of a good sermon. Bishop Wilkins enumerated, in 1646, upwards of sixty who had written on the subject. Several of these are valuable treatises, full of edifying instructions; but all are on a scale too large, and, by affecting to treat of the whole office of a minister, leave that capital branch, public preaching, unfinished and vague.

One of the most important articles of pulpit science, that which gives life and energy to all the rest, and without which all the rest are nothing but a vain parade, is either neglected or exploded in all these treatises. It is essential to the ministrations of the divine word by public preaching, that preachers be allowed to form principles of their own, and that their sermons contain their real sentiments, the fruits of their own intense thought and meditation. Preaching cannot be in a good state in those communities, where the shameful traffic of buying and selling manuscript sermons is carried on. Moreover, all the animating encouragements that arise from a free, unbiassed choice of the people, and from their uncontaminated, disinterested applause, should be left open to stimulate a generous youth to excel. Command a man to utter what he has no inclination to propagate, and what he does not even believe; threaten him, at the same time, with all the miseries of life, if he dare to follow his own ideas, and to promulge his own sentiments, and you pass a sentence of death on all he says. He does declaim, but all is languid and cold, and he lays his system out as an undertaker does the dead.

Since the reformers, we have had multitudes who have entered into their views with disinterestedness and success; and, in the present times, both in Europe and in America, names could be mentioned which would do honor to any pulpit: for though there are too many who do not fill up that important station with proportionate piety and talents, yet we have men who are conspicuous for their extent of knowledge, depth of experience, originality of thought, fervency of zeal, consistency of deportment, and great usefulness in the Christian church. May their numbers still be increased, and their exertions in the cause of truth be eminently crowned with the divine blessing! PREACHING FRIARS. (See DOMINICANS.)
 PREADAMITES; a denomination given to the inhabitants of the earth, conceived by some people to have lived before Adam.

Isaac de la Pereyra, in 1655, published a book to evince the reality of Preadamites, by which he gained a considerable number of proselytes to the opinion; but the answer of Demarets, professor of theology at Groningen, published the year following, put a stop to its progress, though Pereyra made a reply.

His system was this. The Jews he calls Adamites, and supposes them to have issued from Adam; and gives the title Preadamites to the Gentiles, whom he supposes to have been a long time before Adam. But this being expressly contrary to the first words of Genesis, Pereyra had recourse to the fabulous antiquities of the Egyptians and Chaldeans, and to some idle rabbins, who imagined there had been another world before that described by Moses. He was apprehended by the inquisition in Flanders, and very roughly used, though in the service of the dauphin. But he appealed from their sentence to Rome, whither he went in the time of Alexander VII., and where he printed a retraction of his book of Preadamites.

The arguments against the Preadamites are these. The sacred history of Moses assures us that Adam and Eve were the first persons that were created on the earth, Gen. 1: 26. 2: 7. Our Savior confirmed this when he said, "From the beginning of the creation God made them, male and female," Mark 10: 6. It is undeniable that he speaks this of Adam and Eve, because in the next verse he uses the same words as those in Gen. 2: 1: "Therefore shall a man leave his father and mother, and cleave unto his wife." It is also clear from Gen. 3: 20, where it is said, that "Adam called his wife's name Eve, because she was the mother of all living;" that is, she was the source and root of all men and women in the world; which plainly intimates that there was no other woman that was such a mother. Finally, Adam is expressly called twice, by the apostle Paul, the first man, 1 Cor. 15: 45, 47.—Hend. Buck.

PRECEPT; a rule given by a superior; a direction or command. The precepts of religion, says Saurin, are as essential as the doctrines; and religion will as certainly sink if the morality be subverted, as if the theology be undermined. The doctrines are only proposed to us as the ground of our duty. (See DOCTRINE; LAW; and POSITIVE INSTITUTIONS.)—Hend. Buck.

PRECISIANS; one of the names given to the Puritans, or those who, about the time of the Commonwealth, discovered by their conduct that they were in earnest on the subject of religion. They were called precise, because they condemned swearing, plays, gaming, and drinking, dancing, and other worldly recreations on the Lord's day, and the time-serving, careless, and corrupt religion which was then in fashion.—Hend. Buck.

PREDESTINARIANS; those who believe in predestination. (See PREDESTINATION.)—Hend. Buck.

PREDESTINATION. The word predestinate is of Latin original, (prædestino), and signifies in that tongue to deliberate beforehand with one's self how one shall act, and, in consequence of such deliberation, to form a settled plan, or predetermine where, when, how, and by whom any thing shall be done, and to what end it shall be done. So the Greek word προορίζω, which exactly answers to the English word predestinate, and is rendered by it, (Acts 4: 28. Rom. 8: 29, 30. 1 Cor. 2: 7. Eph. 1: 5, 11.) signifies to resolve what shall be done, and before the thing resolved on is actually effected; to appoint it to some certain use, and direct it to some determinate end. (See DECREES OF GOD.)

This doctrine has been the occasion of considerable disputes and controversies among divines. On the one side it has been observed, that it is impossible to reconcile it with our ideas of the justice and goodness of God, that it makes God to be the author of sin, destroys moral distinction, and renders all our efforts useless.

Predestinarians deny these consequences, and endeavor to prove this doctrine from the consideration of the perfections of the divine nature, and from Scripture testimony. If his knowledge, say they, be infinite and unchangeable, he must have known every thing from eternity. If we allow the attribute of prescience, the idea of a decree must certainly be believed also; for how can an action that is really to come to pass be foreseen, if it be not determined either to do or to suffer it? God knew every thing from the beginning; but this he could not have known if he had not so determined it. If, also, God be infinitely wise, it cannot be conceived that he would leave things at random, and have no plan. He is a God of order, and this order he observes as strictly in the moral as in the natural world, however confused things may appear to us. To conceive otherwise of God, is to degrade him, and is an insult to his perfections. If he, then, be wise and unchangeable, no new idea or purpose can arise in his mind; no alteration of his plan can take place, upon condition of his creatures acting in this or that way. (See FOREKNOWLEDGE; PRESCIENCE.)

To say that this doctrine makes him the author of sin is not justifiable. We all allow omnipotence to be an attribute of Deity, and that by this attribute he could have prevented sin from entering into the world, had he chosen it; yet we see he did not. Now he is no more the author of sin in one case than the other. May we not ask, Why does he suffer those inequalities of providence? why permit whole nations to lie in idolatry for ages? why leave men to the most cruel barbarities? why punish the sins of the fathers in the children? In a word, why permit the world at large to be subject to pains, crosses, losses, evils of every kind, and that for so many thousands of years? And, yet, will any dare call the Deity unjust? The fact is, our finite minds know but little of the ways of God, Rom. 11: 33—36.

But, supposing there are difficulties in this subject, (and what subject is without?) the Scripture abounds with passages which at once prove the doctrine, Matt. 25: 34. Rom. 8: 29, 30. Eph. 1: 3, 6, 11. 2 Tim. 1, 9. 2 Thess. 2: 13. 1 Pet. 1: 1, 2. John 6: 37. John 17: 2—24. Rev. 13: 8. 17: 8. Dan. 4: 35. 1 Thess. 5: 19. Matt. 11: 26. Exod. 4: 21. Prov. 16: 4. Acts 13: 48.

The moral uses of this doctrine are these: 1. It hides pride from man. 2. Excludes the idea of chance. 3. Exalts the grace of God. 4. Renders salvation certain. 5. Affords believers great consolation. PRE-EMINENCE; higher power and honor. In all things, in nature, in person, in office, work, power, and honor, Christ has the pre-eminence above angels and men; or any other creature, Col. 1: 18. A man has no pre-eminence above a beast as to his body; he is liable to the same diseases and death, Eccl. 3: 19.—Brown.

PRE-EXISTENCE OF JESUS CHRIST, is his existence before he was born of the virgin Mary. That he really did exist before, is plain, from John 3: 13. 6: 50. &c. 17: 1. 8: 58. 1 John 1: 4; but there have been different opinions respecting this existence.

Dr. Watts supposes, that the doctrine of the pre-existence of the soul of Christ explains dark and difficult scriptures, and discovers many beauties and proprieties of expression in the word of God, which on any other plan lie unobserved. For instance, in Col. 1: 15, &c. Christ is described as the image of the invisible God, the first-born of every creature. His being the image of the invisible God cannot refer merely to his divine nature; for that is as invisible in the Son as in the Father: therefore it seems to refer to his pre-existent soul in union with the Godhead. Again: when man is said to be created in the image of God, (Gen. 1, 2.) it may refer to the God-man, to Christ in his pre-existent state. God says, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness." The word is redoubled, perhaps to intimate that Adam was made in the likeness of the human soul of Christ, as well as that he bore something of the image and resemblance of the divine nature.

On the other side it is affirmed, that this doctrine of the pre-existence of the human soul of Christ weakens and subverts that of his personality. 1. A pure intelligent spirit, say they, the first, the most ancient, and the most excellent of creatures, created before the foundation of the world, so exactly resembles the second person of the Arian trinity, that it is impossible to show the least difference, except in name. 2. The pre-existent intelligence supposed in this doctrine is so confounded with those other intelligences called angels, that there is great danger of mistaking this human soul for an angel, and so of making the person of Christ to consist of three natures. 3. If Jesus Christ had nothing in common like the rest of mankind, except a body, how could this semi-conformity make him a real man? 4. The passages quoted in proof of the pre-existence of the human soul of Jesus Christ are of the same sort with those which others allege in proof of the pre-existence of all human souls. 5. This opinion, by ascribing the dignity of the work of redemption to his sublime human soul, detracts from the deity of Christ, and renders the last as passive as the first active. 6. This notion is contrary to Scripture. St. Paul says, in all things it behooved him to be made like his brethren: he partook of all our infirmities, except sin. St. Luke says, he increased in stature and in wisdom, Heb. 2: 17. Luke 2: 52. PRE-EXISTIANI; a term applied to those who hold the hypothesis of the pre-existence of souls, or the doctrine that, at the beginning of the world, God created the souls of all men, which, however, are not united to the body till the individuals for whom they are destined are begotten or born into the world. This was the opinion of Pythagoras, Plato, and his followers, and of the cabalists among the Jews. The doctrine was taught by Justin Martyr, Origen, and others of the fathers, and has been the common opinion of mystics, both of ancient and modern times. Such as hold the immediate creation of the human soul at the moment of the production of the body, are called creantiani; and those who believe in its natural propagation by the parents, traduciani.—Hend. Buck.

PREMONSTRANTES, or PREMONSTRATENSES; a religious order of regular canons, instituted in 1120 by S. Norbert, and thence called Norbertines. The rule they followed was that of St. Augustine, with some slight alterations, and an addition of certain severe laws, whose authority did not long survive their founder.

They first came into England A. D. 1146. T. L. f. t monastery, called New-house, was erected in Lincolnshire, by Peter de Saulia, and dedicated to St. Martial. In the reign of Edward I. this order had twenty-seven monasteries in England.—Hend. Buck.

PREPARE; (1.) To make ready, Josh. 1: 11. (2.) To fit and qualify, Rom. 9: 23. (3.) To appoint, Matt. 20: 23. (4.) To direct, establish, 1 Chron. 29: 18. God prepares mercy and truth for men when he graciously fulfils his promises and blesses them, Ps. 61: 7. To prepare the way of the Lord Jesus is to consider the predictions concerning him, lay aside every prejudice against him, and readily receive him as the promised Messiah and Savior of the world, Isa. 40: 3. To prepare the heart is to mortify its various lusts, and put it into a frame of holy submission to, and earnest longing for, a God in Christ, 1 Sam. 7: 3. 1 Chron. 29: 18. The preparation of the heart and the answer of the tongue are both from the Lord: the arranging and fixing of the thoughts and inclinations of the heart about civil, and much more about spiritual things, and the giving ability to speak readily, distinctly, and to edification, are from the Lord, as his free gift and effectual work, Prov. 16: 1.

The preparation day on which Christ suffered was not the preparation of the passover, for that was the day before, but for the Sabbath of the passover week, Matt. 27: 62. John 19: 14.—Brown; Robinson's Bibl. Repos.

PRESBYTER. (See next article; and articles BISHOP, DEACON, ELDER.)

PRESBYTERIANISM. The title Presbyterian comes from the Greek word presbuteros, which signifies senior, or elder, intimating that the government of the church in the New Testament was by presbyteries, that is, by association of ministers and ruling elders, possessed all of equal powers, without any superiority among them, either in office or order. The Presbyterians believe, that the authority of their ministers to preach the gospel, to administer the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's supper, and to feed the flock of Christ, is derived from the Holy Ghost by the imposition of the hands of the presbytery; and they oppose the independent scheme of the common rights of Christians by the same arguments which are used for that purpose by the Episcopalians. They affirm, however, that there is no order in the church, as established by Christ and his apostles, superior to that of presbyters; that all ministers, being ambassadors of Christ, are equal by their commission; that presbyter and bishop, though different words, are of the same import; and that prelacy was gradually established upon the primitive practice of making the moderator, or speaker of the presbytery, a permanent officer.

These positions they maintain against the Episcopalians by the following arguments.—They observe, that the apostles planted churches by ordaining bishops and deacons in every city; that the ministers which in one verse are called bishops, are in the next, perhaps, denominated presbyters; that we nowhere read in the New Testament of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, in any one church; and that, therefore, we are under the necessity of concluding bishop and presbyter to be two names for the same church officer. (See EPISCOPACY.)

“The identity of the office of bishop and presbyter being thus clearly established, it follows, that the presbyterate is the highest permanent office in the church, and that every faithful pastor of a flock is successor to the apostles in every thing in which they were to have any successors. In the apostolic office there were indeed some things peculiar and extraordinary, such as their immediate call by Christ, their infallibility, their being witnesses of our Lord's resurrection, and their unlimited jurisdiction over the whole world. These powers and privileges could not be conveyed by imposition of hands to any successors, whether called presbyters or bishops; but as rulers or office-bearers in particular churches, we have the confession of ‘the very chiefest apostles,’ Peter and John, that they were nothing more than presbyters, or parish ministers. This being the case, the dispute which has been so warmly agitated concerning the validity of Presbyterian ordination be at all essential, it is obvious that such a ceremony performed by presbyters must be valid, as there is no higher order of ecclesiastics in the church by whom it can be performed. Accordingly we find, that Timothy himself, though said to be a bishop, was ordained by the laying on of the hands of a presbytery. At that ordination, indeed, St. Paul presided, but he could preside only as primus in paribus; for we have seen that, as permanent officers in the church of Christ, the apostles themselves were no more than presbyters. If the apostles' hands, were imposed for any other purpose, it must have been to communicate those charismata, or miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, which were then so frequent; but which no modern presbyter or bishop will pretend to give, unless his understanding be clouded by the grossest ignorance, or perverted by the most frantic enthusiasm.”

The members of the church of Scotland are strict Presbyterians. Their mode of ecclesiastical government was brought thither from Geneva by John Knox, the famous Scotch reformer, and who has been styled the apostle of Scotland.

Their doctrines are Calvinistic, as may be seen in the confession of faith, and the larger and shorter catechisms; though it is supposed that the clergy, when composing instructions, either for their respective parishes, or the public at large, are no more fettered by the confession, than the clergy of the church of England are by the thirty-nine articles. Many in both communities, it seems, take a more extensive latitude than their formulas allow them. (See CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.)

As to the church government among the Scotch Presbyterians, no one is ignorant, that, from the first dawn of the Reformation among us till the era of the revolution, there was a perpetual struggle between the court and the people, for the establishment of an episcopal or a presbyterian form: the former model of ecclesiastical polity was patronized by the house of Stuart on account of the support which it gave to the prerogatives of the crown; the latter was the favorite of the majority of the people, perhaps not so much on account of its superior claim to apostolical institution, as because the laity are mixed with the clergy in church judicatories, and the two orders, which under episcopacy are kept so distinct, incorporated, as it were, into one body. (See CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.) See Hall's View of a Gospel Church; Ency. Brit., art. PRESBYTERIANS; Brown's Vindication of the Presbyterian Form of Church Government; Scotch Confession and Directory. For the other side of the question, and against Presbyterian church government, see articles BROWNSTIJS; INDEPENDENTS; CONGREGATIONALISTS; and EPISCOPACY.—H. Buck.

PRESBYTERIANS, (DISSENTING;) those in Scotland, who, though holding the principles of Presbyterian church government, have separated from the kirk, and are formed into several distinct bodies. (See RELIEF; SECTERS; and SYNOD; REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN.)—Hend. Buck.

PRESBYTERIANS, (ENGLISH.) The first adherents of this form of church government in England were those Protestants who returned from Frankfort, to which place they had fled for refuge in the reign of queen Mary. There they became acquainted with the Geneva platform, and, returning to their native country in the time of Elizabeth, they at first met in private houses, and afterwards more publicly, on which occasions the worship was conducted agreeably to the forms of the Geneva service-book. The first Presbyterian place of worship that was built was at Wandsworth, in Surry, where also they formed a presbytery. Other presbyteries were then rapidly constituted in most of the counties in England; and, in a short time, the number of the Presbyterians is said to have amounted to a hundred thousand. In the time of Cromwell they held the famous Westminster assembly, consisting of a hundred and fifty ministers, of whom, however, seven were Independents. They now hoped that Presbyterianism would be made the established religion of England by an act of parliament; but a law was enacted, granting free toleration to every one to think and worship as he pleased, which proved a great eyesore to the Presbyterians, who had expected to see their opponents, especially the Independents, completely crushed.

About the beginning of last century, though the Independents had greatly augmented, both the size and number of the Presbyterian congregations were nearly double those of the former; but the gradual increase of Arminian and Arian sentiments, and the consequent diminution of interest in their preaching, powerfully operated on the state of their congregations, as those who could not be satisfied with anti-evangelical and dry moral discourses left them, and joined the Independents. This deteriorating course issued, with many, in downright Socinianism. Ministers of lax and dubious sentiments were at first associated as lecturers, or co-pastors with older ministers of orthodox views; and as these died, they naturally came to be possessed of the entire charge of the congregations. Their seminaries also became infected with heresy; and from these fountains poisoned streams were let in upon the churches. Trustees of Arian or Socinian opinions appointed ministers holding these opinions over orthodox congregations, contrary to their wishes and solicitations. Endowments, that were founded expressly with the view of maintaining the preaching of the doctrines of our Lord's Deity and atonement, and other doctrines therewith connected; in other words, the doctrines contained in the Assembly's confessions and catechisms, were appropriated to the support of a system which the founders would have held in utter abhorrence. In this way have upwards of one hundred and seventy chapels come into the hands of the present generation of Socinians, who, in order to retain them, most disingenuously arrogate to themselves the name of Presbyterians, though they have nothing in the shape of Presbyterian church government; and, what is of infinitely greater moment, not so much as a shred of those doctrinal principles which distinguished the old Presbyterians, and, as just noticed, to transmit which to posterity they endowed these chapels. What with these endowments, and what with charities which have been similarly alienated from their original purpose, the Socinians have in their hands an annual amount of not less than seven thousand pounds, besides the proceeds of fifty thousand pounds, left by Dr. Williams, for the support of orthodox sentiments. Yet, notwithstanding all this temporal provision, pseudo-Presbyterianism is struggling for its existence, disturbed as it is on the one hand by the influence of enlightened criticisms, and the zealous promulgation of Christian doctrine; and, on the other, paralyzed by the torpedo touch of infidelity, with which it is but too generally found to be in contact.

There exists in England, both in the metropolis and in different counties, a number of Presbyterian congregations, which have no connexion with the Socinians, but are in communion with the church of Scotland, or the Scotch Seceders. These are, therefore, carefully to be distinguished from the English Presbyterians.—Head. Buck.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES.* This denomination is to be considered as the offspring of the church of Scotland. It commenced its organized existence in the American colonies about the beginning of the eighteenth century. The ministers of whom we first hear as preaching and laying the foundation of churches, were the Rev. Francis McKemie and the Rev. John Hampton, the former from the north of Ireland, the latter from Scotland. These gentlemen appear to have been sent to this country by a respectable body of pious dissenters in the city of London, for the purpose of preaching the gospel in the middle and southern colonies. They came in 1699, and fixed their residence on the eastern shore of Virginia, near the borders of Maryland, and went preaching in every direction, as the disposition of the people, or other circumstances, invited their evangelical labors. The Quakers of Pennsylvania were disposed to open their arms to all denominations of professing Christians who might be inclined to settle among them; and the Roman Catholics of Maryland, being colonized under a charter which compelled them to exercise universal toleration toward Protestant sects, also afforded an asylum to Presbyterians flying from persecution on the other side of the Atlantic. It was on account of these circumstances that Pennsylvania and Maryland were selected as the first seats of Presbyterian enterprise and organization.

So far as is now known, the first Presbyterian church that was organized, and furnished with a place of worship in the American colonies, was in the city of Philadelphia. This took place about the year 1703. The next year (1704) a presbytery was formed, under the title of the presbytery of Philadelphia; and we almost immediately hear of churches founded at Snow Hill, in Maryland, Newcastle, in Delaware, and Charleston, in South Carolina. Among the members of the first presbytery were the Rev. Messrs. Francis McKemie, John Wilson, Jedediah Andrews, Nathaniel Taylor, George M'Nish, John Hampton, and Samuel Davis. Mr. Andrews was from New England, and had graduated at Harvard college, eight years before. The rest were all emigrants from Scotland or Ireland. Wilson seems to have been settled at Newcastle, in Delaware; M'Nish at Minokin and Wicomico, in Somerset county, Maryland; Hampton at Snow Hill; and Davis in the southern part of Delaware, or the contiguous part of Maryland.

As early as 1716, the Presbyterian body had so far increased that a synod was constituted, comprising four presbyteries. These presbyteries bore the following titles:—1. The presbytery of Philadelphia; 2. The presbytery of Newcastle; 3. The presbytery of Snow Hill; 4. The presbytery of Long Island. Shortly before this arrangement took place, a number of churches, with their ministers, in East and West Jersey, and on Long Island, hitherto Congregationalists, had connected themselves with the Presbyterian church.

After the formation of the synod in 1716, the body went on increasing, receiving additions, not only by emigrants from Scotland and Ireland, but also from natives of England and Wales, who came to the middle colonies, and were thrown by circumstances in the neighborhood of Presbyterian churches; and also from natives, or their descendants, of France, Holland, Switzerland, who preferred the Presbyterian form of worship or government. To these may be added a number from New England, who were induced by local considerations, or other circumstances, to connect themselves with the Presbyterian body.

The consequences of the ministers, and others composing this denomination, coming from so many different countries, and being bred up in so many various habits, while the body was thereby enlarged, tended greatly to diminish its harmony. It soon became apparent that entire unity of sentiment did not prevail among them, respecting the examination of candidates for the ministry on experimental religion, and also respecting strict adherence to presbyterian order, and the requisite amount of learning in those who sought the ministerial office. Frequent conflicts on these subjects occurred in different presbyteries. Parties were formed. Those who were most zealous for strict orthodoxy, for adherence to presbyterian order, and for a learned ministry, were called the "old side;" while those who laid a greater stress on vital piety than on any other qualification, and who undervalued ecclesiastical order and learning, were called the "new side," or "new lights." And although, in 1720, the whole body adopted the Westminster confession of faith and catechisms as the standards of the church, still it was found that a faithful and uniform adherence to these standards could not be in all cases secured. The parties, in the progress of collision, became more excited and ardent; prejudices were indulged; misrepresentations took place; and every thing threatened the approach of serious alienation, if not of a total rupture. While things were in this state of unhappy excitement, Mr. Whitfield, in 1739, paid his second visit to America. The extensive and glorious revival of religion which took place under his ministry, and that of his friends and coadjutors, is well known. Among the ministers of the Presbyterian church, as well as among those of New England, this revival was differently viewed; the "old side" men, looking too much at some censurable irregularities, which mingled themselves with the genuine work of God, were too ready to pronounce the whole a delusion; while the "new side" men with zeal and ardor declared in favor of the ministry of Whitfield and the revival. This brought on the crisis. Undue warmth of feeling and speech, and improper inferences, were admitted on both sides. One act of violence led to another, until, at length, in 1741, the synod was rent asunder; and the synod of New York, composed of "new side" men, was set up in opposition to that of Philadelphia, which retained the original name, and comprehended all the "old side" men who belonged to the general body.

These synods remained in a state of separation for seventeen years. At length, however, a plan of reunion was agreed upon. Several years were spent in negotiation. Mutual concessions were made. The articles of union in detail were happily adjusted; and the synods were united, under the title of the "Synod of New York and Philadelphia," in the year 1759. Among the ministers who were most conspicuous during this period of growth and conflict, from 1716 till 1758, were some of those mentioned above, who still survived; together with the Rev. William Tennent, the elder; his four sons, Gilbert, William, John, and Charles; president Dickinson, of Elizabethtown; president Burr, of Newark; president Davies; president Edwards; the Elairs; president Finley, &c. &c.; all of whom ranked as "new side" men. The Rev. Messrs. John and Samuel Thompson, Dr. Francis Allison, Mr. Robert Cross, and several others, were among the most distinguished on the "old side."

The Presbyterian body, after the union in 1758, went on increasing in numbers, in harmony, and in general edification, until the close of the revolutionary war, when they could reckon about one hundred and seventy ministers, and a few more churches, chiefly in the states of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and the Carolinas. At the meeting of the "Synod of New York and Philadelphia," in May, 1785, finding the independence of the United States established, that judicatory began to take those steps for revising the public standards of the church, which issued in their adoption and establishment on the present plan. The committee appointed to effect this revival were Dr. Witherspoon, Dr. Rodgers, Dr. Robert Smith, Dr. Patrick Allison, Dr. Samuel S. Smith, Dr. John Woodhull, Dr. Robert Cooper, Dr. James Satta, Dr. George Duffield, and Dr. Matthew Wilson. The complete adjustment of this business occupied several years. In May, 1788, the synod completed the revision and arrangement of the public standards, and ordered them to be printed and distributed for the government of all the judicatories of the church. This new arrangement consisted in dividing the body as it formerly stood into four synods, viz. the synod of New York and New Jersey, the synod of Philadelphia, the synod of Virginia, and the synod of the Carolinas; and constituting over these, as a bond of union, a "General Assembly," in all essential particulars after the model of the General Assembly of the church of Scotland. The Westminster confession of faith, after so modifying the twentieth, twenty-first, and twenty-third chapters as to expunge every thing favorable to the civil establishment of religion, and the right of the civil magistrate to interfere in the affairs of the church, was solemnly adopted as a summary of the faith of the Presbyterian church; the Westminster larger and shorter catechisms, with one small alteration in the latter, were also adopted as manuals of instruction; and a form of government and discipline, and a directory for the public worship of God, drawn chiefly from the formularies of the church of Scotland, completed the system. The next year (1789) the first General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in the United States met in Philadelphia, and was opened with a sermon by the Rev. Dr. Witherspoon, who presided until the first moderator of that body (the Rev. Dr. Rodgers) was chosen.

Since the date of the revival and arrangement just mentioned, no alteration has been made either in the confession of faith, or the catechisms of the church. The form of government and discipline have subsequently undergone two revisions; the last, of any extent, in 1821.

The doctrine of the Presbyterian church in the United States is strictly Calvinistic. The Westminster confession of faith and catechisms are universally known to bear this character; to have been drawn up by zealous friends of that system; and to have been expressly intended to form a barrier against Pelagian and Arminian errors.

At the first meeting of the General Assembly, in 1789, there were about one hundred and eighty or one hundred and ninety ministers belonging to the whole Presbyterian body. These were distributed into four synods, and seventeen presbyteries, embracing a large number of vacant congregations. The increase of this denomination of Christians, since that time, has been constant and rapid. It now (1834) embraces twenty-two synods; one hundred and eleven presbyteries; about nineteen hundred ordained ministers; about two hundred and fifty licentiates; about the same number of candidates for license, under the care of presbyteries; considerably above two hundred and thirty thousand communicants; and five or six hundred vacant churches.

Of the above-mentioned ministers about one-third of the whole number reside in the state of New York; the next largest number in Pennsylvania; and the third in order, as to the extent of Presbyterian population, stands the state of Ohio.

Of this body the General Assembly is the highest judicatory. It is the bond of union over the whole; the source of general counsel and advice; and the ultimate resort in the way of reference or appeal, in all cases of difficulty which may occur in the inferior judicatories. This assembly is formed by an equal delegation of ministers and ruling elders from each presbytery. Every presbytery, consisting of not more than twenty-four ministers, is entitled to be represented in the General Assembly by one minister and one ruling elder. Every presbytery consisting of more than twenty-four, and not more than forty-eight, is entitled to be represented by two ministers and two ruling elders; and so on, for every additional twenty-four members. The General Assembly meets annually, in the city of Philadelphia, on the third Thursday of May; and commonly remains in session about two weeks.

The General Assembly of this church has, under its immediate care, two theological seminaries; one at Princeton, New Jersey, founded in 1812, and now containing upwards of one hundred and twenty pupils; another at Alleghany Town, near Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, containing upwards of thirty pupils. The former has three professors, and an assistant teacher. The latter has, for the present, only two professors, in consequence of the decease of a professor elect. There are also, within the bounds of the church, six other theological seminaries: one at Auburn, in the state of New York, containing about fifty pupils, and furnished with three professors; one at Prince Edward, in Virginia, containing about thirty pupils, and having three professors; one at Columbia, South Carolina, having three professors, and about thirty pupils; one at Hanover, Indiana, having three professors, the number of theological pupils not accurately known; the Lane seminary, near Cincinnati, Ohio, having three professors, the number of theological students not known; and one at Maryville, Tennessee, having two professors, the number of theological students also unknown. Of the six last mentioned seminaries, only one (that of Prince Edward, Virginia) has any connexion with the General Assembly; and the connexion in respect to that is but partial. The synods of Virginia and North Carolina, which are united in its support, choose its professors, and its board of directors. It makes an annual report to the General Assembly, and is, to a certain extent, under its supervision; all the rest are founded by, or placed under the direction of, inferior judicatories.

There are a few churches and ministers belonging to this body in Massachusetts and New Hampshire. The rest of them are found scattered throughout all the states and territories south and west of New England.

There is, under the care and direction of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church, a "Board of Missions," which, under different forms, has been in operation for nearly half a century; and also a "Board of Education," which has now under its care nearly four hundred students in training for the holy ministry.

PRESBYTERIANS, (CUMBERLAND;) a body of North American Presbyterians, who reside principally in the states of Kentucky and Tennessee, and the adjacent territories. The causes which led to its formation are the following: About the year 1800, a very great revival of religion took place within the bounds of the synod of Kentucky, in consequence of which a greater number of new congregations were formed than it was possible to supply with regularly educated ministers. To remedy this evil, it was resolved to license men to preach who were apt to teach, and sound in the faith, though they had not gone through any course of classical study. This took place at the Transylvania presbytery; but as many of its members were dissatisfied with the proposed innovation, an appeal was made to the synod, which appointed a commission to examine into the circumstances of the case; the result of whose report was a prohibition of the labors of uneducated ministers, which led the opposite party to form themselves into an independent presbytery, which took its name from the district of Cumberland, in which it was constituted.

As to doctrinal views, they occupy a kind of middle ground between Calvinists and Arminians. They reject the doctrine of eternal reprobation, and hold the universality of redemption, and that the Spirit of God operates on the world, or as coextensively as Christ has made the atonement, in such a manner as to leave all men inexcusable. The number of their congregations amounts to sixty.—Hend. Buck.

PRESCIENCE OF GOD. (See OMNISCIENCE; FOREKNOWLEDGE.) On this subject three leading theories have been resorted to, in order to evade the difficulties which are supposed to be involved in the opinion commonly received. The chevalier Ramsay, among other speculations, holds it a matter of choice in God, to think of finite ideas; and similar opinions, though variously worded, have been occasionally adopted. In substance these opinions are, that though the knowledge of God be infinite as his power is infinite, there is no more reason to conclude, that his knowledge should be always exerted to the full extent of its capacity, than that his power should be employed to the extent of his omnipotence; and that if we suppose him to choose not to know some contingencies, the infiniteness of his knowledge is not thereby impugned. To this it may be answered, that the infinite power of God is in Scripture represented, as in the nature of things it must be, as an infinite capacity, and not as infinite in act; but that the knowledge of God is on the contrary never represented there to us as a capacity to acquire knowledge, but as actually comprehending all things that are, and all things that can be. 2. That the notion of God's choosing to know some things, and not to know others, supposes a reason why he refuses to know any class of things or events; which reason, it would seem, can only arise out of their nature and circumstances, and therefore supposes at least a partial knowledge of them, from which the reason for his not choosing to know them arises. The doctrine is therefore somewhat contradictory. But, 3. It is fatal to this opinion, that it does not at all meet the difficulty arising out of the question of the consistency of divine prescience, and the free actions of men; since some contingent actions, for which men have been made accountable, we are sure, have been foreknown by God, because by his Spirit in the prophets they were foretold; and if the freedom of man can in these cases be reconciled to the prescience of God, there is no greater difficulty in any other case which can possibly occur.

A second theory is, that the foreknowledge of contingent events, being in its own nature impossible, because it implies a contradiction, it does no dishonor to the divine Being to affirm, that of such events he has, and can have, no prescience whatever; and thus the prescience of God, as to moral actions, being wholly denied, the difficulty in question is got rid of. To this the same answer must be given as to the former. It does not meet the case, so long as the Scriptures are allowed to contain prophecies of rewardable and punishable actions. The great fallacy in the argument, that the certain prescience of a moral action destroys its contingent nature, lies in supposing that contingency and certainty are the opposites of each other. It is, perhaps, unfortunate, that a word which is of figurative etymology, and which consequently can only have an ideal application to such subjects, should have grown into common use in this discussion, because it is more liable, on that account, to present itself to different minds under different shades of meaning. If, however, the term contingent in this controversy has any definite meaning at all, as applied to the moral actions of men, it must mean their freedom, and stands opposed, not to certainty, but to necessity. A free action is a voluntary one; and an action which results from the choice of the agent, is distinguished from a necessary one in this, that it might not have been, or have been otherwise, according to the self-determining power of the agent. It is with reference to this specific quality of a free action, that the term contingency is used; it might have been otherwise, in other words, it was not necessitated. Contingency in moral actions is, therefore, their freedom, and is opposed, not to certainty, but to constraint. The very nature of this controversy fixes this as the precise meaning of the term. The question is not, in point of fact, about the certainty of moral actions, that is, whether they will happen or not; but about the nature of them, whether free or constrained, whether they must happen or not. Those who advocate this theory care not about the certainty of actions, simply considered, that is, whether they will take place or not; the reason why they object to a certain prescience of moral actions is this—they conclude that such a prescience renders them necessary. It is the quality of the action for which they contend, not whether it will happen or not. If contingency meant uncertainty, the sense in which such theorists take it, the dispute would be at an end. But though an uncertain action cannot be foreseen as certain, a free, unnecessitated action may; for there is nothing in the knowledge of the action, in the least, to affect its nature. Simple knowledge is, in no sense, a cause of action, nor can it be conceived to be casual, unconnected with exerted power: for mere knowledge, therefore, an action remains free or necessitated, as the case may be. A necessitated action is not made a voluntary one by its being foreknown; a free action is not made a necessary one. Free actions foreknown will not, therefore, cease to be contingent. But how stands the case as to their certainty? Precisely on the same ground. The certainty of a necessary action foreknown, does not result from the knowledge of the action, but from the operation of the necessitating cause; and, in like manner, the certainty of a free action does not result from the knowledge of it, which is no cause at all, but from the voluntary cause, that is, the determination of the will. It alters not the case in the least, to say that the voluntary action might have been otherwise. Had it been otherwise, the knowledge of it would have been otherwise; but as the will, which gives birth to the action, is not dependent upon the previous knowledge of God, but the knowledge of the action upon foresight of the choice of the will, neither the will nor the act is controlled by the knowledge; and the action, though foreseen, is still free or contingent. The foreknowledge of God has then no influence upon either the freedom or the certainty of actions, for this plain reason, that it is knowledge, and not influence; and actions may be certainly foreknown, without their being rendered necessary by that foreknowledge. But here it is said, "If the result of an absolute contingency be certainly foreknown, it can have no other result; it cannot happen otherwise." This is not the true inference. It will not happen otherwise; but, it may be asked, Why can it not happen otherwise? Can is an expression of potentiality; it denotes power or possibility. The objection is, that it is not possible that the action should otherwise happen. But why not? What deprives it of that power? If a necessary action were in question, it could not otherwise happen than as the necessitating cause shall compel; but then that would arise from the necessitating cause solely, and not from the prescience of the action, which is not causal. But if the action be free, and it enter into the very nature of a voluntary action to be unconstrained, then it might have happened in a thousand other ways, or not have happened at all; the foreknowledge of it no more affects its nature in this case than in the other. All its potentiality, so to speak, still remains, independent of foreknowledge, which neither adds to its power of happening otherwise, nor diminishes it. But then we are told, that "the prescience of it, in that case, must be uncertain." Not unless any person can prove, that the divine prescience is unable to dart through all the workings of the human mind, all its comparison of things in the judgment, all the influences of motives on the affections, all the hesitations and haltings of the will, to its final choice. "Such knowledge is too wonderful for us," but it is the knowledge of Him "who understandeth the thoughts of man afar off." "But if a contingency will have a given result, to that result it must be determined." Not in the least. We have seen that it cannot be determined to a given result by mere precognition; for we have evidence in our own minds that mere knowledge is not causal to the actions of another. It is determined to its result by the will of the agent; but even in that case, it cannot be said, that it must be determined to that result, because it is of the nature of freedom to be unconstrained: so that here we have an instance in the case of a free agent that he will act in some particular manner; but it by no means follows from what will be, whether foreseen or not, that it must be.

The third theory amounts, in brief, to this, that the foreknowledge of God must be supposed to differ so much from any thing of the kind which we perceive in ourselves, and from any ideas which we can possibly form of that property of the divine nature, that no argument respecting it can be grounded upon our imperfect notions; and that all controversy on subjects connected with it, is idle and fruitless. But though foreknowledge in God should be admitted to be something of a "very different nature" to the same quality in man, yet, as it is represented as something equivalent to foreknowledge, whatever that something may be, since in consequence of it prophecies have actually been uttered and fulfilled, and of such a kind, too, as relate to actions for which men have in fact been held accountable; all the original difficulty of reconciling contingent events to this something, of which human foreknowledge is a "kind of shadow," as "a map of China is to China itself," remains in full force. The difficulty is shifted, but not removed. It may, therefore, be certainly concluded, if at least the Holy Scriptures are to be our guide, that the omniscience of God comprehends his certain prescience of all events however contingent; and if any thing more were necessary to strengthen the argument above given, it might be drawn from the irrational, and, above all, the unscriptural consequences, which would follow from the denial of this doctrine. These are forcibly stated by president Edwards:—"It would follow from this notion, (namely, that the Almighty doth not foreknow what will be the result of future contingencies,) that as God is liable to be continually repenting what he has done, so he must be exposed to be constantly changing his mind and intentions as to his future conduct; altering his measures, relinquishing his old designs, and forming new schemes and projections. For his purposes, even as to the main parts of his scheme, namely, such as belong to the state of his moral kingdom, must be always liable to be broken, through want of foresight; and he must be continually putting his system to rights, as it gets out of order, through the contingency of the actions of moral agents: he must be a Being who, instead of being absolutely immutable, must necessarily be the subject of infinitely the most numerous acts of repentance, and changes of intention, of any being whatsoever; for this plain reason, that his vastly extensive charge comprehends an infinitely greater number of those things which are to him contingent and uncertain. In such a situation he must have little else to do, but to mend broken links as well as he can, and be rectifying the disjointed frame and disordered movements, in the best manner the case will allow. The Supreme Lord of all things must needs be under great and miserable disadvantages, in governing the world which he has made, and has the care of, through his being utterly unable to find out things of chief importance, which hereafter shall befall his system; which, if he did but know, he might make seasonable provision for. In many cases, there may be very great necessity that he should make provision, in the manner of his ordering and disposing things, for some great events which are to happen, of vast and extensive influence, and endless consequence to the universe; which he may see afterwards, when it is too late, and may wish in vain that he had known beforehand, that he might have ordered his affairs accordingly. And it is in the power of man, on these principles, by his devices, purposes, and actions, thus to disappoint God, break his measures, make him continually to change his mind, subject him to vexation, and bring him into confusion." (See FOREKNOWLEDGE; DECREES OF GOD; PREDESTINATION.)—Watson.

PRESCRIPTION, in theology, was a kind of argument pleaded by Tertullian and others in the third century against erroneous doctors. This mode of arguing has been despised by some, both because it has been used by papists, and because they think that truth has no need of such a support. Others, however, think that if it can be shown that any particular doctrine of Christianity was held in the earliest ages, even approaching the apostolic, it must have very considerable weight; and, indeed, that it has so, appears from the universal appeals of all parties to those early times in support of their particular opinions. The Bible however is the true test.—Head. Buck.

PRESENT; (1.) At hand, and within view, as to place, 1 Sam. 13: 15. (2.) Just now, as to time, 1 Cor. 4: 11. God is represented as present when he utters his mind, displays his glory, favor, or wrath, or some symbol of his presence: so he is represented as present in heaven, (Ps. 16: 11.) in Canaan, (John 1: 3.) in the courts of the temple, (Ps. 100: 2.) in the church, (Gen. 4: 16.) in his noted providences, (Isa. 19: 1, and 64: 1.) and in his ordinances and fellowship with him, Luke 13: 26. Ps. 51: 11. God in Christ is present with the saints in the ordinances of the gospel, in the influences of grace, and continued care of his outward providence, Ps. 46: 1. Matt. 18: 20. To be present with the Lord is to be in heaven, enjoying the immediate view of his glory and fruition of his love, 2 Cor. 5: 8. To be present in spirit is to be near in respect of direction, will, and inclination, 1 Cor. 5: 3. This present world is one abounding with fleshly delights, and with troubles, temptations, and corruptions, Tit. 2: 12. The present truth is the truth greatly opposed, and which is so difficult, and yet much for the honor of Christ, to be cleaved to in principle and practice, 2 Pet. 1: 12.—Brown.

PRESENT; (1.) To show; and to arraign in the presence or view, 1 Sam. 17: 16. Acts 23: 33. (2.) To offer; (Matt. 2: 11.) and so a present is a gift, rendered to testify regard or subjection, or to procure or confirm friendship, 1 Kings 4: 21. 2 Kings 17: 3. Kings offer presents to Christ when they give their hearts to him, believing in and obeying him, and give up their people and wealth to his service, Ps. 72: 10. Ministers present their hearers as chaste virgins before Christ, when, by their means, they come to appear at his judgment-seat, sound in principle, lively in faith, single in affection to Christ, and holy in their lives and conversation, 2 Cor. 11: 2. Col. 1: 22, 28.—Brown.

PRESS. This word is often used in Scripture not only for the machine by which grapes are squeezed, but also for the vessel, or vat, into which the wine runs from the press; that in which it is received and preserved. Whence proceed these expressions: he digged a wine-press in his vineyard; your presses shall run over with wine; thy presses shall burst out with new wine; to draw out of the press; Zeeb they slew at the wine-press of Zeeb. It was a kind of subterranean cistern, in which the wine was received and kept, till it was put into jars or vessels, of earth or wood.

We read in several titles of the Psalms, as 8, 80, 83: 1, "for the presses," [on Gittith, Eng. Tr.] which is differently explained. Some think that these psalms are songs of rejoicing for the vintage, and were chiefly sung at the feast of tabernacles, after the harvest and the vintage. Others think that gittith signifies an instrument of music. The fathers explain this in a spiritual sense, of the church of Christ, the mystical vine, in which the press is built, according to the description of our Savior in the gospel. Calmet thinks the Hebrew may be translated, "a psalm addressed to the master of music, who presided over the band of Gittites." In the temple were several bands of singers, of which some might be of the city Gath.—Gathites.—Calnet.

PRESUMPTION, as it relates to the mind, is a supposition formed before examination. As it relates to the conduct or moral action, it implies arrogance or irreverence. As it relates to religion in general, it is a bold and daring confidence in the goodness of God, without obedience to his will.

Presumptuous sins must be distinguished from sins of infirmity, or those failings peculiar to human nature; (Ecc. 7: 20. 1 John 1: 8, 9,) from sins done through ignorance; (Luke 12: 48.) and from sins into which men are hurried by sudden and violent temptation, Gal. 6: 1. The ingredients which render sin presumptuous are, knowledge, (John 13: 22.) deliberation and contrivance, (Prov. 6: 11. Ps. 36: 4.) obstinacy, (Jer. 44: 16. Deut. 1: 13.) inattention to the remonstrances of conscience, (Acts 7: 51.) opposition to the dispensations of Providence, (2 Chron. 28: 22.) and repeated commission of the same sin, Ps. 78: 17.

Presumptuous sins are numerous; such as profane swearing, perjury, theft, adultery, drunkenness, Sabbath-breaking, &c. These may be more particularly considered as presumptuous sins, because they are generally committed against a known law, and so often repeated. Such sins are most heinous in their nature, and most pernicious in their effects. They are said to be a reproach to the Lord; (Num. 15: 3.) they harden the heart; (1 Tim. 4: 2.) draw down judgments from heaven; (Num. 15: 31.) even when repented of, are seldom pardoned without some visible testimony of God's displeasure, 2 Sam. 12: 10.

As it respects professors of religion, as one observes, they sin presumptuously, (1.) when they take up a profession of religion without principle; (2.) when they profess to ask the blessing of God, and yet go on in forbidden courses; (3.) when they do not take religion as they find it in the Scriptures; (4.) when they make their feelings the test of their religion, without considering the difference between animal passion and the operations of the Spirit of God; (5.) when they run into temptation; (6.) when they indulge in self-confidence and self-complacency; (7.) when they bring the spirit of the world into the church; (8.) when they form apologies for that in some which they condemn in others; (9.) when, professing to believe in the doctrines of the gospel, they live licentiously; (10.) when they create, magnify, and pervert their troubles; (11.) when they arraign the conduct of God as unkind and unjust. PRETORIUM; a name given in the gospels to the house in which dwelt the Roman governor of Jerusalem, Matt. 27: 27. Mark 15: 16. John 18: 28, 33. Here he sat in his judicial capacity, and here Jesus was brought before him. Paul speaks also of the pretorium (or palace) at Rome, in which he gave testimony to Christ, Phil. 1: 13. Some think, that by this he means the palace of the emperor Nero; and others, that he means the place where the Roman prætor sat to administer justice, that is, his tribunal. It is certain that the emperor's palace did not bear the name of tribunal; but Paul, being accustomed to call by this name the governor's palace at Jerusalem, might give it to the emperor's at Rome.—Calnet.

PREVAIL; (1.) To have the advantage of, or power over, Judg. 16: 5. (2.) To rise higher, Gen. 7: 18, 20. Jesus prevailed to open the sealed book of his Father's purposes: he had sufficient knowledge and authority for that work, Rev. 5: 5. The word of God prevails when, by the Holy Ghost, it gains the attention of multitudes, converts them to Christ, and disposes them to lay aside their sinful practices, Acts 19: 20. Jacob's blessings, particularly of Joseph, prevailed above the blessings of his progenitors in the extent of the plainness, and the nearness of their accomplishment. None of his seed were excluded from the blessing, as in the case of Abraham and Isaac.

In his blessing, Canaan was particularly divided; and by the increase of his posterity, there was a nearer prospect of their inheriting it, Gen. 49: 26. Wicked men prevail when permitted to act as they please in dishonoring God and afflicting his people, Ps. 9: 19. Iniquities prevail against a saint when the apprehensions of his guilt greatly affright and distress him, or his powerful corruptions lead him, contrary to his inclination and the convictions of his judgment, to commit sin, Ps. 15: 3.—Brown.

PREVENT; (1.) To come before one is expected or sought, Job 30: 27. (2.) To go before, or be sooner, Ps. 119: 147. One is happily prevented when distress is hindered, and favors come unasked; (Job 3: 12. Ps. 18: 18.) or unhappily, when snares and afflictions come unexpected, 2 Sam. 22: 6.—Brown.

PRICE, (RICHARD, LL. D.), a philosopher and divine, was born in Wakes, February 22, 1723, the son of a Calvinistic minister. He was educated at an academy near London. In 1757, he became the pastor of a dissenting congregation at Newington Green, and in 1769, the pastor at Hackney. In his religious sentiments he was an Arian, having at an early age imbibed the views of Mr. Jones, his school teacher. He died March 19, 1791, aged sixty-seven.

He published a Review of the Principal Questions in Morals; Four Dissertations; Observations on Annuities, &c.; Discussion concerning Materialism and Necessity, in a correspondence with Dr. Priestley; and two volumes of sermons.

Dr. Price's publications on religious subjects are not numerous. His sermons contain much good sense. His "Essays on Providence and Prayer" display great talents; and his "Questions on Morals" are considered as the ablest defence of the system of Cudworth and Clarke. In the controversy with Dr. Priestley, on Materialism, he displayed great ability.

The doctor was always distinguished for his amiable deportment in private life. There was a simplicity and a naïveté in his character, very remarkable in a man who had mingled so much with the world. His piety was sincere, and, in his family prayer, his devotion was ardent.

Of literary honors he enjoyed great abundance. His correspondents included many of the most eminent characters in England, in America, and in France. His works, which procured for him great respect in America, were, Observations on Civil Liberty, and the Justice of the War with America, 1776; Additional Observations, 1777; and the Importance of the American Revolution, and the means of making it useful to the world, 1784. His nephew, William Morgan, has written his life, and described his excellent character.—Allen; Jones' Chris. Biog.

PRICE, (JONATHAN D.), a physician and missionary to Burmah, was ordained in Philadelphia, May 20, 1821. He arrived early in the next year at Rangoon.

When his medical character was known at court, he was ordered to repair to Ava, the capital, where he was introduced to the king, who gave him a house. When the British invaded Burmah, he and Mr. Judson were thrown into prison, June 8, 1824. He was confined, and subject to dreadful sufferings till February or March, 1826, when he was released and employed to negotiate a treaty with the British, who had advanced near to the capital.

After the war he resided at Ava, in the favor of the emperor; he engaged in the tuition of several scholars; and by his lectures hoped to shake the foundation of Buddhism. He fell a victim to pulmonary consumption, February 14, 1828, dying in the hope of that precious gospel he wished to impart to the heathen. Amer. Bab. Mag.; Memoir of Mrs. Judson.—Allen.

PRIDE, is inordinate and unreasonable self-esteem, attended with insolence and rude treatment of others.

"It is sometimes," says a good writer, "confounded with vanity, and sometimes with dignity; but to the former passion it has no resemblance, and in many circumstances it differs from the latter. Vanity is the parent of loquacious boasting; and the person subject to it, if his pretences be admitted, has no inclination to insult the company. The proud man, on the other hand, is naturally silent, and, wrapt up in his own importance, seldom speaks but to make his audience feel their inferiority."

Pride is the high opinion that a poor, little, contracted soul entertains of itself. Dignity consists in just, great, and uniform actions, and is the opposite to meanness.

2. Pride manifests itself by praising ourselves, adorning our persons, attempting to appear before others in a superior light to what we are; contempt and slander of others; envy at the excellencies others possess; anxiety to gain applause; distress and rage when slighted; impatience of contradiction, and opposition to God himself.

3. The evil effects of pride are beyond computation. It has spread itself universally in all nations, among all characters; and as it was the first sin, as some suppose, that entered into the world, so it seems the last to be conquered. It may be considered as the parent of discontent, ingratitude, covetousness, poverty, presumption, passion, extravagance, bigotry, war, and persecution. In fact, there is hardly an evil perpetrated but what pride is connected with it in a proximate or remote sense.

4. To suppress this evil, we should consider what we are. "If we could trace our descents," says Seneca, "we should find all slaves to come from princes, and all princes from slaves. To be proud of knowledge, is to be blind in the light; to be proud of virtue, is to poison ourselves with the antidote; to be proud of authority, is to make our rise our downfall." The imperfection of our nature, our scanty knowledge, contracted powers, narrow conceptions, and moral inability, are strong motives to excite us to humility. We should consider, also, what punishments this sin has brought on mankind. See the cases of Pharaoh, Haman, Nebuchadnezzar, Herod, and others. How particularly is it prohibited; (Prov. 16: 18. 1 Pet. 5: 5. James 4: 6. Prov. 29: 23.) what a torment it is to its possessor; (Esther 5: 13.) how soon all things of a sublunary nature will end; how disgraceful it renders us in the sight of God, angels, and men; what a barrier it is to our felicity and communion with God; how fruitful it is of discord; how it precludes our usefulness, and renders us really contemptible. (See HUMILITY.) Brown's Philosophy of the Mind; Blair's Sermons; Works of Robert Hall.—Hend. Buck.

PRIDEAUX, (JOHN, D. D.;) bishop of Worcester. This great divine was born at Stowford, in Devonshire, on the 17th of September, 1578. His father having a numerous family, with very little to support them, the expenses of his education, after he had been instructed in writing and reading at home, were defrayed by a lady of the same parish. He was sent to school, where he continued till he had acquired some knowledge of the Latin language; he then travelled, on foot, to Oxford, and engaged himself in some menial capacity in Exeter college, dividing his time between the servile offices of the kitchen and those studies which afterwards rendered him so eminent.

On account of his abilities and learning, he was admitted a member of the college in 1596. He took the degrees in arts and divinity; and, after having been some years fellow, was, in 1612, chosen rector of his college. In 1615, he was made Regius professor of divinity, by virtue of which place he became canon of Christ church, and rector of Ewelme, in Oxfordshire, and afterwards filled the office of vice-chancellor for several years. He was consecrated bishop of Worcester, at Westminster, the 19th of December following, 1611. From his adherence and support of Charles the First, during the great rebellion, he became so impoverished, that he was obliged to sell his library to support himself and his family. He was a man of most unassuming and gentle manners; of excellent conduct, and great integrity and piety of mind; quite regardless of worldly concerns, and careless and often imprudent in worldly matters. He died of a fever, at Bredan, in Worcestershire, at the house of his son-in-law, Dr. Henry Sutton, on the 30th of July, 1650, leaving to his children no legacy but God's blessing and a "father's prayers," as he himself expresses it in his will.

He was an excellent linguist, possessing a wonderful memory; and so profound a divine, that some have called him, "Columna fidei orthodoxæ, et Malleus Hereticorum, Patrum Pater;" and "Ingens Scholæ et Academiae oraculum." His works were as much esteemed as his learning.

PRIDEAUX, (HUMPHREY, D. D.,) a learned divine and historian, was born at Padstow, in Cornwall, in 1648. He was educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford; and while at the university, he published the Ancient Inscriptions from the Arundelian Marbles, under the title of "Marmora Oxoniensia," which recommended him to the patronage of the lord chancellor Finch, afterwards earl of Nottingham, who gave him a living near Oxford, and afterwards a prebend in Norwich cathedral. He was subsequently promoted to the archdeaconry of Suffolk; and in 1702, made dean of Norwich. An incurable weakness having incapacitated him for the public offices of the ministry, he resigned his church preferment, and devoted his time to the study of sacred literature. He was highly respected, and often consulted on the affairs of the church. His death took place on the first of November, 1724.

Besides his great work, entitled "The Old and New Testament connected in the History of the Jews, and neighboring Nations," of which there are many editions, he was the author of "The Life of Mahomet, with a Letter to the Deists," octavo, and "Ecclesiastical Tracts," octavo, &c. &c. *Biog. PRIEST; a person set apart for the performance of sacrifice, and other offices and ceremonies of religion.

Before the promulgation of the law of Moses, the first born of every family, the fathers, the princes, and the kings, were priests. Thus Cain and Abel, Noah, Abraham, Melchizedek, Job, Isaac, and Jacob, offered themselves their own sacrifices. Among the Israelites, after their departure from Egypt, the priesthood was confined to one tribe; and it consisted of three orders, the high-priest, priests, and Levites.

The Lord having reserved to himself the first-born of Israel, because he had preserved them from the hand of the destroying angel in Egypt, by way of exchange and compensation, he accepted the tribe of Levi for the service of his tabernacle, Num. 3: 41. Thus the whole tribe of Levi was appointed to the sacred ministry, but not all in the same manner; for of the three sons of Levi, Gershom, Kohath, and Merari, the heads of the three great families, the Lord chose the family of Kohath, and out of this family the house of Aaron, to exercise the functions of the priesthood. All the rest of the family of Kohath, even the children of Moses, and their descendants, remained among the Levites.

The high-priest was at the head of all religious affairs, and was the ordinary judge of all difficulties that belonged thereto, and even of the general justice and judgment of the Jewish nation, Deut. 17: 8—12. 19: 17. 21: 5. 33: 9, 10. Ezek. 44: 24. He only had the privilege of entering the sanctuary once a year, on the day of solemn expiation, to make atonement for the sins of the whole people, Lev. 16: 2, &c. He was to be born of one of his own tribe, whom his father had married a virgin; and was to be exempt from corporal defect, Lev. 21: 13. In general, no priest who had any defect of this kind could offer sacrifice, or enter the holy place, to present the shewbread. But he was to be maintained by the sacrifices offered at the tabernacle, Lev. 21: 22.

God had appropriated to the person of the high-priest the oracle of his truth: so that when he was habited in the proper ornaments of his dignity, and with the urim and thummim, he answered questions proposed to him, and God discovered to him secret and future things. He was forbidden to mourn for the death of any of his relations, even for his father or mother; or to enter into any place where a dead body lay, that he might not contract, or hazard the contraction, of uncleanness. He could not marry a widow, nor a woman who had been divorced, nor a harlot, but a virgin only of his own race.

High-Priest.

He was to observe a strict continence during the whole time of his service.

Priest.

The priesthood was made hereditary in the family of Aaron; and the first-born of the oldest branch of that family, if he had no legal blemish, was always the high-priest. This divine appointment was observed with considerable accuracy till the Jews fell under the dominion of the Romans, and had their faith corrupted by a false philosophy. Then, indeed, the high-priesthood was sometimes set up to sale, and, instead of continuing for life, as it ought to have done, it seems, from some passages in the New Testament, to have been nothing more than an annual office. There is sufficient reason, however, to believe, that it was never disposed of but to some descendant of Aaron capable of filling it, had the older branches been extinct. In the time of David, the inferior priests were divided into twenty-four companies, who were to serve in rotation, each company by itself, for a week. The order in which the several courses were to serve was determined by lot; and each course was, in all succeeding ages, called by the name of its original chief. (See PRIESTHOOD.)

The advocates of hierarchical claims, whether in the Romish, Greek, or Protestant churches, assume that Christian ministers are entitled to be regarded as succeeding to the same relation to the church, with that which was sustained by the priesthood under the Jewish economy. Hence the terms and offices peculiar to the ancient priests, are conceived to be analogous to the functions and designations of the Christian ministry. On this assumption, it is contended that the duties performed, and the authority exercised, under the direct sanction of the Most High, are now transferred to those who are duly qualified, by a certain order of succession, to discharge the offices of the ministry under the present dispensation. It has, however, been satisfactorily proved, that the Christian ministry is not a priesthood; that Christ is the only and the all-sufficient priest of the Christian church; and that the Levitical terms employed in the New Testament, which do not apply exclusively to Christ, belong equally to all true Christians.

As hieruus means one who offers sacrifices, and as sacrifices have been abolished since the offering of the one perfect and all-sufficient sacrifice, it follows, that, in the strict and official sense, there are no "sacrificers" under the present dispensation. If, therefore, the claims of the Christian ministers are made to rest upon a precise analogy to those founded upon the priestly functions of an abrogated dispensation, it surely becomes the advocates of such claims to prove from the Christian Institute, that the conceived analogy exists. But where is the proof? There is not a single passage in "the book" of apostles and evangelists, to support the assumption. Nowhere are the ministers of the gospel represented as "sacrificers;" nowhere is provision made for such a succession, as in any respect similar to the Levitical, and still less the Aaronical priesthood. To the prophets, and rulers of the synagogues, it is admitted that there are allusions descriptive of ministerial duties; for the work of instruction was the appropriate business of these ecclesiastical functionaries, and not performing the services of a prescribed ritual. But sacerdotal dignities are never ascribed to Christian presbyters, and the principles in which the appropriation originated, may be evidently traced to the working of that antichristian power which produced at length "the mystery of iniquity," and "the man of sin."

The conclusions involved in this argument are subversive of all those "high church" pretensions which, in more than one hierarchy, have been the immediate sources of arrogant and unholy domination. The doctrine of prerogatives, whether regal or pontifical, has been for ages upheld by the advocates of despotism, on most indefensible grounds; and the "divine right" by which kings reign, and priests "lord it over God's heritage," has been indebted for its main support to the same assumption and analogy! Judaizing, in one form or another, has been the (πρότον ψεύδος) first delusion under the dispensation of him who was "meek and lowly of heart." The first disciples required special illumination, to emancipate their minds from the secular spirit they had imbibed. The first errors that troubled the churches, and perverted the gospel, arose from the notion of amalgamating Judaism with Christianity. The decree of the "apostles, and elders, and brethren," though "it seemed good to the Holy Ghost," did not eradicate the tendency that led to "the beggarly elements" of the abolished economy. One of the earliest indications of the rising spirit of Antichrist appeared in the principle that made one class of ministers superior to another, and found its convenient prototype in the high-priest's supremacy. The analogy led to its consummation by most appropriate encroachments, till one bishop became the supreme pontiff, and the imagined resemblance was complete. Judaizing is the basis of Protestant hierarchies; and the Old Testament, abused and perverted, furnishes the principal sources, both of the illustrations and the authority, by which the mighty apparatus of ecclesiastical polity and priestly dominion is supported. See Stratten's Book of the Priesthood; Howitt on Priestcraft; Dwight's Theology; Cong. Mag., Feb. 1831.—Calmet; Hend. Buck.

PRIESTHOOD. We may distinguish four kinds of priesthood. (1.) That of kings, princes, heads of families, and the first-born. This may be called a natural priesthood, because nature and reason teach us, that the honor of offering sacrifices to God should belong to the most mature in understanding, and the greatest in dignity. (2.) The priesthood, according to the order of Melchizedek, which does not differ from that now mentioned, but in its dignity; because Melchizedek was raised up of God to represent the priesthood of Jesus Christ. Or, the priesthood of Melchizedek combined in the same person the right of the kingly and of the priestly offices, with that of the first-born, to exercise the priesthood; or, he was at once king, priest, and prophet, that is, a authoritative teacher, in every sense of the term. (See MELCHIZEDEK.) (3.) The priesthood of Aaron and his family, which subsisted as long as the religion of the Jews. (4.) The priesthood of Jesus Christ, and of the new law, which is infinitely superior to all others, in its duration, its dignity, its prerogatives, its object, and its power. The priesthood of Aaron was to end, but that of Jesus Christ is everlasting. That of Aaron was limited to his own family, was exercised only in the temple, and among only one people; its object was bloody sacrifices and purifications, which were only external, and could not remit sins; but the priesthood of Jesus Christ includes the entire Christian church, spread over the face of the whole earth, and among all nations of the world. The epistle to the Hebrews should be considered by those, who would comprehend the excellence of the priesthood of the new law above that of the law of Moses, Heb. 4: 14, &c.; also chap. 5—9. See 1 Pet. 2: 5—9.—Calmet.

PRIESTLEY, (JOSEPH, LL. D.,) an eminent dissenting divine and experimental philosopher, was born, in 1733, at Fieldhead, in Yorkshire. His father was a cloth dresser. At the age of nineteen he had acquired in the schools to which he had been sent, and by the aid of private instruction, a good knowledge of Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, French, Italian, and German; he had also begun to read Arabic, and learned Chaldee and Syriac. With these attainments, and others in mathematics, natural philosophy, and morals, he entered the academy of Davenport, under Dr. Ashworth, in 1752, with a view to the Christian ministry. Here he spent three years. The students were referred to books on both sides of every question, and required to abridge the most important works. The tutors, Mr. Ashworth and Mr. Clark, being of different opinions, and the students being divided, subjects of dispute were continually discussed. He had been educated in Calvinism, and in early life he suffered great distress from not finding satisfactory evidence of the renovation of his mind by the Spirit of God. He had a great aversion to plays and romances. He attended a weekly meeting of young men for conversation and prayer. But, before he went to the academy, he became an Arminian, though he retained the doctrine of the trinity and of the atonement. At the academy he embraced Arianism. Perusing Hartley's Observations on Man, he was fixed in the belief of the doctrine of necessity. By reading Lardner's Letter on the Logos he afterwards became a Socinian.

After having been tutor at Warrington, and pastor to various congregations, and having acquired considerable reputation as an experimentalist and author, he became companion to the earl of Shelburne. At the end of a seven years' residence with that nobleman, he received a pension, and settled, in 1780, at Birmingham. There he proceeded actively with his philosophical and theological researches, and was also appointed pastor to a dissenting congregation.

In 1791, however, the scene changed. His religious principles, and his avowed partiality to the French revolution, excited the hatred of the high church and tory party, and in the riots which took place in July, his house, library, manuscripts, and apparatus, were committed to the flames by the infuriated mob, and he was exposed to great personal danger. Quitting Birmingham, he succeeded Dr. Price at Hackney; but, in 1794, conceiving himself to be not secure from popular rage, he embarked for North America. He took up his abode at Northumberland, in Pennsylvania. For two or three winters after his arrival he delivered lectures on the evidences of Christianity, in Philadelphia. He died in calmness, and in the full vigor of his mind, Feb. 6, 1804, aged seventy. He dictated some alterations in his manuscripts half an hour before his death.

He was amiable and affectionate in the intercourse of private and domestic life. Few men in modern times have written so much, or with such facility; yet he seldom spent more than six or eight hours in a day in any labor, which required much mental exertion. A habit of regularity extended itself to all his studies. He never read a book without determining in his own mind when he would finish it; and at the beginning of every year he arranged the plan of his literary pursuits and scientific researches. He labored under a great defect, which, however, was not a very considerable impediment to his progress. He sometimes lost all ideas both of persons and things, with which he had been conversant.

He always did immediately what he had to perform. Though he rose early and despatched his more serious pursuits in the morning, yet he was as well qualified for mental exertion at one time of the day as at another. All seasons were equal to him, early or late, before dinner or after. He could also write without inconvenience by the parlor fire, with his wife and children about him, and occasionally talking to them. In his family he ever maintained the worship of God. As a schoolmaster and professor he was indefatigable.

With respect to his religious sentiments his mind underwent a number of revolutions; but he died in the Socinian faith, which he had many years supported. He was a materialist and necessitarian. He maintained, that all volitions are the necessary result of previous circumstances, the will being always governed by motives; and yet he opposed the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination. (See MATERIALISM.) The basis of his necessitarian theory was Hartley's Observations on Man.

As a philosopher his fame principally rests upon his pneumatic inquiries. His works extend to between seventy and eighty volumes. Among them are Lectures on General History; on the Theory and History of Language; and on the Principles of Oratory and Criticism; Charts of Biography and History; Disquisitions relating to Matter and Spirit; Harleian Theory of the Human Mind; History of the Corruptions of Christianity; Letters to a Philosophical Unbeliever; Institutes of Natural and Revealed Religion; History of Electricity; History of Vision, Light, and Colors; and Experiments and Observations on different Kinds of Air. He also wrote many defences of Unitarianism, and contributed largely to the Theological Repository. After his arrival in this country he published a Comparison of the Institutions of the Mosiac Religion with those of the Hindoos; Jesus and Socrates compared; several Tracts against Dr. Linn, who wrote against the preceding pamphlet; Notes on the Scriptures, four vols.; History of the Christian Church, six vols.; several pamphlets on philosophical subjects, and in defence of the doctrine of Phlogiston. Dr. Priestley's Life was published in 1806, in two volumes. The memoirs were written by himself to the year 1787, and a short continuation by his own hand brings them to 1795. Am. Ency.; Spirit of the Pilgrims; Douglas on Errors.—Davenport; Allen.

PRIMACY; the highest post in the church. The Romanists contend that Peter, by our Lord's appointment, had a primacy or sovereign authority and jurisdiction over the apostles. This, however, is denied by the Protestants, and that upon just grounds.

Dr. Barrow observes, that there are several sorts of primacy which may belong to a person in respect of others. 1. A primacy of worth or personal excellency. 2. A primacy of reputation and esteem. 3. A primacy of order or bare dignity and precedence. 4. A primacy of power and jurisdiction.

As for the first of these, a primacy of worth, we may well grant it to Peter, admitting that probably he did exceed the rest of his brethren in personal endowments and capacities; particularly in quickness of apprehension, boldness of spirit, readiness of speech, charity to our Lord, and zeal for his service.

2. As to a primacy of repute, which Paul means when he speaks of those who had a special reputation, of those who seemed to be pillars, of the supereminent apostles, (Gal. 2: 6, 9. 2 Cor. 11: 5. 12: 11.) this advantage cannot be refused him, being a necessary consequent of those eminent qualities resplendent in him, and of the illustrious performances achieved by him beyond the rest. This may be inferred from that renown which he hath had from the beginning; and likewise from his being so constantly ranked in the first place before the rest of his brethren.

3. As to a primacy of order or bare dignity, importing that commonly, in all meetings and proceedings, the other apostles did yield him the precedence, may be questioned; for this does not seem suitable to the gravity of such persons, or their condition and circumstances, to stand upon ceremonies of respect; for our Lord's rules seem to exclude all semblance of ambition, all kind of inequality and distance between his apostles. But yet this primacy may be granted as probable upon divers accounts of use and convenience; it might be useful to preserve order, and to promote expedition, or to prevent confusion, distraction, and dilatory obstruction in the management of things.

4. As to a primacy importing a superiority in command, power, or jurisdiction, this we have great reason to deny upon the following considerations:—1. For such a power it was needful that a commission from God, its founder, should be granted in absolute and perspicuous terms; but no such commission is extant in Scripture. 2. If so illustrious an office was instituted by our Savior, it is strange, that nowhere in the evangelical or apostolical history there should be any express mention of that institution. 3. If Peter had been instituted sovereign of the apostolical senate, his office and state had been in nature and kind very distinct from the common office of the other apostles, as the office of a king from the office of any subject; and probably would have been signified by some distinct name, as that of arch-apostle, arch-pastor, the vi-ear of Christ, or the like; but no such name or title was assumed by him, or was by the rest attributed to him. 4. There was no office above that of an apostle known to the apostles or primitive church, Eph. 4: 11. 1 Cor. 12: 28. 5. Our Lord himself declared against this kind of primacy, prohibiting his apostles to affect, to seek, to assume, or admit a superiority of power, one above another, Luke 22: 14—24. Mark 9: 35. 6. We do not find any peculiar administration committed to Peter, nor any privilege conferred on him which was not also granted to the other apostles, John 20: 23. Mark 16: 15. 7. When Peter wrote two catholic epistles, there does not appear in either of them any intimation or any pretence to this arch-apostolic power. 8. In all relations which occur in Scripture about controversies incident of doctrine or practice, there is no appeal made to Peter's judgment or allegation of it as decisive, no argument is built on his authority. 9. Peter nowhere appears intermeddling as a judge or governor paramount in such cases; yet where he doth himself deal with heretics and disorderly persons, he proceedeth not as a pope, decreeing, but as an apostle, warning, arguing, and persuading against them. 10. The consideration of the apostles proceeding in the conversion of people, in the foundation of churches, and in administration of their spiritual affairs, will exclude any probability of Peter's jurisdiction over them. They went about their business, not by order or license from Peter, but according to special direction of God's Spirit. 11. The nature of the apostolic ministry, their not being fixed in one place of residence, but continually moving about the world; the state of things at that time, and the manner of Peter's life, render it unlikely that he had such a jurisdiction over the apostles as some assign him. 12. It was indeed most requisite that every apostle should have a complete, absolute, independent authority in managing the duties and concerns of the office, that he might not anywise be obstructed in the discharge of them, not clogged with a need to consult others, not hampered with orders from those who were at a distance. 13. The discourse and behavior of Paul towards Peter doth evidence that he did not acknowledge any dependence on him, or any subjection to him, Gal. 2: 11. 14. If Peter had been appointed sovereign of the church, it seems that it should have been requisite that he should have outlived all the apostles; for otherwise, the church would have wanted a head, or there must have been an inextricable controversy who that head was. But Peter died long before John, as all agree, and perhaps before divers others of the apostles.

From these arguments, we must see what little ground the church of Rome hath to derive the supremacy of the pope from the supposed primacy of Peter. Barrow's Works, vol. i. p. 557.—Hend. Buck.

PRIMATE; an archbishop who is invested with a jurisdiction over other bishops. (See ΑΡΧΙΕΠΙΣΚΟΠΟΣ.)—Hend. Buck.

PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANS; those who lived in the first ages of Christianity, especially the apostles and immediate followers of our Lord. We think the term should be limited to the first century, or at most the second; to guard against abuses, which early crept in, being cited (as is now the case too often) for example and authority. In truth nothing should be regarded as primitive, which is not sanctioned by the New Testament.—Hend. Buck.

PRINCE, is sometimes taken for the chief, the principal: as the princes of the families, of the tribes, of the houses of Israel; the princes of the Levites, of the people, of the priests; the princes of the synagogue, or assembly; the princes of the children of Reuben, of Judah, &c. Also, for the king, the sovereign of a country, and his principal officers: the princes of the army of Pharaoh; Phicol, prince of the army of Abimelech.

For the transgression of a land its princes are many; the pretenders to royalty or high power are numerous, and are soon cut off, Prov. 28: 2. The princes and thousands of Judah denote the same thing, the governor being put for the governed, or whole body, Matt. 2: 6. Mic. 5: 2. God is called the Prince of the host, and Prince of princes; he rules over all, and in a peculiar manner was the governor of the Jewish nation, Dan. 8: 11, 25. Jesus Christ is the Prince of the kings of the earth; in his person he surpasses every creature in excellence, and he bestows rule and authority on men as he sees fit, Rev. 1: 5. He is the Prince of life: as God, he is the author and disposer of all life, temporal, spiritual, and eternal; as Mediator, he purchases, bestows, and brings men to everlasting happiness, Acts 2: 15. He is the Prince of peace: he is the God of peace: he purchased peace for guilty man, he made peace between Jews and Gentiles; he left peace to his disciples and people; and he governs his church in the most peaceful manner, Isa. 9: 6.

The "prince of this world," is the devil, who boasts of having all the kingdoms of the earth at his disposal, John 12: 31. 14: 30. 16: 11.—Calmet; Brown.

PRINCE, (THOMAS), minister in Boston, was born at Sandwich, May 15, 1687, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1707. Having determined to visit Europe, he sailed for England, April 1, 1709. For some years he preached at Combs, in Suffolk, where he was earnestly invited to continue; but his attachment to his native country was too strong to be resisted. He arrived at Boston, July 20, 1717, and was ordained pastor of the Old South church, as colleague with Dr. Sewall, his classmate, Oct. 1, 1718. In this station his fine genius, improved by diligent study, polished by an extensive acquaintance with mankind, and employed to the noblest purposes of life, rendered him an ornament to his profession, and a rich blessing to the church. He died Oct. 22, 1758, aged seventy-one.

In his last sickness he expressed a deep sense of his sinfulness, and a desire of better evidence that he was fit to dwell in heaven. When his speech failed him, as he was asked, whether he was submissive to the divine will, and could commit his soul to the care of Jesus, he lifted up his hand to express his resignation and confidence in the Savior. From his youth he had been influenced by the fear of God. He was an eminent preacher, for his sermons were rich in thought, perspicuous and devotional, and he inculcated the doctrines and duties of religion as one who felt their importance. In the opinion of Dr. Chauncy, no one in New England had more learning, except Cotton Mather. Firmly attached to the faith once delivered to the saints, he was zealous for the honor of his divine Master.

In private life he was amiable and exemplary. It was his constant endeavor to imitate the perfect example of his Master and Lord. He was ready to forgive injuries, and return good for evil.

Mr. Prince began in 1703, while at college, and continued more than fifty years, a collection of public and private papers relating to the civil and religious history of New England. His collection of manuscripts was destroyed by the British during the late war, and thus many important facts relating to the history of this country are irrecoverably lost. His publications were numerous; consisting of Sermons; an Account of the First Appearance of the Aurora Borealis; a Chronological History of New England, in the form of annals, in 1736; and three numbers of the second volume, in 1755. In this work it was his intention to give a summary account of transactions and occurrences relating to this country, from the discovery of Gosnold, in 1602, to the arrival of governor Belcher, in 1730; but he brought the history down only to 1633. He published also an Account of the Revival of Religion in Boston, in the Christian History, 1744; and the New England Psalm Book, revised and improved, 1758. Wisner's Hist. O. South.—Allen.

PRINCIPALITY. (1.) Royal state, or the attire of the head marking the same, Jer. 13: 18. (2.) Chief rulers, Tit. 3: 1. (3.) Good angels, Eph. 1: 21. 3: 10. (4.) Bad angels, Eph. 6: 12. Col. 2: 15.—Broten.

PRINCIPLE, an essential truth from which others are derived; the ground or motive of action. (See DISPOSITION, and DOCTRINE.)—Hend. Buck.

PRIOR; the head of a convent; next in dignity to an abbot.—Hend. Buck.

PRISCILLA, or PRISCA; (2 Tim. 4: 19.) a Christian woman, well known in the Acts, and in Paul's epistles; sometimes placed before her husband Aquila. Their house was so thoroughly Christianized, that Paul calls it a church. (See AQUILA.)—Calmet.

PRISCILLIANISTS; the followers of Priscillian, in the fourth century, a Spaniard by birth, and bishop of Abila. He is said to have adopted the tenets of the Manichæans: it is more certain that he was cruelly persecuted, even unto death, for his opinions.

Their principal accuser, Ithacius, seems to have been capable of every thing he charged on them; for Sulpicius Severus, who was by no means favorable to their doctrines, says of him, that "he was audacious, talkative, impudent, luxurious, and a slave to his belly."

The part which Martin, bishop of Tours, took in this business, redounds much to his honor. He "blamed Ithacius (says Mr. Miller) for bringing the heretics as criminals before the emperor, and intreated Maximus to abstain from the blood of the unhappy men; he said, it was abundantly sufficient that, having been judged heretics by the sentence of the bishops, they were expelled from the churches; and that it was a new and unheard of evil, for a secular judge to interfere in matters purely ecclesiastical. These were Christian sentiments; and deserve to be here mentioned, as describing an honest, though unsuccessful resistance made to the first attempt which appeared in the church of punishing heresy with death." Mosheim's E. H., vol. i. pp. 427—429; Milner's Ch. Hist., vol. ii. p. 158.—Williams.

PRISON; a place for confining evil-doers, Luke 23: 19. To it are compared whatever tends to restrict liberty, and renders a person disgraced and wretched; as (L.) A low, obscure, and afflicted condition, Eccl. 4: 14. (2.) The state of restraint in which God keeps Satan from seducing mankind, Rev. 20: 7. (3.) The state of spiritual thralldom in which sinners are kept by the curse of the law, and by Satan and their own lusts, Isa. 42: 7. (4.) Custody, out of which men cannot move, and in which they are shut up as evil-doers, Isa. 53: 8. Perhaps, in allusion to this, David calls the cave in which he was, as if one buried alive, a prison, Ps. 142: 7. (5.) Hell, where damned sinners are shamefully and miserably, but securely confined, 1 Pet. 3: 19. Such as are shut up in any of these, or are in a captive condition, are called PRISONERS, Isa. 49: 9. Ps. 69: 33. Job 3: 18.—Brown.

PROBABILISTS, is a sect or division amongst the Catholics, who adhere to the doctrine of probable opinions; holding, that a man is not always obliged to take the more probable side; but may take the less probable, if it be but barely probable. The Jesuits and Molinists are strenuous Probabilists. Those who oppose this doctrine, and assert that we are obliged, on pain of sinning, always take the more probable side, are called Probabilionists. The Jansenists, and particularly the Port-Royalists, are Probabilionists.

The doctrine of probabilities was very convenient to the Jesuits, since it allowed them to follow any course of conduct for which they could find a plausible excuse; that is, a small degree of probability in its favor: such as the opinion of some one person of reputed wisdom, though all others might condemn it.

From this sprang the doctrine of philosophical sin, that is, an action not expressly forbidden, however contrary it may be to equity and justice; though this is, in fact, a Jesuitical quibble, for every thing contrary to these is forbidden by the moral law. (See JESUITS.) Mosheim's E. H. vol. iv. p. 230; v. p. 190.—Williams.

PROBATION, MORAL; that state in which the character of men is formed and developed in action preparatory to judgment. It is the state antecedent to a state of retribution. More strictly speaking, moral probation is that experimental trial which lays the foundation for approbation or disapprobation; praise or blame; reward or punishment. It involves obligations to obedience; exposure to temptations; commands and prohibitions; promises on the one hand to encourage to duty; threatenings on the other to deter from sin; with a certainty of final retributions according to the character produced under these various means, and visibly proved by the course of action pursued by the individual. This is the state which is denominated moral probation; and in such a state is mankind under the law of God, and the mediatorial reign of Christ; or, in the customary language of the New Testament, under the kingdom of heaven, Matt. 13: 10—52.

(See MORAL AGENCY; MORAL OBLIGATION; RESPONSIBILITY; and RETRIBUTION, FUTURE.)

PROBATION, among dissenters, signifies the state of a student or minister while supplying a vacant church, with a view, on their approval of his character and talents, to his taking the pastoral oversight of them. Probation, in a monastic sense, the year of a novitiate, which a religious must pass in a convent, to prove his virtue and vocation, and whether he can bear the severities of the rule.—Hend. Buck.

PROBATIONER; in the church of Scotland, a student in divinity, who, bringing a certificate from a professor in an university of his good morals, and his having performed his exercises to approbation, is admitted to undergo several trials before the presbytery, and upon his acquitting himself properly in these, receives a license to preach.—Hend. Buck.

PROBITY; honesty, sincerity, or veracity. "It consists in the habit of actions useful to society, and in the constant observance of the laws which justice and conscience impose upon us. The man who obeys all the laws of society with an exact punctuality, is not, therefore, a man of probity; laws can only respect the external and definite parts of human conduct; but probity respects our more private actions, and such as it is impossible in all cases to define; and it appears to be in morals what charity is in religion. Probity teaches us to perform in society those actions which no external power can oblige us to perform, and is that quality in the human mind from which we claim the performance of the rights commonly called imperfect."—Hend. Buck.

PROBUS, a Christian martyr under Diocletian and Maximian, in the beginning of the fourth century, was born at Sida, in Pamphylia. He was repeatedly called up before Maximus, the governor of Cilicia, and commanded to sacrifice to the heathen deities. But he invariably refused, and his conduct was marked by the strongest decision. He was on one occasion scourged, both on his back and belly; which only called forth from the intrepid man the remark, "The more my body suffers and loses blood, the more my soul will grow vigorous, and be a gainer." After an ineffectual attempt to destroy him by means of wild beasts, he was finally slain by a sword, rejoicing to suffer persecution for righteousness' sake.—Fox, p. 43.

PROCESSION; a ceremony in the Romish church, consisting of a formal march of the clergy and people, putting up prayers, &c., and in this manner visiting some church, &c. They have processions of the host or sacrament; of our Savior to mount Calvary; of the rosary, &c.

Processions are said to be of pagan origin. The Romans, when the empire was distressed, or after some victory, used constantly to order processions, for several days together, to be made to the temples, to beg the assistance of the gods, or to return them thanks.

The first processions mentioned in ecclesiastical history, are those set on foot at Constantinople, by Chrysostom. The Arians of that city being forced to hold their meetings without the town, went thither night and morning, singing anthems. Chrysostom, to prevent their perverting the Catholics, set up counter processions, in which the clergy and people marched by night, singing prayers and hymns, and carrying crosses and flambeaux. From this period the custom of processions was introduced among the Greeks, and afterwards among the Latins; but they have subsisted longer, and been more frequently used, in the Western than in the Eastern church.—Hend. Buck.

PROCESSION OF THE HOLY GHOST; a term made use of in reference to the Holy Ghost, as proceeding from the Father, or from the Father and the Son. It is founded on that passage in John 15: 26: "When the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of Truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me." (See also 1 Cor. 2: 12.) This procession is here evidently distinguished from his mission; for it is said, "Whom I will send to you from the Father, even the Spirit of Truth which proceeds from the Father."

Dr. Watts, indeed, observes, that the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father, respects not his nature or substance, but his mission only; and that as no distinct and clear ideas can be formed of this procession, it must be given up as popish, scholastic, inconceivable, and indefensible. But, it is answered, what clear idea can be given us of the original, self-existent, eternal being of the Father? Shall we, therefore, deny him to be without beginning or end, and to be self-existent, because we know not how he is so? If not, why must we give up the procession of the Spirit, because we know not the mode of it? We can no more explain the manner how the Spirit proceeds from the Father, than we can explain the eternal generation and hypostatical union of the two natures of the Son. We may say to the objector, as Gregory Nazianzen said to his adversary, "Do you tell me how the Father is unbegotten, and I will attempt to tell you how the Son is begotten, and the Spirit proceeds."

About the eighth and ninth centuries, there was a very warm dispute between the Greek and Latin churches, whether the Spirit proceeded from the Father only, or from the Father and the Son; and the controversy arose to such a height, that they charged one another with heresy and schism, when neither side well understood what they contended for. The Latin church, however, has not scrupled to say that the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son; but the Greek church chooses to express it thus: the Spirit proceeds from the Father, by or through the Son, or he receives of the Son, Gal. 4: 6. See HOLY GHOST; Bishop Pearson on the Creed, p. 324; Watts' Works, 8vo ed. vol. v. p. 199; Hurion on the Holy Spirit, p. 204; Ridley's Div., qu. 11; Dr. Lightfoot's Works, vol. i. p. 482.—Hend. Buck.

PROCLIANITES, the adherents of Proclus, a Phrygian philosopher, who, about the year 194, put himself at the head of a band of Montanists, and spread the errors of Montanus at Rome, and especially in Phrygia, where, about two hundred years afterwards, they formed a most dangerous sect, and greatly disturbed the peace of the churches. Proclus denied that Paul was the author of the epistle to the Hebrews.—Hend. Buck.

PROCTORS OF THE CLERGY, in the English ecclesiastical constitution, are those among the clergy who are chosen, in each diocese, to sit and vote in the house of convocation.—Hend. Buck.

PRODIGAL; profuse, wasteful, extravagant. The reader, no doubt, has always discerned tenderness and affection in the manner in which the father, in the parable of the prodigal son, (Luke 15) receives the young man, his son, when returning home; but the honor implied in some circumstances of his reception, acquires additional spirit, from an occurrence recorded by major Rooke. English readers, observing the "music and dancing," heard by the elder son, are ready to imagine that the family, or a part of it, was dancing to the music, because such would be the case among ourselves; whereas, the fact is, that not only a band of music, but a band of dancers also, according to Eastern usage, was hired, whose agility was now entertaining the numerous company of friends, invited by the father on this joyful occasion. This, then, is an additional expression of honor done the prodigal; and to our Lord's auditory would convey the idea, not merely of the delight expressed by the father on his son's arrival, but also, that he treated him as if he had come back from some honorable pilgrimage; that he forgot his misbehavior in going away, and felt only his wisdom in returning; that besides treating him with the best in the house, he had put himself to further expenses, and had introduced him honorably, not only to his family again, but to his friends around, whom he had assembled to grace his reception. This, too, adds a spirit to the elder brother's expression: "thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends;" and as this fête was given in the evening, it agrees with the circumstance of the elder brother's return from the field; implying, no doubt, his labors there; which certainly are not forgotten by himself, when he says, "these many years do I serve thee."—Calmet.

PROFANE; a term used in opposition to holy. A profane person is one who treats sacred things as if they were common; the history of nations is profane as distinguished from that contained in the Bible; profane writings are such as have been composed by heathens, in contradistinction from the sacred books of Scripture, and the writings of Christian authors.—Hend. Buck.

PROFESSION. Christians are required to make a profession of their faith, 1. Boldly, Rom. 1: 16.—2. Explicitly, Matt. 5: 16.—3. Constantly, Heb. 10: 23.—4. Yet not ostentatiously, but with humility and meekness.

Among the Romanists, it denotes the entering into a religious order, whereby a person offers himself to God by a vow of inviolably observing obedience, chastity, and poverty.—Hend. Buck.

PROFESSOR; a term commonly used in the religious world, to denote any person who makes an open acknowledgment of the religion of Christ, or who outwardly manifests his attachment to Christianity.

All real Christians are professors, but all professors are not real Christians. In this, as in all other things of worth and importance, we find counterfeits. There are many who become professors, not from principle, from investigation, from love to the truth; but from interested motives, prejudice of education, custom, influence of connexions, novelty, &c., as Saul, Jehu, Judas, Demas, the foolish virgins, &c. See article CHRISTIAN; Jay's Sermons, ser. 9; Mead's Almost Christian; Bellamy's True Religion delineated; Shepherd's Sincere Convert, and on the Parable of the Ten Virgins; Secker's Nonsuch Professor; Walker's Sermons; Dwight's Theology; Fuller's Works; Barr's Help to Professing Christians. PROMISE, is a solemn asseveration, by which one pledges his veracity that he shall perform, or cause to be performed, the thing which he mentions.

The obligation of promises arises from the necessity of the well-being and existence of society. "Virtue requires," as Dr. Doddridge observes, "that promises be fulfilled. The promisee, i. e. the person to whom the promise is made, acquires a property in virtue of the promise. The uncertainty of property would evidently be attended with great inconvenience. By failing to fulfil my promise, I either show that I was not sincere in making it, or that I have little constancy or resolution, and either way injure my character, and consequently my usefulness in life.

"Promises, however, are not binding, 1. If they were made by us before we came to such exercise of reason as to be fit to transact affairs of moment; or if by any dissembler or sudden surprise we are deprived of the exercise of our reason at the time when the promise is made.—2. If the promise was made on a false presumption, in which the promiser, after the most diligent inquiry, was imposed upon, especially if he were deceived by the fraud of the promisee.—3. If the thing itself be vicious; for virtue cannot require that vice should be committed.—4. If the accomplishment of the promise be so hard and intolerable, that there is reason to believe that, had it been foreseen, it would have been an excepted case.—5. If the promise be not accepted, or if it depend on conditions not performed." See Doddridge's Lect., lec. 69; Grot. de Jure, lib. ii. cap. 11; Paley's Mor. Phil., vol. i. ch. 5; Grove's Mor. Phil., vol. ii. c. 12. p. 2; Watts' Serms., ser. 20; Dymond's Essays; Verplanck on Contracts.—Hend. Buck.

PROMISES OF GOD, are the kind declarations of his word, in which he hath assured us he will bestow blessings upon his people.

The promises contained in the sacred Scriptures may be considered, 1. Divine as to their origin.—2. Suitable as to their nature.—3. Abundant as to their number.—4. Clear as to their expression.—5. Certain as to their accomplishment. The consideration of them should, 1. Prove an antidote to despair.—2. A motive to patience.—3. A call for prayer.—4. A spur to perseverance. See Clark on the Promises; a book that Dr. Watts says "he could dare put into the hands of every Christian, among all their divided sects and parties in the world;" Buck's Serms., ser. 11.—Hend. Buck.

PROOF; trial, temptation. God proved the Israelites to see if they would walk in his ways, Exod. 20: 20. After he had proved them and afflicted them he had pity on them, Deut. 8: 16. As gold and silver are tried in the furnace, so God proves the heart, Prov. 17: 3.—Calm.

PROPAGANDA; a society founded at Rome, by pope Gregory XV., in 1622. It consisted, according to some, of twelve cardinals and a few prelates; or, as others would have it, of thirteen cardinals, two priests, one monk, and one secretary. Mosheim mentions eighteen cardinals, and several ministers and officers of the pope. It was designed to propagate the religion of Rome throughout the world. Its riches are adequate to the most extensive undertakings. Its printing office is furnished with types of all the important languages of the globe, and is altogether the first establishment of the kind now existing. A magnificent and immense library is also attached to the Propaganda. In 1627, Urban VIII. connected with it a college or seminary for the propagation of the faith, for the purpose of educating missionaries. All the important languages of the globe are taught here. The expenses of the seminary are said to amount to fifty thousand dollars annually. The Propaganda has of late been supposed to be impoverished, nor is this improbable; but the emperor of Austria has made extraordinary efforts to raise it again. The king of Spain has devoted fifty thousand dollars to its support, and a kind of cent society has lately grown up in France to raise its declining funds.

The Congregation of the Priests of Foreign Missions was instituted by Vincent De Paul; confirmed by the archbishop of Paris in 1626; sanctioned by the pope in 1632; and by the king of France in 1642.

A seminary of foreign missions, according to abbe Tassin, was founded at Paris in 1663, by Bernard de St. Theresa, a barefooted Carmelite, a bishop of Babylon, seconded by sundry persons, zealous for their religion. This institution is yet in full operation, and is intimately connected with the Propaganda of Rome.

In 1707, Clement VI. ordered the principals of all religious orders to appoint certain numbers of their respective orders to prepare for the service of foreign missions, and to hold themselves ready, in case of necessity, to labor in any part of the world. Of these orders there are three, which distinguished themselves specially in the spread of Romanism; viz. the Capuchins, the Carmelites, and the Jesuits. (See those articles.)

It appears that a new Propaganda has recently been established in France. At what precise period this association was formed, or what station it holds in the Roman church, we are not informed. Its seat is in France. It has a superior council in France, and a particular council at Marseilles. It consists of two divisions, each having its own central council. That of the northern division is seated at Paris, that of the southern at Lyons. The total receipts of this new Propaganda in 1828, were two hundred and sixty-nine thousand six hundred and thirty-three dollars; of which one hundred and twenty thousand dollars were sent to America. (See CHURCH OF ROME; POPE; ROMAN CATHOLICS IN THE UNITED STATES.)—Report appended to Memoirs of American Missionaries; Am. Quar. Register.

PROPHECY; a word derived from propheteia, and in its original import signifies the prediction of future events. It is thus defined by Witsius: "A knowledge and manifestation of secret things, which a man knows not from his own sagacity, nor from the relation of others, but by an extraordinary revelation of God from heaven." It is prophecy according to this definition we shall here consider.

1. Prophecy (with the power of working miracles) may be considered as the highest evidence that can be given of a supernatural communion with the Deity. The ways by which the Deity made known his mind were various; such as dreams, visions, angels, symbolic representations, impulses on the mind, Num. 12: 6. Jer. 31: 26. Dan. 8: 16, 17. Hence, among the professors of almost every religious system, there have been numberless pretenders to the gift of prophecy. Pagans had their oracles, augurs, and soothsayers; modern idolaters their necromancers and diviners; and the Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans, their prophets. The pretensions of pagans and impostors have, however, been justly exposed; while the Jewish and Christian prophecies carry with them evident marks of their validity.

The distinction between the prophecies of Scripture and the oracles of heathenism is marked and essential. In the heathen oracles we cannot discern any clear and unequivocal tokens of genuine prophecy. They were destitute of dignity and importance, had no connexion with each other, tended to no object of general concern, and never looked into times remote from their own. We read only of some few predictions and prognostications, scattered among the writings of poets and philosophers, most of which, besides being very weakly authenticated, appear to have been answers to questions of merely local, personal, and temporary concern, relating to the issue of affairs then actually in hand, and to events speedily to be determined. Far from attempting to form any chain of prophecies, respecting things far distant as to time or place, or matters contrary to human probability, and requiring supernatural agency to effect them, the heathen priests and soothsayers did not even pretend to a systematic and connected plan. They hardly dared, indeed, to assume the prophetic character in its full force, but stood trembling, as it were, on the brink of futurity, conscious of their inability to venture beyond the depths of human conjecture. Hence their predictions became so fleeting, so futile, so uninteresting, that, though they were collected together as worthy of preservation, they soon fell into disrepute and almost total oblivion. (See ORACLES.) The Scripture prophecies, on the other hand, constitute a series of divine predictions, relating principally to one grand object, of universal importance, the work of man's redemption, and carried on in regular progression through the patriarchal, Jewish, and Christian dispensations, with a harmony and uniformity of design, clearly indicating one and the same divine Author. They speak of the agents to be employed in it, and especially of the great agent, the Redeemer himself; and of those mighty and awful proceedings of Providence as to the nations of the earth, by which judgment and mercy are exercised with reference both to the ordinary principles of moral government, and especially to this restoring economy, to its struggles, its oppositions, and its triumphs. They all meet in Christ, as in their proper centre, and in him only; however many of the single lines, when considered apart, may be imagined to have another direction, and though they may pass through intermediate events, Rev. 19: 10. 1 Pet. 1: 10—12.

If we look into the prophetic writings, says Bishop Hurd, we find that prophecy is of a prodigious extent; that it commenced from the fall of man, and reaches to the consummation of all things; that for many ages it was delivered darkly to a few persons, and with large intervals from the date of one prophecy to that of another; but, at length, became more clear, more frequent, and was uniformly carried on in the line of one people, separated from the rest of the world,—among other reasons assigned, for this principally, to be the repository of the divine oracles; that, with some intermission, the spirit of prophecy subsisted among that people to the coming of Christ; that he himself and his apostles exercised this power in the most conspicuous manner, and left behind them many predictions, recorded in the books of the New Testament, which profess to respect very distant events, and even run out to the end of time, or, in St. John's expression, to that period "when the mystery of God shall be perfected."

Farther, beside the extent of this prophetic scheme, the dignity of the Person whom it concerns deserves our consideration. He is described in terms which excite the most august and magnificent ideas. He is spoken of, indeed, sometimes as being "the seed of the woman," and as "the Son of man;" yet so as being at the same time of more than mortal extraction. He is even represented to us as being superior to men and angels; as far above all principality and power; above all that is accounted great, whether in heaven or in earth; as the word and wisdom of God; as the eternal Son of the Father; as the Heir of all things, by whom he made the worlds; as the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person. We have no words to denote greater ideas than these; the mind of man cannot elevate itself to nobler conceptions. Of such transcendent worth and excellence is that Jesus said to be, to whom all the prophets bear witness! (See JESUS CHRIST.)

Last, the declared purpose for which the Messiah, prefigured by so long a train of prophecy, came into the world, corresponds to all the rest of the representation. It was not to deliver an oppressed nation from civil tyranny, or to erect a great civil empire, that is, to achieve one of those acts which history accounts most heroic. No: it was not a mighty state, a victor people, that was worthy to enter into the contemplation of this divine Person. It was another and far sublimer purpose, which he came to accomplish; a purpose, in comparison of which all our policies are poor and little, and all the performances of man as nothing. It was to deliver a world from ruin; to abolish sin and death; to purify and immortalize human nature; and thus, in the most exalted sense of the words, to be the Savior of men and the blessing of all nations. There is no exaggeration in this account: a spirit of prophecy pervading all time, characterizing one Person, of the highest dignity, and proclaiming the accomplishment of one purpose, the most beneficent, the most divine, the imagination itself can project. Such is the scriptural delineation of that economy which we call prophetic.

Non res Romana perituræ regna,

The advantage of this species of evidence belongs then exclusively to the Christian revelation. Heathenism never made any clear and well-founded pretensions to it. Mohammedanism, though it stands itself as a proof of the truth of Scripture prophecy, is unsupported by a single prediction of its own.

II. The objection which has been raised to Scripture prophecy, from its supposed obscurity, has no solid foundation. There is, it is true, a prophetic language of symbol and emblem; but it is a language which is definite and not equivocal in its meaning, and as easily mastered as the language of poetry, by attentive persons. This, however, is not always used. The style of the prophecies of Scripture very often differs in nothing from the ordinary style of the Hebrew poets; and, in not a few cases, and those too on which the Christian builds most in the argument, it speaks in the plainness of historical narrative. Some degree of obscurity is essential to prophecy: for the end of it was not to gratify human curiosity, by a detail of future events and circumstances; and too great clearness and speciality might have led to many artful attempts to fulfil the predictions, and so far the evidence of their accomplishment would have been weakened. The two great ends of prophecy are, to excite expectation before the event, and then to confirm the truth by a striking and unequivocal fulfilment; and it is a sufficient answer to the allegation of the obscurity of the prophecies of Scripture, that they have abundantly accomplished those objects, among the most intelligent and investigating, as well as among the simple and unlearned, in all ages. It cannot be denied, for instance, leaving out particular cases which might be given, that by means of these predictions the expectation of the incarnation and appearance of a divine Restorer was kept up among the people to whom they were given, and spread even to the neighboring nations; that as these prophecies multiplied, the hope became more intense; and that at the time of our Lord's coming, the expectation of the birth of a very extraordinary person prevailed, not only among the Jews, but among other nations. This purpose was then sufficiently answered, and an answer is given to the objection. In like manner prophecy serves as the basis of our hope in things yet to come; in the final triumph of truth and righteousness on earth, the universal establishment of the kingdom of our Lord, and the rewards of eternal life to be bestowed at his second appearing. In these all true Christians agree; and their hope could not have been so uniformly supported in all ages and under all circumstances, had not the prophecies and predictive promises conveyed with sufficient clearness the general knowledge of the good for which they looked, though many of its particulars be unrevealed. The second end of prophecy is, to confirm the truth by the subsequent event. Here the question of the actual fulfilment of Scripture prophecy is involved; and it is no argument against the unequivocal fulfilment of several prophecies, that many have doubted or denied what the believers in revelation have on this subject so strenuously contended for. How few of mankind have read the Scriptures with serious attention, or been at the pains to compare their prophecies with the statements in history. How few, especially of the objectors to the Bible, have read it in this manner! How many of them have confessed unblushingly their unacquaintance with its contents, or have proved what they have not confessed by the mistakes and misrepresentations into which they have fallen! As for the Jews, the evident dominion of their prejudices, their general averseness to discussion, and the extravagant principles of interpretation they have adopted for many ages, which set all sober criticism at defiance, render nugatory any authority which might be ascribed to their denial of the fulfilment of certain prophecies in the sense adopted by Christians. We may add to this, that among Christian critics themselves there may be much disagreement. Eccentricities and absurdities are found among the learned in every department of knowledge, and much of this waywardness and affectation of singularity has infected interpreters of Scripture. But, after all, there is a truth and reason in every subject, which the understandings of the generality of men will apprehend and acknowledge whenever it is fully understood and impartially considered; to this in all such cases the appeal can only be made, and here it may be made with confidence. Instances of the signal fulfilment of numerous prophecies are scattered through various articles in this volume; so that it is not necessary to repeat them here.

III. A few words on the double sense of prophecy may, however, be added. For want of a right apprehension of the true meaning of this somewhat unfortunate term which has obtained in theology, an objection of another kind has been raised, as though no definite meaning could be assigned to the prophecies of Scripture. Nothing can be more unfounded. The equivocations of the heathen oracles manifestly arose from their ignorance of future events, and from their endeavors to conceal that ignorance by such indefinite expressions as might be equally applicable to two or more events of a contrary description. But the double sense of the Scripture prophecies, far from originating in any doubt or uncertainty as to the fulfilment of them in either sense, springs from a foreknowledge of their accomplishment in both; whence the prediction is purposely so framed as to include both events, which, so far from being contrary to each other, are typical the one of the other, and are thus connected together by a mutual dependency or relation. This has often been satisfactorily proved, with respect to those prophecies which referred, in their primary sense, to the events of the Old Testament, and, in their further and more complex signification, to those of the New: and on this double accomplishment of some prophecies is grounded our firm expectation of the completion of others, which remain yet unfulfilled in their secondary sense, but which we justly consider as equally certain in their issue as those which are already past. So far, then, from any valid objection lying against the credibility of the Scripture prophecies from these seeming ambiguities of meaning, we may urge them as additional proofs of their coming from God. For, who but the Being that is infinite in knowledge and in counsel could so construct predictions as to give them a twofold application to events distant from, and, to human foresight, unconnected with, each other? What power less than divine could so frame them, as to make the accomplishment of them, in one instance, a solemn pledge and assurance of their completion in another instance, of still higher and more universal importance? Where will the scoffer find any thing like this in the artifices of heathen oracles, to conceal their ignorance, and to impose on the credulity of mankind? (See ORACLES.)

IV. The manifold use of prophecy. As prophecy is so striking a proof of a supernatural communion with the Deity, and is of so early a date, we may rest assured it was given for many important ends. "The uses of prophecy," says Dr. Jortin, "besides gradually opening and unfolding the things relating to the Messiah, and the blessings which by him should be conferred upon mankind, are many, great, and manifest.

"1. It served to secure the belief of a God, and of a providence.

"As God is invisible and spiritual, there was cause to fear, that, in the first and ruder ages of the world, when men were busier in cultivating the earth than in cultivating arts and sciences, and in seeking the necessities of life than in the study of morality, they might forget their Creator and Governor; and, therefore, God maintained amongst them the great article of faith in him, by manifestations of himself; by sending angels to declare his will; by miracles, and by prophecies.

"2. It was intended to give men the profoundest veneration for that amazing knowledge from which nothing was concealed, not even the future actions of creatures, and the things which as yet were not. How could a man hope to hide any counsel, any design or thought, from such a Being?

"3. It contributed to keep up devotion and true religion, the religion of the heart, which consists partly in entertaining just and honorable notions of God and of his perfections, and which is a more rational and a more acceptable service than rites and ceremonies.

"4. It excited men to rely upon God, and to love him who condescended to hold this mutual intercourse with his creatures, and to permit them to consult him, as one friend asks advice of another.

"5. It was intended to keep the people, to whom God revealed himself, from idolatry; a sin to which the Jews would be inclined, both from the disposition to it which they had acquired in Egypt, and from the contagion of bad example.

"The people of Israel were strictly forbidden to consult the diviners and the gods of other nations, and to use any enchantments and wicked arts; and that they might have no temptation to it, God permitted them to apply to him and to his prophets, even upon small occasions; and he raised up amongst them a succession of prophets, to whom they might have recourse for advice and direction. These prophets were revered abroad as well as at home, and consulted by foreign princes; and, in times of the captivity, they were honored by great kings, and advanced to high stations."

As it respects us, prophecy connected with miracles affords evidence of the truth of revelation, as well as of a superintending providence. This evidence, too, is a growing evidence. "The divine design, uniformly pursued through a series of successive generations, opens with a greater degree of clearness, in proportion to the lapse of time and the number of events. An increase of age is an addition to its strength; and the nearer we approach the point towards which the dispensations of God unvaryingly tend, the more clearly shall we discern the wonderful regularity, consistency, and beauty, of this stupendous plan for universal good. Of the great use of prophecies which have been fulfilled, as a direct and strong argument to convert unbelievers to Christianity, and to establish Christians in the faith, we have the most ample proofs. Our Lord himself made very frequent appeals to prophecy, as evidence of his divine mission: he referred the Jews to their own Scriptures, as most fully and clearly bearing witness of himself. Upon them he grounded the necessity of his sufferings; upon them he settled the faith of the disciples at Emmaus, and of the apostles at Jerusalem. The same source supplied the eloquence of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the means with which Apollon 'mightily convinced the Jews.' This was a powerful instrument of persuasion in the succeeding ages of the church, when used by the primitive apologists. Upon this topic were employed the zeal and diligence, not only of Justin Martyr, but Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine. It would never have been so frequently employed, if it had not been well adapted to the desired end; and that it did most completely answer this end, by the conversion of unbelievers, is evident from the accounts of Scripture, and the records of the primitive church.

V. Plain examples of the fulfilment of prophecy. Our limits will not permit us to give a copious account of the various prophecies which have been remarkably fulfilled: but whoever has examined profane history with any degree of attention, and compared it with the predictions of Scripture, must, if he be not blinded by prejudice, and hardened by infidelity, be convinced of the truth of prophecy by its exact accomplishment. It is in vain to say that these prophecies were delivered since the events have taken place; for we see the prophecies, the latest whereof were delivered about seventeen hundred years ago, and some of them above three thousand years ago, fulfilling at this very time; and cities, and countries, and kingdoms, in the very same condition, and all brought about in the very same manner, and with the very same circumstances, as the prophets had foretold. "We see," says bishop Newton, "the descendants of Shem and Japheth ruling and enlarged in Asia and Europe, and perhaps in America, and 'the curse of servitude' still attending the wretched descendants of Ham, in Africa. We see the posterity of Ishmael 'multiplied exceedingly,' and become 'a great nation' in the Arabians; yet living like 'wild men,' and shifting from place to place in the wilderness; 'their hand against every man, and every man's hand against them;' and still dwelling an independent and free people, 'in the presence of all their brethren,' and in the presence of all their enemies. We see the family of Esau totally extinct, and that of Jacob subsisting at this day; 'the sceptre departed from Judah,' and the people living nowhere in authority, everywhere in subjection; the Jews still dwelling alone among the nations, while 'the remembrance of Amalek is utterly put out from under heaven.' We see the Jews severely punished for their infidelity and disobedience to their great prophet like unto Moses; 'plucked from off their own land, and removed into all the kingdoms of the earth; oppressed and spoiled evermore;' and made a 'proverb and a by-word among all nations.' We see 'Ephraim so broken as to be no more a people,' while the whole nation is comprehended under the name of Judah; the Jews wonderfully preserved as a distinct people, while their great conquerors are everywhere destroyed; their land lying desolate, and themselves cut off from being the people of God, while the Gentiles are advanced in their room. We see Nineveh so completely destroyed that the place thereof is not and cannot be known; Babylon made 'a desolation forever,' a possession for the bitter, and pools of water; Tyre become 'like the top of a rock, a place for fishers to spread their nets upon;' and Egypt, 'a base kingdom, the basest of the kingdoms,' and still tributary and subject to strangers. We see, of the four great empires of the world, the fourth and last, which was greater and more powerful than any of the former, divided in the western part thereof into ten lesser kingdoms; and among them a power with a triple crown 'differs from the first,' with 'a mouth speaking very great things,' and with 'look more stout than his fellows, speaking great words against the Most High, wearing out the saints of the Most High, and changing times and laws.' We see a power 'cast down the truth to the ground, and prosper, and practise, and destroy the holy people, not regarding the God of his fathers, nor the desire of wives, but honoring Mahuzzim,' gods-protectors, or saints-protectors, 'and causing' the priests of Mahuzzim 'to rule over many, and to divide the land for gain.' We see the Turks 'stretching forth their hand over the countries,' and particularly 'over the land of Egypt, the Libyans at their steps,' and the Arabians still 'escaping out of their hand.' We see the Jews 'led away captive into all nations, and Jerusalem trodden down of the Gentiles,' and likely to continue so 'until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled,' as the Jews are by a constant miracle preserved a distinct people for the completion of other prophecies relating to them. We see one 'who opposeth and exalteth himself,' above all laws, divine and human, 'sitting as God in the church of God, and showing himself that he is God, whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness.' We see a great apostasy in the Christian church, which consists chiefly in the worship of demons, angels, or departed saints, and is promoted 'through the hypocrisy of liars, forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats.' We see the seven churches of Asia lying in the same forlorn and desolate condition that the angel had signified to St. John, their 'candlestick removed out of its place, their churches turned into mosques, their worship into superstition. In short, we see the character of 'the beast and the false prophet,' and 'the whore of Babylon,' now exemplified in every particular, and in a city that is seated 'upon seven mountains;' so that if the bishop of Rome had sat for his picture, a greater resemblance and likeness could not have been drawn.

"For these things we have the attestation of past, and the experience of present times; and we cannot well be deceived, if we will only believe our own eyes and observation. We actually see the completion of many of the prophecies in the state of men and things around us; and we have the prophecies themselves recorded in books, which books have been read in public assemblies these seventeen hundred or two thousand years, have been dispersed into several countries, have been translated into several languages, and quoted and commented upon by different nations, so that there is no room to suspect so much as a possibility of forgery or illusion." See also the several articles referred to in this work.

VI. Rules for correctly understanding the prophecies.—In order to understand the prophecies, and to form a right judgment of the argument for the truth of Christianity, we must not consider them singly and apart, but as a grand whole, or a chain reaching through several thousand years, yet manifestly subservient to one and the same end. This end is no other than the establishment of the universal empire of truth and righteousness under the dominion of Jesus Christ. We are not, indeed, to suppose that each of the prophecies recorded in the Old Testament expressly points out and clearly characterizes Jesus Christ; yet, taken as a whole, this grand system refers to him; for "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." All the revolutions of divine providence have him for their scope and end. Is an empire, or kingdom, erected? that empire, or kingdom, is erected with a view, directly or indirectly, to the kingdom of the Messiah. Is an empire, or kingdom, subverted or overthrown? that empire, or kingdom, is overthrown in subserviency to the glory of his kingdom and empire, which shall know neither bounds nor end, but whose limits shall be no other than the limits of the universe, and whose end no other than the days of eternity. Jesus Christ, then, is the only person that ever existed in whom all the prophecies meet as in a centre. In order, therefore, to oppose error and confront the infidel, we must study the prophecies not as independent of each other, but as connected; for "the argument from prophecy," says bishop Hurd, "is not to be formed from the consideration of single prophecies, but from all the prophecies taken together, and considered as making one system; in which, from the mutual dependence and connexion of its parts, preceding prophecies prepare and illustrate those which follow; and these, again, reflect light on the foregoing; just as in any philosophical system, that which shows the solidity of it is the harmony and correspondence of the whole, not the application of it in particular instances.

"Hence, though the evidence be but small from the completion of any one prophecy taken separately, yet that evidence being always something, the amount of the whole evidence resulting from a great number of prophecies, all relative to the same design, may be considerable; like many scattered rays, which, though each be weak in itself, yet, concentrated into one point, shall form a strong light, and strike the sense very powerfully. Still more; this evidence is not merely a growing evidence, but is indeed multiplied upon us, from the number of reflected lights which the several component parts of such a system reciprocally throw upon each, till, at length, the conviction rise into a high degree of moral certainty."

Further; in order to understand the prophecies, we must endeavor to find out the true subject of prophecy; that is, precisely what the prophets speak of, and the characters that are applied to that subject. The literal sense should be always kept in view, and a knowledge of oriental customs attained. The beginning and end of the prophetic sermons must be carefully observed. The time, as near as possible, of the prediction should be ascertained. An acquaintance with the method of salvation by Christ will greatly assist us in this work. The mind must be unprejudiced, and we should be well acquainted with the Scriptures at large. These rules, with dependence on the divine teaching, will assist us in understanding the prophecies. PROPHEYSINGS; religious exercises of the clergy in the reign of queen Elizabeth, instituted for the purpose of promoting knowledge and piety. The ministers of a particular division, at a set time, met together in some church of a market or other large town, and there each in their order explained, according to their abilities, some portion of Scripture allotted to them before. This done, a moderator made his observations on what had been said, and determined the true sense of the place, a certain space of time being fixed for despatching the whole. These institutions, like all others, however, it seems, were sometimes abused, by irregularity, disputations, and divisions. The queen put them down for no other reason, but because they enlightened the people's minds in the Scriptures, and encouraged their inquiries after truth; her majesty being always of opinion that knowledge and learning in the laity would only endanger their peaceable submission to her absolute will and pleasure. Neal's History of the Puritans.—Hend. Buck.

PROPHET; a person who foretells future events. It is particularly applied to such inspired persons among the Jews as were commissioned by God to declare his will and purposes to that people. (See PROPHET.)

Scripture often gives to prophets the name of men of God, or of angels (that is, messengers) of the Lord. The verb nibba, which we translate to prophecy, is of very great extent. Sometimes it signifies to foretell what is to come; at other times, to interpret, to promulge, or to sing in strains of sacred music, the prophetic declarations of Scripture, 1 Sam. 18: 10. 10: 5, 6. God says to Moses, (Exod. 7: 1.) "Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet;" he shall explain thy sentiments to the people. Scripture does not withhold the name of prophet from impostors, although they falsely boasted of inspiration. Paul, (Tit. 1: 12.) quoting a heathen poet, calls him a prophet. So we read, (1 Chron. 25: 1.) that the sons of Asaph were appointed to prophesy upon harps.

The term prophecy is also used (1 Cor. 11: 4, 5. 14: 1, &c.) either for explaining Scripture, speaking to the church in public by way of exhortation, or singing the praises of God in the language of inspiration.

The Hebrew prophets present a succession of men at once the most singular and the most venerable that ever appeared, in so long a line of time, in the world. They had special communion with God; they laid open the scenes of the future; they were ministers of the promised Christ. They upheld religion and piety in the worst times, and at the greatest risks; and their disinterestedness was only equalled by their patriotism. To succeeding ages they have left a character consecrated by holiness, and "visions of the Holy One;" which still unveil to the church his most glorious attributes, and his deepest designs. "Prophecy," says the apostle Peter, "came not of old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," 2 Pet. 1: 21. They flourished in a continued succession during a period of more than a thousand years, reckoning from Moses to Malachi, all co-operating in the same designs, uniting in one spirit to deliver the same doctrines, and to predict the same blessings to mankind. The great object of prophecy was, as has been before observed, a description of the Messiah, and of his kingdom, Matt. 26: 56. Luke 1: 70. 18:

31. 24: 44. John 1: 45. Acts 3: 18, 24. 10: 43. 13: 29. 15: 15. 28: 23. 1 Pet. 1: 10—12. Their claims to a divine commission were demonstrated by the intrinsic excellency of their doctrine; by the disinterested zeal and undaunted courage with which they prosecuted their ministry, and persevered in their great design; and by the unimpeachable integrity of their conduct. But even those credentials of a divine mission were still further confirmed by the exercise of miraculous powers, and by the completion of many less important predictions which they uttered, Deut. 13: 1—3. 18: 22. Joshua 10: 13. 1 Sam. 12: 8. 2 Kings 1: 10. Isa. 38: 8. 62: 4, 9. 1 Sam. 9: 6. 1 Kings 13: 3. Jer. 28: 9. Ezek. 33: 33. They were the established oracles of their country, and consulted upon all occasions when it was necessary to collect the divine will on any civil or religious question. These illustrious personages were likewise as well the types as the harbingers of that greater Prophet whom they foretold; and in the general outline of their character, as well as in particular events of their lives, they prefigured to the Jews the future Teacher of mankind. Like him, also, they labored by every exertion to instruct and reclaim; reproving and threatening the sinful, however exalted in rank, or encircled by power, with fearless confidence and sincerity, becoming "men of God." (See ΠΑΡΟΡΕΥ.)

The manner in which the prophets published their predictions was, either by uttering them aloud in some public place, or by affixing them on the gates of the temple, (Jer. 7: 2. Ezek. 3: 10.) where they might be generally seen and read. Upon some important occasions, when it was necessary to rouse the fears of a disobedient people, and to recall them to repentance, the prophets, as objects of universal attention, appear to have walked about publicly in sackcloth, and with every external mark of humiliation and sorrow. They then adopted extraordinary modes of expressing their convictions of impending wrath, and endeavored to awaken the apprehensions of their country by the most striking illustration of threatened punishment. Thus Jeremiah made bonds and yokes, and put them upon his neck, (Jer. 27.) strongly to intimate the subjection that God would bring on the nations whom Nebuchadnezzar should subdue. Isaiah likewise walked naked, that is, without the rough garment of the prophet, and barefoot, as a sign of the distress that awaited the Egyptians, Isa. 20. So Jeremiah broke the potter's vessel, (Jer. 19.) and Ezekiel publicly removed his household goods from the city, (2 Kings 25: 4, 5. Ezek. 12: 7.) more forcibly to represent by these actions some correspondent calamities ready to fall on nations obnoxious to God's wrath; this mode of expressing important circumstances by action being customary and familiar among all eastern nations.—Hend. Buck; Calmet; Watson; Hillhouse.

PROPHETS, SONS OF THE; an appellation given to young men who were educated in the schools or colleges under a proper master, who was commonly, if not always, an inspired prophet, in the knowledge of religion, and in sacred music, and thus were qualified to be public preachers, 1 Sam. 10, 11. 2 Sam. 19. 2 Kings 2.—*Hend. PROPIATION; a sacrifice offered to God to avert the punishment of sin, and secure the bestowment of his favor. Among the Jews, there were both ordinary and public sacrifices, as holocausts, &c., offered by way of thanksgiving; and extraordinary ones, offered by persons guilty of any crime, by way of propitiation.

The Romish church believe the mass to be a sacrifice of propitiation for the living and the dead. The reformed churches allow of no propitiation, but that one offered by Jesus on the cross, whereby divine justice is appeased, and our sins forgiven, Rom. 3: 25. 1 John 2: 2.

As it respects the unbloody propitiatory sacrifice of the mass above mentioned, little need be said to confute such a doctrine. Indeed, it is owned in the church of Rome, that there is no other foundation for the belief of it than an unwritten tradition. There is no hint in the Scripture of Christ's offering his body and blood to his Father at his institution of the eucharist. It is also a manifest contradiction to St. Paul's doctrine, who teaches, that without shedding of blood there is no remission; therefore there can be no remission of sins in the mass. The sacrifice of Christ, according to the same apostle, is not to be repeated. A second oblation would be superfluous: consequently the pretended true and proper sacrifice of the mass must be superfluous and useless.

The propitiation made by Jesus Christ alone is that which atones for and covers our guilt, as the mercy-seat hid the tables of the law. All this is expressed in most explicit terms in the following passages: "And he is the propitiation for our sins," 1 John 2: 2. "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins," 1 John 4: 10. "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood," Rom. 3: 25. The word used in the two former passages is hilasmos; in the last hilasterion. Both are from the verb hilaskō, so often used by Greek writers to express the action of a person who, in some appointed way, turned away the wrath of a deity; and therefore cannot bear the sense which Socinus would put upon it,—the destruction of sin. This is not supported by a single example. With all Greek authorities, whether poets, historians, or others, the word means to propitiate, and is, for the most part, construed with an accusative case, designating the person whose displeasure is averted. As this could not be denied, Crellius comes to the aid of Socinus, and contends that the sense of this word was not to be taken from its common use in the Greek tongue, but from the Hellenistic use of it in the Greek of the New Testament, the LXX., and the Apocrypha. But this will not serve him; for both by the LXX., and in the Apocrypha, it is used in the same sense as in the Greek classic writers, Num. 5: 8. Ezek. 44: 27. 45: 19. See also 2 Mac. 3: 33.

The propitiatory sense of the word hilasmos being thus fixed, the modern Socinians have conceded, in their note on 1 John 2: 2. in their "Improved Version," that it means the "pacifying of an offended party;" but they subjoin, that Christ is a propitiation, because by his gospel he brings sinners to repentance, and thus averts the divine displeasure. The concession is important; and the comment cannot weaken it, because of its absurdity; for, in that interpretation of propitiation, Moses, or any of the apostles, or any minister of the gospel now, who succeeds in bringing sinners to repentance, is as truly a propitiation for sin as Christ himself. On Rom. 3: 25, however, the authors of the Improved Version continue to follow their master Socinus, and translate the passage, "whom God hath set forth as a mercy-seat in his own blood," and lay great stress upon this rendering, as removing that countenance to the doctrine of atonement by vicarious sufferings which the common translation affords. But so little is to be gained by taking it in this sense in this passage, that this rendering is adopted by several orthodox commentators as expressing, by a figure, or rather by emphatically supplying a type to the antitype, the doctrine of our Lord's atonement. Some able critics have, however, argued, from the force of the context, that the word ought to be taken actively, and not merely declaratively; not as "propitiatory," but as "a propitiation;" which, says Grotius, is shown by the mention which is afterwards made of blood, to which the power of propitiation is ascribed. Others supply thuma or hierion, and render it expiatory sacrifice. But, whichever of these renderings be adopted, the same doctrine is held, forth to us. The covering of the ark was rendered a propitiatory, or mercy-seat, only by the blood of the victims sprinkled before and upon it; and when the apostle says, that God hath set forth Jesus Christ to be a propitiatory, he immediately adds, having the ceremonies of the temple in his view, "through faith in his blood." The text, therefore, contains no exhibition of any means of obtaining mercy but through the blood of sacrifice, according to the rule laid down in the epistle to the Hebrews, "Without shedding of blood there is no remission;" and is in strict accordance with Ephesians 1: 7: "We have redemption through his blood, the remission of sins." It is only by his blood, that Christ reconciles us to God.

Unable as they who deny the vicarious nature of the sufferings of Christ are, to evade the testimony of the above passages which speak of our Lord as "a propitiation," their next resource often is to deny the existence of wrath in God, in the hope of proving that propitiation, in a proper sense, cannot be the doctrine of Scripture, whatever may be the force of the mere terms which the sacred writers employ. In order to give plausibility to their statement, they pervert the opinion of the orthodox, and argue as though it formed a part of the doctrine of Christ's propitiation and oblation for sin, to represent God as naturally an implacable and vengeful being, and only made placable and disposed to show mercy, by satisfaction being made to his displeasure through our Lord's sufferings and death. This is as contrary to Scripture as it is to the opinions of all sober persons who hold the doctrine of Christ's atonement. The true questions are, indeed, not whether God is love, or whether he is of a placable nature; but whether God is holy and just; whether we, his creatures, are under law or not; whether this law has any penalty, and whether God, in his judicial character, is bound to execute and uphold that law. As the justice of God is punitive, (and if it is not punitive, his laws are a dead letter,) then is there wrath in God; then is God angry with the wicked; then is man, as a sinner, obnoxious to this anger; and so a propitiation becomes necessary to turn it away from him. Nor are these terms unscriptural; they are used in the New Testament as emphatically as in the Old; though the former is, in a special sense, a revelation of the mercy of God to man. John declares, that if any man believeth not on the Son of God, "the wrath of God abideth upon him;" and St. Paul affirms, that "the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men." The day of judgment is, with reference to the ungodly, said to be "the day of wrath;" God is called "a consuming fire;" and, as such, is the object of "reverence and godly fear." Nor is this his displeasure light, and the consequences of it a trifling and temporary inconvenience. When we only regard the consequences which have followed sin in society, from the earliest ages, and in every part of the world, and add to these the many direct and fearful inflictions of punishment which have proceeded from the "Judge of the whole earth," then, to use the language of Scripture, "our flesh may well tremble because of his judgments." But when we look at the future state of the wicked as represented in Scripture, though it is expressed generally, and surrounded with the mystery of a place, and a condition of being, unknown to us in the present state, all evils which history has crowded into the lot of man appear insignificant in comparison of banishment from God, separation from good men, public condemnation, torment of spirit, "weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth," "everlasting destruction," "everlasting fire." Let men talk ever so much or eloquently of the pure benevolence of God, they cannot abolish the facts recorded in the history of human suffering in this world as the effects of transgression; nor can they discharge these fearful comminations from the pages of the book of God. These cannot be criticised away; and if it is "Jesus who saves us from this wrath to come," that is, from those effects of the wrath of God which are to come, then, but for him, we should have been liable to them. That principle in God, from which such effects follow, the Scriptures call wrath; and they who deny the existence of wrath in God, deny, therefore, the Scriptures.

It by no means follows, however, that this wrath is a passion in God; or that, though we contend that the awful attribute of his justice requires satisfaction, in order to the forgiveness of the guilty, we afford reason to any to charge us with attributing vengeful affections to the divine Being. "Our adversaries," says bishop Stillingfleet, "first make opinions for us, and then show that they are unreasonable. They first suppose that anger in God is to be considered as a passion, and that passion a desire of revenge; and then tell us, that if we do not prove that this desire of revenge can be satisfied by the sufferings of Christ, then we can never prove the doctrine of satisfaction to be true; whereas, we do not mean, by God's anger, any such passion, but the just declaration of God's will to punish, upon our provocation of him by our sins; we do not make the design of the satisfaction to be that God may please himself in revengeing the sins of the guilty upon the most innocent person, because we make the design of punishment not to be the satisfaction of anger as a desire of revenge, but to be the vindication of the honor and rights of the offended person, by such a way as he himself shall judge satisfactory to the ends of his government." PROPORTION OF FAITH. (See ANALOGY OF FAITH.)

PROSELYTE, (prosēlytos;) signifies a stranger, a foreigner; the Hebrew word ger, or gēr, also denotes a stranger, one who comes from abroad, or from another place. In the language of the Jews, those were called by this name who came to dwell in their country, or who embraced their religion, being not Jews by birth. In the New Testament they are called sometimes proselytes, and sometimes Gentiles, fearing God, Acts 2: 5. 10: 2, 22. 13: 16, 50.

The Jews distinguish two kinds of proselytes. The first, proselytes of the gate; the others, proselytes of justice or righteousness. The first dwelt in the land of Israel, or even out of that country, and, without obliging themselves to circumcision, or to any other ceremony of the law, feared and worshipped the true God, observing the rules imposed on Noah. These were, according to the rabbins, 1. To abstain from idolatry; 2. From blasphemy; 3. From murder; 4. From adultery; 5. From theft; 6. To appoint just and upright judges; 7. Not to eat the flesh of any animal cut off while it was alive. The privileges of proselytes of the gate were, first, that through holiness they might have hope of eternal life. Secondly, they could dwell in the land of Israel, and share in the outward prosperities of it.

Proselytes of justice or of righteousness, were those converted to Judaism, who had engaged themselves to receive circumcision, and to observe the whole law of Moses. Thus were they admitted to all the prerogatives of the people of the Lord. The rabbins inform us, that before circumcision was administered to them, and before they were admitted into the religion of the Hebrews, they were examined about the motives to their conversion; whether the change was voluntary, or whether it proceeded from interest, fear, ambition, &c. When the proselyte was well proved and instructed, they gave him circumcision; and when the wound of his circumcision healed, they gave him baptism, by plunging his whole body into a cistern of water, by only one immersion. Boys under twelve years of age, and girls under thirteen, could not become proselytes till they had obtained the consent of their parents, or, in case of refusal, the concurrence of the officers of justice. Baptism in respect of girls had the same effect as circumcision in respect of boys. Each of them, by means of this, received, as it were, a new birth, so that those who were their parents before were no longer regarded as such after this ceremony, and those who before were slaves now became free.

Many, however, are of opinion that there appears to be no ground whatever in Scripture for this distinction of proselytes of the gate, and proselytes of righteousness. "According to my idea," says Dr. Tomline, "proselytes were those, and those only, who took upon themselves the obligation of the whole Mosaic law, but retained that name till they were admitted into the congregation of the Lord as adopted children. Gentiles were allowed to worship and offer sacrifices to the God of Israel in the outer court of the temple; and some of them, persuaded of the sole and universal sovereignty of the Lord Jehovah, might renounce idolatry without embracing the Mosaic law; but such persons appear to me never to be called proselytes in Scripture, or in any ancient Christian writer." He also observes, that "the term proselytes of the gate is derived from an expression frequent in the Old Testament; namely, 'the stranger that is within thy gates;' but I think it evident that the strangers were those Gentiles who were permitted to live among the Jews under certain restrictions, and whom the Jews were forbidden 'to vex or oppress,' so long as they lived in a peaceable manner." Dr. Lardner says, "I do not believe that the notion of two sorts of Jewish proselytes can be found in any Christian writer before the fourteenth century or later." Dr. Jennings also observes, that "there does not appear to be sufficient evidence in the Scripture history of the existence of such proselytes of the gate as the rabbins mention; nor, indeed, of any who with propriety can be styled proselytes, except such as fully embraced the Jewish religion."—Watson.

PROSEUCHÆ, (from proseuchē, prayer,) is taken for the places of prayer of the Jews, and was pretty nearly, if not quite, the same as their synagogues. But the synagogues were originally in the cities, and were covered places; whereas, for the most part, the proseuchæ were out of the cities, and on the banks of rivers, having no covering, except, perhaps, the shade of some trees or covered galleries, Acts 16: 13.—Hend. Buck.

PROSPERITY; the state wherein things succeed according to our wishes, and are productive of affluence and ease.

However desirable prosperity be, it has its manifest disadvantages. It too often alienates the soul from God; excites pride; exposes to temptation; hardens the heart; occasions idleness; promotes effeminacy; damps zeal and energy; and, too often, has a baneful relative influence. It is no wonder, therefore, that the Almighty in general withholds it from his children; and that adversity should be their lot rather than prosperity. Indeed adversity seems more beneficial on the whole, although it be so unpleasant to our feelings. "The advantages of prosperity," says Bacon, "are to be wished; but the advantages of adversity are to be admired. The principal virtue of prosperity is temperance; the principal virtue of adversity is fortitude, which in morality is allowed to be the most heroic virtue; prosperity best discovers vice; adversity best discovers virtue, which is like those perfumes which are most fragrant when burnt or bruised."

It is not, however, to be understood that prosperity in itself is unlawful. The world, with all its various productions, was formed by the Almighty for the happiness of man, and designed to endear himself to us, and to what leads our minds up to him. What, however, God often gives us as a blessing, by our own folly we pervert and turn into a curse. Where prosperity is given, there religion is absolutely necessary to enable us to act under it as we ought. Where this divine principle influences the mind, prosperity may be enjoyed and become a blessing; for "while bad men snatch the pleasures of the world as by stealth, without countenance from God the proprietor of the world, the righteous sit openly down to the feast of life, under the smile of heaven. No guilty fears damp their joys. The blessing of God rests upon all they possess. Their piety reflects sunshine from heaven upon the prosperity of the world; writes in one point of view the smiling aspect both of the powers above and of the objects below. Not only have they as full a relish as others of the innocent pleasures of life, but, moreover, in them they hold communion with God. In all that is good or fair they trace his hand. From the beauties of nature, from the improvements of art, from the enjoyments of social life, they raise their affections to the source of all the happiness which surrounds them, and thus widen the sphere of their pleasures, by adding intellectual and spiritual to earthly joys."

Spiritual prosperity consists in the continual progress of the mind in knowledge, purity, and joy. It arises from the participation of the divine blessing; and evidences itself by frequency in prayer; love to God's word; delight in his people; attendance on his ordinances; zeal in his cause; submission to his will; usefulness in his church; and increasing abhorrence of every thing that is derogatory to his glory, 3 John 2. Blair's Sermons, vol. i. ser. 3; Bates' Works, p. 297.—Hend. Buck.

PROTERIUS; a martyred prelate, about the middle of the sixth century. He had been made a priest by Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, who was well acquainted with his virtues. On the death of Cyril, the see of Alexandria was filled by Dioscorus, who, knowing the reputation of Proterius, did all in his power to gain his confidence and interest, that he might, through him, accomplish his designs. But Proterius was not to be corrupted; the welfare of the church was next his heart, and no worldly preferment could bribe him to forego his duty. Dioscorus being condemned by the council of Chalcedon, for having embraced the errors of Eutyches, was deposed, and Proterius was chosen to fill the vacant see, and approved by the emperor. This occasioned a dangerous insurrection, and the city was divided into two factions. Much mischief was done on both sides, and Proterius was brought into the most imminent danger. The civil authority was set at naught, violence was resorted to, nor was peace restored until a detachment of two thousand men was dispatched by the emperor to quell the sedition. The discontented party, however, still beheld Proterius with an eye of resentment; the attendance of a guard became necessary; and although of a mild temper, he was compelled to procure the banishment of several from the city. Upon the emperor Marcian's death, the exiles returned to Alexandria, and seemed resolved to be revenged for what they had suffered in the last reign. Timothy, the head of the conspirators against him, in the absence of Dionysius, seized on the great church, and was uncanonically consecrated to the see by two bishops of his faction, who had been deposed for heresy. On the return of Dionysius, the incendiary Timothy was driven from the city; which so enraged the Eutychians, that they barbarously murdered the prelate in the church; treated his remains with every indignity; and scattered their ashes in the air.—Fox, p. 77.

PROTESTANTS. The emperor Charles V. called a diet at Spire, in 1529, to request aid from the German princes against the Turks, and to devise the most effectual means for allaying the religious disputes which then raged in consequence of Luther's opposition to the established religion. In this diet it was decreed by Ferdinand, archduke of Austria, and other popish princes, that in the countries which had embraced the new religion, it should be lawful to continue in it till the meeting of a council; but that no Roman Catholic should be allowed to turn Lutheran, and that the reformers should deliver nothing in their sermons contrary to the received doctrine of the church. Against this decree, six Lutheran princes, namely, John and George, the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, Ernest and Francis, the two dukes of Lunenburg, the landgrave of Hesse, and the prince of Anhalt, with the deputies of thirteen imperial towns, namely, Strasburg, Ulm, Nuremberg, Constance, Rottingen, Windsheim, Memmingen, Northingen, Lindaw, Kempten, Hailbron, Wissingen, and St. Gall, formally and solemnly protested, and declared that they appealed to a general council; and hence the name of Protestants, by which the followers of Luther have ever since been known. Nor was it confined to them; for it soon after included the Calvinists, and has now of a long time been applied generally to the Christian sects, of whatever denomination, and in whatever country they may be found, which have separated from the see of Rome. With equal if not superior propriety, however, does this term belong to the Novatians, and their successors, the Paulicians and Waldenses, of earlier ages. See those articles.

Mr. Chillingworth, addressing himself to a writer in favor of the church of Rome, speaks of the religion of Protestants in the following admirable manner: "Know then, Sir, that when I say the religion of Protestants is in prudence to be preferred before yours, on the one side, I do not understand by your religion the doctrine of Bellarmine, or Baronius, or any other private man amongst you, nor the doctrine of the Sorbonne, of the Jesuits, or of the Dominicans, or of any other particular company among you, but that wherein you all agree, or profess to agree, the doctrine of the council of Trent; so, accordingly, on the other side, by the religion of Protestants, I do not understand the doctrine of Luther, or Calvin, or Melancthon, nor the confession of Augsburg, or Geneva, nor the catechism of Heidelberg, nor the articles of the church of England, no, nor the harmony of Protestant confessions; but that in which they all agree, and which they all subscribe with a greater harmony, as a perfect rule of faith and action; that is, the BIBLE.

"The Bible, I say, the Bible only, is the religion of Protestants. Whatsoever else they believe besides it, and the plain, irrefragable, indubitable consequences of it, will may they hold it as a matter of opinion; but as a matter of faith and religion, neither can they with coherence to their own grounds believe it themselves, nor require belief of it of others, without most high and most schismatical presumption. I, for my part, after a long, and, as I verily believe and hope, impartial, search of the true way to eternal happiness, do profess plainly that I cannot find any rest for the sole of my foot but upon this rock only. I see plainly, and with my own eyes, that there are popes against popes, and councils against councils; some fathers against other fathers, the same fathers against themselves; a consent of fathers of one age against a consent of fathers of another age; traditive interpretations of Scripture are pretended, but there are few or none to be found; no tradition but that of Scripture can derive itself from the fountain, but may be plainly proved either to have been brought in in such an age after Christ, or that in such an age it was not in. In a word, there is no sufficient certainty but of Scripture only for any considering man to build upon. This, therefore, and this only, I have reason to believe. This I will profess; according to this I will live; and for this, if there be occasion, I will not only willingly, but even gladly, lose my life, though I should be sorry that Christians should take it from me.

"Propose me any thing out of this book, and require whether I believe it or no, and, seem it never so incomprehensible to human reason, I will subscribe it with hand and heart, as knowing no demonstration can be stronger than this,—GOD HATH SAID SO, THEREFORE IT IS TRUE. In other things, I will take no man's liberty of judging from him; neither shall any man take mine from me."

Under such views the Bible is held as the only sure foundation upon which all true Protestants build every article of the faith which they profess, and every point of doctrine which they teach; and all other foundations, whether they be the decisions of councils, the confessions of churches, the precepts of popes, or the expositions of private men, are considered by them as sandy and unsafe, or as in no wise to be ultimately relied on. Yet they are sensible that all men are not equally qualified to understand or to apply this rule; and that the wisest men may use all the helps afforded by the learning and research of others to enable them to understand its precise nature, and to define its certain extent. These helps are great and numerous, having been supplied, in every age of the church, by the united labors of pious and learned men in every country, and by none in greater abundance than by those in Protestant communions.—Watson; Head, Book.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.* This church derives its origin from the church of England, to which it is "indebted, under God," to borrow the language of the preface to the book of common prayer, "for a long continuance of nursing care and protection." It agrees with that church in doctrine; and its ritual and formularies, with some not very essential variations, which were introduced after the American revolution, are the same. It is not, however, like the parent church, in any way connected with the state, nor do its bishops enjoy any civil powers, immunities, or emoluments, by virtue of their office.

The service book of the American Episcopal church differs from that of England in the following particulars: 1. A shorter form of absolution is allowed to be used instead of the English one, which however is retained, and is most generally recited in divine service.—2. The Athanasian creed is omitted, chiefly, it is probable, on account of the objections which have been made to what are called the damnable clauses, although the Nicene is retained.—3. In the office of baptism, the sign of the cross may be dispensed with, if requested. Scarcely an instance however is recollected, in which a desire has been expressed to have it omitted.—4. The marriage service has been considerably abridged.—5. In the funeral service, some expressions in the English prayer book, which have been thought liable to misconstruction, are altered or omitted. Besides these variations, a change was, of course, made in the prayers for rulers, in consequence of the independence of the United States; and there may be a few other verbal differences of minor importance, which will appear on a comparison of the English and American prayer books. Most of these alterations will probably be considered as judicious.

The different episcopal parishes throughout the United States are united by a constitution, which provides for a general convention of the church once in three years, at some place previously determined, in which the church in each state or diocese is represented by lay and clerical delegates, chosen by the state convention, (every state or diocese having a convention of its own to regulate its local concerns,) each order having one vote, and the concurrence of both being necessary to an act of the convention. The bishops of the church form a separate house, with a right to originate measures for the concurrence of the house of delegates, composed of clergy and laity; and when any proposed act passes the house of delegates, it is transmitted to the house of bishops, who have a negative on the same, so that the consent of both houses is requisite to the passage of any act. The church is governed by canons framed by this assembly, and which regulate the election of bishops, declare the qualifications necessary for obtaining the orders of deacon or priest, the studies to be previously pursued, the examinations which are to be made, and the age which it is necessary for candidates to attain before they can be admitted to the several grades of the ministry: which are three in number, and are believed to be of apostolical institution; viz. bishops, priests, and deacons. Deacon's orders can be conferred on no person under the age of twenty-one, nor those of a priest before that of twenty-four; nor can any person be consecrated a bishop until he be thirty years of age. The thirty-nine articles are not signed by those who are admitted to orders, as in the church of England, but candidates are required to subscribe the following declaration:—"I do believe the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be the word of God, and to contain all things necessary to salvation; and I do solemnly engage to conform to the doctrines and worship of the Protestant Episcopal church in these United States." These doctrines, however, are understood to be contained in the articles of religion, which are printed with the book of common prayer, and implied in the liturgy of the church. In these documents the trinity of divine persons, the atonement of Christ, and the influence of the Holy Spirit in the renewal of the heart, are recognised. In general, the doctrinal views of the church accord with those which have been usually termed the doctrines of the Reformation, and were generally professed by those who separated from the communion of the church of Rome.

Prejudices have prevailed against the Episcopal church, and probably still exist in the minds of some, from an impression that episcopacy is not congenial with republican forms of government and the civil institutions of our country. How erroneous this opinion is, may partly appear from what has already been stated with regard to its constitution, which is founded on the representative principle, and is strikingly analogous to the form of government of the United States. "In the permanent official stations of the bishops and clergy in her legislative bodies, our own church," says bishop Hobart, "resembles all other religious communities, whose clergy also are permanent legislators. But in some respects she is more conformed than they are to the organization of our civil governments. Of these it is a characteristic that legislative power is divided between two branches. And it is a peculiar character of our own church that her legislative power is thus divided. Again, a single responsible executive characterizes our civil constitutions. The same feature marks our own church in the single episcopal executive in each diocese, chosen in the first instance by the clergy and representatives of the laity. Nor are these the only points in which the bishop of our church may feel pleasure in asserting the free and republican constitution of our government; for in our ecclesiastical judicatories the representatives of the laity possess strict co-ordinate authority—the power of voting as a separate body, and of annulling, by a majority of votes, the acts of the bishops and clergy."

History.—A proportion of the early emigrants to English America being of the religious profession established in the mother country, some churches of that persuasion existed of course in several of the colonies at an early period, although from various causes the number was not so considerable as might have been supposed from the existing relation. At the commencement of the revolutionary war, there were not more than about eighty parochial clergymen of the English church to the northward and eastward of Maryland; who derived the principal part of their support, except in Boston, Newport, New York, and Philadelphia, from the society instituted in England for the propagation of the gospel in foreign parts. In Maryland and Virginia, the members of the Episcopal church were much more numerous, and the clergy were supported by a legal establishment. In the more southern colonies, the Episcopalians were fewer in number than in the states last named. An obstacle to the increase of the Episcopal church in this country was found in its separation by the Atlantic ocean from its parent stock, which rendered it dependent for the ministry on emigrations from the mother country, or on sending candidates to England for orders. For this and other reasons application had been made at different times by the clergy for the purpose of obtaining an American episcopate. But the jealousy with which such a measure was regarded by other denominations of Christians, and the great opposition which it consequently met with, rendered the design abortive. The only bond of union which existed between the Episcopal congregations in America before the revolution was through the medium of the bishop of London, to whose diocese they were attached. This tie being dissolved by the independence of the states, it was evident that they could not be combined in one communion without some new principle of association. Accordingly, at a voluntary meeting of a number of the clergy and laity of the Episcopal church at New York, in October, 1784, a plan of ecclesiastical union was proposed, providing for a general convention of the church, consisting of clerical and lay delegates from each state; and it was recommended to the church in the several states to send such delegates to a meeting, to be held at Philadelphia on the 27th of September in the following year. At this meeting the subject of procuring an episcopacy was considered, and an address was framed to the English bishops and archbishops, expressing a desire to perpetuate in the United States the principles of the church of England in doctrine, discipline, and worship; and praying that their lordships would consecrate to the episcopacy the persons who should be sent with that view, from the churches in any of the states respectively. At this meeting also an ecclesiastical constitution was formed, and a committee appointed to correspond with the bishops of England. After the convention had risen, their address to the English prelates was forwarded by the committee to his excellency John Adams, the American minister, with a request that he would deliver it to the archbishop of Canterbury. Mr. Adams willingly complied with this request, and endeavored to promote the object of the address. An act of parliament being obtained, authorizing the English prelates to consecrate bishops for the United States, after some further correspondence, and a declaration of the general convention, that it was not intended to depart from the doctrines of the English church, and that no other alterations were designed in the book of common prayer than such as arose from a change of circumstances, or might be conducive to union, the Rev. William White, D. D., of Philadelphia, and the Rev. Samuel Provoost, D. D., of New York, proceeded to England, and, after some delay, were consecrated bishops, in the chapel of the archiepiscopal palace of Lambeth, by the most reverend John Moore, archbishop of Canterbury, being presented by the most reverend William Markham, archbishop of York. The right reverend Charles Moss, bishop of Bath and Wells, and the right reverend John Hinchliff, bishop of Peterborough, joined with the two archbishops in the imposition of hands. The newly consecrated bishops commenced the exercise of their episcopacy in their respective dioceses soon after their arrival in New York. The Rev. Samuel Seabury, D. D., had some time previously been consecrated to the episcopal office by three of the non-juring bishops of Scotland, not being assured of success at that time in England, and afterwards became bishop of Connecticut. At the triennial convention in July, 1789, the subject of perpetuating the episcopacy was considered. Bishop White expressed a doubt of its being consistent with the faith impliedly pledged to the English prelates, not to proceed to any consecration without first obtaining from them the number held to be canonically necessary in their church to such an act. A vote however was passed in favor of the validity of bishop Seabury's consecration, and the convention accordingly signified their wishes to the two bishops consecrated in England, that they would unite with bishop Seabury in the consecration of the Rev. Edward Bass, of Newburyport, who had been elected by the church in New Hampshire and Massachusetts as their bishop. An address to the English prelates was also framed, requesting their approbation of the measure, in order to remove any scruples which might remain in the minds of the bishops whom they had already consecrated. The difficulty was however not long after removed in another manner, in the election of the Rev. James Madison, D. D., by the convention of Virginia, as their bishop, and his consecration in England. At the next triennial convention, in 1792, held in the city of New York, the four bishops already mentioned as having been consecrated abroad were present; and although nothing further was brought forward from Massachusetts relative to Dr. Bass, application was made from Maryland for the consecration of the Rev. Thomas John Claggett, D. D., who had been elected bishop by the convention of that state. He was accordingly consecrated by bishop Provoost, assisted by bishops Seabury, White, and Madison. Hitherto there had been no consecration of a bishop in the United States, but several have been admitted to the office since that time; and care will doubtless be taken to prevent the necessity of recurring at any future period to a foreign source for the episcopal succession.

Within the last twenty years a theological seminary, now believed to be in a promising condition, was established in New York. By the munificence of Mr. Jacob Sherred, it has been endowed with the sum of sixty thousand dollars. Professors are provided in various branches of theological learning, and candidates for the ministry are prepared for holy orders at a very moderate expense. An incorporated institution, under the denomination of Washington college, with the power of conferring degrees, has been founded at Hartford, in Connecticut, and is in a flourishing state. The Rev. Nath. S. Wheaton, D. D., is the president. A few years since the right reverend Philander Chase, late bishop of Ohio, embarked for England for the purpose of obtaining assistance towards the foundation of a literary institution in that state, in which young men might be qualified for the ministry of the Episcopal church, with the view of supplying the western portion of our country with well instructed clergymen. In the pursuit of this favorite object he was indefatigably diligent, and his exertions were crowned with so much success that he was enabled to establish a theological school at Gambier, by the name of Kenyon college, in honor of one of its most distinguished benefactors in England. The untiring activity of the late bishop Hobart greatly contributed to increase the number of Episcopalians in the diocese of New York, and many new churches were formed during his episcopate in that state. The venerable bishop White still survives, (1834,) after having held the episcopal office for nearly half a century, to edify the church at large by his amiable and exemplary deportment, and assist it by his pious and prudent counsels. At the patriarchal age of eighty-six, he continues to perform his ecclesiastical functions at Philadelphia for the benefit of the church, with whose history his name has been so long associated, and whose welfare and reputation he has so greatly advanced.

The last general convention of the Episcopal church was held in the city of New York, in October, 1832. From the journal of that convention, it appears that the number of bishops of this church at that time was fifteen. The number of the other clergy was as follows:—In the eastern diocese, composed of the states of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, fifty-six; in the diocese of Vermont, fourteen; Connecticut, fifty-six; New York, one hundred and sixty-two; New Jersey, eighteen; Pennsylvania, fifty-nine; Delaware, six;

Maryland, fifty-three; Virginia, fifty-five; North Carolina, fifteen; South Carolina, thirty-three; Georgia, three; Ohio, eighteen; Mississippi, four; Kentucky, eight; Tennessee, seven; Alabama, three; Louisiana, three; Missouri territory, three; Michigan, five; Florida, one; Indiana, one. Total, five hundred and eighty-three. Since that period, the number of bishops has increased to sixteen, and that of other clergymen to six hundred and forty-eight.

The Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the church, instituted in 1820, has numerous auxiliaries. The Protestant Episcopal Sunday School Union was organized in 1826. In 1828, a Protestant Episcopal press was established in New York, "to serve, as far as possible, the best interests of the church, and her institutions."

The prejudices which have existed against the Episcopal church appear to be gradually diminishing, and its beautiful and impressive liturgy, its apostolic government, and venerable usages, to be better understood, and more correctly appreciated, than in former years. PROTESTANT METHODIST CHURCH, or METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES.* This is the name assumed by a respectable body of seceders from the Methodist Episcopal church in this country. They are also known under the name of Reformed Methodists.

History.—At the close of the year 1784, the Methodist societies in these United States were organized by a conference of preachers exclusively, into what is called the Methodist Episcopal church, and made independent of Mr. Wesley. The government was so framed by the conference, as to secure to the itinerant ministers the unlimited exercise of the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of the church, to the entire seclusion of all other classes of ministers, and all the people. Subsequent general conferences exhibited marked dissatisfaction at the leading features of the government, and a very respectable minority struggled hard to effect some salutary improvements, but without producing any important changes. The opposition of the minority continued with unabating ardor, until the membership became more fully acquainted with the genius of the government under which their spiritual guides had placed them, without their knowledge or consent. In 1820, a periodical was instituted, entitled the Wesleyan Repository, and was continued up to the general conference of 1824. Numerous petitions were presented to the conference, praying for a representation of ministers and laymen in the rule-making department; but no change either in the principle or in the practical operations of the government could be obtained.

Immediately after the rise of the general conference of 1824, a meeting, composed of some distinguished members of the conference, and of reformers from different parts of the United States, was held in Baltimore, at which it was determined to publish a periodical pamphlet, entitled "The Mutual Rights of the Ministers and Members of the Methodist Episcopal Church," "for the purpose of giving the Methodist community a suitable opportunity to enter upon a calm and dispassionate discussion of the subjects in dispute." The meeting also determined to resolve itself into a Union Society; and recommended that similar societies be raised in all parts of the United States, "in order to ascertain the number of persons in the Methodist Episcopal church friendly to a change in her government." This measure was followed by much persecution of the reformers. In Tennessee, fourteen official members were expelled for attempting to form an Union Society.

Sometime during the spring of the year 1826, the Baltimore Union Society recommended state conventions to be held in the several states, for the exclusive purpose of making inquiry into the propriety of making one united petition to the approaching general conference of 1828, praying for REPRESENTATION; and to elect delegates to meet in a general convention for the purpose. Conventions were accordingly held, and delegates elected; in consequence of which, reformers in different parts of the country were made to feel the displeasure of men in power. In North Carolina, several members of the Granville Union Society were expelled for being members thereof. In the fall of 1827, eleven ministers were suspended, and finally expelled from the Methodist Episcopal church in this church in Baltimore, and twenty-two laymen, for being members of the Union society, and supporters of mutual rights. The members expelled, and others who saw fit to secede, organized under Mr. Wesley's general rules, taking the title of Associated Methodists.

In November, 1827, the general convention assembled in Baltimore, composed of ministers and lay delegates, elected by the state conventions and union societies. This convention prepared a memorial to the general conference of May, 1828, praying that the government of the church might be made representative, and more in accordance with the mutual rights of the ministers and people. To this memorial the general conference replied, in a circular, by claiming for the itinerant ministers of their church an exclusive divine right to the same unlimited and unnameable power, which they had exercised over the whole church from the establishment of their government in 1784. Soon after the rise of the general conference, several reformers in Cincinnati, Lynchburg, and other places, were expelled for being members of union societies, and supporters of the mutual rights.

The reformers, now perceiving that all hope of obtaining a change in the government of the church had vanished, withdrew in considerable numbers, in different parts of the United States, and called another general convention, to assemble in Baltimore, November 12, 1828. This convention drew up seventeen "Articles of Association," to serve as a provisional government for the Associated Methodist churches, until a constitution and book of discipline could be prepared by a subsequent convention, to be held in November, 1830.

Agreeably to appointment, the convention assembled in the city of Baltimore, on the 2d of November, 1830, and continued in session to the 23d, inclusive. The Rev. Francis Waters, D. D., of Baltimore, was elected president; Mr. William C. Lipscomb, of Georgetown, D. C., secretary; and Mr. William S. Stockton, of Philadelphia, assistant secretary. In this convention was formed and adopted a constitution and discipline for the government of the Methodist Protestant church.

Principles.—The following preamble and articles preceded the constitution:—"We, the representatives of the Associated Methodist churches, in general convention assembled, acknowledging the Lord Jesus Christ as the only HEAD of the Church, and the word of God as the sufficient rule of faith and practice, in all things pertaining to godliness; and being fully persuaded, that the representative form of church government is the most scriptural, best suited to our condition, and most congenial with our views and feelings as fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; and whereas a written constitution, establishing the form of government, and securing to the ministers and members of the church their rights and privileges, is the best safeguard of Christian liberty: We therefore, trusting in the protection of Almighty God, and acting in the name and by the authority of our constituents, do ordain and establish, and agree to be governed by the following elementary principles and constitution:—

1. A Christian church is a society of believers in Jesus Christ, and is a divine institution.
2. Christ is the only Head of the Church; and the word of God the only rule of faith and conduct.
3. No person who loves the Lord Jesus Christ, and obeys the gospel of God, our Savior, ought to be deprived of church membership.
4. Every man has an inalienable right to private judgment, in matters of religion; and an equal right to express his opinion, in any way which will not violate the laws of God, or the rights of his fellow-men.
5. Church trials should be conducted on gospel principles only; and no minister or member should be excommunicated except for immorality; the propagation of unchristian doctrines; or for the neglect of duties enjoined by the word of God.

6. The pastoral or ministerial office and duties are of divine appointment; and all elders in the church of God are equal; but ministers are forbidden to be lords over God's heritage, or to have dominion over the faith of the saints.

7. The church has a right to form and enforce such rules and regulations only, as are in accordance with the Holy Scriptures, and may be necessary or have a tendency to carry into effect the great system of practical Christianity.

8. Whatever power may be necessary to the formation of rules and regulations, is inherent in the ministers and members of the church; but so much of that power may be delegated, from time to time, upon a plan of representation, as they may judge necessary and proper.

9. It is the duty of all ministers and members of the church to maintain godliness, and to oppose all moral evil.

10. It is obligatory on ministers of the gospel to be faithful in the discharge of their pastoral and ministerial duties; and it is also obligatory on the members, to esteem ministers highly for their works' sake, and to render them a righteous compensation for their labors.

11. The church ought to secure to all her official bodies the necessary authority for the purposes of good government; but she has no right to create any distinct or independent sovereignties.

As the preceding history and elementary principles sufficiently develop the peculiarities of this denomination, the constitution is here omitted. It may be found in the "Constitution and Discipline of the Methodist Protestant Church," from which this article is chiefly compiled.

Organization and Enterprise.—A general conference of this body is held once in seven years, consisting of a representation of a single minister and layman to every thousand communicants. There are also about twenty district conferences, where the minor interests of the societies are attended to; but those laws generally binding originate in the general conference. A board of Foreign and Domestic Missions has been instituted by the general conference; and there is in Baltimore, under the direction of the same, a book concern, from which editions of about a hundred and fifty works are sent out for the use of the connexion. From this establishment is issued a weekly periodical, entitled the "Protestant Methodist." Another periodical also is published semi-monthly at Pittsburgh, (Penn.) called the "Methodist Correspondent."

There is a theological seminary in Baltimore, under the direction of Rev. Dr. Waters, which is principally supported by the Reformed Methodists, but which is open also to others.

The principal writers belonging to this body are the Rev. Samuel K. Jennings, D. D., and the Rev. Asa Shinn.

The American Quarterly Register for February, 1834, gives the statistics of the denomination as follows:—Four hundred ministers; fifty thousand communicants; and two hundred thousand population. See the Constitution and Discipline of the M. P. Church; Jennings' History of the Protestant Methodist Secession.

PROVERBS, (Mestim;) a name given by the Hebrews, in common with that of parables or similitudes, to moral sentences, maxims, comparisons, or enigmas, expressed in a poetical, figurative, and sententious style. Solomon says, that in his time, maxims of this sort were the chief study of the learned: "A wise man will endeavor to understand a proverb, and the interpretation; the words of the wise, and their dark sayings," Prov. 1: 6.

"The moralists of the East," says Sir William Jones, "have, in general, chosen to deliver their precepts in short sententious maxims, to illustrate them by sprightly comparisons, or to inculcate them in the very ancient forms of agreeable apologies. There are, indeed, both in Arabic and Persian, philosophical tracts on ethics, written with sound ratiocination and elegant perspicuity; but in every part of the eastern world, from Peking to Damascus, the popular teachers of moral wisdom have immemorably been poets; and there would be no end of enumerating their works, which are still extant in the five principal languages of Asia." The ingenious but ever-disputing and loquacious Greeks were indebted to the same means for their earliest instruction in wisdom. The sayings of the seven wise men, the golden verses of Pythagoras, the remains of Theognis and Phocylides, if genuine, and the gnomai of the older poets, testify the prevalence of aphorisms in ancient Greece. This mode of communicating moral and practical wisdom accorded also with the sedate and deliberative character of the Romans; and, in truth, from its influence over the mind, and its fitness for popular instruction, proverbial expressions exist in all ages and in all languages.

The Proverbs of Solomon are, without doubt, the most valuable part of his works: he says they were fruits of his most profound meditations, and of his most excellent wisdom, Eccles. 12: 9. Here we find rules for the conduct of persons in all conditions of life; for kings, courtiers, and men of the world; for masters, servants, fathers, mothers, and children. (See SOLOMON.)

Some have doubted whether Solomon alone were the author of the Proverbs. Grotius thinks he had a compilation made, for his own use, of whatever was extant, excellent in point of morality, from all the ancient writers of his own nation; that under Hezekiah this collection was enlarged, by adding what had been written since Solomon; and Eliakim, Shebna, and Joab, he thinks, completed the collection, 2 Kings 18: 18. But these conjectures are not supported by proof. The fathers and interpreters ascribe the whole book to Solomon.

True it is, we may observe some differences of style and method in this book. The first nine chapters, entitled, "The Proverbs of Solomon," are written as a continued discourse, and may be considered as a preface. In chap. 10, where we see the same title again, the style changes to short sentences, which have little connexion with each other, and which, generally, contain a kind of antithesis. In chap. 22, ver. 17, we find a new style, approaching nearer to that of the first nine chapters; to chap. 24, v. 23, there is a new title; (To the wise; or, Further sayings of the wise;) and their style is short and sententious. Chap. 25, we read, "These are also proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah, copied out." And, doubtless, it was on this authority that Grotius advanced this collection to have been made by Eliakim, Shebna, and Joab, famous men under the reign of Hezekiah. In chap. 30: 1, we read, "The words of Agur, the son of Jakeh;" and the title of chap. 31, is, "The words of king Lemuel."

From all this it seems certain, that the book of Proverbs is a collection of Solomon, compiled by several hands: but we cannot conclude hence, that it is not the work of Solomon, who, being inspired by Divine Wisdom, composed no less than three thousand proverbs, 1 Kings 4: 32. Several persons might make collections of them; Hezekiah among others, as mentioned chap. 25; and Agur, Isaiah, and Ezra, might do the same. From these collections might be composed the work which we now have; and nothing is more reasonable than this supposition. It is nowhere said, that Solomon himself had made a collection of proverbs and sentences. The title, "Solomon's Proverbs," rather shows the author than the compiler. The rabbins generally maintain, that king Hezekiah, observing the abuse the people made of several works of Solomon, chiefly those which contained the virtues of plants, and secrets of natural philosophy, suppressed several of these works, and only preserved those that are handed down to us. See the Translation and Notes of Dr. J. M. Good, and Memoir of his Life by Dr. O. Gregory.—Calmet; Watson.

PROVIDENCE; the conduct and direction of the several parts of the universe, by a superior intelligent Being.

The Epicureans denied any divine providence, as thinking it inconsistent with the ease and repose of the divine nature to meddle at all with human affairs. Simplicianus argues thus for a providence: If God does not look to the affairs of the world, it is either because he cannot or will not; but the first is absurd, since, to govern cannot be difficult where to create was easy; and the latter is both absurd and blasphemous. Plato, in his Tenth Dialog of Laws, observes, "that a superior nature of such excellence as the divine, which hears, sees, and knows all things, cannot, in any instance, be subject to negligence or sloth; that the meanest and the greatest parts of the world are all equally his work or possession; that great things cannot be rightly taken care of without taking care of small; and that, in all cases, the more able and perfect any artist is, (as a physician, an architect, or the ruler of the state,) the more his skill and care appear in little as well as great things. Let us not, then," says he, "conceive of God as worse than even mortal artists."

By providence, then, we understand, not merely foresight, but an uniform and constant operation of God subsequent to the act of creation. Thus, in every machine formed by human ingenuity, there is a necessity for the action of some extraneous power to put the machine in motion: a proper construction and disposition of parts not being sufficient to effect the end: there must be a spring, or a weight, or an impulse of air or water, or some substance or other, on which the motion of the several parts of the machine must depend. In like manner, the machine of the universe depends upon its Creator for the commencement and the conservation of the motion of its several parts. The power by which the insensible particles of matter coalesce into sensible masses, as well as that by which the great orbs of the universe are reluctantly, as it were, retained in their course, admits not an explanation from mechanical causes: the effects of both of them are different from such as mere matter and motion can produce; they must ultimately be referred to God. Vegetable and animal life and increase cannot be accounted for, without recurring to him as the primary cause of both. In all these respects the providence of God is something more than foresight; it is a continual influence, an universal agency; "by him all things consist," and "in him we live, and move, and have our being."

Much labor, has been employed to account for all the phenomena of nature by the powers of mechanism, or the necessary laws of matter and motion. But this, as we imagine, cannot be done. The primary causes of things must certainly be some powers and principles not mechanical, otherwise we shall be reduced to the necessity of maintaining an endless progression of motions communicated from matter to matter, without any first mover; or of saying that the first impelling matter moved itself. The former is an absurdity too great to be embraced by any one; and there is reason to hope that the essential inactivity of matter is at present so well understood, and so generally allowed, notwithstanding some modern opponents of this hypothesis, that there can be but few who will care to assert the latter. All our reasonings about bodies, and the whole of natural philosophy, are founded on the three laws of motion laid down by Sir Isaac Newton, at the beginning of the "Principia." These laws express the plainest truths; but they would have neither evidence nor meaning, were not inactivity contained in our idea of matter. Should it be said that matter, though naturally inert, may be made to be otherwise by divine power, this would be the same with saying that matter may be made not to be matter. The communication of motion, its direction, the resistance it suffers, and its cessation, in a word, the whole doctrine of motion, cannot be consistently explained or clearly understood without supposing the inertia of matter. "The philosopher," says an excellent writer, "who overlooks the laws of an all-governing Deity in nature, contenting himself with the appearance of the material universe only, and the mechanical laws of motion, neglects what is most excellent, and prefers what is imperfect to what is supremely perfect, flounders to infinity, what is narrow and weak to what is unlimited and almighty, and what is perishing to what endures forever. Sir Isaac Newton thought it most unaccountable to exclude the Deity only out of the universe. It appeared to him much more just and reasonable to suppose that the whole chain of causes, or the several series of them, should centre in him as their source; and the whole system appear depending on him, the only independent cause."

If, then, the Deity pervades and actuates the material world, and his unremitting energy is the cause to which every effect in it must be traced, the spiritual world, which is of greater consequence, cannot be disregarded by him. Is there one atom of matter on which he does not act; and is there one living being about which he has no concern? Does not a stone fall without him; and does, then, a man suffer without him? The inanimate world is of no consequence, abstracted from its subservience to the animate and rational world: the former, therefore, must be preserved and governed entirely with a view to the latter. But it is not mere energy or the constant exertion of power that is discernible in the frame or laws of the universe, in maintaining the succession of men, and in producing men and other beings; but wisdom and skill are also conspicuous in the structure of every object in the inanimate creation. After a survey of the beauty and elegance of the works of nature, aided by the perusal of Matt. 6: 28, &c., we may ask ourselves, Has God, in the lowest of his works, been lavish of wisdom, beauty, and skill; and is he sparing of these in the concerns of reasonable beings? Or does he less regard order, propriety, and fitness in the determination of their states? The answer is obvious. Providence, then, implies a particular interposition of God in administering the affairs of individuals and nations, and wholly distinct from that general and incessant exertion of his power, by which he sustains the universe in existence.

The doctrine of providence may be evinced from the consideration of the divine perfections. The Deity cannot be an indifferent spectator of the series of events in that world to which he has given being. His goodness will as certainly engage him to direct them agreeably to the ends of goodness, as his wisdom and power enable him to do it in the most effectual manner. This conclusion is conformable to all our ideas of those attributes. Could we call that being good who would refuse to do any good which he is able to do without the least labor or difficulty? God is present everywhere. He sees all that happens, and it is in his power, with perfect ease, to order all for the best. Can he then possess goodness, and at the same time not do this? A God without a providence is undoubtedly a contradiction. Nothing is plainer than that a being of perfect reason will, in every instance, take such care of the universe as perfect reason requires. That supreme intelligence and love, which are present to all things, and from whence all things sprung, must govern all occurrences. These considerations prove what has been called a particular, in distinction from a general, providence. We cannot conceive of any reasons that can influence the Deity to exercise any providence over the world, which are not likewise reasons for extending it to all that happens in the world. As far as it is confined to generals, or overlooks any individual, or any event, it is incomplete, and therefore unsuitable to the idea of a perfect being.

One common prejudice against this doctrine arises from the apprehension that it is below the dignity of the Deity to watch over, in the manner implied in it, the meanest beings, and the minutest affairs. To which it may be replied, that a great number of minute affairs, if they are each of them of some consequence, make up a sum which is of great consequence; and that there is no way of taking care of this sum, without taking care of each particular. This objection, therefore, under the appearance of honoring God, plainly dishonors him. Again, whatever it was not too great condescension in him to create, it cannot be too great a condescension in him to take care of. Besides, with regard to God, all distinctions in the creation vanish. All beings are infinitely, that is to say, equally, inferior to him.

The uniform doctrine of the sacred writings is, that throughout the universe nothing happens without God; that his hand is ever active, and his decree of performance or sufferance intervenes in all; that nothing is too great or unwieldy for his management, and nothing so minute and inconsiderable as to be below his inspection and care. While he is guiding the sun and moon in their course through the heavens; while in this inferior world he is ruling among empires, stilling the ragings of the waters, and the tumults of the people, he is at the same time watching over the humble good man, who, in the obscurity of his cottage, is serving and worshipping him.

In what manner, indeed, Providence interposes in human affairs; by what means it influences the thoughts and counsels of men, and, notwithstanding the influence it exerts, leaves to them the freedom of choice, are subjects of dark and mysterious nature, and which have given occasion to many an intricate controversy. Let us remember that the manner in which God influences the motion of all the heavenly bodies, the nature of that secret power by which he is ever directing the sun and the moon, the planets, stars, and comets, in their course through the heavens, while they appear to move themselves in a free course, are matters no less inexplicable to us than the manner in which he influences the counsels of men. But though the mode of divine operation remains unknown, the fact of an overruling influence is equally certain in the moral as it is in the natural world. In cases where the fact is clearly authenticated, we are not at liberty to call its truth in question, merely because we understand not the manner in which it is brought about.

Nothing can be more clear, from the testimony of Scripture, than that God takes part in all that happens among mankind; directing and overruling the whole course of events so as to make every one of them answer the designs of his wise and righteous government. We cannot, indeed, conceive God acting as the governor of the world at all, unless his government were to extend to all the events that happen. It is upon the supposition of a particular providence that our worship and prayers to him are founded. All his perfections would be utterly insignificant to us, if they were not exercised, on every occasion, according as the circumstances of his creatures required. The Almighty would then be no more than an unconcerned spectator of the behavior of his subjects, regarding the obedient and the rebellious with an equal eye. (See PRAYER.)

The experience of every one also must, more or less, bear testimony to it. We need not for this purpose have recourse to those sudden and unexpected vicissitudes which have sometimes astonished whole nations, and drawn their attention to the conspicuous hand of heaven. We need not appeal to the history of the statesman and the warrior; or of the ambitious and the enterprising. We confine our observation to those whose lives have been most plain and simple, and who had no desire to depart from the ordinary train of conduct. In how many instances have we found, that we are held in subjection to a higher Power, on whom depends the accomplishment of our wishes and designs? Fondly we had projected some favorite plan; we thought that we had forecast and provided for all that might happen; we had taken our measures with such vigilant prudence, that on every side we seemed to ourselves perfectly guarded and secure! but, lo! some little event hath come about, unforeseen by us, and in its consequences at the first seemingly inconsiderable, which yet hath turned the whole course of things into a new direction, and blasted all our hopes. At other times our counsels and plans have been permitted to succeed: we then applauded our own wisdom, and sat down to feast on the happiness we had attained. To our surprise we found that happiness was not there, and that God's decree had appointed it to be only vanity. We labor for prosperity, and obtain it not. Unexpected, it is sometimes made to drop upon us as of its own accord. The happiness of man depends on secret springs too nice and delicate to be adjusted by human art: it requires a favorable combination of external circumstances with the state of his own mind. To accomplish, on every occasion, such a combination, is far beyond his power; but it is what God can at all times effect; as the whole series of external causes are arranged according to his pleasure, and the hearts of all men are in his hands, to turn them wheresoever he will, as rivers of water. From the imperfection of our knowledge to ascertain what is good for us, and from the defect of our power to bring about that good when known, arise all those disappointments which continually testify that the way of man is not in himself; that he is not the master of his own lot; that, though he may devise, it is God who directs; God, who can make the smallest incident an effectual instrument of his providence for overturning the most labored plans of men.

Accident, and chance, and fortune, are words which we often hear mentioned, and much is ascribed to them in the life of man. But they are words without meaning; or, as far as they have any signification, they are no other than names for the unknown operations of Providence; for it is certain that in God's universe nothing comes to pass causelessly or in vain. Every event has its own determined direction. That chaos of human affairs and intrigues where we can see no light, that mass of disorder and confusion which they often present to our view, is all clearness and order in the sight of him who is governing and directing all, and bringing forward every event in its due time and place. "The Lord sitteth on the flood. The Lord maketh the wrath of man to praise him, as he maketh the hail and the rain obey his word. He hath prepared his throne in the heavens; and his kingdom ruleth over all. A man's heart deviseth his way, but the Lord directeth his steps."

No other principle than this, embraced with a steady faith, and attended with a suitable practice, can ever be able to give repose and tranquillity to the mind; to animate our hopes, or extinguish our fears; to give us any true satisfaction in the enjoyments of life, or to minister consolation under its adversities. If we are persuaded that God governs the world, that he has the superintendence and direction of all events, and that we are the objects of his providential care; whatever may be our distress or our danger, we can never want consolation; we may always have a fund of hope, always a prospect of relief. But take away this hope and this prospect, take away the belief of God and of a superintending providence, and man would be of all creatures the most miserable; destitute of every comfort, every support, under present sufferings, and of every security against future dangers.

To follow the leadings of Providence, means no other than to act agreeably to the law of duty, prudence, and safety, or any particular circumstance, according to the direction or determination of the word or law of God. He follows the dictates of Providence, who takes a due survey of the situation he is placed in, compares it with the rules of the word which reaches his case, and acts accordingly. To know the will of God as it respects providence, there must be, 1. Deliberation; 2. Consultation; 3. Supplication. The tokens of the divine will and pleasure in any particular case are not to be gathered from our inclinations, particular frames, the form of Scripture phrases, impulses, nor even the event, as that cannot always be a rule of judgment; but whatever appears to be proper duty, true prudence, or real necessity, that we should esteem to be his will. PROVIDENCE, NUNS or; a community of young women at Paris, established about the year 1647, by Madame Potailon, for the reception of poor virgins, who might otherwise be exposed, through poverty, to the temptations of the world. This pious lady having formed the design, was discouraged from prosecuting it by several persons, who represented to her, that she had not a fund sufficient to carry it on; to whom she replied, that Providence should be her fund; and, accordingly, having succeeded in her undertaking, she gave to her community the name of The Nuns of Providence.—Williams.

PRUDENCE, is the act of suiting words and actions according to the circumstances of things, or rules of right reason. Cicero thus defines it:—"Est rerum expetandarum fugiendarum scientia;"—"the knowledge of what is to be desired or avoided." Grove thus:—"Prudence is an ability of judging what is best in the choice both of ends and means." Mason thus:—"Prudence is a conformity to the rules of reason, truth, and decency, at all times, and in all circumstances. It differs from wisdom only in degree; wisdom being nothing but a more consummate habit of prudence; and prudence a lower degree or weaker habit of wisdom." It is divided into, 1. Christian prudence, which directs to the pursuit of that blessedness which the gospel discovers by the use of gospel means. 2. Moral prudence has for its end peace and satisfaction of mind in this world, and the greatest happiness after death. 3. Civil prudence is the knowledge of what ought to be done in order to secure the outward happiness of life, consisting in prosperity, liberty, &c. 4. Monastic, relating to any circumstances in which a man is not charged with the care of others. 5. Economical prudence regards the conduct of a family. 6. Political refers to the good government of a state.

The idea of prudence, says one, includes (cauboulia) due consultation; that is, concerning such things as demand consultation; in a right manner, and for a competent time, that the resolution taken up may be neither too precipitate nor too slow; and (sunesis) a faculty of discerning proper means when they occur. To the perfection of prudence these three things are further required, viz. (deinotēs) a natural sagacity; (agchinoia) presence of mind, or a ready turn of thought; and (empeiria) experience.

Plato styles prudence the leading virtue; and Cicero observes, "that not one of the virtues can want prudence;" which is certainly most true, since without prudence to guide them, piety would degenerate into superstition, zeal into bigotry, temperance into austerity, courage into rashness, and justice itself into folly. PSALMS, (THE BOOK OF;) in Hebrew, Sepher Tschillim, the book of hymns. In the gospels it is variously called, "The Book of Psalms," "The Prophet," or "David," from the name of its principal author. It is justly esteemed to be a kind of abstract of the whole Scripture; a general library, in which we may meet with whatever is requisite for salvation.

"The moral of life, the mystery of redeeming grace, the display of almighty power, and almighty love, the spiritual history of the world, the passage of Jehovah through the wonders of his creation; all that can alarm the wicked, revive the penitent, console the afflicted, and confirm the faithful, is to be found in the book of the Psalms. But in this same book these subjects are often to be sought for, so much below the shining surface of its poetical beauties, so deep in the recesses of spiritual wisdom, and so near the border of the invisible world, that minds of the greatest grasp, and longest reach, are never more usefully employed for mankind, than when engaged in the interpretation of this part of holy Scripture. Lessons of wisdom as salutary as they are intelligible, lie open in the Psalms to the ordinary reader: the attributes of God, the rewards of piety, the vanity of human cares, and the deceitfulness of human counsels, are enforced and exposed by examples, by images, and by descriptions so magnificent, yet so familiar; so elevating, yet so natural; so suitable to common feeling, yet so commensurate with our highest faculties, that all must acknowledge their excellence, and few can wholly resist their influence; but to the mind inquisitively pious, and ardent in the pursuit of heavenly knowledge, these seraphic songs present a path of discovery continually opening before them, refulgent with the footsteps of the Messiah, and resounding with the promises of the gospel."

The sacred history instructs us, says Ambrose, that the prophecies declare future events, the reproofs restrain the wicked, and the precepts persuade them; but the Psalms produce all these effects. Agreeableness and usefulness are here so happily blended, that it is not easy to decide which is most prevalent.

The Hebrews commonly divide the Psalter into five books; at the end of each of which we read the same conclusion, and which is thought to have been put there by Ezra, or by those who had the care of collecting the sacred books after the captivity of Babylon. The first book ends at our fortieth Psalm; the second at the seventy-first; the third, at the eighty-eighth; the fourth at the hundred and fifth; the fifth at the hundred and fiftieth. The first four books conclude with these words: "Amen, Amen;" the fifth with "Hallelujah."

It is a tradition among the Hebrews and Christians, that Ezra is, if not the only, yet the principal, collector of the book of Psalms. Eusebius, Hilary, Theodoret, the author of the Synopsis printed under the name of Athanasius, venerable Bede, and several others, give him this honor. There was before the captivity, however, a collection of the Psalms of David, since Hezekiah, when he restored the worship of the Lord in the temple, caused the Psalms of David to be sung there, 2 Chron. 29: 25, 26, &c. In the library that Nebemiah erected at Jerusalem, he deposited the Psalms of David, 2 Mac. 2: 13.

The authority and inspiration of the book of Psalms have always been acknowledged by both Jews and Christians.

One thing, however, has created a difficulty with many persons of piety; namely, that in the Psalms we sometimes find what seem to be imprecations against the wicked, and the enemies of the prophet. The fathers and modern interpreters, however, commonly and justly explain these passages as inspired predictions of their calamities. It is certain the Hebrew may be as properly translated in the future tense, as in the imperative.

It was impossible in the earliest period of the church of Christ, for those who studied his word, not to learn from him and his apostles the proper use to be made of the Psalms. Succeeding ages have improved that use, as the progress of learning and study have corrected its excesses, and enlarged its foundation. The ardor of critical research which has been brought to the examination of the language of Scripture, and the indefatigable industry with which the manuscripts of the holy text have been compared and corrected, have given to the moderns very decided advantages over the ancients in tracing the beautiful connexion between the Old and New Testament. Time, that impairs and obscures the works of human intellect, consolidates and illustrates the Bible, develops its harmonies, and brings it into closer union with our understandings and affections.

PSALMS OF DEGREES, is a name given to fifteen psalms, from the one hundred and twentieth to the hundred and thirty-fourth. In the Hebrew it is A Song of Ascents. (See DEGREES, PSALMS OF.) As the Hebrews used the term to go up, when they spoke of their journeying from Babylon to Jerusalem, Calmet thinks it is very natural to call those psalms of ascent, which were composed on occasion of their deliverance from the captivity of Babylon; whether to implore this deliverance from God, or to return thanks for it after it had taken place. It is certain that they have all some relation to this great event. They mention it in several places; and the greater part of them cannot be otherwise explained. Mr. Taylor suggests that it is not unlikely that the tribes which came up, in companies, to Jerusalem to worship, several times in a year, should repeat these psalms at their resting stations in the way thither. Dr. Good happily translates the title, "A Sacred March." See his Translation of the Psalms, with Notes, and a Memoir of his Life, by Dr. O. Gregory. See also Lenth, Horne, and Horsley on the Psalms; British Review; and Howe's Chris. Reg. for 1816.—Calmet.

PSALMISTS, and PSALMODISTS. The former term means the authors, the latter the singers of psalms.—Williams.

PSALMODY; the art or act of singing psalms. Psalmody was always esteemed a considerable part of devotion, and usually performed in the standing posture; and as to the manner of pronunciation, the plain song was sometimes used, being a gentle inflection of the voice, not much different from reading, like the chant in cathedrals; at other times, more artificial compositions were used, like our anthems.

As to the persons concerned in singing, sometimes a single person sung alone; sometimes the whole assembly joined together, which was the most ancient and general practice. At other times, the psalms were sung alternately, the congregation dividing themselves into two parts, and singing, verse about, in their turns. There was also a fourth way of singing, pretty common in the fourth century, which was, when a single person began the verse, and the people joined with him in the close; this was often used for variety in the same service with alternate psalmody. (See PSALMS; SINGING; and MUSIC.)

Clement Marot, groom of the bedchamber to Francis I., king of France, was the first who engaged in translating the Psalms into metre. He versified the first fifty at the instigation of Vatablus, Hebrew professor at Paris; and afterwards, upon his return to Geneva, he made an acquaintance with Beza, who versified the rest, and had tunes set to them; and thus they began to be sung in private houses, and afterwards were brought into the churches of the French and other countries. In imitation of this version, Sternhold, one of the grooms of the privy-chamber to king Edward VI., undertook a translation of the Psalms into metre. He went through but thirty-seven of them, the rest being soon after finished by Hopkins and others. This translation was at first discontinued by many of the clergy, who looked upon it as done in opposition to the practice of chanting the Psalms in the cathedrals.

Early in the reign of queen Elizabeth, metrical psalmody was introduced into England. The new morning prayer began at St. Antholin's, London, when a psalm was sung in the Geneva fashion, all the congregation, men, women, and boys, singing together. Bishop Jewell says, that "the singing of psalms, begun in one church in London, did quickly spread itself, not only through the city, but in the neighboring places; sometimes at Paul's Cross six thousand people singing together."

A curious controversy on this subject arose among the Dissenters in the end of the seventeenth century. Whether singing in public worship had been partially discontinued during the times of persecution to avoid informers, or whether the miserable manner in which it was performed gave persons a distaste to it, so it appears, that in 1691, Mr. Benjamin Keach published a tract, entitled, "The Breach Repaired in God's Worship: or, Psalms, Hymns, &c., proved to be a Holy Ordinance of Jesus Christ." To us it may appear strange that such a point should be disputed; but Mr. Keach was obliged to labor earnestly, and with a great deal of prudence and caution, to obtain the consent of his people to sing a hymn at the conclusion of the Lord's supper. After six years more, they agreed to sing on the thanksgiving days; but it required still fourteen years more before he could persuade them to sing every Lord's day; and then it was only after the last prayer, that those who chose it might withdraw without joining in it! Nor did even this satisfy these scrupulous consciences; for, after all, a separation took place, and the inharmonious seceders formed a new church in Maze Pond, where it was above twenty years longer before singing the praises of God could be endured. It is difficult at this period to believe it; but Mr. Ivimey quotes Mr. Crosby, as saying, that Mr. Keach's was the first church in which psalm-singing was introduced. This remark, however, must probably be confined to the Baptist churches.

The Presbyterians, it seems, were not quite so unmusical; for the Directory of the Westminster divines distinctly stated, that "it is the duty of Christians to praise God publicly by singing of psalms together in the congregation." And besides the old Scotch psalms, Dr. John Patrick, of the Charterhouse, made a version, which was in very general use among Dissenters, Presbyterians, and Independents, before it was superseded by the far superior compositions of Dr. Watts. These psalms, however, like those of the English and Scotch establishment, were drawn out in notes of equal length, without accent or variety. Even the introduction of the triple-time tunes, probably about the time of Dr. Watts' psalms, gave also great offence to some people, because it marked the accent of the measure. Old Mr. Thomas Bradbury used to call this time "a long leg and a short one."

The beautiful compositions of Dr. Watts and others, have produced a considerable revolution in modern psalmody. Better versions of the psalms, and many excellent collections of hymns, are now in use, and may be considered as highly important gifts bestowed upon the modern church of God.—Hend. Buck; Watson.

PSALTERY. (See MUSIC.)

PSALTYRIANS a sect of Arians, who, in the council of Antioch, held in the year 360, maintained that the Son was not like the Father as to will; that he was taken from nothing, or made of nothing; and that in God generation was not to be distinguished from creation.—Hend. Buck.

PTOLEMAIS. (See ACCO.)

PTOLEMY; the name of all the kings of Egypt, from Ptolemy, son of Lagos, to the conquest of Egypt by the Romans; that is, from A. M. 3631 to 3974; or from the death of Alexander to the death of Cleopatra, spouse of Mark Antony. (See EGYPT.)—Calmet.

PUBLICAN; an officer of the revenue, employed in collecting taxes. The ordinary taxes which the Romans levied in the provinces were of three sorts: 1. Customs upon goods imported and exported; which tribute was therefore called portorium, from portus, "a haven." 2. A tax upon cattle fed in certain pastures belonging to the Roman state, the number of which being kept in writing, this tribute was called scriptura. 3. A tax upon corn, of which the government demanded a tenth part. This tribute was called decuma. Among the Romans there were two sorts of tax receivers: some were general receivers, who in each province had deputies, who collected the revenues of the empire, and accounted to the emperor. These were men of great consideration in the government; and Cicero says, that among these were the flower of the Roman knights, the ornament of the city, and the strength of the commonwealth. But the deputies, the under-farmers, the commissioners, the publicans of the lower order, for their rapine and extortion, were looked upon as so many thieves and pickpockets. Theocritus being asked, Which was the most cruel of all beasts? answered, "Among the beasts of the wilderness, the bear and the lion; among the beasts of the city, the publican and the parasite."

Among the Jews, also, the name and profession of a publican was excessively odious. They could not, without the utmost reluctance, see publicans exacting tributes and impositions laid on them by foreigners—the Romans. The Galileans, or Herodians, the disciples of Judas the Gaulonite, especially, submitted to this with the greatest impatience, and thought it even unlawful. Those of their own nation who undertook this office, they looked upon as heathen. See Matt. 18: 17. It is even said, they would not allow them to enter the temple, or the synagogues; to partake of the public prayers, or offices of judicature, or to give testimony in a court of justice.

There were many publicans in Judea in the time of our Savior, and they are frequently mentioned by the evangelists.—Calmet; Watson.

PUBLICANI; a party of English Waldenses. (See WALDENSES.) Rapin, in relating the transactions of the councils of Henry II., gives the following account of these people, on the authority of archbishop Usher:—"Henry ordered a council to meet at Oxford in 1166, to examine the tenets of certain heretics, called Publicani. Very probably they were disciples of the Waldenses, who began then to appear. When they were asked in the council who they were, they answered, they were Christians, and followers of the apostles. After that, being questioned upon the creed, their replies were very orthodox as to the Trinity and incarnation. But (says Rapin) if the historian is to be depended on, they rejected baptism, the eucharist, marriage, and the communion of saints. They showed a deal of modesty and meekness in their whole behavior. When they were threatened with death, in order to oblige them to renounce their tenets, they only said, 'Blessed are they that suffer for righteousness' sake.'"

There is no difficulty in understanding what were their sentiments on these heretical points. When a monk says they rejected the eucharist, it is to be understood they rejected the absurd doctrine of transubstantiation; when he says they rejected marriage, he means, that they denied it to be a sacrament, and maintained it to be a civil institution; when he says they rejected the communion of saints, nothing more is to be understood, than that they refused to hold communion with the corrupt church of Rome; and when he says that they rejected baptism, what are we to understand, but that they rejected the baptism of infants? These were the errors for which they were branded with a hot iron in their foreheads, by those who had "the mark of the beast on their forehead and in their hands." Ivimey's Hist. of the Baptists, vol. i. p. 56, 57.—Williams.

PUBLIUS; the governor of Malta, or Melita, when Paul was shipwrecked on that island, A. D. 60, Acts 28: 7—9. It is said, that not only Publius and his father, but the whole island also, was converted to the Christian faith.—Calmet.

PUDENS, mentioned by Paul, (2 Tim. 4: 21.) is thought by the ancients to have been a Roman senator converted by Peter. But there is reason to think they confound him with another Pudens, a senator, said to be father of Praxedus and Prudentiana, in the time of pope Pius, above a hundred years afterwards. The Greeks put him in the list of the seventy disciples, and say, that after the death of Paul, he was beheaded by Nero. Some think that Claudia, mentioned by Paul after Pudens, was his wife.—Calmet.

PUL; king of Assyria, 2 Kings 15: 19. Hos. 5: 13. Pul is thought to have been the father of Sardanapalus, who added the name Pal or Pul to that of Sardan; as Merodach added the name of Baladan, and called himself Merodach-Baladan. If this conjecture be true, Pul is the same as the Anacindarexes, or Anabaxares, of profane authors. He is the first king of Assyria mentioned in Scripture.—Calmet.

PUL; an island called Philæ, in the Nile, not far from Syene, (Isa. 66: 19.) on which are remains and ruins of very noble and extensive temples, built by the ancient Egyptians. It is thought that the people called Phul, are represented in Egypt to this day, by the Pholahs, Pholeys, or Fellahs, which are for the most part husbandmen and cultivators.—Calmet.

PULSE; (peli, from pul, a bean, Lev. 23: 14. 1 Sam. 17: 17.) those grains or seeds which grow in pods, as beans, peas, &c. The ancient Hebrews used parched chick-peas as a common provision when they took the field, 2 Sam. 17: 28.—Calmet.

PUNISHMENTS OF THE HEBREWS. There were several sorts of punishments in use among the Jews which are mentioned in the Scripture. 1. The punishment of the cross. (See Cross.) 2. Suspension, or hanging, Esth. 7: 10. Josh. 8: 29. 2 Sam. 21: 12. 3. Stoning. 4. Fire. This punishment was common, Gen. 38: 24. Lev. 21: 9. 5. The rack or tympanum, mentioned Heb. 11: 35. Commentators are much divided about the meaning of this punishment; but most of them are of opinion that the bastinado, or the punishment of the stick, is intended, and that the apostle alludes to the cruelties exercised upon old Eleazar; for, in 2 Mac. 6: 19, where his martyrdom is spoken of, it is said that he came to the tympanum. 6. The precipice, or throwing persons headlong from a rock, with a stone tied about the neck, 2 Chron. 25: 12. 7. Decapitation, Gen. 40: 19. Judg. 9: 5. 2 Kings 10: 7. Matt. 14: 8. 8. The punishment of the saw, or to be cut asunder in the middle, Heb. 11: 37. This punishment was not unknown to the Hebrews. Some think it was originally from the Persians or Chaldeans. 9. Plucking out the eyes, Exod. 21: 24. Some think this punishment was seldom executed, but the offender was made to suffer in his property rather than in his person: yet there are some instances on record, Judg. 16: 21. 1 Sam. 11: 2. 2 Kings 25: 7. 10. The cutting off the extremities of the feet and hands, Judg. 1: 5—7. 2 Sam. 4: 12.—Watson.

PUR; a Hebrew word, which, like the Greek kleros, signifies lot. Pur, Phur, or Purim, was a solemn feast of the Jews, instituted in memory of the lots cast by Haman, the enemy of the Jews, Esth. 3: 7. These lots were cast in the first month of the year, and gave the twelfth month of the same year for the execution of Haman's design, to destroy all the Jews in Persia. Thus the superstition of Haman, in crediting these lots, caused his own ruin, and the preservation of the Jews, who, by means of Esther, had time to avert this blow. The Jews have exactly kept this feast down to our times. (See HAMAN; ESTHER; and MORDECAI.)—Watson.

PURE; a term in theology, which is applied to certain doctrines or articles of faith, in contradistinction from those which are called mixed. Pure doctrines are such as are only and entirely derived from the Holy Scriptures, such as those of the Trinity, incarnation, &c.; whereas those which are mixed are such as may be discovered or demonstrated by reason, from which, as well as from Scripture, proofs may be derived, as to the existence of certain of the attributes of God.—Hend. Buck.

PURGATORY; a fiction of the church of Rome. It is an imaginary place, in which the just who depart out of this life are supposed to expiate certain offences which do not merit eternal damnation. Broughton has endeavored to prove that this notion has been held by pagans, Jews, and Mohammedans, as well as by Christians; and that, in the days of the Maccabees, the Jews believed that sin might be expiated by sacrifice after the death of the sinner.

The arguments advanced by the papists for purgatory are these:—1. Every sin, how slight soever, though no more than an idle word, as it is an offence to God, deserves punishment from him, and will be punished by him hereafter, if not cancelled by repentance here.—2. Such small sins do not deserve eternal punishment.—3. Few depart this life so pure as to be totally exempt from spots of this nature, and from every kind of debt due to God's justice.—4. Therefore, few will escape without suffering something from his justice for such debts as they have carried with them out of this world, according to that rule of divine justice by which he treats every soul hereafter according to its works, and according to the state in which he finds it in death. From these propositions, which the papist considers as so many self-evident truths, he infers that there must be some third place of punishment; for since the infinite goodness of God can admit nothing into heaven which is not clean and pure from all sin, both great and small, and his infinite justice can permit none to receive the reward of bliss who as yet are not out of debt, but have something in justice to suffer, there must, of necessity, be some place or state, where souls departing this life, pardoned as to external guilt or pain, yet obnoxious to some temporal penalty, or with the guilt of some venial faults, are purged and purified before their admittance into heaven. And this is what he is taught concerning purgatory, which, though he know not where it is, of what nature the pains are, or how long each soul is detained there, yet he believes that those who are in this place are relieved by the prayers of their fellow-members here on earth, as also by alms and masses offered up to God for their souls. And as for such as have no relations or friends to pray for them, or give alms to procure masses for their relief, they are not neglected by the church, which makes a general commemoration of all the faithful departed in every mass, and in every one of the canonical hours of the divine office. Besides the above arguments, the following passages are alleged as proofs: 2 Mac. 12: 43, 44, 45. Matt. 12: 31, 32. 1 Cor. 3: 15. 1 Pet. 3: 19.

But it may be observed, 1. That the books of Maccabees have no evidence of inspiration, therefore quotations from them are not to be regarded.—2. If they were, the texts referred to would rather prove that there is no such place as purgatory, since Judas did not expect the souls departed to reap any benefit from his sin-offering till the resurrection. The texts quoted from the Scriptures have no reference to this doctrine, as may be seen by consulting the context, and any just commentator thereon.—3. Scripture, in general, speaks of departed souls going, immediately at death, to a fixed state of happiness or misery, and gives us no idea of purgatory, Isa. 57: 2. Rev. 14: 13. Luke 16: 22. 2 Cor. 5: 8.—4. It is derogatory from the doctrine of Christ's satisfaction. If Christ died for us, and redeemed us from sin and hell, as the Scripture speaks, then the idea of further meritorious suffering detracts from the perfection of Christ's work, and places merit still in the creature; a doctrine exactly opposite to Scripture.

It is remarkable that the modern doctrine of universal restoration is grounded on the same general arguments as the papal purgatory. See Doddridge's Lectures, lec. 270; Limborch's Theol., l. 6, ch. 10, sec. 10, 22; Earl's Sermon, in the Sermons against Popery, vol. ii. no. 1; Burnett on the Art. 22; Fleury's Catechism, vol. ii. p. 250; Sermons of Dr. A. Clarke.—Hend. Buck.

PURIFICATION; a ceremony which consists in cleansing any thing from pollution or defilement. Purifications are common to Jews, pagans, and Mohammedans. (See IMPURITY.)—Hend. Buck.

PURITANS, (Cathari), has been a common term of reproach applied to the friends of "pure religion and undefiled." In the middle ages it was applied to a branch of the Paulicians, (See CATHEART,) who are charged with the heresies of the Manichæans; but whose principal crime, according to Milner, was their aversion to the church of Rome. (See PAULICIANS.) This able historian says, "The Cathari were a plain, unassuming, harmless, and industrious race of Christians; condemning, by their doctrine and manners, the whole apparatus of the reigning idolatry and superstition; placing true religion in the faith and love of Christ, and retaining a supreme regard for the divine word."

In England, the term Puritans was applied to those who wished for a farther degree of reformation in the church than was adopted by queen Elizabeth; and a purser form, not of faith, but of discipline and worship. It was a common name given to all who, from conscientious motives, though on different grounds, disapproved of the established religion, from the Reformation under Elizabeth to the act of uniformity, in 1662. From that time to the revolution, in 1688, as many as refused to comply with the established worship, (among whom were about two thousand clergymen, and perhaps five hundred thousand people,) were denominated non-conformists. From the passing of the act of toleration, on the accession of William and Mary, the name of non-conformists was changed to that of Protestant dissenters. (See DISSENTERS, and TOLERATION.)

The greater part of the Puritans were Presbyterians. Their objections to the English establishment lay principally in forms and ceremonies. Some, however, were Independents and Baptists. The objections of these were much more fundamental; disapproving of all national churches, as such, and disavowing the authority of human legislation in matters of faith and worship.

Neither the Puritans, nor the non-conformists, appear to have disapproved of the doctrinal articles of the established church; at least, the number who did so was very inconsiderable. While the great body of the clergy had, from the days of archbishop Laud, abandoned their own articles in favor of Arminianism, these were attached to the principles of the first reformers; and by their labors and sufferings the spirit of the Reformation was kept alive. But after the revolution many of the Presbyterians first veered towards Arminianism, then revived the Arian hypothesis, and by degrees settled in Socinianism. Some of the Independents and Baptists, on the other hand, leaned to the Antinomian doctrines; but the rise of Methodism in the last century greatly revived and increased the dissenting interest: not intentionally, indeed; but from necessity. For not only were their favorite preachers mostly excluded from the establishment, but the churches were filled with doctrinal dissenters; that is, with dissenters from their own articles, and from the doctrines of the Reformation. Exclusion from the church, however, naturally led them to study the principles of dissent; and those who at first seceded without any principles of that nature, at length became conscientious non-conformists.

The persecutions carried on against the Puritans during the reigns of Elizabeth and the Stuarts, served to lay the foundation of a new empire, and eventually a vast republic, in this western world. Hither, as into a wilderness, they fled from the face of their persecutors; and being protected in the free exercise of their religion, continued to increase, until at length they became an independent nation. The different principles, however, on which they had originally divided from the church establishment at home, operated in a way that might have been expected, when they came to the possession of the civil power abroad. Those who formed the colony of Massachusetts, having never relinquished the principle of a national church, and of the power of the civil magistrate in matters of faith and worship, were less tolerant than those who settled at New Plymouth, at Rhode Island, and Providence plantations. The very men (and they were good men too) who had just escaped the persecutions of the English prelates, now, in their turn, persecuted others who dissented from them; until, at length, the liberal system of toleration established in the parent country at the revolution, through the influence of the writings of Roger Williams and others, extended to the colonies, in a good measure put an end to these abominable proceedings. Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, by Toulmin, 5 vols. 8vo, or Parsons' Abridgment, 2 vols.; Palmer's Non-conformist's Memorial, 2 vols.; Bogue's and Bennett's History of Dissenters, 4 vols.; Brooks' Lives of the Puritans, 2 vols.; Milner's Church Hist., vol. iii. p. 385; Knocles' Memoir of Roger Williams, and Bancroft's Hist. of the United States.—Williams.

PURITY; the freedom of any thing from foreign admixture; but more particularly it signifies the temper directly opposite to criminal sensualities, or the ascendancy of irregular passions. (See CHASTITY.)

Purity implies, 1. A fixed, habitual abhorrence of all forbidden indulgences of the flesh.—2. All past impurities, either of heart or life, will be reflected on with shame and sorrow.—3. The heart will be freed, in a great measure, from impure and irregular desires.—4. It will dis-cover itself by a cautious fear of the least degree of impurity.—5. It implies a careful and habitual guard against every thing which tends to pollute the mind. See Taylor's Holy Living; Evans' Sermons on the Christian Temper, ser. 23; and Watts' Sermons, ser. 27.—Hend. Buck.

PURPLE; (aregamen, Exod. 25: 4, &c.; porphura, Mark 15: 17, 20. Luke 16: 19. John 19: 2, 5. Rev. 17: 4. 18: 12, 16.) This is supposed to be the very precious color extracted from the purpura or murex, a species of shell-fish; and the same with the famous Tyrian dye, so costly, and so much celebrated in antiquity. The purple dye is called in 1 Mac. 4: 23. "purple of the sea," or sea purple; it being the blood or juice of a turbinated shell-fish, which the Jews call chelzun. (See SCARLET.) Among the blessings pronounced by Moses upon the tribes of Israel, those of Zebulon and Issachar are, "They shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of the treasures hid in the sand." Deut. 33: 19. The words of Tacitus are remarkable: "The river Belus falls into the Jewish sea, about whose mouth those sands mixed with nitre are collected, out of which glass is formed." But it seems much more natural to explain "the treasures hid in the sand," of those highly valuable murexes and purpura which were found on the sea-coast, near the country of Zebulon and Issachar, and of which those tribes partook in common with their heathen neighbors of Tyre, who rendered the curious dyes made from those shell-fish so famous among the Romans by the names of Sarranum ostrum, Tyri colores, Acts 16: 14. In reference to the purple vestment, (Luke 16: 19.) it may be observed, that this was not appropriately a royal robe. In the earlier times it was the dress of any of high rank. Thus all the courtiers were styled by the historians purpurati.

Mr. Harmer styles purple the most sublime of all earthly colors, having the gaudiness of red, of which it retains a shade, softened with the gravity of blue.—Watson.

PURPOSE OF GOD. (See DECREES.)

PUSILLANIMITY, is a feebleness of mind, by which it is terrified at mere trifles or imaginary dangers, unauthorized by the most distant probability.—Hend. Buck.

PUTEOLI, so called from its baths of hot water; a city of Campania, in Italy; now called Pozzuoli, in a province of the kingdom of Naples, called Terra di Lavoro, and about eight miles from Naples. St. Paul stayed a week with the Christians of this place, in his journey as a prisoner to Rome, Acts 28: 13. The Alexandrian merchant vessels referred Puteoli to all the harbors in Italy, and here they deposited their rich freights. They conducted the ships, adorned with wreaths and festive garments, in the form of a fleet, one after another, into the harbor, where they were received with the greatest demonstrations of friendship. Such was the case with the sale of Alexandrian commodities throughout Italy. According to the course then pursued, the vessel in which St. Paul sailed went direct into this harbor.—Watson.

PYRRHONISTS. (See SCEPTICS.)

PYTHAGOREANS; the followers of Pythagoras, a celebrated Greek philosopher, who flourished about five hundred years before the Christian era. His distinguishing doctrine was that of the metempsychosis, (or transmigration of souls,) which he learned among the philosophers of India. This doctrine refers to the transmigration of the human soul after death into the bodies of various animals, till it returns again to its own nature. This notion led to the total rejection of animal food, and to a merciful treatment of the brute creation, which, in those ages, no other kind of argument could have secured. (See METEMPYSCHOSIS; HINDOOISM; PHARISEES.) Enfield's Philosophy, vol. i. pp. 361—400.—Williams.

Q.

QUAIL; (shala, Exod. 16: 13. Num. 11: 31, 32. Psalm 105: 10.) a bird of the gallinaceous kind. Hasselquist, mentioning the quail of the larger kind, says, "It is of the size of the turtle-dove. I have met with it in the wilderness of Palestine, near the shores of the Dead sea and the Jordan, between Jordan and Jericho, and in the deserts of Arabia Petrea. If the food of the Israelites was a bird, this is certainly it; being so common in the places through they which passed." It is said that God gave quails to his people in the wilderness upon two occasions: first, within a few days after they had passed the Red sea, Exod. 16: 3—13. The second time was at the encampment at the place called in Hebrew, Kibroth-Hataavah, the graves of lust, Num. 11: 32. Psalm 105: 40. Both of these happened in the spring, when the quails passed from Asia into Europe. They are then to be found in great quantities upon the coast of the Red sea and Mediterranean. God caused a wind to arise that drove them within and about the camp of the Israelites; and it is in this that the miracle consists, that they were brought so seasonably to this place, and in so great number as to furnish food for above a million of persons for more than a month. The Hebrew word shala signifies "a quail," by the agreement of the ancient interpreters. And the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic languages call them nearly by the same name. The Septuagint, Symmachus, and most of commentators, both ancient and modern, understand it in the same manner; and with them agree Philo, Josephus, Apollinaris, and the rabbins; but Ludolphus has endeavored to prove that a species of locust is spoken of by Moses. (See LOCUST.) Dr. Shaw answers, that the holy Psalmist, in describing this particular food of the Israelites, by calling the animals feathered fowls, entirely confutes this supposition. And it should be recollected, that this miracle was performed in compliance with the wish of the people that they might have flesh to eat.—Watson.

QUAKERS, or FRIENDS; a body of Christians which took its rise in England, about the middle of the seventeenth century, and rapidly found its way into other countries in Europe, and into the English settlements in North America. The members of this society, we believe, called themselves at first Seekers, from their seeking the truth; but after the society was formed, they assumed the appellation of Friends. The name of Quakers was given to them by their enemies; and, though an epithet of reproach, seems to be stamped upon them indelibly. George Fox is supposed to be their first founder; but, after the restoration, Penn and Barclay gave to their principles a more regular form. The doctrines of the society have been variously represented; and some have thought and taken pains to prove them favorable to Socinianism. But, according to Penn, they believe in the Holy Three, or the Trinity of the Father, Word, and Spirit, agreeably to the Scripture. In reply to the charge that they deny Christ to be God, Penn says, "that it is a most untrue and uncharitable censure; that they truly and expressly own him to be so according to the Scripture. To the objection that they deny the human nature of Christ, he answers, "We never taught, said, or held so gross a thing, but believe him to be truly and properly man like us, sin only excepted." The doctrines of the fall, and the redemption by Christ, are, according to him, believed by them; and he firmly declares, "that they own Jesus Christ as their sacrifice, atonement, and propitiation."

But we shall here state a further account of their principles and discipline, as extracted from a summary transmitted by one of their most respectable members.

They tell us that, about the beginning of the seventeenth century, a number of men, dissatisfied with all the modes of religious worship then known in the world, withdrew from the communion of every visible church, to seek the Lord in retirement. Among these was their honorable elder, George Fox, who, being quickened by the immediate touches of divine love, could not satisfy his apprehensions of duty to God without directing the people where to find the like consolation and instruction. In the course of his travels, he met with many seeking persons in circumstances similar to his own, and these readily received his testimony. They then give us a short account of their sufferings and different settlements; they also vindicate Charles II. from the character of a persecutor; acknowledging that, though they suffered much during his reign, he gave as little countenance as he could to the severities of the legislature. They even tell us that he exerted his influence to rescue their friends from the unprovoked and cruel persecutions they met with in New England; and they speak with becoming gratitude of the different acts passed in their favor during the reigns of William and Mary, and George I. They then proceed to give us the following account of their doctrine:—

"We agree with other professors of the Christian name in the belief of one eternal God, the Creator and Preserver of the universe; and in Jesus Christ, his Son, the Messiah and Mediator of the new covenant, Heb. 12: 24.

"When we speak of the gracious display of the love of God to mankind, in the miraculous conception, birth, life, miracles, death, resurrection, and ascension of our Savior, we prefer the use of such terms as we find in Scripture; and, contented with that knowledge which divine wisdom hath seen meet to reveal, we attempt not to explain those mysteries which remain under the veil; nevertheless we acknowledge and assert the divinity of Christ, who is the wisdom and power of God unto salvation, 1 Cor. 1: 24.

"To Christ alone we give the title of the word of God, (John 1: 1.) and not to the Scriptures, although we highly esteem these sacred writings, in subordination to the Spirit (2 Pet. 1: 21.) from which they were given forth; and we hold, with the apostle Paul, that they are able to make wise unto salvation, through faith, which is in Christ Jesus, 2 Tim. 3: 15.

"We reverence those most excellent precepts which are recorded in Scripture to have been delivered by our great Lord; and we firmly believe that they are practicable and binding on every Christian; and that in the life to come every man will be rewarded according to his works, Matt. 16: 27. And further, it is our belief that, in order to enable mankind to put in practice these sacred precepts, many of which are contradictory to the unregenerate will of man, (John 1: 9.) every man coming into the world is endowed with a measure of the light, grace, or good Spirit of Christ; by which, as it is attended to, he is enabled to distinguish good from evil, and correct the disorderly passions and corrupt propensities of his nature, which mere reason is altogether insufficient to overcome. For all that belongs to man is fallible, and within the reach of temptation; but this divine grace which comes by him who hath overcome the world, (John 16: 33.) is, to those who humbly and sincerely seek it, an all-sufficient and present help in the time of need. By this the snares of the enemy are detected, his allurements avoided, and deliverance is experienced through faith in its effectual operation; whereby the soul is translated out of the kingdom of darkness, and from under the power of Satan, unto the marvellous light and kingdom of the Son of God.

"Being thus persuaded that man, without the Spirit of Christ inwardly revealed, can do nothing to the glory of God or to effect his own salvation, we think this influence especially necessary to the performance of the highest act of which the human mind is capable; even the worship of the Father of lights and of spirits, in spirit and in truth: therefore we consider as obstructions to pure worship, all forms which divert the attention of the mind from the secret influence of this union from the Holy One, 1 John 2: 20, 27. Yet, although true worship is not confined to time and place, we think it incumbent on Christians to meet often together, (Heb. 10: 25.) in testimony of their dependence on the heavenly Father, and for a renewal of their spiritual strength: nevertheless, in the performance of worship, we dare not depend for our acceptance with him on a formal repetition of the words and experiences of others; but we believe it to be our duty to lay aside the activity of the imagination, and to wait in silence to have a true sight of our condition bestowed upon us; believing even a single sigh (Rom. 7: 24.) arising from such a sense of our infirmities, and of the need we have of divine help, to be more acceptable to God than any performances, however specious, which originate in the will of man.

"From what has been said respecting worship, it follows that the ministry we approve must have its origin from the same source; for that which is needful for man's own direction, and for his acceptance with God, (Jer. 23: 30—32.) must be eminently so to enable him to be helpful to others. Accordingly, we believe that the renewed assistance of the light and power of Christ is indispensably necessary for all true ministry; and that this holy influence is not at our command, or to be procured by study, but is the free gift of God to chosen and devoted servants. Hence arises our testimony against preaching for hire, in contradiction to Christ's positive command: 'Freely ye have received, freely give;' (Matt. 10: 8.) and hence our conscientious refusal to support such ministry by tithes, or other means.

"As we dare not encourage any ministry but that which we believe to spring from the influence of the Holy Spirit; so neither dare we attempt to restrain this influence to persons of any condition in life, or to the male sex alone; but, as male and female are one in Christ, we allow such of the female sex as we believe to be endued with a right qualification for the ministry, to exercise their gifts for the general edification of the church; and this liberty we esteem a peculiar mark of the gospel dispensation, as foretold by the prophet Joel, (Joel 2: 28, 29.) and noticed by the apostle Peter, Acts 2: 16, 17.

"There are two ceremonies in use among most professors of the Christian name,—water baptism, and what is termed the Lord's supper. The first of these is generally esteemed the essential means of initiation into the church of Christ; and the latter of maintaining communion with him. But as we have been convinced that nothing short of his redeeming power, inwardly revealed, can set the soul free from the thralldom of sin, by this power alone we believe salvation to be effected. We hold, that as there is one Lord and one faith, (Eph. 4: 5.) so his baptism is one, in nature and operation; that nothing short of it can make us living members of his mystical body; and that the baptism with water, administered by his forerunner John, belonged, as the latter confessed, to an inferior dispensation. John 3: 30.

"With respect to the other rite, we believe that communion between Christ and his church is not maintained by that, nor any other external performance, but only by a real participation of his divine nature (1 Pet. 2: 4.) through faith; that this is the supper alluded to in the Revelation: (Rev. 3: 20.) 'Behold, I stand at the door, and knock: if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me;' and that where the substance is attained, it is unnecessary to attend to the shadow, which doth not confer grace, and concerning which opinions so different, and animosities so violent, have arisen.

"Now, as we thus believe that the grace of God, which comes by Jesus Christ, is alone sufficient for salvation, we can neither admit that it is conferred on a few only, whilst others are left without it, nor, thus asserting its universality, can we limit its operation to a partial cleansing of the soul from sin, even in this life. We entertain worthier notions both of the power and goodness of our heavenly Father, and believe that he doth vouchsafe to assist the obedient to experience a total surrender of the natural will to the guidance of his pure unerring Spirit; through whose renewed assistance they are enabled to bring forth fruits unto holiness, and to stand perfect in their present rank, Matt. 5: 48. Eph. 4: 13. Col. 4: 12.

"There are not many of our tenets more generally known than our testimony against oaths, and against war. With respect to the former of these, we abide literally by Christ's positive injunction, delivered in his sermon on the mount, 'Swear not at all;' Matt. 5: 34. From the same sacred collection of the most excellent precepts of moral and religious duty, from the example of our Lord himself, (Matt. 5: 39, 44. &c. 26: 52, 53. Luke 22: 51. John 18: 11.) and from the correspondent convictions of his Spirit in our hearts, we are confirmed in the belief that wars and fightings are in their origin and effects utterly repugnant to the gospel, which still breathes peace and goodwill to men. We also are clearly of the judgment, that if the benevolence of the gospel were generally prevalent in the minds of men, it would effectually prevent them from oppressing, much more from enslaving, their brethren, (of whatever color or complexion,) for whom, as for themselves, Christ died; and would even influence their conduct in their treatment of the brute creation, which would no longer groan, the victims of their avarice, or of their false ideas of pleasure.

"Some of our ideas have in former times, as hath been shown, subjected our friends to much suffering from government, though to the salutary purposes of government our principles are a security. They inculcate submission to the laws in all cases wherein conscience is not violated. But we hold that, as Christ's kingdom is not of this world, it is not the business of the civil magistrate to interfere in matters of religion, but to maintain the external peace and good order of the community. We therefore think persecution, even in the smallest degree, unwarrantable. We are careful in requiring our members not to be concerned in illicit trade, nor in any manner to defraud the revenue.

"It is well known that the society, from its first appearance, has disused those names of the months and days, which, having been given in honor of the heroes or false gods of the heathen, originated in their flattery or superstition; and the custom of speaking to a single person in the plural number, as having arisen also from motives of adulation. Compliments, superfluity of apparel and furniture, outward shows of rejoicing and mourning, and the observation of days and times, we esteem to be incompatible with the simplicity and sincerity of a Christian life; and public diversions, gamiug, and other vain amusements of the world, we cannot but condemn. They are a waste of that time which is given us for nobler purposes; and divert the attention of the mind from the sober duties of life, and from the reproofs of instruction by which we are guided to an everlasting inheritance.

"To conclude: although we have exhibited the several tenets which distinguish our religious society as objects of our belief, yet we are sensible that a true and living faith is not produced in the mind of man by his own effort, but is the free gift of God in Christ Jesus, (Eph. 2: 8.) nourished and increased by the progressive operation of his Spirit in our hearts, and our proportionate obedience. John 7: 17. Therefore, although, for the preservation of the testimonies given us to bear, and for the peace and good order of the society, we deem it necessary that those who are admitted into membership with us should be previously convinced of those doctrines which we esteem essential, yet we require no formal subscription to any articles, either as a condition of membership, or a qualification for the service of the church. We prefer the judging of men by their fruits, and depending on the aid of Him, who, by his prophet, hath promised to be "a spirit of judgment to him that sitteth in judgment," Isa. 28: 6. Without this, there is a danger of receiving numbers into outward communion, without any addition to that spiritual sheepfold, whereof our blessed Lord declared himself to be both the door and the shepherd: (John 10: 7, 11.) that is, such as know his voice and follow him in the paths of obedience.

"In the practice of discipline, we think it indispensable that the order recommended by Christ himself be invariably observed, Matt. 18: 15—17.

"To effect the salutary purposes of discipline, meetings were appointed at an early period of the society, which, from the times of their being held, were called quarterly meetings. It was afterwards found expedient to divide the districts of those meetings, and to meet more frequently: from whence arose monthly meetings, subordinate to those held quarterly. At length, in 1669, a yearly meeting was established, to superintend, assist, and provide rules for the whole, previously to which general meetings had been occasionally held.

"A monthly meeting is usually composed of several particular congregations, situated within a convenient distance from each other. Its business is to provide for the subsistence of the poor, and for the education of their offspring; to judge of the sincerity and fitness of persons appearing to be convinced of the religious principles of the society, and desiring to be admitted into membership; to excite due attention to the discharge of religious and moral duty; and to deal with disorderly members. Monthly meetings also grant to such of their members as remove into other monthly meetings certificates of their membership and conduct; without which they cannot gain membership in such meetings. Each monthly meeting is required to appoint certain persons, under the name of overseers, who are to take care that the rules of our discipline be put in practice; and when any case of complaint, or disorderly conduct, comes to their knowledge, to see that private admonition, agreeably to the gospel rule before mentioned, be given, previously to its being laid before the monthly meeting.

"When a case is introduced, it is usual for a small committee to be appointed to visit the offender, to endeavor to convince him of his error, and to induce him to forsake and condemn it. If they succeed, the person is by minute declared to have made satisfaction for the offence; if not, he is disowned as a member of the society.

"In disputes between individuals, it has long been the decided judgment of the society, that its members should not sue each other at law. It therefore enjoins all to end their differences by speedy and impartial arbitration, agreeably to rules laid down. If any refuse to adopt this mode, or, having adopted it, to submit to the award, it is the direction of the yearly meeting that such be disowned.

"To monthly meetings also belongs the allowing of marriages; for our society hath always scrupled to acknowledge the exclusive authority of the priests in the solemnization of marriage. Those who intend to marry appear together, and propose their intention to the monthly meeting; and if not attended by their parents and guardians, produce a written certificate of their consent, signed in the presence of witnesses. The meeting then appoints a committee to inquire whether they be clear of other engagements respecting marriage; and if at a subsequent meeting, to which the parties also come and declare the continuance of their intention, no objections be reported, they have the meeting's consent to solemnize their intended marriage. This is done in a public meeting for worship, towards the close whereof the parties stand up, and solemnly take each other for husband and wife. A certificate of the proceedings is then publicly read, and signed by the parties, and afterwards by the relations and others as witnesses. Of such marriage the monthly meeting keeps a record; as also of the births and burials of its members. A certificate of the date of the name of the infant, and of its parents, signed by those present at the birth, is the subject of one of these last mentioned records; and an order for the interment, countersigned by the grave-maker, of the other. The naming of children is without ceremony. Burials are also conducted in a simple manner. The body, followed by the relations and friends, is sometimes, previously to interment, carried to a meeting; and at the grave a pause is generally made; on both which occasions it frequently falls out that one or more friends present have somewhat to express for the edification of those who attend; but no religious rite is considered as an essential part of burial.

"Several monthly meetings compose a quarterly meeting. At the quarterly meeting are produced written answers from the monthly meetings to certain queries respecting the conduct of their members, and the meeting's care over them. The accounts thus received are digested into one, which is sent, also in the form of answers to queries, by representatives to the yearly meeting. Appeals from the judgment of monthly meetings are brought to the quarterly meetings, whose business also it is to assist in any difficult case, or where remissness appears in the care of the monthly meetings over the individuals who compose them. There are seven yearly meetings; viz. 1. London, to which come representatives from Ireland; 2. New England; 3. New York; 4. Pennsylvania and New Jersey; 5. Maryland; 6. Virginia; 7. The Carolinas and Georgia.

"The yearly meeting has the general superintendance of the society in the country in which it is established; and, therefore, as the accounts which it receives discover the state of inferior meetings, as particular exigencies require, or as the meeting is impressed with a sense of duty, it gives forth its advice, making such regulations as appear to be requisite, or excite to the observance of those already made; and sometimes appoints committees to visit those quarterly meetings which appear to be in need of immediate advice. Appeals from the judgment of quarterly meetings are here finally determined; and a brotherly correspondence, by epistles, is maintained with other yearly meetings.

"In this place it is proper to add, that, as we believe women may be rightly called to the work of the ministry, we also think that to them belongs a share in the support of our Christian discipline; and that some parts of it, wherein their own sex is concerned, devolve on them with peculiar propriety: accordingly they have monthly, quarterly, and yearly meetings of their own sex, held at the same time and in the same place with those of the men; but separately, and without the power of making rules: and it may be remarked, that during the persecutions which in the last century occasioned the imprisonment of so many of the men, the care of the poor often fell on the women, and was by them satisfactorily administered.

"In order that those who are in the situation of ministers may have the tender sympathy and counsel of those of either sex, who by their experience in the work of religion are qualified for that service, the monthly meetings are advised to select such, under the denomination of elders. These, and ministers approved by their monthly meetings, have meetings peculiar to themselves, called meetings of ministers and elders; in which they have an opportunity of exciting each other to a discharge of their several duties, and of extending advice to those who may appear to be weak, without any needless exposure. Such meetings are generally held in the compass of each monthly, quarterly, and yearly meeting. They are conducted by rules prescribed by the yearly meeting, and have no authority to make any alteration or addition to them. The members of them unite with their brethren in the meetings for discipline, and are equally accountable to the latter for their conduct.

"It is to a meeting of this kind in London, called the second-day's morning meeting, that the revival of manuscripts concerning our principles, previously to publication, is intrusted by the yearly meeting held in London; and also the granting, in the intervals of the yearly meeting, of certificates of approbation to such ministers as are concerned to travel in the work of the ministry in foreign parts, in addition to those granted by their monthly or quarterly meetings. When a visit of this kind doth not extend beyond Great Britain, a certificate from the monthly meeting of which the minister is a member is sufficient; if to Ireland, the concurrence of the quarterly meeting is also required. Regulations of similar tendency obtain in other yearly meetings.

"The yearly meeting of London, in the year 1675, appointed a meeting to be held in that city, for the purpose of advising and assisting in cases of suffering for conscience's sake, which hath continued with great use to the society to this day. It is composed of friends, under the name of correspondents, chosen by the several quarterly meetings, and who reside in or near the society. The same meetings also appoint members of their own in the country as correspondents, who are to join their brethren in London on emergency. The names of all these correspondents, previously to their being recorded as such, are submitted to the approbation of the yearly meeting. Those of the men who are approved ministers are also members of this meeting, which is called the meeting for sufferings; a name arising from its original purpose, which is not yet become entirely obsolete.

"The yearly meeting has intrusted the meeting for sufferings with the care of printing and distributing books, and with the management of its stock; and, considered as a standing committee of the yearly meeting, it hath a general care of whatever may arise, during the intervals of that meeting, affecting the society, and requiring immediate attention, particularly of those circumstances which may occasion an application to government.

"There is not in any of the meetings which have been mentioned any president, as we believe that divine wisdom alone ought to preside; nor hath any member a right to claim pre-eminence over the rest. The office of clerk, with a few exceptions, is undertaken voluntarily by some member; as is also the keeping of the records. When these are very voluminous, and require a house for their deposit, (as is the case in London, where the general records of the society in Great Britain are kept,) a clerk is hired to have the care of them: but except a few clerks of this kind, and persons who have the care of meeting-houses, none receive any stipend or gratuity for their services in our religious society."

Within a few years past, a great division has been taking place in this peaceable community. They subsist now in two separate bodies, called the Orthodox, and the Hicksites, after David Hicks, whose views are Socinian.

The number of Quakers in England and Ireland may amount to about forty thousand; in Scotland, they do not much exceed three hundred; but in America their number is estimated in the American Quarterly Register for February, 1834, at four hundred and fifty congregations, and two hundred and twenty thousand population. See a pamphlet entitled A Summary of the History, Doctrine, and Discipline of the Quakers; Serell's and Rutt's History of the Quakers; Besse's Sufferings of the Quakers; Pew's Works; Barclay's Apology for the Quakers; Neal's History of the Puritans; Claridge's Life and Posthumous Works; Bevan's Defence of the Doctrines of the Quakers; Adams' View of Religions; Tuke's Principles of Religion as professed by the Quakers; Gough's Hist. of Quakers; Clarkson's Portraiture of Quakerism.—*Head. QUARLES, (FRANCIS,) a poet, was born, in 1592, near Romford, in Essex; studied at Christ college, Cambridge, and at Lincoln's inn; was successively cupbearer to Elizabeth, (daughter of James I.,) and secretary to archbishop Usher, in Ireland; suffered greatly for his attachment to the cause of Charles I.; and died in 1644. His principal works are, Emblems; Argalus and Parthenia; Divine Fancies; and Enchiridion. Quarles has been made an object of satire; but, with all its faults, his religious poetry is above contempt.—Davenport.

QUARTUS; a disciple mentioned by the apostle Paul in his epistle to the Romans, ch. 16: 23. The Greeks say he was one of the seventy whom Christ sent out to preach the gospel of the kingdom, and that he was afterwards bishop of Berythus, a sea-port town in Phœnicia.—Jones.

QUARREL; a brawl or contest. Solomon compares him who meddles with the quarrels of people unknown, to one who takes a dog by the ears, and so rashly exposes himself to be bitten. This is generally the case; but it should not be concluded from hence, that we ought never to try to reconcile neighbors. It must be attempted, however, with much prudence, caution, and charity, for fear of increasing the evil we undertake to appease, Matt. 5: 9.—Calmet.

QUATERNION; four in company, Acts 12: 4.

QUEEN; a king's wife. This is the general acceptation of the term queen; but it seems to be used by the Orientals in another sense, and corresponds to the official title of "king's mother." A knowledge of this circumstance will remove several discrepancies in the historical books of the Old Testament, which have greatly perplexed the commentators. (See KING'S MOTHER.)—Calmet.

QUEEN OF HEAVEN; a name which the Hebrew idolaters gave to the moon. Jeremiah (7: 17, &c.) says, "The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire, and the women knead their dough, to make cakes to the queen of heaven." Chap. 44: 16—18. Calmet thinks it to be the Meni of Isa. 65: 11, who was worshipped as the moon, Astarte, Trivia, Hecate, Diana, the heavenly Venus, and Isis, according to different superstitions. They placed altars to her on the platforms or the roofs of their houses, at the corners of the streets, near their doors, and in groves. They offered her cakes kneaded with oil or honey, and made libations to her, with wine and other liquors. The rabbins think they printed on these cakes the resemblance of a star, or half-moon. (See IDOLATRY.)—Calmet.

QUEEN OF SHEBA. (See SHEBA.)

QUENCH; a figurative expression, borrowed from the practice of extinguishing fire, by throwing water upon it. Paul applies it to the influences of the Holy Spirit, when he exhorts the Thessalonians to "quench not the Spirit," 1 Thess. 5: 19. And the counterpart to this is what he says to the Ephesians: (chap. 5: 18.) "Be filled with the Spirit."

Some restrict these admonitions to the use of the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, which were peculiar to the apostolic age, Heb. 2: 4. But though they may comprehend the use of those gifts, it is a dangerous error to set aside the ordinary influences of the Holy Spirit, which, without doubt, equally with the extraordinary, may be cherished by yielding to their influence, cultivating charity in all its branches, and a virtuous temper of mind; or repelled and extinguished by the indulgence of sensual, malevolent, and worldly dispositions. Hence the important exhortation to Christians, "Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed to the day of redemption, Eph. 4: 30—32." See Beddome's Short Discourses, vol. iv. ser. 8; Robert Hall on the Work of the Holy Spirit.—Jones.

QUIETISTS; the disciples of Michael de Molinos, a Spanish priest, who flourished in the seventeenth century, and wrote a book called "The Spiritual Guide." He had many disciples in Spain, Italy, France, and the Netherlands. Some pretend that he borrowed his principles from the Spanish Illuminati; and M. Gregoire will have it that they came originally from the Persian Sufcees; while others no less confidently derive them from the Greek Hesycasts. The Quietists, however, deduce their principles from the Scriptures. They argue thus: "The apostle tells us, that 'the Spirit makes intercession for' or 'in' us.' Now if the Spirit pray in us, we must resign ourselves to his impulses, by remaining in a state of absolute rest, or quietude, till we attain the perfection of the unitive life" a life of union with, and, as it should seem, of absorption in, the Deity. (See MYSTICS.)—Watson.

QUIETNESS, in a moral sense, is opposed to disorderly motion, to turbulence, to contention, to pragmatical eriosity, to all such exorbitant behavior whereby the right of others is infringed, their peace disturbed, their just interest or welfare in any way prejudiced. It is a calm, steady, regular way of proceeding within the bounds and measures prescribed by reason, justice, and charity, modesty, and sobriety. It is of such importance, that we find it enjoined in the sacred Scripture; and we are commanded to study and pursue it with the greatest diligence and care, 1 Thess. 4: 11.

The great Dr. Barrow has two admirable sermons on this subject in the first volume of his Works. He justly observes, 1. That quietness is just and equal. 2. It indicates humility, modesty, and sobriety of mind. 3. It is beneficial to the world, preserving the general order of things. 4. It preserves concord and amity. 5. It begets tranquility and peace. 6. It is a decent and lovely thing, indicating a good disposition, and producing good effects. 7. It adorneth any profession, bringing credit and respect thereto. 8. It is a safe practice, keeping us from needless encumbrances and hazards; whereas pragmaticalness, interfering with the business and concerns of others, often raises dissensions, involves in guilt, injures others, shows our vanity and pride, and exposes to continual trouble and danger.—Hend. Buck.

QUINQUAGESIMA; a Sunday, so called because it is the fiftieth day before Easter, reckoned in whole numbers. (See SHROVE SUNDAY).—Hend. Buck.

QUINTA; a Christian martyr in Alexandria, about the middle of the third century. Being carried to the temple, and refusing to worship idols there, she was dragged by her feet over sharp flint-stones, scourged, and at last stoned to death. This persecution took place at the instigation of a pagan priest, without the knowledge of the emperor, Philip, during whose reign, and that of his predecessor, the church was free from persecution.—Fox, p. 26.

QUINTILIANS; a sect that appeared in Phrygia, about A. D. 189: thus called from their prophetess, Quintilia. In this sect the women were admitted to perform the sacerdotal and episcopal functions. They attributed extraordinary gifts to Eve for having first eaten of the tree of knowledge; told great things of Mary, the sister of Moses, as having been a prophetess, &c. They added, that Philip the deacon had four daughters, who were all prophetesses, and were of their sect. In these assemblies it was usual to see the virgins entering in white robes, personating prophetesses. The errors of the Quintilians were at first looked upon as folly and madness; but as they appeared to gain ground, the council of Laodicea, in 320, condemned them. (See MONTANISTS, and PRISCILLIANISTS).—Hend. Buck.

QUINTIN, a Christian martyr under Maximian, was a native of Rome, but determined to attempt the propagation of the gospel in Gaul. He accordingly went to Picardy, attended by one Lucian: they preached together at Amiens; after which Lucian went to Beawaris, where he was martyred. Quintin remained in Picardy, and was very zealous in his ministry. After his apprehension, he was stretched with pulleys till his joints were dislocated; his body was torn with wire scourges, and boiling oil, pitch, and lighted torches were applied to his flesh. Having been ordered to repair with the governor to Vermandois, under a strong guard, he died there of the barbarities he suffered, A. D. 287. His body was sunk in the river Somme.—Fox, p. 38.

QUIRINUS; bishop of Siscia, a Christian martyr under Galerius, at the commencement of the fourth century. He was most resolute in his adherence to his principles, and when in torture said, "I scarce feel my torments, and am ready to suffer still greater, that my example may show those whom God has committed to my care the way to the glory we wish for." He was drowned in the Danube; and the circumstances attending his death are said to be most extraordinary, if not miraculous.—Fox, p. 57.

QUIRITUS, a Roman nobleman, with his family and domestics, were, on account of being Christians, put to the most excruciating tortures, and then to the most painful deaths, about the year 236, under Maximinus.—Fox, p. 25.

R.

RAAMAH; the fourth son of Cush, who peopled a country of Arabia, whence were brought to Tyre spices, precious stones, and gold. This country is thought to have been in Arabia Felix, at the entrance of the Persian gulf, Gen. 10: 7. Ezek. 27: 22.—Calmet.

RAAMESSES, or RAMESSES; a city built by the Hebrews, during their servitude in Egypt, and which probably took its name from a king of Egypt, Gen. 47: 11. Exod. 1: 11. (See RAMESSES).—Calmet.

RAB, RABBI, RABBIN, RABBAN, or RABBAN; a name of dignity among the Hebrews, given to masters and doctors, to chiefs of classes, and to the principal officers in the court of a prince. It appears that the title came originally from the Chaldees; for before the captivity, when mention is made of Judea, we find it used only in reference to the officers of the king of Babylon.

Rab, or robban, properly signifies master, or one who excels in any thing; rabbu or rabboni, is my master. Rabbin is the plural. Thus Rab is of greater dignity than Rabbi, and Rabbin or Rabbim, is of greater dignity than Rab or Rabbi. There were several gradations among the Jews before the dignity of Rabbi, as among us, before the degree of doctor. The head of a school was called Hacham, or wise; he who aspired to the doctorship, had the name of Bachur, or Elou; and he frequented the school of Chabar of the Rab, or master's companion, and when perfectly skilled in the knowledge of the law and traditions, he was called only Rab or Rabin, and Morena, our master. There seems to be an allusion to something of this sort in Matt. 10: 24. Luke 6: 40: "The disciple is not above his master; but it is enough for the finished disciple to be as his master," or to be his master's companion.

Our Savior upbraids the rabbins and masters of Israel with vanity, and eagerness to occupy the first places at feasts, and the head seats in the synagogues; also, with their being saluted in the streets, and desiring to be called rabbi, my master.

The studies of the rabbins are either the text of the law, or the traditions, or the cabala: these three objects form so many different sorts of rabbins. Those who chiefly apply to the letter of Scripture, are called Caraites, i. e. Literalists. Those who chiefly study the traditions and oral laws of the Talmud, are called Rabbinists. Those who give themselves to their secret and mysterious divinity, letters and numbers are called Cabalists, i. e. Traditionaries. (See RABBINS).—Calmet.

RABBINS; (from the Heb. rab, great;) doctors or teachers among the Jews, whose province it is to decide differences, determine what things are allowed or forbidden, and judge both in religious and civil matters. They celebrate marriages and declare divorces, preach in the synagogues, and preside over academies. Their studies are chiefly occupied with the Talmud and cabala, and in general they are acquainted with little else. There have, however, been some distinguished men among them, especially in Spain. Of these the following are the principal —

Moses Maimonides, or, abridged, Romban, born at Corduba, A. D. 1131, author of an abridgment of the Talmud, a "Commentary on the Mishna," and "More Nevochim, or a Guide to the Perplexed;" in the two latter of which works many novel philosophical principles are advanced, which greatly scandalized the western Jews.

Solomon Jarchi, abbreviated Rashi, died at Troyes, in France, A. D. 1170, wrote a "Commentary on the Old Testament," in which he chiefly follows the interpretation of "The Targum." Owing to the brevity with which he expresses himself, he is often very obscure.

Aben Ezra, born at Toledo, 1167, improved himself by travelling, applied to the study of the different sciences, and rose quite superior to his countrymen in his independence and impartiality of mind. He also wrote a "Commentary on the Scriptures," which is of much greater value than that of Jarchi, on account of its containing the results of much grammatical and historical investigation. In elucidating the Hebrew words, he frequently avails himself of the Arabic.

David Kimchi, born about 1160, the author of a commentary, and other learned works. He is more polemical than any of his predecessors, and often attacks the Christians with much bitterness; but most of the passages containing these attacks have been struck out of the printed copies by the censors, and have since been omitted in the MSS. for fear of the Inquisition.

Abarbanel (Abraham) flourished about 1490, and wrote very elaborate and tedious commentaries on the Bible. Taking the schoolmen for his model, he proposes a number of knotty questions on every chapter or division, which he answers at great length.

Tanchum, of Jerusalem, wrote Arabic commentaries on the Old Testament, which still exist in MS. in the Bodleian library. In critical works on the Scriptures, accounts will be found of Ben Asher and Ben Naphtali, who revised the Hebrew text about the beginning of the eleventh century. Ramban, (rabbi Moses ben Nahman,) who wrote on the books of the law. Elias Levita, the distinguished masoretic critic, and others, who, in different countries, addicted themselves, with greater or less success, to the study of the Hebrew grammar and Scriptures.—Hend. Dusk.

RABBATH, or RABBAT-AMNON, or RABBATH OF THE CHILDREN OF AMNON, afterwards called Philadelphia, by Ptolemy Philadelphus, the capital of the Ammonites, was situated on the mountains of Gilead, near the source of the Arnon, beyond Jordan. It is now called Amman, and is about fifteen miles south-east of Szaet. (See AMMONITES.)—Calmet.

RABBATH-MOAB, RABBAT-MOBA, AR, AREOPOLIS, ARIEL OF MOAB, KIRHERES, of the city with brick walls, situated about twenty-five miles south of the Arnon, was the capital of the Moabites. (See AR.)—Calmet.

RACA; (Matt. 5: 22.) a word derived from the root rik, vain, hypocritical, or worthless. It is thus translated by the Vulgate, in Judg. 11: 3; in the English, vain men.

The word includes a strong idea of passion, like our word rascal. Lightfoot assures us, that in the Jewish books, the word Raca is a term of the utmost contempt; and that it used to be pronounced with certain gestures of indignation, as spitting, turning away the head, &c.—Calmet.

RACE, RUNNING. The numerous allusions in the writings of Paul to the races and games established in Greece, require some acquaintance with the nature and laws of those institutions, to render such passages intelligible. (See GAMES.)

“Such as obtained victories in any of these games, especially the Olympic, were universally honored, nay, almost adored. Cicero reports, that a victory in the Olympic games was not much less honorable than a triumph at Rome. Happy was the man esteemed, who could but obtain a single victory; if any person merited repeated rewards, he was thought to have attained the utmost felicity of which human nature is capable; but if he came off conqueror in all the exercises, he was elevated above the condition of men, and his actions styled wonderful victories! Nor did their honors terminate in themselves, but were extended to all about them; the city that gave them birth and education was esteemed more honorable and august: happy were their relations, and thrice happy their parents. It is a remarkable story which Plutarch relates of a Spartan, who, meeting Diogoras, that had himself been crowned in the Olympic games, and seen his sons and grandchildren victors, embraced him, and said, ‘Now die, Diogoras; for thou canst not be a god!’ By the laws of Solon, a hundred drachms were allowed from the public treasury to every Athenian who obtained a prize in the Isthmian games; and five hundred drachms to such as were victors in the Olympian. Afterwards, the latter of these had their maintenance in the Prytaneum, or public hall of Athens.”—Calmet.

RACHEL; the daughter of Laban, and sister of Leah. The prophet Jeremiah, (31: 15.) and St. Matthew, (2: 18.) have put Rachel for the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, the children of Joseph, the son of Rachel. The prophecy was completed when these two tribes were carried into captivity beyond the Euphrates; and St. Matthew uses it beautifully to illustrate what happened at Bethlehem, when Herod put to death the children of two years old and under. Then Rachel, who was buried there, might be said to make her lamentations for the death of so many innocent children sacrificed to the jealousy of a wicked monarch.—Watson.

RAGUEL. (See JETHRO.)

RAHAB; an hostess of the city of Jericho, who received and concealed the spies sent by Joshua. The Hebrew calls her zunch, (Josh. 2: 1.) which Jerome and many others understand of a prostitute. Others, however, think she was only a hostess or innkeeper, and that this is the true signification of the original word, from zoon, to provide food. Had she been a woman of ill fame, would Salmon, a prince of the tribe of Judah, have taken her to wife? Or could he have done it by the law? Besides, the spies of Joshua would hardly have gone to lodge with a common harlot, they who were charged with so nice and dangerous a commission. Those who maintain that she was a harlot, pretend that she was perhaps one of those women who prostituted themselves in honor of the pagan deities. But such women are called kadeshah, not zunch, in the Hebrew.

Rahab married Salmon, a prince of Judah, by whom she had Boaz, from whom descended Obed, Jesse, and David. Thus Jesus Christ condescended to reckon this Canaanitish woman among his ancestors. St. Paul magnifies the faith of Rahab, Heb. 11: 31.

Rahab is also a name of Egypt, Isa. 30: 7. 51: 9.—Watson.

RAIMENT. In addition to what occurs under the article HABITS, it may be observed that to make presents of changes of raiment, (Gen. 43: 22.) has always been common among all ranks of Orientals. A frequent change of garments is also very common both to show respect and to display opulence. Is there an allusion to this in Ps. 102: 26: “As a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed?” If so, it conveys the magnificent idea of the almighty Creator investing himself with the whole creation as with a robe, and, having laid that aside, by new creations, or the successive production of beings, clothing himself with others, at his pleasure.—Watson.

RAIN; the vapors exhaled by the sun, which descend from the clouds to water the earth, Eccles. 11: 3. The sacred writers often speak of the rain of the former and latter season, Dent. 11: 14. Hos. 6: 3. Twice in the year there generally fell plenty of rain in Judea; in the beginning of the civil year, about September or October; and half a year after, in the month of Abib, or March, which was the first month in the ecclesiastical or sacred year; whence it is called the latter rain in the first month, Joel 2: 23. (See CANAAN.)

The ancient Hebrews compared doctrine to rain, on account of its refreshing and fertilizing influence: “My doctrine shall drop as the rain,” Dent. 32: 2.—Watson.

RAINOLDS, (JOHN, D. D.) a learned English divine, was born at Pinto, in Devonshire, in 1549, and received his education at Oxford, where he distinguished himself as first scholar; became fellow, and took the degrees of master of arts, and of doctor of divinity. In 1598, he was made dean of London; but, being unwilling to quit academical life, he exchanged his deanery the year following for the presidency of Corpus Christi college. Queen Elizabeth offered him a bishopric, which he refused for the same reason. He was engaged in translating a part of the Old Testament, by the command of king James I. He died, May 21, 1607, aged fifty-eight.

Dr. Rainolds is spoken of as a man of incredible powers and diligence; and as having made himself “a treasury of all knowledge, both human and divine.” “He alone,” says bishop Hall, “was a well-furnished library, full of all faculties, of all study, of all learning. The memory, the reading of that man were to a miracle.”

His religious character has also been extolled. It was said of him, that “for virtue, probity, integrity, and piety, he was so eminent, that, as Nazianzen speaks of Athanasius, to name him is to commend virtue itself.”

His publications were numerous; some of them were directed against popery; others in defence of the church of England; they embraced, also, a variety of other subjects.—Middleton's Evan. Biog., vol. ii. p. 371.

RAM, or BATTERING RAM; an ancient engine of war. (See ARMS, MILITARY.)

RAMAH. This word signifies an eminence; from hence are so many places in Palestine named Rama, Ramath, Ramatha, Ramoth, Ramathaim, Ramala, and Ramathan. Sometimes the same place is called by one or other of these names indiscriminately, all signifying the same. Sometimes Rama or Ramoth is joined to another name, to determine the place of such city, or eminence; and it is sometimes put simply for a high place, and signifies neither city nor village.—Calmet.

RAMAH; a city of Benjamin, between Gaba and Bethel, toward the mountains of Ephraim, six miles from Jerusalem north, and on the road from Samaria to Jerusalem. (See RACHEL.)—Calmet.

RAMAH; a city about thirty miles north-west of Jerusalem, on the road to Joppa. M. le Bruyn describes the fine reservoirs of water to be seen here, and many other marks of antiquity. He says it is but four leagues from Jaffa, or Joppa, and stands in a plain and even country: he also says, that Lydda is on one side, and about three miles from Rama. (See ARIMATHEA.) Eusebius and some others seem to have thought, that this city is the Ramath of Samuel, or Ramathaim-zophim of the mountains of Ephraim. But this opinion cannot be supported. (See RAMATHAIM.)—Calmet.

RAMATHAIM; the two Ramathas: probably, because the city was divided into two parts. It was also called Zophim, because of a family of Levites dwelling there, who were descended from Zoph. (See RAMAH.)—Calmet.

RAMBAUT, (DANIEL;) a Christian martyr of Villaro, in a valley of Piedmont, in the seventeenth century. Every proposal was made to him to induce him to turn papist, and every sympathy to be excited by a numerous family was appealed to. On being impertuned to subscribe to certain articles, he promptly refuted them, and kept his fidelity. The priests were so highly offended at his answers, that they determined to try him by the most cruel method imaginable: they ordered one joint of his fingers to be cut off every day, till all his fingers were gone; they then proceeded in the same manner with his toes; afterwards, they alternately cut off a foot and a hand; but finding him unshaken, they stabbed him to the heart, and threw his body to the dogs.—Foz, p. 192.

RAMESES, or RAMSES; a city supposed to have been situated in the eastern part of Egypt, called the land of Goshen, which was also hence termed the land of Rameses. It was one of the cities built by the Israelites as a treasure-city, as it is translated in our Bibles; probably a store-city, or, as others interpret it, a fortress. Its position may be fixed about six or eight miles above the modern Cairo, a little to the south of the Babylon of the Persians, the ancient Letopolis; as Josephus says that the children of Israel, after quitting this place, in their first march to Succoth, passed by the latter city.—Watson.

RAMOTH; a famous city in the mountains of Gilead, 1 Kings 4: 13. It is often called Ramoth-Gilead. Josephus calls it Ramathan, or Aramatha. The city belonged to the tribe of Gad, Deut. 4: 43. Eusebius says that Ramoth was fifteen miles from Philadelphia towards the east. Jerome places it in the neighborhood of Jabbok, and consequently to the north of Philadelphia.—Watson.

RANSOM; a price paid to recover a person or thing from one who detains that person or thing in captivity. Hence prisoners of war, or slaves, are said to be ransomed, when they are liberated in exchange for a valuable consideration. Whatever is substituted or exchanged, in compensation for the party, is his ransom; but the word ransom is more extensively taken in Scripture. A man is said to ransom his life, (Exod. 21: 30.) to substitute a sum of money instead of his life; (chap. 30: 12. Job 36: 18. Ps. 49: 7.) and some kinds of sacrifices might be regarded as ransoms, that is, as substitutes for the offerer. In like manner Christ is said to give himself a ransom for all; (1 Tim. 2: 6. Matt. 20: 28. Mark 10: 45.) a substitute for them, bearing sufferings in their stead, undergoing that penalty which would otherwise attach to them. See Rom. 3: 24. 7: 23. 1 Cor. 1: 30. Eph. 1: 7. 4: 30. Heb. 9: 15. COMP. REDEEMER.—Calmet.

RANTERS; 1. A sect which sprang up in 1645, and advocated the light of nature under the name of Christ within. Their sentiments corresponded in a great measure with those of the SEEKERS, which see. 2. A recent separation from the Wesleyan Methodists. (See METHODISTS.)—Hend. Buck.

RAPHAEL, or RAFFAELLE, the most perfect of painters, whose real name was Sanzio, was born, in 1483, at Urbino, and was the son of a painter, who, conscious of his own inferiority of genius, placed him under the tuition of Perugino. The principles of coloring and chiaro oscuro he obtained from Fra Bartolomeo, and he improved his original style by studying the works of da Vinci and Michael Angelo. When he was only twenty-five, he was invited to Rome by Julius II. to embellish the Vatican. The three apartments of that edifice, which he adorned by his pencil, occupied him during nine years, and contain some of his finest productions: the School of Athens is among the number. The Cartoons, and the Transfiguration of Christ, the most splendid masterpiece of modern art, were among the last of his labors. Raphael was also an architect; succeeded his uncle Bramante as superintendent of the works of St. Peter's; and designed several splendid edifices. Sculpture and poetry likewise shared his attention. The character of this great man is represented as most estimable and lovely. His diligence was incredible, whether we consider the amount he executed, or the continual improvement of his style, which unites the utmost strength and dignity of character, with unexampled variety and vivacity of expression. He died April 7, 1520, at the early age of thirty-seven. "General opinion," says M. Fuseli, "has placed Raffaele at the head of his art; not because he possessed a decided superiority over every other painter in every branch, but because no other artist ever united with his own peculiar excellence all the other parts of the art in an equal degree with him."—Davenport.

RAPIN-THOYRAS, (PAUL DE,) a French historian, was born, in 1661, at Castres; quitted France on the revocation of the edict of Nantes; served as an officer in the Dutch army, accompanied William of Nassau to England, and was present at the battle of the Boyne, and the siege of Limerick; became tutor to the son of the earl of Portland; and died, in 1725, at Wesel. His great work is The History of England, which was long in repute, and was the only complete narrative of English events.—Davenport.

RASHNESS, consists in undertaking an action, or pronouncing an opinion, without a due examination of the grounds, motives, or arguments, that ought first to be weighed. (See JUDGING, RASH.)—Hend. Buck.

RASKOLRIKS; schismatics; a term of reproach given to all who secede from the Greek church in Russia. They are very numerous, amounting to between two and three millions, and are daily on the increase.—Hend. Buck.

RATIONALISM; the system which would reduce all the truths and dictates of religion to the standard of human reason. Its advocates, called rationalists, maintain, in general, that mankind are led by their reason, and especially by the natural powers of their mind, and by the observation of nature, by which they are surrounded, to a true knowledge of things relating to the Deity, human happiness, &c.; and that reason possesses the supreme authority, and highest right of decision in matters of faith and morality. The term seems first to have been used by Amos Comenius, in the year 1661, and has been, and still is, applied to the German neologians, who have acquired to themselves such a fearful pre-eminence by their opposition to the peculiarities of the revealed system. Rationalism differs but little from naturalism, and is often used as strictly synonymous with it. (See the articles NEOLOGY, and REASON.)—Hend. Buck.

RAVEN; a well-known bird of prey, unclean by the law, Lev. 11: 15. See Gen. 8: 6, 7, and 1 Kings 17: 5. (See ELIJAH.)

The blackness of the raven is proverbial: "His locks are bushy and black as a raven," Cant. 5: 11.—Calmet.

RAVISH; the taking away of any thing from any one by violence, Prov. 11: 24. Gen. 34: 2. 21: 21.—Calmet.

RAY, (JOHN,) a celebrated naturalist, the son of a blacksmith, was born, in 1628, at Black Notley, in Essex; was educated at Braintree school, and at Catharine hall and Trinity college, Cambridge; lost his fellowship in the latter college, by refusing to comply with the act of uniformity; travelled on the continent for three years with Mr. Willoughby and other friends; became a fellow of the Royal society; and died in 1705. His works are numerous and valuable. Among them are, Historia Plantarum; his Travels; The Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of Creation; Physico-Theological Discourses; and a Collection of English Proverbs.—Davenport.

RAY, (WILLIAM,) a poet, was born in Salisbury, Connecticut, December 9, 1771. He had but little education. After several ineffectual attempts to provide for his family, he sailed to the Mediterranean, in 1803, on board the frigate Philadelphia, which struck upon a rock near Tripoli, and fell into the hands of the Tripolitans. He was a slave for a year and a half, and his sufferings were great. In 1809, he settled in Essex county, New York; but was unsuccessful in trade. In the war of 1812 he was a major in the detached militia. He afterwards lived in Onondaga; and died at Auburn, in 1827. His volume of poems was published in 1821. Among them are some of exquisite pathos and deep piety. Specimens of American Poets, vol. ii. p. 137.—Allen.

RAZOR. The Psalmist compares the tongue of Doeg (Ps. 52: 2.) to a sharp razor, starting aside from what should be its true operation, to a bloody purpose and effect.

In reference to Isa. 7: 20, "shaving by a razor that is hired," Mr. Taylor thinks it likely that there is an implication of contempt as well as suffering included in it, as the office of a barber ambulant has seldom been esteemed of any dignity, either in the East or in the West.—Cabinet.

READING OF THE SCRIPTURES. (See SCRIPTURES.)

READINGS, (VARIOUS;) instances in which a difference is found to exist in different manuscripts of the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures. Without the intervention of a miracle it was impossible that the sacred text should continue to be propagated, without suffering, in a greater or less degree, the fate of all other written documents. And that no such intervention has taken place is evident, from the fact that no two manuscripts, either of the Hebrew Bible or the Greek New Testament, are found in every respect to agree. The inspired autographs having long since been lost, it is impossible to point out any manuscript, and affirm that it contains the ipsissima verba (the very words) of the prophets or apostles. Even the best copies are found, in many instances, to exhibit readings which must, on every just principle of criticism, give place to readings contained in inferior copies.

When we speak of a various reading, we do not usually mean a reading which differs from the originally inspired text, but one which differs from the received text, textus receptus; i. e. Vander Hooght's Hebrew Bible, published at Amsterdam in 1705, and the Elzevir Greek Testament, printed at Leyden in 1624. The text of these editions, having, from the beauty of their typographical execution, obtained an extensive circulation, and become the basis of subsequent editions, were most conveniently appealed to on critical questions; and when critical editions were published, this text was exhibited in full, without any alteration, and the varieties of reading were added in the margin. The result of a nice and accurate collation of these readings has shown that there are, among them, many which possess a higher claim to reception than those which occupy their place in the text; but by far the greater number are, as far as evidence yet goes, not likely ever to supplant the textual readings. Though the number of variae lectiones (various readings) is immense, amounting to several hundred thousands, comparatively few are of any importance to the sense of the passages in which they occur. The very worst manuscript that is known to exist contains every doctrine of faith, every precept of morality, and every essential fact and circumstance of history that is to be found in the best. The variations are more in letters than in words; and even where the words differ, it is more in sound than in sense.

The fact that various readings did exist in the copies of the sacred text, created, when first disclosed, no small alarm among those who had paid but little attention to subjects of criticism; but it is now clearly perceived that these readings, multiplied as they have since been beyond comparison, so far from invalidating the authority, or detracting from the integrity of the word of God, go rather to establish both, while they incontestably show, that, being written independently of each other, by persons separated by distance of time, remoteness of place, and difference of opinions, no collusion has taken place with a view to transmit certain particular tenets, as divinely sanctioned, to posterity.

The sources of various readings are various; but are chiefly the following: errors or mistakes in copies which have served as exemplars; negligence or mistake on the part of transcribers; critical emendations; and wilful corruptions. Of the last mentioned, however, very few instances can be proved: Eichhorn avers that only two are to be met with in all the Old Testament.

In judging of the merits of the different readings, recourse must be had to the testimony of manuscripts, the ancient versions, the quotations found in ancient Jewish and Christian writers, the usus loquendi, the exigency of the passages, &c.—Hend. Buck.

REALISTS; the name of a sect of school philosophers formed in opposition to the Nominalists. The former believed that universals are realities, and have an actual existence out of the mind; while the latter contended that they exist only in the mind, and are only ideas.—Hend. Buck.

RE-ANOINTERS; a sect in Russia, which sprang up about the year 1770. They do not rebaptize those who join them from the Greek church, but insist on the necessity of their having the mystery of the chrism again administered to them. They are very numerous in Moscow.—Hend. Buck.

REAPING, is such a natural employment in agriculture, that it almost glides of itself into a metaphorical action, at once expressive, and easily understood. To cut down corn, to gather fruits, when come to maturity; to receive the natural effects, or consequences, or rewards, of good or bad actions, have many points of similitude, which are readily comprehended by all, and furnish frequent allusions in Scripture. (See HARVEST).—Calmat.

REASON, is that intellectual power by which we apprehend and discover truth, whether contained in first principles of belief, or in the arguments and conclusions from those principles, by which truth not intuitive is investigated.

Use of Reason in Religion.—The sublime, incomprehensible nature of some of the Christian doctrines, has so completely subdued the understanding of many pious men, as to make them think it presumptuous to apply reason in any way to the revelations of God; and the many instances in which the simplicity of truth has been corrupted by an alliance with philosophy, confirm them in the belief that it is safer, as well as more respectful, to resign their minds to devout impressions, than to exercise their understandings in any speculations upon sacred subjects. Enthusiasts and fanatics of all different names and sects agree in decrying the use of reason, because it is the very essence of fanaticism to substitute, in place of the sober deductions of reason, the extravagant fancies of a disordered imagination, and to consider these fancies as the immediate illumination of the Spirit of God.

Insidious writers in the deistical controversy have pretended to adopt those sentiments of humility and reverence, which are inseparable from true Christians, and even that total subjection of reason to faith which characterizes enthusiasts. A pamphlet was published about the middle of the last century that made a noise in its day, although it is now forgotten, "Christianity not founded on Argument," which, while to a careless reader it may seem to magnify the gospel, does in reality tend to undermine our faith, by separating it from a rational assent; and Mr. Hume, in the spirit of this pamphlet, concludes his Essay on Miracles by calling those dangerous friends or disguised enemies to the Christian religion who have undertaken to defend it by the principles of human reason: "Our most holy religion," he says, with a disingenuity very unbecoming his respectable talents, "is founded on faith, not on reason;" and, "mere reason is insufficient to convince us of its verity." The church of Rome, in order to subject the minds of her votaries to her authority, has reprobated the use of reason in matters of religion. She has revived an ancient position, that things may be true in theology which are false in philosophy; and she has, in some instances, made the merit of faith to consist in the absurdity of that which was believed. (See PROTESTANTS.)

The extravagance of these positions has produced, since the Reformation, an opposite extreme. While those who deny the truth of revelation consider reason as in all respects a sufficient guide, the Socinians, who admit that a revelation has been made, employ reason as the supreme judge of its doctrines, and boldly strike out of their creed every article that is not altogether conformable to those notions which may be derived from the exercise of reason. (See RATIONALISM, and NEOLOGY.)

These controversies concerning the use of reason in matters of religion are disputes, not about words, but about the essence of Christianity. But a few plain observations are sufficient to ascertain where the truth lies in this subject.

1. The first use of reason in matters of religion is to examine the evidences of revelation. For, the more entire the submission which we consider as due to every thing that is revealed, we have the more need to be satisfied that any system which professes to be a divine revelation does really come from God.

2. After the exercise of reason has established in our minds a firm belief that Christianity is of divine original, the second use of reason is to learn what are the truths revealed. This is to be done by applying the established laws of interpretation to the sacred writings. As these truths are not in our days communicated to any by immediate inspiration, the knowledge of them is to be acquired only from books transmitted to us with satisfying evidence that they were written above seventeen hundred years ago, in a remote country and foreign language, under the direction of the Spirit of God. In order to attain the meaning of these books we must study the language in which they were written; and we must study also the manners of the times, and the state of the countries, in which the writers lived; because these are circumstances to which an original author is often alluding, and by which his phraseology is generally affected; we must lay together different passages in which the same word or phrase occurs, because without this labor we cannot ascertain its precise signification; and we must mark the difference of style and manner which characterizes different writers, because a right apprehension of their meaning often depends upon attention to this difference. All this supposes the application of grammar, history, geography, chronology, and criticism, in matters of religion; that is, it supposes that the reason of man had been previously exercised in pursuing these different branches of knowledge, and that our success in attaining the true sense of Scripture depends upon the diligence with which we avail ourselves of the progress that has been made in them. (See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.) It is obvious that every Christian is not in an equal degree capable of making this application. But this is no argument against the use of reason, of which we are now speaking; for they who use translations and commentaries rely only upon the reason of others, in cases where they cannot exercise their own. The several branches of knowledge have been applied in every age by some persons for the benefit of others; and the progress in sacred criticism, which distinguishes the present times, is nothing else but the continued application, in elucidating the Scripture, of reason enlightened by every kind of subsidiary knowledge, and very much improved in this kind of exercise by the employment which the ancient classics have given it since the revival of letters. (See also on this point, the article AFFECTIONS.)

3. After the two uses of reason that have been illustrated, a third comes to be mentioned, which may be considered as compounded of both. Reason is of eminent use in repelling the attacks of the adversaries of Christianity. When men of erudition, of philosophical acuteness, and of accomplished taste, direct their talents against our religion, the cause is very much hurt by an unskilful defender. He cannot unravel their sophistry; he does not see the amount and the effect of the concessions which he makes to them; he is bewildered by their quotations, and he is often led by their artifice upon dangerous ground. In all ages of the church there have been weak defenders of Christianity; and the only triumphs of the enemies of our religion have arisen from their being able to expose the defects of those methods of defending the truth which some of its advocates had unwarily chosen. A mind trained to accurate and philosophical views of the nature and the amount of evidence, enriched with historical knowledge, accustomed to throw out of a subject all that is minute and irrelative, to collect what is of importance within a short compass, and to form the comprehension of a whole, is the mind qualified to contend with the learning, the wit, and the sophistry of infidelity. Many such minds have appeared in this honorable controversy during the course of this and the last century; and the success has corresponded to the completeness of the furniture with which they engaged in the combat. The Christian doctrine has been vindicated by their masterly exposition from various misrepresentations; the arguments for its divine original have been placed in their true light; and the attempts to confound the miracles and prophecies upon which Christianity rests its claim, with the delusions of imposture, have been effectually repelled. Christianity has, in this way, received the most important advantages from the attacks of its enemies; and it is not improbable that its doctrines would never have been so thoroughly cleared from all the corruptions and subtleties which had attached to them in the progress of ages, nor the evidences of its truths been so accurately understood, nor its peculiar character been so perfectly discriminated, had not the zeal and abilities which have been employed against it called forth in its defence some of the most distinguished masters of reason. They brought into the service of Christianity the same weapons which had been drawn for her destruction, and, wielding them with confidence and skill in a good cause, became the successful champions of the truth.

4. The fourth use of reason consists in tracing the relations, harmony, beauty, glory, together with the practical application and use, of the truths of religion. If theology be considered as a science, just like any other series of truths connected as principles and conclusions, it must evidently be the work of reason to apprehend and connect them. Any other opinion would involve the monstrous proposition, that we may, agreeably to a rational nature, believe and act without a reason; a proposition, which does not offer greater violence to our constitution, than to the spirit of that religion which is not of fear, but of power, and love, and a sound mind. Every thing which is revealed by God comes to his creatures from so high an authority, that it may be rested in with perfect assurance as true. Nothing can be received by us as true which is contrary to reason, because it is impossible for us to perceive at the same time the truth and the falsehood of a proposition. But many things are true which we do not fully comprehend; and many propositions, which appear incredible when they are first enunciated, are found, upon examination, such as our understandings can readily admit.

These principles embrace the whole of the subject, and they mark out the steps by which reason is to proceed in judging of the truths of religion. We first examine the evidences of revelation. If these satisfy our understandings, we are certain that there can be no contradiction between the doctrines of this true religion and the dictates of right reason. If any such contradiction appear, there must be some mistake; by not making a proper use of our reason in the interpretation of the gospel, we suppose that it contains doctrines which it does not teach; or we give the name of right reason to some narrow prejudices, which deeper reflection, and more enlarged knowledge, will dissipate; or we consider a proposition as implying a contradiction, when, in truth, it is only imperfectly understood. Here, as in every other case, mistakes are to be corrected by measuring back our steps. We must examine closely and impartially the meaning of those passages which appear to contain the doctrine; we must compare them with one another; we must endeavor to derive light from the general phraseology of Scripture and the analogy of faith; and we shall generally be able, in this way, to separate the doctrine from all those adventitious circumstances which give it the appearance of absurdity. If a doctrine which, upon the closest examination, appears unquestionably to be taught in Scripture, still does not approve itself to our understanding, we must consider carefully what it is that prevents us from receiving it. There may be preconceived notions hastily taken up which that doctrine opposes; there may be pride of understanding that does not readily submit to the views which it communicates; or reason may need to be reminded, that we must expect to find in religion many things which we are not able to comprehend.

One of the most important offices of reason is to recognise her own limits. She never can be moved, by any authority, to receive as true what she perceives to be absurd. But, if she has formed a just estimate of human knowledge, she will not shelter her presumption in rejecting the truths of revelation under the pretence of contradictions that do not really exist; she will readily admit that there may be in a subject some points which she knows, and others of which she is ignorant; she will not allow her ignorance of the latter to shake the evidence of the former, but will yield a firm assent to that which she does not understand, without presuming to deny what is beyond her comprehension. And thus, availing herself of all the light which she now has, she will wait in humble hope for the time when a larger measure shall be imparted. REBEKAH; the wife of Isaac. (See ISAAC, ESAU, and JACOB.)

REBEL; to cast off lawful authority, or make war against a superior, Num. 16: 1, 2. 2 Sam. 15: 20. Men rebel against God when they contemn his authority, and do what he forbids, Num. 14: 9. They rebel against his Spirit when they resist his motions and slight his reproofs, Isa. 63: 10. They rebel against his word when they refuse to believe his promises, receive his offers, or obey his laws, Ps. 107: 11.—Brown.

RECEIPT OF CUSTOM. Matthew was a tax-gatherer, or, as we should say, a custom-house officer. The publicans had houses or booths built for them at the foot of bridges, at the mouth of rivers, by the sea-shore, and the parts of the lake of Gennesareth, or sea of Tiberias, to collect the taxes on passengers and merchandise. (See PUBLICAN.)—Watson.

RECEIVE. Christ receives power, wisdom, strength, honor, glory, and blessing, when they are heartily ascribed to him in his people's praise, Rev. 5: 11. To receive Christ is to believe the promise of the gospel, in which he is freely offered, as made of God to us, wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption, John 1: 12. To receive his word or law is to hear, consider, understand, believe, and love it, Prov. 2: 1. To receive Christ's ministers as such is to hear them as invested with his authority, and earnestly endeavor to believe and obey their instructions, Matt. 10: 40, 41. Hypocrites receive the word of God merely by a rational consideration of and assent to it, but not so as to have it impressed on their heart, Matt. 13: 20. Unregenerate men receive not the things of God; they have not the spiritual knowledge, love, or possession of them in their heart, 1 Cor. 2: 10.—Brown.

RECHABITES. The Rechabites, though they dwelt among the Israelites, did not belong to any of their tribes: for they were Kenites, as appears from 1 Chron. 2: 55, where the Kenites are said to have come of "Hemath, the father of the house of Rechab." These Kenites, afterwards called Rechabites, were of the family of Jethro, otherwise called Hobab, whose daughter Moses married; for "the children of the Kenite, Moses' father-in-law," it is said, "went up out of the city of palm-trees with the children of Judah, and dwelt among the people;" (Judges 1: 16.) and we read of "Heber the Kenite, who was of the children of Hobab, the father-in-law of Moses, who had severed himself from the Kenites," or from the bulk of them who settled in the tribe of Judah, "and pitched his tent in the plain of Zaanaim," Judges 4: 11. They appear to have sprung from Midian, the son of Abraham by Keturah; (Gen. 25: 2.) for Jethro, from whom they are descended, is called a Midianite, Num. 10: 23.

Of this family was Jehonadab, the son of Rechab, a man of eminent zeal for the pure worship of God against idolatry, who assisted king Jehu in destroying the honso of Ahab, and the worshippers of Baal, 2 Kings 10: 15, 16, 23, &c. It was he who gave that rule of life to his children and posterity which we read of in Jer. 35: 6, 7. It consisted of these three articles: that they should drink no wine; that they should neither possess nor occupy any houses, fields, or vineyards; that they should dwell in tents. This was the institution of the children of Rechab; and this they continued to observe for upwards of three hundred years, from the time of Jehu to that of Jehoiaquim, king of Judah, when Nebuchadnezzar coming to besiege Jerusalem, the Rechabites were obliged to leave the country and take refuge in the city. In Jer. 35. there is a promise made to this people, that Jonadab, the son of Rechab, should not want a man to stand before the Lord; that is, that his posterity should not fail: and to this day this tribe is found among the Arabians of the desert, distinct, free, and practising exactly the institutions of Jonadab, whose name they bear, and of whose institutions they boast. This is a remarkable instance of the exact fulfilment of a minute and isolated prophecy. (See BENI KHAIBIK.)—Watson.

RECLUSE; among the papists, a person shut up in a small cell of an hermitage, or monastery, and cut off not only from all conversation with the world, but even with the house. This is a kind of voluntary imprisonment, from a motive either of devotion or penance. (See MONASTERY.)—Watson.

RECONCILIATION. The expressions "reconciliation" and "making peace" necessarily suppose a previous state of hostility between God and man, which is reciprocal. This is called enmity, a term, as it respects God, rather unfortunate, since enmity is almost fixed in our language to signify a malignant and revengeful feeling. Of this, the opponents of the doctrine of the atonement have availed themselves to argue, that as there can be no such affection in the divine nature, therefore reconciliation in Scripture does not mean the reconciliation of God to man, but of man to God, whose enmity the example and reaching of Christ, they tell us, is very effectual to subdue. It is, indeed, a sad and humbling truth, and one which the Socinians in their discussions on the natural innocence of man are not willing to admit, that "the carnal mind is enmity to God," that corrupt human nature is malignantly hostile to God and to the control of his law; but this is far from expressing the whole of that relation of man, in which, in Scripture, he is said to be at enmity with God, and so to need a reconciliation, the making of peace between God and him. That relation is a legal one, as that of a sovereign in his judicial capacity, and a criminal who has violated his laws and risen up against his authority, and who is, therefore, treated as an enemy. The word echthros, enmity, is used in this passive sense, both in the Greek writers and in the New Testament. So, in Rom. 11: 28, the Jews, rejected and punished for refusing the gospel, are said by the apostle, "as concerning the gospel," to be "enemies for your sakes;" treated and accounted such; "but, as touching the election, they are beloved for the fathers' sakes." In the same epistle, 5: 10, the term is used precisely in the same sense, and that with reference to the reconciliation by Christ:—"For if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son;" that is, when we were objects of the divine judicial displeasure, accounted as enemies, and liable to be capitally treated as such. Enmity, in the sense of malignity and the sentiment of hatred, is added to this relation in the case of man; but it is no part of the relation itself; it is rather a cause of it, as it is one of the acts of his corrupt nature which renders man obnoxious to the displeasure of God, and the penalty of his law, and places him in the condition of an enemy. It is this judicial variance and opposition between God and man, which is referred to in the term reconciliation, and in the phrase "making peace," in the New Testament; and the hostility is, therefore, in its own nature, mutual.

But that there is no truth in the notion, that reconciliation means no more than our laying aside our enmity to God, may also be shown from several express passages. The first is the passage we have above cited: "For if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God," &c., Rom. 5: 10. Here the act of reconciling is ascribed to the death of the Son of God, and not to us; but if this reconciliation consisted simply in the laying aside of our own enmity, the act would be ours alone.

"God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them," 2 Cor. 5: 19. Here the manner of this reconciliation is expressly said to be, not simply our laying aside our enmity, but the non-imputation of our trespasses to us by God; in other words, the pardoning of our offences and restoring us to favor through a Mediator. "For he hath made him to be sin," a sin-offering, "for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him."

"And that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby," Eph. 2: 16. Here the act of reconciling is attributed to Christ. Man is not spoken of as reconciling himself to God; but Christ is said to reconcile Jews and Gentiles together, and both to God, "by his cross." Thus, says the apostle, "he is our peace;" but in what manner is the peace effected? Not, in the first instance, by subduing the enmity of man's heart, but by removing the enmity of "the law." "Having abolished in" or by "his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments." The feeble criticism of Socinus on this passage, in which he has been followed by his adherents to this day, is thus answered by Gratius: "In this passage the dative Theō, to God, can only be governed by the verb apokatallaxe, that he might reconcile; for the interpretation of Socinus, which makes to God stand by itself, or that to reconcile to God is to reconcile them among themselves, that they might serve God, is distorted and without example. Nor is the argument valid which is drawn from thence, that in this place St. Paul properly treats of the peace made between Jews and Gentiles; for neither does it follow, from this argument, that it was beside his purpose to mention the peace made for each with God. For the two opposites which are joined, are so joined among themselves, that they should be primarily and chiefly joined by that bond; for they are not united among themselves, except by and for that bond. Gentiles and Jews, therefore, are made friends among themselves by friendship with God."

Here also a critical remark will be appropriate. The above passages will show how falsely it has been asserted that God is nowhere in Scripture said to be reconciled to us, and that they only declare that we are reconciled to God; but the fact is, that the very phrase of our being reconciled to God imports the turning away of his wrath from us. When the Philistines suspected that David would appease the anger of Saul, by becoming their adversary, they said, "Wherewith should he reconcile himself to his master? Should it not be with the heads of these men?" not, surely, How shall he remove his own anger against his master? but, How shall he remove his master's anger against him? How shall he restore himself to his master's favor? "If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother had aught against thee," not, that thou hast aught against thy brother, "first be reconciled to thy brother;" that is, appease and conciliate him; so that the words, in fact, import, "See that thy brother be reconciled to thee," since that which goes before is, not that he hath done thee an injury, but thou him. Thus, then, for us to be reconciled to God is to avail ourselves of the means by which the just anger of God toward us is to be appeased, which the New Testament expressly declares to be meritoriously "the sin-offering" of Him "who knew no sin," and instrumentally, as to each individual personally, "faith in his blood." RECTITUDE, or UPRIGHTNESS, is the choosing and pursuing those things which the mind, upon due inquiry and attention, clearly perceives to be fit and good, and avoiding those that are evil. God's law is the standard of moral rectitude.—Hend. Buck.

RECTOR; a term applied to several persons whose offices are very different; as, 1. The rector of a parish is a clergyman that has the charge and care of a parish, and possesses all the tithes, &c. 2. The same name is also given to the chief elective officer in several foreign universities, and also to the head master of large schools. 3. Rector is also used in several convents for the superior officer who governs the house. The Jesuits gave this name to the superiors of such of their houses as were either seminaries or colleges.—Hend. Buck.

RECUSANTS; such persons as acknowledge the pope to be the supreme head of the church, and refuse to acknowledge the king's supremacy; who are hence called popish recusants.—Hend. Buck.

REDEEMER. The Hebrew goel is thus rendered, and the title is applied to Christ, as he is the Avenger of man upon his spiritual enemy, and delivers man from death and the power of the grave, which the human avenger could not do. The right of the institution of goel was only in a relative, one of the same blood; and hence our Savior's assumption of our nature is alluded to and implied under this term. There was also the right of buying back the family inheritance when alienated; (Lev. 25: 25—48. Ruth 2: 20. 3: 9.) and this also applies to Christ, our Goel, who has purchased back the heavenly inheritance into the human family. Under these views Job joyfully exclaims, "I know that my Goel, my Redeemer, liveth;" &c. (See GOEL, MEDIATOR, and JESUS CHRIST.)—Watson.

REDEMPTION. This word, says Dr. Gill, is from the Latin tongue, and signifies buying again; and several words, in the Greek language of the New Testament, are used in the affair of our redemption, which signify the obtaining of something by paying a proper price for it; sometimes the simple verb agorazo, to buy, is used; so the redeemed are said to be bought unto God by the blood of Christ, and to be bought from the earth, and to be bought from among men, and to be bought with a price; that is, with the price of Christ's blood, 1 Cor. 6: 20. Hence the church of God is said to be purchased with it, Acts 20: 28. Sometimes the compound word exagorazo is used; which signifies to buy again, or out of the hands of another, as the redeemed are bought out of the hands of justice, as in Gal. 3: 13, and 4: 5. In other places, lutroō is used, or other words derived from it, which signifies the deliverance of a slave or captive from thralldom, by paying a ransom price for him; so the saints are said to be redeemed not with silver or gold, the usual price paid for a ransom, but with a far greater one, the blood and life of Christ, which he came into this world to give as a ransom price for many, and even himself, which is antilutron, an answerable, adequate, and full price for them, 1 Pet. 1: 18.

The evils from which we are redeemed or delivered are the curse of the law, sin, Satan, the world, death, and hell. The moving cause of redemption is the love of God, John 3: 16. The procuring cause, Jesus Christ, 1 Pet. 1: 18, 19. The ends of redemption are, that the justice of God might be satisfied; his people reconciled, adopted, sanctified, and brought to glory. The properties of it are these: 1. It is agreeable to all the perfections of God. 2. What a creature never could merit, and therefore entirely of free grace. 3. It is special and particular. 4. Full and complete. And, lastly, 5. It is eternal as to its blessings.

Redemption, then, in New Testament usage, is that glorious deliverance from sin, secured by the propitiatory sacrifice of Christ for his church. The relation which atonement and redemption hold to each other, is that of cause and effect. Atonement is the ground of redemption. (See ATONEMENT.) Redemption is one of the results of atonement. The atonement has an inseparable relation to the law as its object, yielding it such honor "that God may be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus." Redemption has an inseparable relation to men as its object; and, therefore, in its very nature, is limited to the number for whom the price is paid, in whose behalf it is accepted, and on whom the blessing is actually bestowed. In other words, while the atonement is general, redemption is particular.

Calvinists in general, says Mr. Fuller, have considered the particularity of redemption as consisting not in the degree of Christ's sufferings, (as though he must have suffered more, if more had been finally saved,) or in any insufficiency that attended them, but in the sovereign purpose and design of the Father and the Son, whereby they were constituted or appointed the price of redemption; the objects of that redemption ascertained; and the ends to be answered by the whole transaction determined. They suppose the sufferings of Christ, in themselves considered, are of infinite value, sufficient to have saved all the world, and a thousand worlds, if it had pleased God to have constituted them the price of their redemption, and to have made them effectual to that end. Farther, whatever difficulties there may appear in these subjects, they in general suppose that there is in the death of Christ a sufficient ground for indefinite calls and invitations; and that there is no mockery or insincerity in the Holy One in any of these things. (See CALLING.)

The principal merits of this subject are involved in the two questions,—1. Had our Lord Jesus Christ any absolute determination in his death to save any of the human race? 2. Supposing such a determination to exist concerning some which does not exist concerning others, is this consistent with indefinite calls and universal invitations?

If the affirmative of the first question be established; if it be shown that Christ had an absolute purpose of salvation in his death; the limited extent of that purpose must follow, for the plain reason that an absolute purpose must be effectual. If it extended to all mankind, all mankind would certainly be saved. Unless, therefore, we will maintain the final salvation of all mankind, we must either suppose a limitation to the absolute determination of Christ to save, or deny any such determination to exist.

The affirmative of the first question is shown from the following considerations: 1. The promises made to Christ of the certain efficacy of his death, Ps. 110: 3. Isa. 53: 10—12, &c. 2. The character under which Christ died. Christ laid down his life as a shepherd, John 10: 11, 15, 16. Heb. 13: 20. Christ also laid down his life as a husband, as a surety, and as a sacrifice of atonement; (John 16: 9, 19.) all these characters implying limitation as to number. 3. From the effects ascribed to the death of Christ, being such as do not terminate upon all mankind. 4. Christ is said to have borne the sin of many, (the term many being in Scripture used to express an unlimited number only when opposed to one, or to few; but when no such opposition exists it is always used for a limited number, and generally stands opposed to all.) 5. The intercession of Christ, which is founded upon his death, and expressive of its grand design, extends not to all mankind, John 6: 37. 17: 20. 6. If the doctrine of eternal, personal, gratuitous election be a truth, that of a special design in the death of Christ must necessarily follow. 7. The character of the redeemed in the world above implies a special design in the death of Christ. These are some of the reasons in favor of the doctrine that there was a certain, absolute, and consequently limited design in the death of Christ, securing the salvation of all those and only those who are finally saved.

With regard to the consistency of the limited extent of Christ's redemption with universal calls and invitations, we may remark, it is a subject upon which a curious mind may start many questions which it would be difficult, and perhaps impossible, to solve. That there is a consistency between the divine decrees and the free agency of man, we are bound to believe; but whether we can account for it is another thing. Both are distinctly revealed, and we must believe them. (See ATONEMENT.)

The same difficulty which presents itself to the mind respecting the consistency of a belief in particular redemption, and a belief that there is in the death of Christ a sufficient ground for indefinite calls and universal invitations, attends us, in our present state, respecting almost all the works of God. For example, 1. The time of man's life is appointed of God; 2. Our portion in this life is represented as coming under the divine appointment; (Acts 17: 26. Ps. 31: 15. 47: 4.) 3. Events which imply the evil actions of men come under divine appointment. It must be confessed that some of these things may look like contradictions of the doctrine of free agency. They are doubtless profound subjects; and perhaps, as some have expressed it, we shall never be fully able, in the present state, to explain the link that unites the appointments of God with the free agency of man; the fact, however, is abundantly revealed in Scripture; and it ought not to distress Christians if in this matter they have all their lives to "walk by faith, and not by sight." RED HEIFER. The particulars relative to this sacrifice, which was an eminent type of our Savior, (Heb. 9: 14.) will be found in Num. 19.

Spencer thinks, that the ceremony was designed in opposition to the Egyptian superstitions. But Mr. Taylor remarks, that though the Apis of Egypt was black, yet the Apis of India is "red-colored;" and consequently, the Hebrew red heifer could not be in opposition to this: which is the original of the Egyptian superstition. The virtue of purifying from defilement did not reside in the abundance of water with which the person previously washed himself; but in the ashes of the heifer, however small their quantity, with which he was sprinkled, (Heb. 9: 10, 13, 14.)

As no heifer can be burnt under the present condition of the Jews, it follows, that they cannot, on their own legal principles, be fully purified from the defilement communicated by the dead: they wash their clothes, the furniture of their apartments, their rooms, &c., but the ashes of the sacrifice are still wanting for the purification of their persons.—Calmet.

REDMAN, (JOHN, M. D.) first president of the college of physicians of Philadelphia, was born in that city, February 27, 1722. After finishing his preparatory education in Mr. Tennent's academy, he entered upon the study of physic with John Kearsley, then one of the most respectable physicians of Philadelphia. When he commenced the practice of his profession he went to Bermuda, where he continued for several years. Thence he proceeded to Europe, for the purpose of perfecting his acquaintance with medicine. He lived one year in Edinburgh; he attended lectures, dissections, and the hospitals in Paris; he was graduated at Leyden, in July, 1748, and after passing some time at Grey's hospital he returned to America, and settled in his native city, where he soon gained great and deserved celebrity. In the evening of his life he withdrew from the labors of his profession; but it was only to engage in business of another kind. In the year 1784, he was elected an elder of the second Presbyterian church; and the benevolent duties of this office employed him and gave him delight. He himself died of the apoplexy, March 19, 1808, aged eighty-six.

He was remarkably attached to all the members of his family. At the funeral of his brother, Joseph R., in 1779, after the company were assembled he rose from his seat, and, grasping the lifeless hand of his brother, said, "I declare in the presence of God and of this company, that in the whole course of our lives no angry word nor look has ever passed between this dear brother and me." He then knelt down by the side of his coffin, and implored the favor of God to his widow and children. He was an eminent Christian. He published an Inaugural Dissertation on Abortion, 1748, and a Defence of Inoculation, 1759.—Allen.

RED SEA; celebrated chiefly for the miraculous passage of the Israelites through its waters, Exod. 12: 37—39. Num. 11: 4. 33. 3.

The precise place of this passage has been contested. Some place it near Suez, at the head of the gulf; others, with more probability, about ten hours' journey lower down, at Clyma, or the vale of Bedea. The day before the passage, by the divine command, the Israelites encamped beside Pi-bahiroth, "between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon," Exod. 14: 2. Num. 33: 7. Pi-bahiroth signifies "the mouth of the ridge," or chain of mountains, which line the western coast of the Red sea, called Attaka, "deliverance," in which was a gap, which formed the extremity of the valley of Bedea, ending at the sea eastward, and running westwards to some distance, towards Cairo; Migdol, signifying "a tower," probably lay in that direction; and Baal-zephon, signifying "the northern Baal," was probably a temple on the opposite promontory, built on the eastern coast of the Red sea. And the modern names of places in the vicinity tend to confirm these expositions of the ancient. Beside Attaka, on the eastern coast opposite, is a headland, called Ras Musa, or "the cape of Moses;" somewhat lower, Haman Faraua, "Pharaoh's springs;" below Girondel, a reach of the gulf, called Birket Faraua; and the general name of the gulf is Bahr el Kotsuam, "the bay of Submersion." These names indicate that the passage was considerably below Suez, according to the tradition of the natives.

In the queries of Michaëlis, sent to Niebuhr, when in Egypt, it was proposed to him to inquire upon the spot, whether there were not some ridges of rocks where the water was shallow, so that an army at particular times may pass over; secondly, whether the Etesian winds, which blow strongly all summer from the north-west, could not blow so violently against the sea as to keep it back on a heap, so that the Israelites might have passed without a miracle. And a copy of these queries was left, also, for Bruce, to join his inquiries likewise; his observations on which are excellent:—"I must confess, however learned the gentlemen were who proposed these doubts, I did not think they merited any attention to solve them. This passage is told us by Scripture to be a miraculous one; and if so, we have nothing to do with natural causes. If we do not believe Moses, we need not believe the transaction at all, seeing that it is from his authority alone we derive it. If we believe in God, that he made the sea, we must believe he could divide it when he sees proper reason; and of that he must be the only judge. It is no greater miracle to divide the Red sea than to divide the river Jordan. If the Etesian wind, blowing from the north-west in summer, could keep up the sea as a wall on the right, or to the south, of fifty feet high, still the difficulty would remain of building the wall on the left hand, or to the north. Besides, water standing in that position for a day must have lost the nature of fluid. Whence came that cohesion of particles which hindered that wall to escape at the sides? This is as great a miracle as that of Moses. If the Etesian winds had done this once, they must have repeated it many a time before and since, from the same causes. Yet Diodorus Siculus says, the Troglodytes, the indigenous inhabitants of that very spot, had a tradition from father to son, from their very earliest ages, that 'once this division of the sea did happen there; and that, after leaving its bottom some time dry, the sea again came back, and covered it with great fury.' The words of this author are of the most remarkable kind: we cannot think this heathen is writing in favor of revelation: he knew not Moses, nor says a word about Pharaoh and his host; but records the miracle of the division of the sea in words nearly as strong as those of Moses, from the mouths of unbiassed, undesigned pagans."

Still, sceptical queries have their use; they lead to a stricter investigation of facts, and thereby tend strongly to confirm the veracity of the history they mean to impeach. Thus it appears, from the accurate observations of Niebuhr and Bruce, that there is no ledge of rocks running across the gulf anywhere, to afford a shallow passage. And the second query, about the Etesian or northerly wind, is refuted by the express mention of a strong easterly wind blowing across, and scooping out a dry passage; not that it was necessary for Omnipotence to employ it there as an instrument, any more than at Jordan; but it seems to be introduced in the sacred history by way of anticipation, to exclude the natural agency that might in after times be employed for solving the miracle; and it is remarkable that the monsoon in the Red sea blows the summer half of the year from the north, the winter half from the south, neither of which therefore, even if wind could be supposed to operate so violently upon the waters, could produce the miracle in question.

Wishing to diminish, though not to deny the miracle, Niebuhr adopts the opinion of those who contend for a higher passage, near Suez. "For," says he, "the miracle would be less if they crossed the sea there than near Bedea. But whosoever should suppose that the multitude of the Israelites could be able to cross it here without a prodigy would deceive himself; for, even in our days, no caravan passes that way to go from Cairo to mount Sinai, although it would considerably shorten the journey. The passage would have been naturally more difficult for the Israelites some thousands of years back, when the gulf was probably larger, deeper, and more extended towards the north; for, in all appearance, the water has retired, and the ground near this end has been raised by the sands of the neighboring desert." But it sufficiently appears, even from Niebuhr's own statement, that the passage of the Israelites could not have been taken near Suez; for, 1. He evidently confounded the town of Kolsum, the ruins of which he places near Suez, and where he supposed the passage to be made, with the bay of Kolsum, which began about forty-five miles lower down; as Bryant has satisfactorily proved, from the astronomical observations of Ptolemy and of Ulug Beigh, made at Heroum, the ancient head of the gulf. 2. Instead of crossing the sea at or near Ethan, their second station, the Israelites turned southwards, along the western shore; and their third station, at Pi-hahiroth, or Bedea, was at least a full day's journey below Ethan, as Bryant has satisfactorily proved from Scripture, Exod. 14: 2. And it was this unexpected change in the direction of their march, and the apparently disadvantageous situation in which they were then placed, entangled in the land, and shut in by the wilderness, with a deep sea in front, the mountains of Attaka on the sides, and the enemy in their rear, that tempted the Egyptians to pursue them through the valley of Bedea, by the direct route from Cairo, who overtook them, encamping by the sea, beside Pi-hahiroth, opposite to Baal-zephon, Exod. 14: 2-9.

Besides, 3. The particulars of this transaction demonstrate, that neither the host of the Israelites, nor the host of Pharaoh, could possibly have passed at the head of the gulf near Suez; where the sea was only half a league broad, and consequently too narrow to contain the whole host of Pharaoh at once; whose six hundred chariots alone, exclusive of his cavalry and infantry, must have occupied more ground.

Manetho, and the Egyptian writers, have passed over in silence this tremendous visitation of their nation. An ancient writer, however, Artapanus, who wrote a history of the Jews, about B. C. 150, has preserved the following curious Egyptian traditions:—"The Memphites relate, that Moses, being well acquainted with the country, watched the influx of the tide, and made the multitude pass through the dry bed of the sea. But the Heliopolitans relate, that the king, with a great army, accompanied by the sacred animals, pursued after the Jews, who had carried off with them the substance of the Egyptians; and that Moses, having been directed by a divine voice to strike the sea with his rod, when he heard it, touched the water with his rod; and so the fluid divided, and the host passed over through a dry way. But when the Egyptians entered along with them, and pursued them, it is said, that fire flashed against them in front, and the sea, returning back, overwhelmed the passage. Thus the Egyptians perished, both by the fire, and by the reflux of the tide." Comp. Ps. 77: 16, 17. 18: 13-15.

The Red sea derived its name from Edom, signifying "red," a title of Esau, to whom the bordering country of Edom, or Idumea, belonged, Gen. 25: 30. 36: 31-40. It was also called Yam Suph, "the weedy sea," in several passages, (Num. 33: 10. Ps. 106: 9, &c.) which are improperly rendered "the Red sea." Some learned authors have supposed that it was so named from the quantity of weeds in it. "But in contradiction to this," says Bruce, "I must confess, that I never in my life, and I have seen the whole extent of it, saw a weed of any sort in it. And indeed, upon the slightest consideration, it will appear to any one, that a narrow gulf, under the immediate influence of monsoons, blowing from contrary points six months each year, would have too much agitation to produce such vegetables, seldom found but in stagnant water, and seldom, if ever, found in salt ones. My opinion then is, that it is from the large trees, or plants, of white coral, perfectly in imitation of plants on land, that the sea has taken the name 'weedy.'" I saw one of these, which, from a root nearly central, threw out ramifications in a nearly central form, measuring twenty-six feet diameter every way." This seems to be the most probable solution that has been hitherto proposed of the name. The tides in this sea are but moderate. At Suez the difference between high and low water did not exceed from three to four feet, according to Niebuhr's observations on the tides in that gulf, during the years 1762 and 1763. Robinson's Bib. Repos., 1832.—Watson.

REED; (agaman, Job 40: 21. 41: 2, 20. Isa. 9: 14. 19: 15. 58: 5; kalamos, Matt. 11: 7.) a plant growing in fenny and watery places; very weak and slender, and bending with the least breath of wind, Matt. 11: 7. Luke 7: 24. Thus it is threatened, "The Lord shall smite Israel as a reed is shaken in the water, and he shall root up Israel out of the good land which he gave to their fathers, and shall scatter them beyond the river, because they have made their idol groves, provoking him to anger;" 1 Kings 14: 15. The slenderness and fragility of the reed is mentioned in 2 Kings 18: 21. Isa. 36: 6; and is referred to in Matt. 12: 20, where the remark, illustrating the gentleness of our Savior, is quoted from the prophecy of Isa. 42: 3. The Hebrew word in these places is queneh, as also in Job 40: 21. Isa. 19: 6. 35: 7. Ezek. 29: 6. (See CANE).—Watson.

REES, (ABRAHAM, LL. D.), a dissenting divine and author, was born, in 1743, in North Wales; was educated at the dissenting establishment, Hoxton, of which he became the mathematical tutor; was appointed theological professor at Hackney college; officiated more than forty years as minister of the congregation in the Old Jewry; was a fellow of the Royal Society, and of other institutions; and died June 9, 1825. He wrote Sermons; and contributed to the Monthly Review; but is best known as the editor of the enlarged edition of Chambers' Cyclopædia; and of the still more extensive Cyclopædia, in forty-four volumes.—Davenport.

REFINE; to purge, as founders do metal from dross, or as vintners do wine from dregs, 1 Chron. 28: 18. Isa. 25: 6. Christ is a refiner and purifier; by his word, his blood, his Spirit, and by sanctified troubles, he purges out the dross of error, corruption, and scandalous persons, from the church, and the dross of sinful defilement from the heart and life of his people, Mal. 3: 2, 3. Isa. 48: 10. Zech. 13: 9. The word of the Lord is refined; there is no dross, error, wickedness, or vanity to be found therein, 2 Sam. 22: 31. Ps. 119: 140.—Brown.

REFORM; to bring into a new shape, course, or disposition. The Hebrews were reformed when they left their idolatries and other evil courses, and turned to the Lord, Lev. 26: 23. The gospel dispensation is called the reformation; the ceremonial ordinances, being fulfilled in Christ, were laid aside for more clear, easy, and spiritual ones; and multitudes of Jews and Gentiles were turned from the legal, superstitious, idolatrous, and other wicked courses, to the profession, faith, and obedience of a God in Christ, Heb. 9: 10.—Brown.

REFORMATION; usually spoken of the great reformation in Christendom begun by Luther, in 1517.

The sad apostasy of the Romish hierarchy, combined with the indecency and arrogance with which they trampled upon the rights of sovereigns, and upon the property and the comfort of all classes of men, had, for a considerable period, produced a general conviction, that a reformation of the church in its head and members, (to use the expression which was then prevalent,) was absolutely requisite: and some steps to accomplish this had been actually taken. The celebrated council of Constance, whilst, in its efforts to heal the schism which had so long grieved and scandalized the catholic world, it set aside the rival pontiffs who claimed to be the successors of St. Peter, laid down the important maxim, that a general council was superior to a pope, and that its decisions can restrain his power; and this doctrine, which might otherwise have appeared to arise out of the extraordinary circumstances under which it was declared, was fully confirmed by the council of Basil, which met several years after, and which decided the point upon grounds that might at all times be urged. The popes, indeed, remonstrated against this, but still they were compelled to lower their tone; and they were often reminded, even within the precincts of their own court, that the period was fast approaching when the fallacy of many of their pretensions would be ascertained and exposed. It had become common, before the election of a new pontiff, to frame certain articles of reformation, which the successful candidate was required to swear that he would carry into effect; and although the oath was uniformly disregarded or violated, the views which led to the imposition of it indicated the existence of a spirit which could not be eradicated, and which might, from events that could not be foreseen, and could not be controlled, acquire a vigor which no exertion of power could resist. Such, under the beneficent arrangement of Providence, was soon actually the case. (See LUTHER, &c.)

In the progress of the opposition made to some of the worst abuses of Rome, they who conducted that opposition were guided to the word of life; they studied it with avidity and with delight; and they found themselves furnished by it with sufficient armor for the mighty contest in which they were to engage. They discovered in the New Testament what Christianity really was; their representations of it were received with wonder, and read with avidity; the secession from the church of Rome became much more rapid and much more extensive than it had previously been, and all possibility of reconciliation with that church was done away. Of this the popes were fully aware; and as the only way of counteracting that which was to them so formidable, they attempted, by various devices, to fetter the press, to prevent the circulation of the Bible, and thus again to plunge the world into that intellectual darkness from which it had been happily delivered. The scheme was impracticable. The "Judices Expurgatorii," in which they pointed out the works that they condemned, and which they declared it to be heresy and pollution to peruse, increased the desire to become acquainted with them; and although some who indulged that curiosity suffered the punishment denounced by the inquisition against the enemies of papal superstition, there was an immense proportion which even spiritual tyranny could not reach; so that the light which had been kindled daily brightened, till it shone with unclouded lustre through many of the most powerful and the most refined nations of Europe.

It is worthy of careful observation, that the resistance which ultimately proved so successful, was first occasioned by practices that had been devised for establishing the monstrous despotism of the popes; that when it commenced it was directed against what was conceived to be an abuse of power, without the slightest suspicion being entertained that the power itself was unchristian; that the Reformers gradually advanced; every adjuvial inquiry to which they were conducted enlarging their views, and bringing them acquainted with fresh proofs of that daring usurpation to which men had long submitted, till at length the foundation upon which the whole system, venerated through ages, rested, was disclosed to them, and perceived to be a foundation of sand. The consequence was, that the supremacy of the pope was by multitudes abjured; that he was branded as Antichrist; that communion with the popish church was avoided as sinful; and that the form of ecclesiastical polity, the essential principle of which was the infallibility of the bishop of Rome, was forever renounced. The wonderful manner in which this signal revolution, so fraught with blessings to mankind, was accomplished, the various events which mark its history, and the characters and exertions of the men by whose agency it was effected, cannot be too often surveyed, or too deeply fixed in the memory. The whole, even with reference to the illumination of the human mind and the improvement of the social state of the world, is in a high degree interesting; and that interest is unspeakably increased by our discerning the most striking evidence of the gracious interposition of Providence, dissipating the cloud which obscured divine truth, and restoring to mankind that sacred treasure which is sufficient to make all who seriously examine it wise unto salvation. It does not, however, come within the compass of this work to give a minute history of the origin and progress of the Reformation, to trace the steps of Zuinglius and of Luther, and to detail the circumstances which advanced or retarded them in the glorious career upon which they had entered.

Much information however will be found on this subject in various articles of this work, especially in the lives of Luther and other reformers.

On the review of this great era, what reason have we to admire Infinite Wisdom, in making human events, apparently fortuitous, subservient to the spread of the gospel! What reason to adore that Divine Power which was here evidently manifested in opposition to all the powers of the world! What reason to praise that Goodness, which thus caused light and truth to break forth for the happiness and salvation of millions of the human race! But, above all, let us praise God that it pleased him to raise up, in the persons of the Reformers, men of a character equal to the crisis. They were men, says Dr. Wayland, who counted not their lives dear unto them when a moral change was to be effected. In despite of every thing appalling in the form of opposition, they studied, they argued, they preached, they wrote, they translated, they printed; they employed for the promotion of true religion all those means which the progress of society had placed within their power. They thus gave the impression of Christianity to the changes which were going forward.

But, if we mistake not, physical and intellectual changes, very similar to those which characterized the Reformation, are at this moment going forward among us. It remains for the men of the present generation to say, whether these changes shall receive a corresponding moral impression.

REFORMED CHURCH. (See CHURCH, REFORMED.)
REFORMED DUTCH CHURCH; more properly, DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES. This is the oldest body of Presbyterians in America; it descended immediately from the church of Holland; and for about a century from its commencement in this country, it hung in colonial dependence on the classis of Amsterdam, and the synod of North Holland, and was unable to ordain a minister, or perform any ecclesiastical function of the kind, without a reference to the parent country and mother church.

The origin of this church will lead us back to the earliest history of the city and state of New York; for they were first settled by this people, and by them a foundation was laid for the first churches of this persuasion, the most distinguished of which were planted at New York, (then called New Amsterdam,) Flushing, Esopus, and Albany. The church at New York was probably the oldest, and was founded at or before the year 1639. This is the earliest period to which its records conduct us.

The Dutch church was the established religion of the colony until it surrendered to the British, in 1664, after which, its circumstances were materially changed. Not long after the colony passed into the hands of the British, an act was passed, which went to establish the Episcopal church as the predominant party; and for almost a century after, the Dutch and English Presbyterians, and all others in the colony, were forced to contribute to the support of that church.

The first judicatory higher than a consistory among this people was a Cœtus, formed in 1747. The object and powers of this assembly were merely those of advice and fraternal intercourse.

It could not ordain ministers, nor judicially decide in ecclesiastical disputes, without the consent of the classis of Amsterdam.

The first regular classis among the Dutch was formed in 1757. But the foundation of this classis involved this infant church in the most unhappy collisions, which sometimes threatened its very existence. These disputes continued for many years, by which two parties were raised in the church, one of which was for, and the other against, an ecclesiastical subordination to the judicatories of the mother church and country. These disputes, in which eminent men on both sides were concerned, besides disturbing their own peace and enjoyment, procured unfavorable impressions among their brethren at home.

In 1776, John H. Livingston, D. D., then a young man, went from New York to Holland, to prosecute his studies in the Dutch universities. By his representations, a favorable disposition was produced towards the American church in that country; and on his return, in full convention of both parties, an amicable adjustment of their differences was made, and a friendly correspondence was opened with the church in Holland, which was continued until the revolution of the country under Bonaparte.

The Dutch church suffered much in the loss of its members, and in other respects, by persisting to maintain its service in the Dutch language after it had gone greatly into disuse. The solicitation for English preaching was long resisted, and Dr. Laidlie, a native of Scotland, was the first minister in the Dutch church in North America, who was expressly called to officiate in the English language.

The statistics of this denomination are, one hundred and sixty-seven ministers; one hundred and ninety-seven churches; twenty-one thousand one hundred and fifteen communicants; about thirty thousand families, and one hundred fifty thousand souls.

Rutger's college, in New Jersey, is under the direction of this denomination. It was established in 1770, and named after a distinguished benefactor. Rev. Philip Milledoler, D. D., is its president. The theological seminary of New Brunswick is also under the patronage of the Dutch church, and is connected with Rutger's college. The number of its students is twenty.

Most of the Dutch Presbyterians are in New York; the remainder are chiefly in New Jersey and Pennsylvania.—Benedict's History of all Religions; Am. Quar. Register, May, 1832; Feb. 1834.

REFORMED GERMAN CHURCH; more properly, GERMAN REFORMED CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES. As the Dutch Reformed church in this country is an exact counterpart of the church of Holland, so the German Reformed is of the Reformed or Calvinistic church of Germany. The people of this persuasion were among the early settlers of Pennsylvania; here their churches were first formed; but they are now to be found in nearly all the states south and west of the one above named. The German Reformed churches in this country remained in a scattered and neglected state until 1746, when the Rev. Michael Schlatter, who was sent from Europe for the purpose, collected them together, and put their concerns in a more prosperous train. They have since increased to a numerous body, and are assuming an important stand among the American Presbyterians.

Their present statistics are, one hundred and eighty ministers; six hundred churches; thirty thousand communicants; three hundred thousand population.—Benedict's Hist. of all Religions; Am. Quar. Reg., May, 1833, and Feb. 1834.

REFORMERS, or CAMPBELLITES. (See DISCIPLES OF CHRIST, and REGENERATION.)

REFRESH; (1.) To strengthen one by food, 1 Kings 13: 7. (2.) To take rest and recover strength after fatigue, Exod. 23: 12. (3.) To revive and comfort, 1 Cor. 16: 18. Men's spirits, souls, or bowels, are refreshed when they get new inward ease, strength, vigor, and comfort, Job 32: 20. 2 Cor. 7: 13. Prov. 25: 13. Philm. 7. The times of refreshing and of restitution spoken of Acts 3: 19—21, appear to be the season of religious revival and ultimate restoration of the Jews so often predicted by the prophets. It may however refer to the results of the last judgment, Acts 3: 19. (See REST.)—Brown.

REFUGES, CITIES OF. In the East, from time immemorial, the punishment of murder, or manslaughter, has been to a great extent a matter not of public justice, but of private, and often of precipitate, violent, and cruel revenge. (See AVENGER OF BLOOD.) No discrimination is made in the heat of the passions between intentional and involuntary homicide. To provide security therefore for those who should undesignedly kill a man, the Lord commanded Moses to appoint six cities of refuge, or asylums, that whoever should have thus spilt blood might retire thither, and have time to prepare his defence before the judges; and that the kinsmen of the deceased might not pursue and kill him, Exod. 21: 13. Num. 35: 11, &c. Of such cities there were three on each side Jordan.

The cities of refuge were to be of easy access; and every year, on the fifteenth of Adar, the magistrates inspected the roads, to see that they were in good condition, and that there were no impediments. At every division of the road was a direction-post, on which was written, Refuge, Refuge, for the guidance of him who was fleeing for security. They were to be well supplied with water and provisions. It was not allowed to make any weapons there, that the relations of the deceased might not procure arms to gratify their revenge. It was necessary, that whoever took refuge there should understand a trade, that he might not be chargeable. They used to send some prudent and moderate persons to meet those who were pursuing the culprit, in order to dispose them to clemency and forgiveness, and to await the decision of justice.

At the death of the high-priest, the refugee might quit the city in which he was. But though the manslayer had fled to the city of refuge, he was not exempt from the power of justice, Num. 35: 12. An information was lodged against him; and he was summoned before the judges and the people, to prove that the murder was truly casual and involuntary. If found innocent, he dwelt safely in the city to which he had retired; if otherwise, he was put to death, according to the law. Scripture is not very express, whether the affair came under the cognizance of the judges of the place where the murder was committed, or of the judges of the city of refuge, to which the murderer had fled. Comp. Deut. 19: 11, 12. Josh. 20: 4, 5, 6. Num. 35: 25. But it appears from the passage of Joshua, that the fugitive underwent two trials: first in the city of refuge, where the judges summarily examined the affair; secondly, in his own city, where the magistrates examined the cause more strictly. If the latter judges declared him innocent, they reconducted him under a guard to the city of refuge.

Those who are best acquainted with Eastern customs, will be best able to appreciate how mild, considerate, politic, and humane, was this Mosaic institution.—Cabinet.

REFUGEES; a term first applied to the French Protestants, who, by the revocation of the edict of Nantes, were constrained to flee from persecution, and take refuge in foreign countries. Since that time, however, it has been extended to all such as leave their country in times of distress. (See HUGUENOTS.)—Hend. Buck.

REGENERATION; a scriptural designation for the new birth; that work of the Holy Spirit by which we experience a change of heart, or receive a holy disposition.

It will be of advantage to notice the import of this term in other writers. It is compounded of pain, again, and genesis, generation, or origin. It is used by Greek writers to express the state of the earth in the spring, when the face and appearance of nature is renovated, and the vegetables, flowers, and fruits, are regenerated in the successors of those of the last year. So, by a strong metaphor, Cicero, writing to Atticus, expresses the state and dignity to which he was reappointed after his return from exile, by the term regeneration. Josephus also calls the rebuilding and restoration of Jerusalem, after the captivity, the regeneration of his country.

The fathers, by a literal interpretation of Paul's metaphorical language, (Tit. 3: 5.) unhappily employed the term regeneration to signify baptism; so that Phavorinus says expressly, referring to this place, the holy rite of baptism is called regeneration. It is so used by Justin Martyr, and other early Christians. But this is to confound the sign with the thing signified; an error, the consequences of which have been most deplorable in every succeeding age, as the history of all established churches, from Rome to England, will testify. Baptism was always thought to denote a resurrection, a transplantation, a change of manners, of society, of interests, and of cares, as those who are "risen with Christ," who are "alive from the dead," with whom "old things are passed away, and all things are become new," &c.; and when administered to believers, as in the primitive times, it actually did denote this. Still it was not the thing itself.

It is remarkable that the error of the fathers on this subject has been recently revived in this country by Mr. Alexander Campbell. (See DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.) Let those who adopt the error look seriously at the consequences.

Regeneration, then, is to be distinguished from baptism, which is an external rite, though some have confounded them together. Nor does it signify a mere reformation of the outward conduct. Nor is it a conversion from one sect or creed to another; or even from atheism. Nor are new faculties given in this change. Nor does it consist in new revelations, a succession of terrors or consolations, or any whisper as it were from God to the heart, concerning his secret love, choice, or purpose to save us.

The change in regeneration consists in the recovery of the moral image of God upon the heart; that is to say, so as to love him supremely and serve him ultimately as our highest end, and to delight in him superlatively as our chief good. The sum of the moral law is to love the Lord our God with all our heart, and soul, and strength, and mind. This is the duty of every rational creature; and in order to obey it perfectly, no part of our inward affection or actual service ought to be, at any time, or in the least degree, misapplied. Regeneration consists in the principle being implanted, obtaining the ascendancy, and habitually prevailing over its opposite. It may be remarked, that though the inspired writers use various terms and modes of speech in order to describe this change of mind, sometimes terming it conversion, regeneration, a new creation, or the new creature, putting off the old man with his deeds, and putting on the new man, walking not after the flesh, but after the spirit, &c., yet it is all effected by the word of truth, or the gospel of salvation, gaining an entrance into the mind, through divine teaching, so as to possess the understanding, subdue the will, and reign in the affections. In a word, it is faith working by love that constitutes the new creature, the regenerate man, Gal. 5: 6. 1 John 3: 1—5. It is expressed in Scripture by being born again; (John 3: 7.) born from above, so it may be rendered; (John 3: 2, 7, 27.) being quickened; (Eph. 2: 1.) Christ formed in the heart; (Gal. 4: 12.) a partaking of the divine nature, 2 Pet. 1: 4.

The efficient cause of regeneration is the Divine Spirit. That man is not the author of it is evident, if we consider, 1. The case in which men are before it takes place; a state of ignorance and inability, John 3: 4. 2. The nature of the work shows plainly that it is not in the power of men to do it: it is called a creation, the production of a new class of principles, which was not in the mind before, and which man could not himself produce, Eph. 2: 8, 10. 3. It is expressly denied to be of men, but declared to be of God, John 1: 12, 13. 1 John 3: 9. The instrumental cause, if it may be so called, or means, is the word of God, James 1: 18. 1 Cor. 4: 15.

The evidences of it are, conviction of sin, holy sorrow, deep humility, knowledge, faith, repentance, love, and devotedness to God's glory.

The properties of it are these:—1. It is a passive work, and herein it differs from conversion. In regeneration we are passive, and receive from God; in conversion we are active, and turn to him.—2. It is an effectual, or invincible work of God's grace, Eph. 3: 8.—3. It is an instantaneous work, for there can be no medium between life and death; and here it differs from sanctification, which is progressive.—4. It is a complete work, and perfect in its kind; a change of the whole man, 2 Cor. 5: 17.—5. It is a great and important work, both as to its author and effects, Eph. 2: 4, 5.—6. It is an internal work, not consisting in bare outward forms, Ezek. 36: 26, 27.—7. Visible as to its effects, 1 John 3: 14.—8. Delightful, 1 Pet. 1: 8.—9. Necessary, John 3: 3.—10. It is a work of grace, the blessings of which we can never finally lose, John 13: 1.

The Scripture account of men's hearts being by nature unclean; deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked; enmity against God; dead in trespasses and sins, renders it manifest that no good act can be performed by them without new habits or principles of grace implanted in them, Job 14: 4. Jer. 17: 9. Rom. 8: 7, 8. Eph. 2: 1, 2. Matt. 14: 19. 8: 16, 17. 12: 33—35. Neither the love, nor the wisdom, nor the sufficiency of Christ, can appear in our redemption, unless the remedy answer to the malady, and gracious habits be implanted instead of the natural habits of indwelling corruption, spiritual knowledge instead of ignorance, faith instead of an evil heart of unbelief, love instead of enmity, &c. Ezek. 10: 19. 36: 26. 1 Cor. 7: 11. Tit. 3: 3, 5. The Scripture never represents any virtuous acts of men as either their regeneration or the means of it, but always as the fruit of it. We see and know spiritual things, because we are born again, and have had eyes to see and ears to hear given us, Deut. 29: 4. 1 John 5: 20. John 3: 3. 1 Cor. 2: 14. We believe that Jesus is the Christ, and receive him by faith, because we are born of God, 1 John 5: 1. John 1: 12, 13. We love God and his people, because we are born of God, and know God, 1 John 4: 7. The sight-giving, quickening, heart-circumcising, renewing, begetting, and creating influence ascribed to God in this matter, at once represents us entirely passive in our regeneration; and that the power of God works not by mere moral suasion upon the rational soul, but by a supernatural and almighty influence, similar to that through which by a word he created the world, healed desperate diseases, or raised the dead; and that by this divine agency there is produced in us an abiding vital habit or principle of grace, disposing and enabling to acts of faith, love, &c. Acts 26: 18. 2 Cor. 4: 6. Deut. 29: 4. John 5: 25. Rom. 4: 17. Eph. 2: 1, 5. Ezek. 37: 1—14. Deut. 30: 6. Col. 2: 11, 12, with Gen. 1: 17, 10, 11. Tit. 3: 5. Eph. 4: 23. John 1: 13. 3: 3, 5, 6, 8. Jam. 1: 18. 1 Pet. 1: 3, 23. Eph. 2: 10. 4: 24. Col. 3: 10. The inspired representations of that which is produced by this supernatural and all-powerful agency of God, are remarkable: as a mind serving the law of God, a law of the mind that warreth; (Rom. 7: 23, 25.) as a copy of God's law in the heart, which Adam had in his creation; (Jer. 31: 33. 2 Cor. 3: 3.) as life, eternal life, abiding in one; (1 John 5: 12. 3: 14, 15.) a heart, a new heart, a pure heart, one heart, a heart to know and fear God, a heart of flesh; (Ezek. 19: 11, 19. 26: 6. 18: 31. Jer. 24: 7. 32: 39. Deut. 29: 4. 1 Tim. 1: 5. Heb. 10: 22.) a divine nature, God's workmanship created not in or by, but unto good works; (2 Pet. 1: 4. Eph. 2: 10.) the image of God, opposed to the image of the devil, which is in them by nature, and answerable in the substance of it to Adam's likeness to God, Eph. 4: 24. Col. 3: 10. 2 Cor. 3: 18. Gen. 1: 26, 27. A new creature, that has a real subsistence in us, and rendering us new in our qualities, and which is contrary to and exclusive of old sinful lusts, 2 Cor. 5: 17. Gal. 6: 15. Eph. 2: 10. 4: 24. Col. 3: 10. A new man, the reverse of the old man, which must be put off, and is crucified with Christ; (Bph. 4: 22, 24. Col. 3: 9, 10. Rom. 6: 6.) a new man, having eyes to see, ears to hear, and a heart to understand; (Deut. 39: 4.) an inward or inner man, which delights in God's law, and is renewed and strengthened day by day, Rom. 7: 22. 2 Cor. 4: 16. Eph. 3: 16. A spirit born of God's Spirit, a new spirit, put within one, and which lusteth against the flesh, or habits of sinful corruption, and directs and draws in a good walk, and produces gracious fruits of actual holiness, John 3: 5, 6. Ezek. 36: 26. 11: 19. Rom. 8: 4. Gal. 5: 17, 22. As fleshy tables of the heart, in which Christ's truths are written by the Holy Ghost, 2 Cor. 3: 3. An inward root, which produces good fruits, Matt. 7: 17, 18. 12: 33. 13: 6, 21. A good treasure of the heart, out of which good acts are brought forth; (Matt. 12: 35.) good ground of an honest and good heart, in which the seed of gospel truth is sown, Luke 8: 15. Matt. 13: 23. As incorruptible seed, distinct from and conveyed into the heart by the word of God; (1 Pet. 1: 23.) seed that abideth in every one born of God; (1 John 3: 9.) and which is manifest in an implanted habit of grace in every saint. This gracious habit or principle, under the different forms of knowledge, faith, love, hope, &c., is represented as obtained; (2 Pet. 1: 1.) had; (2 Thess. 3: 2.) kept; (2 Tim. 4: 7.) as abiding;

(Luke 22: 32. 1 Cor. 13: 8, 13.) dwelling; (2 Tim. 1: 5. Eph. 3: 17.) as working; (Gal. 5: 6, 22. Jam. 2: 22. 1 Cor. 13: 4, 8.) as increased; (2 Cor. 10: 15.) growing; (2 Pet. 3: 18.) all which descriptions manifest, that in every regenerate person there is divinely implanted, preserved, strengthened, and excited, a supernatural virtuous habit, or vital principle of holiness.

This implanted and inherent grace and holiness may either be viewed as one simple habit or principle, filling and disposing the whole soul to holy acts; or, in respect of the different powers of the soul in which it is sent and acts, and in respect of its different forms of acting on objects, it may be distinguished into the different habits or graces of knowledge, faith, love, hope, repentance, &c. But the thing is so important, that whoever denies this, overthrows the gospel, and all the work of the Spirit of God, the grace of Christ, and the new covenant. Without allowing this habitual grace, we must deny original sin, the sinful corruption of man's whole nature, and the spiritual extent and indispensable obligation of God's law, as a rule of life. We must deny all sanctification of our nature, all renovation of the whole man after the image of God, all experience and exercise truly virtuous or acceptable to God, all spiritual warfare between the flesh and spirit; all growth and perseverance of grace, and perfection therein at last; all marks of a gracious state, and examination of ourselves whether we be in the faith, or Christ be in us; all habitual, nay, actual preparation for the Lord's supper, or for death or heaven; and all meanness of nature or temper for the blessedness of heaven; and all admission to it, unless it be with hearts filled with all unrighteousness. In short, the whole experience and exercise of religion must be reduced to those of the stony-ground hearers; some kind of moral influence of the Holy Ghost by the word, and some rootless, chimerical, and transient acts of faith, love, or the like.

REGIUS, (URBANUS,) a divine, was born at Arga Lorega, in Germany. He received his education at Lindau, Friburg, Basil, and Ingolstadt, where he distinguished himself for diligence and success in study. He soon became eminent for his erudition, was made poet laureate and orator to the emperor Maximilian, and afterwards professor of oratory and poetry in the university of Ingolstadt. He subsequently applied himself to the study of divinity; and when the controversy was going on between Luther and Eckius, sided with the former. Great exertions were made to restore him to papacy, but they proved unsuccessful.

In 1530, he was prevailed upon by the duke of Brunswick to go to Lunenburg, in his dominions, to take charge of the church there. The prince soon became much attached to him, and made him chief pastor of all the churches in his dominions, with an ample salary for his support. The rest of his life was here spent in preaching, writing, and religious conferences. He finished his course with joy, A. D. 1541.

He is spoken of as a man of excellent understanding, of uncommon learning, upright in his life and conversation, and indefatigable in the labors of his sacred function.—Middleton's Evan. Biog., vol. i. p. 144.

REHOBOAM; the son and successor of Solomon, by Naamah, an Ammonitess, 1 Kings 14: 20, 21. He was forty-one years old when he began to reign; and was therefore born in the first year of his father's reign. He ascended the throne A. M. 3029, and reigned seventeen years at Jerusalem. He died A. M. 3046.

Rehoboam was buried in the city of David, and was succeeded by his son Abijah, who, speaking of his father, says, he was an ignorant prince, unskilled in the art of government, a weak man, and without courage, 2 Chron. 13: 7. Solomon seems to have had this son, his successor, before his eyes, in Eccl. 2: 15: 19.

The indiscretion of this prince caused ten of the tribes to revolt, and thus occasioned the founding of the kingdom of Israel. (See JEROBAM.)—Calmet.

REID, (THOMAS,) a celebrated Scotch divine and metaphysician, was born, in 1710, at Strachan, in Kincardineshire; was educated at Marischal college, Aberdeen; became minister of New Machar; was appointed one of the professors of philosophy at King's college, Aberdeen, in 1751; succeeded Adam Smith, in 1764, as professor of moral philosophy at Glasgow; and died in 1796. Dr. Reid was the first writer in Scotland who attacked the sceptical conclusions of Hume's philosophy, and labored to refute the ideal theory, which was then prevalent. His principal works are, An Inquiry into the Human Mind; Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man; and Essays on the Active Powers of Man.—Davenport.

REIGN; to rule or command as a king, 2 Sam. 5: 4, 5. The saints reign; they have a spiritual dominion over sin, Satan, and the corrupt influence of this world; and by their prayers have considerable influence in the management of it; and during the millennium, they shall possess the chief power in church and state, Rev. 5: 10. 20: 6. They reign in life spiritual, being more than conquerors, through him that loved them, of sin, Satan, and the world; and reign in life eternal when they are advanced to the highest glory, and have every thing to their wish, Rom. 5: 17. Sin reigns, and reigns unto death, when indwelling sin has the chief power in the heart, and when sin in general hastens forward, and condemns to death temporal, spiritual, and eternal, Rom. 6: 12. 5: 25. Grace reigns, and reigns to eternal life; through the finished and imputed righteousness of Jesus Christ, the free favor of God, in a glorious and irresistible manner, disposes of the elect and all their concerns so as to promote their eternal life: the gracious habits implanted in their souls conquer their inward corruptions, and prepare them for eternal life; nor can sin reign over them as before, Rom. 6: 14. 5: 21.—Bronn.

REINHARD, (FRANCIS VOLKMAR, S. T. D.,) a celebrated Protestant preacher, was born in the duchy of Sutzbach, in Germany, A. D. 1753. He was instructed by his father, who was a clergyman, until he was sixteen, when he was admitted into the gymnasium of Ratisbon, where he remained five years; and in 1773, he was removed to the university of Wittenberg. The study of sacred eloquence especially attracted his attention; and his reputation procured him, in 1782, the chair of theology, to which, in 1784, was added the offices of preacher at the university church and assessor of the consistory. In 1792, he was invited to Dresden, to become first preacher to the court of Saxony, ecclesiastical counsellor, and member of the supreme consistory. After filling these stations with high reputation for about twenty years, he died, September 6, 1812, in the sixtieth year of his age.

The character and works of Reinhard are of the first order. He was equally conspicuous as a scholar, philosopher, divine, pulpit orator, and Christian. Though evangelically educated by his father, he doubtless acquired in the progress of his studies some bias towards the rationalism which was then creeping into all the universities of Germany. (See RATIONALISM, and NEOLOGY.) But his religious sensibilities and profound reverence for the word of God as one only and sufficient rule of faith and practice, enabled him to withstand that popular tide of degeneracy which drifted so many of his contemporaries upon the rocks and quicksands of a baptized infidelity. (See NEOLOGY.) Convinced of the authenticity of the Scriptures, and of their consistency with themselves, he made no attempt to render reason co-ordinate with them, but viewed it as totally subordinate; as bound to recognise them as from God, and yield obedience to them as of divine authority. These views exposed him to much and severe opposition even among the followers of Luther; by some he was calumniated; by others, which was more afflictive to him, he was apologized for and defended.

His popularity as a preacher was unrivalled; and his sermons, of which thirty-nine volumes have been published, are said to be the best specimens of pulpit eloquence that Germany has furnished since the days of Luther. Besides this library of sermons, he gave to the public a brief System of Theology; a very valuable work on Christian Ethics, in five volumes; his Plan of the Founder of Christianity; his Confessions, consisting of letters on his sermons, and on his education as a preacher; and two volumes of minor pieces, on a variety of important topics in theology, philosophy, and sacred literature. See Spirit of the Pilgrims, vol. v. no. 5. p. 297; Memoirs and Confessions of F. V. Reinhard; and Ency. Amer.

REINS, or KIDNEYS. The Hebrews, regarding them in some measure as the secret seat or source of the mental affections, ascribe to the reins knowledge, joy, pain, pleasure; hence in Scripture it is so often said, that God searches the heart and the reins.—Calmet.

RELICS; in the Roman church, the remains of the bodies or clothes of saints or martyrs, and the instruments by which they were put to death, devoutly preserved in honor to their memory; kissed, revered, and carried in procession.

The honoring the relics of saints, on which the church of Rome afterwards founded her superstitious and lucrative use of them, as objects of devotion, as a kind of charms, or amulets, and as instruments of pretended miracles, appears to have originated in a very ancient custom that prevailed among Christians, of assembling at the cemeteries or burying-places of the martyrs, for the purpose of commemorating them, and of performing divine worship. When the profession of Christianity obtained the protection of civil government, under Constantine the Great, stately churches were erected over sepulchres, and their names and memories were treated with every possible token of affection and respect. This reverence, however, gradually exceeded all reasonable bounds; and those prayers and religious services were thought to have a peculiar sanctity and virtue which were performed over their tombs: hence the practice which afterwards obtained of depositing relics of saints and martyrs under the altars in all churches. This practice was then thought of such importance, that St. Ambrose would not consecrate a church because it had no relics; and the council of Constantinople in Trullo ordained, that those altars should be demolished under which were found no relics! Such was the rage for them at one time, that, as F. Mabillon, a Benedictine, justly complains, the altars were loaded with suspected relics: numerous spurious ones being everywhere offered to the piety and devotion of the faithful. He adds, too, that bones are often consecrated, which, so far from belonging to saints, probably do not belong to Christians. From the catacombs numerous relics have been taken, and yet it is not known who were the persons interred therein. In the eleventh century, relics were tried by fire, and those which did not consume were reckoned genuine, and the rest not. Relics were, and still are, preserved on the altars whereon mass is celebrated: a square hole being made in the middle of the altar big enough to receive the hand; and herein is the relic deposited, being first wrapped in red silk, and inclosed in a leaden box.

Besides the arguments from antiquity, to which the papists refer in vindication of their worship of relics, of which the reader may form some judgment from this article, Bellarmine appeals to Scripture in support of it! and cites the following passages; viz. Exod. 13: 19. Deut. 34: 6. 2 Kings 13: 21. 23: 16, 17, 18. Isa. 11: 10. Matt. 11: 20, 21, 22. Acts 5: 12, 15. 19: 11, 12.

The Roman Catholics in Great Britain do not acknowledge any worship to be due to relics, but merely a high veneration and respect, by which means they think they honor God, who, they say, has often wrought very extraordinary miracles by them!—Hend. Buck.

RELIEF SYNOD. The members of the Relief Synod are a species of dissenters in Scotland, who dissent from the establishment, that they may enjoy the liberty and privilege, which they maintain, of choosing their own ministers.

Mr. Gillespie, who may be considered as the founder of this sect, Mr. T. Boston, and Mr. Collier, together with some ordained elders, in 1752, constituted themselves into a presbytery at Colingsburgh, whose inhabitants were the first who formally applied to them for relief, hence called "the Presbytery of Relief;" being willing, say they, to afford relief from the rigorous execution of the act of patronage, to all "who adhered to the constitution of the church of Scotland, as exhibited in her creeds, canons, confessions, and forms of worship."

In regard to doctrines, worship, church government, and discipline, the members of the Relief kirk differ in little or nothing from the establishment.

There are at present upwards of eighty congregations in connexion with the synod. Of these thirty are large, and will average, every Sunday, about twelve hundred worshippers. Of the remaining fifty, several are small, but, one with another, they may be estimated at five hundred; making, in all, somewhat more than sixty thousand worshippers. And as it is found that only about one-half the population can regularly attend divine ordinances, the whole number in connexion with the synod may be reckoned at from one hundred and sixteen to one hundred and twenty thousand. Adams' Religious World; Smith's Historical Sketches of the Relief Church; Edinb. Theol. Rev., Nov. 1830.—Hend. Buck.

RELIGION, is a Latin word, derived, according to Cicero, from religere, "to reconsider;" but according to Servius and most modern grammarians, from religare, "to bind fast." If the Ciceronian etymology be the true one, the word religion will denote the diligent study of whatever pertains to the worship of God. Accordingly, those who exhibited zeal and earnestness in the service of God, as the most important concern, were, therefore, called religiosi; and their conduct was called religio (the name of the Deity being frequently annexed) dei, or erga deum. The word religio, however, and especially the plural, religiones, was most commonly used in reference to external worship, rites, and ceremonies. According to the other derivation, it denotes that obligation which we feel on our minds from the relation in which we stand to some superior power. The word is sometimes used as synonymous with sect; but, in a practical sense, it is generally considered as the same with godliness, or a life devoted to the worship and fear of God. Dr. Doddridge thus defines it:—"Religion consists in the resolution of the will for God, and in a constant care to avoid whatever we are persuaded he would disapprove, to despatch the work he has assigned us in life, and to promote his glory in the happiness of mankind." (See GODLINESS.) The foundation of all religion rests on the belief of the existence of God. As we have, however, already considered the evidences of the divine existence, they need not be enumerated again in this place; the reader will find them under the article EXISTENCE OF GOD. See also the articles GOD, and JENOVAH.

Religion has been divided into natural and revealed. By natural religion is meant that knowledge, veneration, and love of God, and the practice of those duties to him, our fellow-creatures, and ourselves, which are discoverable by the right exercise of our rational faculties, from considering the nature and perfections of God, and our relation to him and to one another. By revealed religion is understood that discovery which he has made to us of his mind and will in the Holy Scriptures.

As it respects natural religion, some doubt whether, properly speaking, there can be any such thing; since, through the fall, reason is so depraved, that man without revelation is under the greatest darkness and misery, as may be easily seen by considering the history of those nations who are destitute of it, and who are given up to barbarism, ignorance, cruelty, and evils of every kind. So far as this, however, may be observed, that the light of nature can give us no proper ideas of God, nor inform us what worship will be acceptable to him. It does not tell us how man became a fallen, sinful creature, as he is, nor how he can be recovered. It affords us no intelligence as to the immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, and a future state of happiness and misery. The apostle, indeed, observes, that the Gentiles have the law written on their hearts, and a law unto themselves; yet the greatest moralists among them were so blinded as to be guilty of, and actually to countenance, the greatest vices. Such a system, therefore, it is supposed, can hardly be said to be religious, which leaves man in such uncertainty, ignorance, and impiety. (See REVELATION.)

On the other side, it is observed, "that, though it is in the highest degree probable that the parents of mankind received all their theological knowledge by supernatural means, it is yet obvious that some parts of that knowledge must have been capable of a proof purely rational, other wise not a single religious truth could have been conveyed through the succeeding generations of the human race but by the immediate inspiration of each individual. We, indeed, admit many propositions as certainly true, upon the sole authority of the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, and we receive these Scriptures with gratitude, as the lively oracles of God; but it is self-evident that we could not do either the one or the other, were we not convinced by natural means that God exists; that he is a being of goodness, justice, and power; and that he inspired with divine wisdom the penmen of these sacred volumes. Now, though it is very possible that no man, or body of men, left to themselves from infancy in a desert world, would ever have made a theological discovery, yet, what ever propositions relating to the being and attributes of the First Cause, and duty of man, can be demonstrated by human reason, independent of written revelation, may be called natural theology, and are of the utmost importance, as being to us the first principles of all religion. Natural theology, in this sense of the word, is the foundation of Christian revelation; for, without a previous knowledge of it, we could have no evidence that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are indeed the word of God."

The religions which exist in the world have been generally divided into four: the Pagan, the Jewish, the Mohammedan, and the Christian; to which articles the reader is referred. The various duties of the Christian religion also are stated in their different places. See also, as connected with this article, the articles INSPIRATION, REVELATION, THEOLOGY, NATURAL, CHRISTIANITY, and books there recommended.—Hend. Buck.

RELIGIOUS; in a general sense, something that relates to religion; and, in reference to persons, that which indicates that they give their attention to religion, and are influenced by it, so as to differ from the world.

It is also used for a person engaged by solemn vows to the monastic life; or a person shut up in a monastery, to lead a life of devotion and austerity under some rule or institution. The male religious are called monks and friars; the females, nuns and conventresses.—Hend. Buck.

RELIGIOUS AND BENEVOLENT INSTITUTIONS. (SEE VOLUNTARY ASSOCIATIONS.)

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION. "Fathers," says the apostle, (Eph. 6: 4.) "bring up your children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." This, surely, says Mr. Buckminster, can be interpreted as nothing less than a precept for the religious education of those committed to their care. If any thing should be taught soon, it is surely that which ought never to be forgotten. The cup will be tainted with the liquor which it first receives. The earliest age is that which imbibes the most copiously, and retains the longest. If then we would succeed in training up children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, we must begin before the heart is hardened by prejudices, or polluted with vice. If we intend them to be Christians, we must let them know as soon as the intellect expands, that there are some truths, eternal and immutable, which are never to desert them; truths which time has sanctioned, genius embraced, learning illustrated, piety cherished, and the world revered in every age. The first light which strikes them should be the light of heaven. The mind will be preoccupied if the parent is a moment idle. The mind of a child cannot be shut up until he is ready to furnish it. No! strange prejudices, and curious and unaccountable opinions, will gain an early ascendancy in the neglected understanding; and, though it is hard to make them learn, it will be found still harder to make them forget what they should not have received.

We will here point out some of the most common mistakes on this subject.

The first is, an opinion that the habits of children only are to be regarded; and that, in time, principles will follow of course; that, if they only learn to behave well, it is of little importance to trouble their weak heads with reasons, or to furnish them with a stronger argument than the example or the command of their parents. But who does not know, that habits, unsupported by principles, are, even in the maturest mind, the most precarious and insecure of our possessions? As soon as the child's company is changed, if he has been left without instruction, his character is changed also. Send him from his father's house, and you send him, innocent, indeed, but naked and unshielded, into the midst of enemies in ambush, and weapons flying in mid-air. An amiable temper, unfortified by principles; and good habits, strong only because they have not been tried; are the richest and easiest prey of the polluting harpies of profligate society. Indeed, to be careful of forming children to correct habits and fair demeanor, without imparting early principles of piety, is nothing better than raising the walls of a citadel, which you intend to leave unfortified, uncommanded.

A second mistake on this subject is, that because many of the subjects of religion are beyond the capacity of children, to instruct them in Christianity is only to load their memories with words, and by the irksomeness of such a lesson to give rise to an antipathy, which, in after life, may extend to every thing which wears the complexion of seriousness. But, even if it should be granted, that the primary truths of religion were not completely intelligible to the youthful capacity, it ought not to be therefore inferred, that tuition is vain. Indeed, if every kind of instruction were deferred till its nature and use could be completely understood by the pupil, we should soon be overwhelmed by a race of barbarians; and the next generation would find themselves thousands of years behind their progenitors. But, in fact, the principles of religion are some of the most simple and intelligible which can be proposed to the human mind.

A third mistake is, that to furnish children early with religious ideas is to infuse into them prejudices; as if a creature, introduced as man is into the world, helpless, unfurnished, dependent, and inexperienced, could live, or act, or think, a single day, without some kind of prejudices. Prejudice is an unexamined opinion. Now the slightest observation discovers that such is the condition of man, and such the progressive nature of his powers, from their feebleness in infancy to their maturity in manhood, that it is a law of his condition, which omnipotence only can abrogate, that during the years of childhood he should depend on authority, and lean on the understandings of others. His opinions, during this period, in distinction from his knowledge, can be nothing, and ought to be nothing, but prepossessions. And is it thought, that, by withholding from him instruction on subjects of religion, we secure him, for any season, from the slavery of prejudice? By this very neglect we infuse into his susceptible mind one of the most baneful and captivating of prejudices; for we tempt him unavoidably to this dangerous conclusion, that religious opinions are unworthy of his concern, or make no part of his interests, and are unnecessary, or unimportant to society. Besides, we must not think that no prejudices will grow up and deform his fruitful mind, of which we have not dropped the seeds. Is it thought that the opinions he will entertain on these subjects—opinions which he will gather from his first intercourse with society—will possess less of the nature of prejudices, than those which might have been instilled by parental affection, and enforced by parental authority?

But on what other subject which concerns the formation of the minds of children do we make so absurd a mistake? Wherein do we forbear to tincture their tender minds with our own opinions? It is not politics; it is not literature. Are the elements of the religion of Christ then less fixed than the principles of taste, less certain than the doctrines of party? Why must these alone be picked up by chance, or be left to be gathered by our children, at an age when all their habits shall be formed, all their prejudices shall be rooted, and parental recommendation have lost its supreme authority?

Another most unfortunate error upon this subject is this; that children will certainly acquire at school, and by the public institutions of the gospel, an adequate sentiment and knowledge of religious truths, without the necessity of our interference. The child, as soon as it is released from the bondage of the nurse, and needs no longer a careful eye to look after its steps, and guard it from external injury, is too often surrendered to instructors, some of whom are employed to polish the surface of the character, and regulate the motion of the limbs, others to furnish the memory, and accomplish the imagination, while religion gets admission as she can; sometimes in aid of authority, and sometimes as a Saturday's task, or a Sunday's peculiarity, but how rarely as a sentiment. Their little hearts are made to flutter with vanity, encouraged to pant with emulation, persuaded to contract with parsimony, allowed to glow with revenge, or reduced to absolute numbness by worldliness and cares, before they have ever felt a sentiment of devotion, or beat with a pulsation of sorrow for an offence, or gratitude for a benefit, in the presence of God. Parents have no right to expect that the sense of religion will be infused by the labors of others. It is peculiarly the business, or rather, the pleasure of the parent. Let us abjure, then, the delusion that our children are learning all that is necessary of Christianity, without any instruction or encouragement from ourselves. When parents have ceased to be teachers, religion has ceased to be taught. (See PARENT.)

The institution of Sabbath schools, valuable as it is as an auxiliary of the parent in religious education, by no means diminishes the force of the preceding remarks; while the remarks serve to unfold the importance of the instruction given in Sabbath schools.—Buckminster's Sermons; Works of Hannah More and Mrs. Barbauld; Babington; James' Parent's Gift; Abbott's publications; Dwight's Theology; Anderson on the Domestic Constitution.

RELIGIOUS EFFORT. ENCOURAGEMENTS TO. We are citizens of a country, says Dr. Wayland, whose untrodden soil was moistened by the tears, and consecrated by the prayers, of persecuted saints; whose earliest institutions were formed under the auspices of the Bible, where every man may pray as much, and live as holily as he will; where every man may circulate as widely as he pleases the gospel of Jesus Christ, and as eloquently as he is able urge his fellow-citizens to obey it; and where God has been pleased to honor with his special benediction every effort which has been made to arrest the progress of vice, and to increase the influence of religion. What can we ask for more? Why stand we here all the day idle? We see how glorious a success has attended our present feeble and imperfect efforts. They have as yet been almost nothing, in comparison with the ability of the Christian church in this country. How few of us have even approached the point of self-denial in effort; and surely it is only at this point that real benevolence begins.

Let us estimate what is our solemn and unquestionable duty. Let us look at the wonderful success with which God has crowned our exertions, and I think we shall arrive at the conclusion, that with a corresponding degree of success upon so greater efforts for the promotion of religion than are palpably within our power, a revival of piety may be witnessed in every neighborhood throughout our land; the principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ may be made to regulate the detail of individual and national intercourse; the high praises of God may be heard from every habitation; and perhaps, before even the youth of the rising generation be gathered to their fathers, there may burst forth upon these highly favored states the light of the millennial glory. What is to prevent it? Let any man reflect upon the subject, and then answer.

My brethren, I speak deliberately. I do believe that the option, under God, is put into our hands. It is for us to say, whether the present movement shall be onward, until it terminate in the universal triumph of the Messiah, or whether all shall go back again, and the generations to come after us shall suffer for ages the divine indignation for our neglect of the gospel of the grace of God. The church has for two thousand years been praying "Thy kingdom come." Jesus Christ is saying unto us, "It shall come, if you desire it."

The period within which this question must be decided, may in other countries be prolonged; not so, however, in this country. Other governments may be kept stable, amid political commotion, by balancing the interests and passions of one class of the community against those of another. With us there is but one class, the people. Hence our institutions can only be supported while the people are restrained by moral principle. We have provided no checks to the turbulence of passion; we have raised no barriers against the encroachments of a tyrannical major ity. Hence the very forms which we so much admire, are at any moment liable to become an intolerable nuisance, the instruments of ultimate and remediless oppression. Now I do not know that history furnishes us with reason to believe that man can be brought under subjection to moral government in any other way than by the inculcation of principles, such as are delivered in the New Testament. You see, then, that the church of Christ is the only hope of our country. It is time you were aware of the fact, that even now, not a moment is to be lost. When the statesman trembles for the republic, then it is time for Christians to act. Shall the kingdom of Christ come, or shall it not come?

The kingdom of Christ will not come, unless an effort be made on the part of the church, more intense and more universal than any which later ages have seen. The providence of God calls loudly upon all religions men, to be more deeply and thoroughly religious.—Wayland's Discourses; Beecher's Sermons; Douglas's Works; Saturday Evening; Hinton and Sprague on Revivals.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY; LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE; the name given to the rights of conscience. We will here briefly state its general principles.

All men are bound by the laws of God, and are responsible to him. From this primary and supreme obligation the conscience cannot be freed. All human authority is subordinate to that which is divine, and is submitted to with the reservation of allegiance to the Universal Sovereign. That allegiance no man has a right to forego.

God may prescribe, as Supreme Ruler, the truths necessary to belief, and the modes of worship acceptable to him, and, if he pleases, enforce conformity by temporal as well as eternal penalties. This he did once in the Hebrew commonwealth. He there authorized the civil magistrate to act in his name; and armed him with coercive power to maintain the revealed national religion.

But this system was changed on the introduction of Christianity. The Son of God declined totally the use of civil or coercive power in the propagation of the gospel. My kingdom, he affirmed, is not of this world; else would my servants fight for me. The obligation to love God and obey the gospel binds the conscience of every man under this new dispensation, as before; but he is now made responsible, not to the magistrate, but to God. Every thing is referred to the individual's own conscience, quickened by the view of the divine tribunal. His fellow-men have no right to interfere. Whether it be right in the sight of God, said the apostles to the Jewish sanhedrim, to obey men rather than God, judge ye.

All human laws therefore which either prescribe or prohibit certain doctrines or rites, not inconsistent with the civil peace, are manifestly unauthorized by the Bible, and are obviously unjust. They invade the divine prerogative. They trespass on the most sacred right of the human soul, the right of seeking and serving God in the manner we are persuaded he requires. They are therefore null and void, and no man is bound to obey them.

To Roger Williams belongs the honor of unfolding to the world the true principles of religious liberty in their full extent, and of carrying them consistently, steadily, and triumphantly into effect. His celebrated work on this subject was published in England, in 1644. Bap. Mag. 1834; Works of Robert Hall.*

RELIGIOUS LITERATURE. Writing, Dr. Channing observes, is now the mightiest instrument on earth. Through this, the mind has acquired a kind of omnipresence. To literature we then look, as the chief means of forming a better race of human beings. To superior minds which may act through this, we look for the impulses by which their country is to be carried forward. We would teach them that they are the depositaries of the highest power on earth, and that on them the best hopes of society rest.

One of the great laws of our nature, and a law singularly important to social beings, is, that the intellect enlarges and strengthens itself by expressing worthily its best views. In this, as in other respects, it is more blessed to give than to receive. Superior minds are formed, not merely by solitary thought, but almost as much by communication. Great thoughts are never fully possessed, till he who has conceived them has given them fit utterance. One of the noblest and most invigorating labors of genius, is to clothe its conceptions in clear and glorious forms, to give them existence in other souls. Thus literature creates, as well as manifests, intellectual power; and without it the highest minds will never be summoned to the most invigorating action.

It is on the vast subjects of morals and human nature, that the mind especially strengthens itself by elaborate composition; and these, let it be remembered, form the staple of the highest literature. Moral truth, under which we include every thing relating to mind and character, is of a refined and subtle, as well as elevated nature, and requires the joint and full exercise of discrimination, invention, imagination, and sensibility, to give it effectual utterance. A writer who would make it visible and powerful must strive to join an austere logic to a fervid eloquence; must place it in various lights; must create for it interesting forms; must wed it to beauty; must illuminate it by similitudes and contrasts; must show its correspondence with the outward world; perhaps must frame for it a vast machinery of fiction. How invigorating are these efforts! Yet it is only in writing, in elaborate composition, that they are deliberately called forth and sustained; and without literature they would almost cease. It may be said of many truths, that greater intellectual energy is required to express them with effect, than to conceive them; so that a nation which does not encourage this expression, impoverishes so far its own mind.

We feel our debt to be immense to the glorious company of pure and wise minds, which in foreign lands have bequeathed us in writing their choicest thoughts and holiest feelings. Still we feel, that all existing literature has been produced under influences which have necessarily mixed with it much error and corruption, and that the whole of it ought to pass, and must pass, under rigorous review. For example, we think that the history of the human race is to be rewritten. Men imbued with the prejudices which thrive under aristocracies and state religions, cannot understand it. Great principles also are yet to be settled in criticism, in morals, in politics; and, above all, the true character of religion is to be rescued from the disguises and corruptions of ages.

We want a reformation. We want a literature, in which genius will pay supreme, if not undivided, homage to truth and virtue; in which the childish admiration of what has been called greatness will give place to a wise moral judgment; which will breathe reverence for the mind, and elevating thoughts of God. When we look back, we see that literature has been originated and modified by a variety of principles; by patriotism and national feeling, by reverence for antiquity, by the spirit of innovation, by enthusiasm, by scepticism, by romantic love, and by political and religious convulsions. Now we do not expect from these causes any higher action of the mind than they have yet produced.

Are we asked, then, to what impulse or power we look for a higher literature than has yet existed, we answer, to a new action or development of the religious principle. This remark will probably surprise not a few of our readers. Still man's relation to God is the great quickening truth, throwing all other truths into insignificance, and a truth which, however obscured and paralyzed by the many errors which ignorance and fraud have hitherto linked with it, has ever been a chief spring of human improvement. We look to it as the true life of the intellect. No man can be just to himself, can comprehend his own existence, can put forth all his powers with an heroic confidence, can deserve to be the guide and inspirer of other minds, till he has risen to communion with the Savior of men; till he feels his filial connexion with the Universal Parent; till he regards himself as the recipient and minister of the Infinite Spirit; till he feels his consecration to the ends which religion unfolds; till he rises above human opinion, and is moved by a higher impulse than fame.

There are many considerations which show the importance of the cultivation, in this country, of an elevated Christian literature. With a few exceptions we have no indigenous permanent literature now. We have written no Principia, no Analogy, no Pilgrim's Progress, no Paradise Lost. Our literature is yet to be created. And now is the time. Our population is now in a condition to be moulded by it. General education is extending to the whole mass of the community. That community in a few years will multiply to fifty, and a few years more, to a hundred millions of intelligent readers. Indeed, the English language will soon encircle the globe. The number of liberally educated men in our country is large, and rapidly increasing. Our fifty collegiate institutions, in twenty years will swell to a hundred. Fourteen thousand alumni of our colleges are now living. About four thousand young men are now in our colleges, and myriads more in our preparatory schools. Besides, great numbers of these, men of taste and talent, are becoming vital Christians, and their minds must have their appropriate nutriment. Shall a wish to return to their former opinions and habits ever enter their hearts, for want of finding among Christian writers enlarged thought and elevated sentiment? God forbid. There must, there will be, to meet all these wants, a high and thoroughly Christian literature. Who, then, will gird themselves to this great vocation?—Christian Examiner, no. XXXVI; *Am. Quar. RELLYANISTS, or RELLYAN UNIVERSALISTS; the followers of Mr. James Relly. He first commenced his ministerial character in connexion with Mr. Whitfield, and was received with great popularity. Upon a change of his views, he encountered reproach, and was pronounced by many an enemy to godliness. He believed that Christ, as a Mediator, was so united to mankind, that his actions were theirs, his obedience and sufferings theirs; and, consequently, that he has as fully restored the whole human race to the divine favor, as if all had obeyed and suffered in their own persons; and upon this persuasion he preached a finished salvation. The Rellyanists are not observers of ordinances, such as water baptism and the sacrament; professing to believe only in one baptism, which they call an immersion of the mind or conscience into truth by the teaching of the Spirit of God; and by the same Spirit they are enabled to feed on Christ as the bread of life, professing that in and with Jesus they possess all things. They inculcate and maintain good works for necessary purposes; but contend that the principal and only work which ought to be attended to, is the doing real good without religious ostentation; that to relieve the miseries and distresses of mankind according to our ability, is doing more real good than the superstitious observance of religious ceremonies. In general they believe that there will be a resurrection to life, and a resurrection to condemnation; that believers only will be among the former, who, as first-fruits, and kings and priests, will have part in the first resurrection, and shall reign with Christ in his kingdom of the millennium; that unbelievers who are after raised, must wait the manifestation of the Savior of the world, under that condemnation of conscience which a mind in darkness and wrath must necessarily feel; that ultimately every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess that in the Lord they have righteousness and strength; and thus every enemy shall be subdued to the kingdom and glory of the great Mediator. Mr. Murray, belonging to this society, emigrated to America, and preached these sentiments at Boston and elsewhere.

Mr. Relly published several works, the principal of which were, "Union," "The Trial of Spirits," "Christian Liberty," "One Baptism," "The Salt of Sacrifice," "Antichrist Resisted," "Letters on Universal Salvation," "The Cherubimical Mystery."—Head. Buck.

REMEDIAL LAW. (See LAW; N<sup>ON</sup>OMIANS; and JUSTIFICATION.)

REMISSION; the release of an obligation. It is sometimes taken for the year of jubilee, or the sabbatical year, in which the slaves were set at liberty, and in which every one returned into his own inheritance, Lev. 25: 10. Num. 36: 4. Deut. 15: 1. It is generally used in the New Testament for the pardon of sin, which is a divine discharge from the obligation to suffer the punishment of the law. The gospel says, that "John did baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance, for the remission of sins," Mark 1: 4. Luke 3: 3. And, that the blood of Jesus Christ was shed to procure remission of our sins, Eph. 1: 7. Col. 1: 14. Matt. 26: 28. (See P<sup>AR</sup>ON.)—Calmet.

REMONSTRANTS; a title given to the Arminians, by reason of the remonstrance which, in 1610, they made to the states of Holland against the sentence of the synod of Dort, which condemned them as heretics. Episcopius and Grotius were at the head of the Remonstrants, whose principles were first openly patronized in England by archbishop Laud. In Holland, the Calvinists presented an address in opposition to the remonstrance of the Arminians, and called it a counter-remonstrance. (See ARMINIANS, and DORT.)—Head. Buck.

REMORSE; uneasiness occasioned by a consciousness of guilt. When it is blended with the fear of punishment, and rises to despair, it constitutes the supreme wretchedness of the mind.—Head. Buck.

REMPHAN. (See CHUVV, and MOLOCH.)

REPENTANCE signifies a reduction of the mind from a rebellious and disaffected state, to that submission and thorough separation from iniquity by which converted sinners are distinguished, Matt. 3: 2—8.

Repentance is sometimes used generally for a change of mind, and an earnest wishing that something were undone that has been done. In a sense analogous to this, God himself is said to repent; but this can only be understood of his altering his conduct towards his creatures, either in the bestowing of good or the infliction of evil: which change in the divine conduct is founded on a change in his creatures; and thus, speaking after the manner of men, God is said to repent. In this generic sense, also, Esau found no place for repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears; he could not move his father Isaac to repent of what he had done, or to recall the blessing from Jacob and confer it on himself, Heb. 12: 17. Rom. 11: 29. 2 Cor. 7: 10.

The Greek metanoia, (repentance,) properly denotes the soul recollecting its own actions, and that in such a manner as to produce sorrow in the review, and a desire of amendment. It is strictly a change of mind, and includes the whole of that alteration with respect to views, dispositions, and conduct, which is effected by the power of the gospel. This term is used in the New Testament about sixty times. Another word also is used in a few instances, (but never where repentance is enjoined as a duty,) metamelomia, which merely signifies anxiety or uneasiness upon the consideration of what is done, Matt. 21: 29, 32. 27: 3. 2 Cor. 7: 8. Heb. 7: 21. The first word signifies a change founded on a reconsideration of principles; the second, a concern founded on a view of consequences. The first is thorough, the second is partial, and ineffectual.

To distinguish these, there should have been two distinct words in our common version, corresponding to the two in the original. But as there is no difference made in the translation, the old divines used to designate the latter by the term legal, and the former by the term evangelical; a designation as unfortunate as it is unscriptural, because it by no means truly describes the difference between them. The law of God is in fact an essential instrument in producing evangelical repentance; it is emphatically a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ. The real difference is much better expressed by the terms worldly and godly, which moreover have a scriptural sanction, 2 Cor. 7: 9, 10. Let it be remembered then, that there is, 1. A worldly or partial repentance, wherein one is grieved for and turns from his outward sin, merely on account of the hurt it has done, or is likely to do him; as a malefactor, who still loves his sin, repents of doing it, because it brings him to punishment. 2. A godly or evangelical repentance, which is a pious sorrow wrought in the heart of a sinner by the word and Spirit of God, whereby, from a sense of his sin, as offensive to God, and defiling and endangering to his own soul, and from an apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ, he, with grief and hatred of all his known sins, turns from them to God, as his Savior and Lord. This is called "repentance towards God," as therein we turn from sin to him; and "repentance unto life," as it leads to spiritual life, and is the first step to eternal life, Matt. 3: 2. Acts 3: 19. 11: 18. 20: 12. There are only these two kinds of repentance.

The author, as well as object, of true repentance is God, Acts 5: 31. The subjects of it are sinners, since none but those who have sinned can repent. The means of repentance are the word, and the ministers of it; yet sometimes consideration, sanctified afflictions, conversation, &c. have been the instruments of repentance. The  blessings connected with repentance are, pardon, peace, and everlasting life, Acts 11: 18. The time of repentance is the present life, Isa. 55: 6. Eccl. 9: 50. The evidences of repentance are, faith, humility, prayer, and obedience, Zech. 12: 10.

The necessity of repentance appears evident from the evil of sin; the misery it involves us in here; the commands given us to repent in God's word; the promises made to the penitent; and the absolute incapability of enjoying God here or hereafter without it. See Dickinson's Letters, let. 9; Dr. Owen on the 130th Psalm; Gill's Body of Divinity, article Repentance; Ridgley's Body of Divinity, question 76; Hill's Sermon on Evangelical Repentance; Davies' Sermons, vol. iii. ser. 44; Case's Sermons, ser. 4; Whitfield's Sermons; Saurin's Sermons, vol. iii. ser. 9; Scott's Treatise on Repentance; Campbell on the Gospels, Dissert. 6; Chalmers' Preface to Baxter's Call; Fulter's Works; Dwight's Theology; Works of Robert Hall.—*Hend. REPETITIONS, VAIN. These, in relation to prayer, are forbidden by our Lord, and were well styled "vain," if they consisted, as among the Mohammedans, in the repetitions of words and phrases.

Richardson mentions an old man who travelled with him, who was thought to be of peculiar sanctity, and most devout in prayer: "Certainly he did not pray in secret, communing with his heart, but called aloud with all his might, and repeated the words as fast as his tongue could give them utterance. The form and words of his prayer were the same with those of the others; but this good man had made a vow to repeat certain words of the prayer a given number of times, both night and morning. The word Rabboni, for example, answering to our word Lord, he would bind himself to repeat a hundred or two hundred times, twice a day; and, accordingly, went on in the hearing of all the party; and, on his knees, sometimes with his face directed steadily to heaven, and at other times bowing down to the ground, and calling out Rabboni, Rabboni, Rabboni, Rabboni, Rabboni, &c., as fast as he could articulate the words after each other, like a school-boy going through his task, not like a man who, praying with the heart, and the understanding also, continues longer on his knees, in the rapture of devotion, whose soul is a flame of fire, enkindled by his Maker, and fixing upon his God, like Jacob, will not let him go until he bless him. Having settled his accounts with the word Rabboni, which the telling of his beads enabled him to know when he had done, he proceeded to dispose of his other vows in a similar manner. Allah houakbar, perhaps, came next, 'God most great'; and he would go on, as with the other, Allah houakbar, Allah houakbar, Allah houakbar, Allah houakbar, &c., repeating them as fast as he could frame his organs to pronounce them."—Watson.

REPHAIM; ancient giants of Canaan, of whom there were several families. It is commonly thought they descended from an ancestor called Rephah, or Rapha; but others imagine that the word properly signified giants, in the ancient language of this people. The giants Goliath, Sippai, Lahmi, and others, were remains of the Rephaim. Their magnitude and strength are well known in Scripture. (See GIANTS.)

THE VALLEY OF THE REPHAIM, or giants, was famous in Joshua's time, and also in David's, Josh. 15: 8. 18: 16.

2 Sam. 5: 18, 22. 1 Chron. 11: 15. 14: 9. It is placed as one limit of the portion of Judah. It belonged to Judah, and was south or west of Jerusalem.—Calmet.

REPHIDIM; a place on the east side of the western gulf of the Red sea, where the Hebrews tempted God, and quarrelled with Moses for want of water; and so it was called Meribah, contention, and Massah, temptation. Here Moses brought them water from a rock; and here they, under the direction of Joshua, routed the Amalekites.—Brown.

REPLY. To reply against God, is to quarrel with his purpose or providence, Rom. 9: 20.—Brown.

REPRESENTERS. (See MARROW-MEN.)

REPROACH; the act of finding fault in opprobrious terms, or attempting to expose to infamy and disgrace.

In whatever cause we engage, however disinterested our motives, however laudable our designs, reproach is what we must expect. But it becomes us not to retaliate, but to bear it patiently; and so to live, that every charge brought against us be groundless. If we be reproached for righteousness' sake, we have no reason to be ashamed nor to be afraid. All good men have thus suffered, Jesus Christ himself especially. We have the greatest promises of support. Besides, it has a tendency to humble us, detach us from the world, and excite in us a desire for that state of blessedness where all reproach shall be done away. Matt. 5.—Hend. Buck.

REPROBATION is opposed, not, as some theologians have represented, to election, but to approbation, and is equivalent to condemnation after trial. It always implies a cause—"Reprobate silver shall men call them;" (Jer. 6: 30.) that is, they are base metal, that will not abide the proof. Where all are equally vile and unworthy, if some be elevated to excellence and honor by divine grace, the rest are but left where they were; their condition is not worse, if it is not improved. God never rejects any without reason; but those who, by continuing in sin, reject the offered mercy of God, reprobate themselves; they say unto God, "Depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways."

Those who represent Calvinists in general as holding to an unconditional, absolute reprobation of any of the human race, are guilty of defamation in one of its most atrocious forms. Whatever may have been advanced by certain individuals, such a doctrine is not, and never was any part of the Calvinistic system. No creed or confession of faith, from Dort to Westminster, ever avowed such a doctrine. It is therefore a flagrant injustice to impute it to them; and to argue formally against it, is to combat a man of straw. And yet even Mr. WATSON devotes several pages of his Theological Dictionary and Institutes to this worse than quixotical combat. O when will Christian ministers become divinely candid! The editor of this work has before him this moment a work entitled "Propositions and Principles of Divinity," as taught in the school of Geneva in 1586, the time at which Arminius himself was a student there, (our edition is that of 1591,) in which we find the following statements:—"The eternal purpose of God doth impose no other necessity upon the events which he hath determined, than such as he will have second causes to be moved according to their own nature; whence it followeth that it doth not take away the contingency or voluntariness of man's will. Therefore we do retain these scholastical distinctions of necessity and compulsion, of natural and voluntary, of absolute and conditional, of enforced and ensuing necessity, as true and profitable." Then, after speaking of election, it is added, "Now all those whom it pleaseth the same God, who is debtor to no man, in justice to leave in their own corruption, either altogether not called; or called, but without the opening of the heart; and deservedly to deliver up unto Satan and their own concupiscence; they being such also as wilfully and willingly harden themselves, will be one day, according to his eternal predestination, adjudged together with Satan unto eternal punishments; laying open in their just destruction the glory of his great and most just hatred against evil. The manifesting of this decree of reprobation is to be left unto God, unless it be apparent in any, that they have sinned against the Holy Ghost, as in times past it was with Julian the apostate. Those therefore who hold on the way of destruction, are so to be told of their duty; as, leaving unto God the secrets of his judgments, we are not to despair of any man's salvation. For it is a true consequence indeed to say, I believe, as it appeareth by the effects; therefore I am elected and appointed unto salvation. But it is no necessary consequent to say, I do not believe, and I tread the path of destruction; therefore I am a reprobate, and appointed to damnation. For he that believeth not to-day, may be endued with faith to-morrow. But thus rather we are to make a true conclusion: I do neither believe the gospel, nor labor to believe, but continue in the way of destruction: wherefore, except I betake me unto another course, I shall perish. And therefore I will enter into another way, which God layeth before me. And these are the reflections which all pastors are bound by duty with great care to lay before their wandering sheep.

"God, therefore, in appointing some of free gift unto salvation, and others unto just condemnation, is neither the author of sin, nor a respecter of persons: but thereby showeth himself to be the true God indeed." (Pp. 19—23.) Now whether right or wrong, this is the real doctrine of the old school of Calvinism, concerning reprobation. And this beyond dispute is conditional, which Mr. Watson himself says "is a scriptural doctrine."—Calmet; Principles, &c.

REPROOF; blame or reprehension spoken to a person's face. It is distinguished from a reprimand thus: He who reproves another, points out his fault, and blames him. He who reprimands, affects to punish, and mortifies the offender. (See OFFENCE.)

In giving reproof, the following rules may be observed:—1. We should not be forward in reproving our elders or superiors, but rather to remonstrate and supplicate for redress. What the ministers of God do in this kind, they do by special commission, as those that must give an account, 1 Tim. 5: 1. Heb. 13: 17. 2. We must not reprove rashly: there should be proof before reproof. 3. We should not reprove for slight matters, for such faults or defects as proceed from natural frailty, from inadvertency, or mistake in matters of small consequence. 4. We should never reprove unseasonably, as to the time, the place, or the circumstances. 5. We should reprove mildly and sweetly, in the calmest manner, in the gentlest terms. 6. We should not affect to be reprehensive: perhaps there is no one considered more troublesome than he who delights in finding fault with others.

In receiving reproof, it may be observed, 1. That we should not reject it merely because it may come from those who are not exactly on a level with ourselves. 2. We should consider whether the reproof given be not actually deserved; and that, if the reprover knew all, whether the reproof would not be sharper than what it is. 3. Whether, if taken humbly and patiently, it will not be of great advantage to us. 4. That it is nothing but pride to suppose that we are never to be the subjects of reproof, since it is human to err. Inne's Advice.—Hend. Buck.

REPTILES; animals that have no feet, or such short ones, that they seem to creep, or crawl, on the ground. Serpents, worms, locusts, and caterpillars, are taken for reptiles. The Hebrews put fishes also among reptiles, (they having no feet.) whatever be their nature or shape, Gen. 1: 21. Lev. 11: 46. Ps. 69: 34, &c.—Calmet.

RESRIPTUS, CODEX. This name is given to ancient MSS., which, in the middle ages, were used, after the original writing had been in a great measure effaced, for the copying of other works, generally ecclesiastical treatises. The Holy Scriptures themselves have sometimes been effaced by the monks, to make way for homilies and legends. One of the most ancient of our biblical MSS., marked C in the critical collections, is a codex rescriptus, or, as the Greeks term it, palimpsest.—Hend. Buck.

RESEN; a city of Assyria, between Nineveh and Calah, (Gen. 10: 12.) on the river Chaboras, in Mesopotamia.—Calmet.

RESENTMENT; the feeling that arises from a sense of injury. It is however most generally used in an ill sense, implying a determination to return an injury. Dr. Johnson observes, that resentment in this sense is an union of sorrow with malignity; a combination of a passion which all endeavor to avoid, with a passion which all concur to detest. The man who retires to meditate mischief, and to exasperate his own rage; whose thoughts are employed only on means of distress and contrivances of ruin; whose mind never pauses from the remembrance of his own sufferings, but to indulge some hope of enjoying the calamities of another, may justly be numbered among the most miserable of human beings; among those who are guilty; who have neither the gladness of prosperity, nor the calm of innocence.—Hend. Buck.

RESIGNATION; a submission without discontent to the will of God. The obligations to this duty arise from, 1. The perfections of God, Deut. 32: 4. 2. The purposes of God, Eph. 1: 11. 3. The commands of God, Heb. 12: 9. 4. The promises of God, 1 Pet. 5: 7. 5. Our own interest, Hos. 2: 14, 15. 6. The prospect of eternal felicity Heb. 4: 9. See articles AFFLICTION, DESPAIR, and PATIENCE; Worthington on Resignation; Grosvenor's Mourner Brooks' Mute Christian; Dwight's Theology; Works of H. More; and books under AFFLICTION.—Hend. Buck.

RESOLUTION, PIOUS; a determination to break off or abstain from sin, and to live godly. Some have bitterly exclaimed against such resolutions, while others have made the whole of their religion to consist in them.

To form them however in dependence on the promised aid of God's holy Spirit, must be virtuous; to break them, sin. Peter was not to blame for resolving to live and die with his Master; his fault lay in starting from his engagement. It was a virtue in David to draw up a plan of holy living before he came to the throne, and to resolve to realize it, Ps. 101. Indeed, though the best may break their resolutions, and fall very short of their designs, yet they who never so much as resolve to do well, will assuredly never do so. Robin in Claude.—Hend. Buck.

RESOLUTIONISTS; those who approved of the answer given by the commissioners of the general assembly of the church of Scotland, met at Perth in the time of Charles II., to the question proposed to them by the parliament, relative to what persons were to be admitted to rise in arms against Cromwell. The resolution was, that all persons capable of bearing arms were to be admitted, except those of bad character, or obstinate enemies to the covenant. It set the country in a flame. Sermons were preached against it; pamphlets were published, and meetings were held upon the subject. Such as supported it were called Resolutionists; while those who opposed it were designated the Protesters, or Anti-resolutionists.—H. Buck.

RESPECT OF PERSONS, or appearances, signifies partiality in judicial proceedings. God appointed that the judges should pronounce sentence without respect of persons, Lev. 19: 15. Deut. 16: 17, 19. That they should consider neither the poor nor the rich, the weak nor the powerful; but should attend only to truth and justice. God has no respect of persons. And the Jews complimented our Savior, that he told the truth without respect of persons, without fear, Matt. 22: 16. See Isa. 32: 1—16.

In matters of grace or bounty this phrase has no proper application. Hence when we read, (Exod. 2: 25.) "God had respect to the children of Israel," it can only express his compassion and sympathy for them: when God had respect to the offering of Abel, (Gen. 4: 4.) it imports to accept favorably, to notice with satisfaction. Comp. 1 Kings 8: 28. Num. 16: 15.—Calmet.

REST; (1.) To cease from work, Exod. 23: 12. (2.) To sit or nestle quietly, Gen. 18: 4. Isa. 39: 14. (3.) To lean, or to trust in, 2 Chron. 32: 8. (4.) To continue fixed, Isa. 51: 4. (5.) To come to an end, Ezek. 16: 42. 21: 17. God rested from his work of creation, and was refreshed; he ceased to make new kinds of creatures, and took pleasure in what he had made, Heb. 4: 4. Exod. 31: 17. His resting in his love implies his unchanging pleasure in the past effects of it, and his taking delight in showing it more abundantly, Zeph. 3: 17. His taking his rest during the Assyrian ravages of Egypt and Ethiopia imports his forbearing to interpose remarkably between the contending parties, Isa. 18: 4. Men rest on the Lord when, with a strong faith in his promise and righteousness, they commit themselves to his care, and depend on him for all necessary blessings, Ps. 37: 7. The saints rest at noon when, amid scorching persecution and temptation, God bestows upon them distinguished protection, inward patience, and com-rest, Soi Song 1: 7. The dead rest in their graves from all labor, disturbance, and pain, Isa. 57: 2. To QUIET is to cause to rest, make still. God's spirit was quieted in the north country when the Persians, Greeks, and after them the Romans, executed the destined vengeance on Chaldea, where his people had been oppressed; or when the spread of the gospel was the means of converting multitudes to Christ, Zech. 6: 8. God quieteth the earth with the south wind when he makes his gentle gales to blow on it, Job 37: 17.

REST; QUIETNESS; (1.) A ceasing from labor, Exod. 5: 5. (2.) A ceasing from open war, Josh. 14: 15. (3.) Ceasing from tillage and husbandry, Lev. 25: 5. (4.) A state of peace and reconciliation with God and men's own conscience, Matt. 11: 29. Heb. 4: 3. (5.) A calm composure of mind, produced by the love of God shed abroad in the heart, and by the Holy Ghost's witnessing to the conscience, justification, reconciliation, regeneration, adoption, and sure title to eternal glory; this is attended with a cheerful confidence in the promises, and a submission to the providences of God, Ps. 116: 7. (6.) Rest also signifies a peaceful and comfortable settlement, such as Canaan to the Hebrews, and the temple to the ark, Deut. 3: 20. Ps. 132: 8, 14.

Christ, in his person, offices, relations, righteousness, power, and love, and in his promises, is a rest and refreshing, which, if applied and improved, yield a most sweet pleasure and quiet to men, Isa. 28: 12. Christ's rest is glorious; his gospel-church and his new-covenant state, in which his people enjoy sweet delight and repose, is the product of his glorious power and bleeding love, and is glorious in its properties and ends, Isa. 11: 10. The rest remaining for the people of God is the heavenly state, in which the saints shall be forever free from sin, sorrow, temptation, and trouble or toil, and forever delighted in the full enjoyment of and conformity to a God in Christ, Heb. 4: 9.—Brown.

RESTITUTION; that act of justice by which we restore to our neighbor whatever we have unjustly deprived him of, Exod. 22: 1. Luke 19: 8.

Moralists observe respecting restitution, 1. That where it can be made in kind, or the injury can be certainly valued, we are to restore the thing or the value. 2. We are bound to restore the thing with the natural increase of it, that is, to satisfy for the loss sustained in the mean time, and the gain hindered. 3. Where the thing cannot be restored, and the value of it is not certain, we are to give reasonable satisfaction, according to a middle estimation. 4. We are at least to give by way of restitution what the law would give, for that is generally equal, and in most cases rather favorable than rigorous. 5. A man is not only bound to restitution for the injury he did, but for all that directly follows from the injurious act. For the first injury being wilful, we are supposed to will all that which follows upon it. Tillotson's Sermons, ser. 170, 171; Chillingworth's Works, ser. 7.—Hend. Buck.

RESTORATIONISTS;* those who believe that all men will ultimately become holy and happy. They maintain that God created only to bless; and that in pursuance of that purpose, he sent his Son to "be for salvation to the ends of the earth;" that Christ's kingdom is moral in its nature, and extends to moral beings in every state or mode of existence; that the probation of man is not confined to the present life, but extends through the mediatorial reign; and that, as Christ died for all, so, before he shall have delivered up the kingdom to the Father, all shall be brought to a participation of the knowledge and enjoyment of that truth, which maketh free from the bondage of sin and death. They believe in a general resurrection and judgment, when those who have improved their probation in this life will be raised to more perfect felicity, and those who have misimproved their opportunities on earth will come forward to shame and condemnation, which will continue till they become truly penitent; that punishment itself is a mediatorial work, a discipline, perfectly consistent with mercy; that it is a means employed by Christ to humble and subdue the stubborn will, and prepare the mind to receive a manifestation of the goodness of God, which leadeth the sinner to true repentance. See Gen. 12: 3. 22: 18. Gal. 3: 8. Isa. 45: 22, 23. Phil. 2: 10, 11. Rev. 5: 13. 1 Tim. 2: 1—6. Col. 1: 20. Eph. 1: 7—11. Rom. 5: 12—21. 8: 20, 21. 1 Cor. 15: 24—28.

They contend that this doctrine is not only sustained by particular texts, but grows necessarily out of some of the first principles of divine revelation. They maintain that it is immediately connected with the perfections of the Deity; that God, being infinitely benevolent, must have desired the happiness of all his offspring; that his infinite wisdom would enable him to form a perfect plan, and his almighty power will secure its accomplishment. They contend that the mission of Christ is abortive on any other plan, and that nothing short of the "restitution of all things" can satisfy the ardent desires of every pious soul. On this system alone can they reconcile the attributes of justice and mercy, and secure to the Almighty a character worthy of our imitation. [See ATONEMENT.]

They insist that the words rendered everlasting, eternal, and forever, which are in a few instances applied to the misery of the wicked, do not prove that misery to be endless; because these terms are loose in their signification, and are frequently used in a limited sense; that the original terms being often used in the plural number, clearly demonstrates that the period, though indefinite, is limited in its very nature. They maintain that the meaning of the term must always be sought in the subject to which it is applied; and that there is nothing in the nature of punishment which will justify an endless sense. [See the article AION.] They believe that the doctrine of the restoration is the most consonant to the perfections of the Deity, the most worthy of the character of Christ, and the only doctrine which will accord with pious and devout feelings, or harmonize with the Scriptures. They teach their followers, that ardent love to God, active benevolence to man, and personal meekness and purity, are the natural results of these views. [See RETRIBUTION, FUTURE.]

Though the Restorationists, as a separate sect, have arisen within a few years, their sentiments are by no means new. Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, Didymus of Alexandria, Gregory Nyssen, and several others, among the Christian fathers of the first four centuries, it is said, believed and advocated the restoration of all fallen intelligences. A branch of the German Baptists, before the Reformation, held this doctrine, and propagated it in that country. Since the Reformation this doctrine has had numerous advocates; and some of them have been among the brightest ornaments of the church. Among the Europeans, we may mention the names of Jeremy White, of Trinity college, Dr. Burnet, Dr. Cheyne, chevalier Ramsay, Dr. Hartley, bishop Newton, Mr. Stonehouse, Mr. Petitpierre, Dr. Cogan, Mr. Lindsey, Dr. Priestley, Dr. Jebb, Mr. Rely, Mr. Kenrick, Mr. Belsham, Dr. Southworth Smith, and many others. In fact the restoration is the commonly received doctrine among the English Unitarians at the present day. In Germany, a country which, for several centuries, has taken the lead in all theological reforms, the orthodox have espoused this doctrine. The restoration was introduced into America about the middle of the eighteenth century; though it was not propagated much till about 1775 or 1780; when John Murray and Elhanan Winchester became public advocates of this doctrine, and by their untiring labors extended it in every direction. From that time to the present, many men have been found in all parts of our country, who have rejoiced in this belief. This doctrine found an able advocate in the learned Dr. Chauncey, of Boston. Dr. Rush, of Philadelphia, Dr. Smith, of New York, Mr. Foster, of New Hampshire, may also be mentioned as advocates of the restoration.

Most of the writers whose names are given above did not belong to a sect which took the distinctive name of Restorationists. They were found in the ranks of the various sects into which the Christian world has been divided. And those who formed a distinct sect were more frequently denominated Universalists than Restorationists. In 1785, a convention was organized at Oxford, Massachusetts, under the auspices of Messrs. Winchester and

* This article was prepared for the Encyclopædia by the Rev. Paul Dean, of Boston.

Murray. And as all who had embraced universal salvation believed that the effects of sin and the means of grace extended into a future life, the terms Restorationist and Universalist were then used as synonymous; and those who formed that convention adopted the latter as their distinctive name.

During the first twenty-five years, the members of the Universalist Convention were believers in a future retribution. But about the year 1818, Hosea Ballou, now of Boston, advanced the doctrine, that all retribution is confined to this world. That sentiment at first was founded upon the old Gnostic notion, that all sin originates in the flesh, and that death frees the soul from all impurity. Subsequently some of the advocates for the no-future punishment scheme adopted the doctrine of materialism, and hence maintained that the soul was mortal; that the whole man died at temporal death, and that the resurrection was the grand event which would introduce all men into heavenly felicity.

Those who have since taken to themselves the name of Restorationists, viewed these innovations as corruptions of the gospel, and raised their voices against them. But a majority of the Convention having espoused those sentiments, no reformation could be effected. The Restorationists, believing these errors to be increasing, and finding in the connexion what appeared to them to be a want of engagedness in the cause of true piety, and in some instances an open opposition to the organization of churches; and finding that a spirit of levity and bitterness characterized the public labors of their brethren, and that practices were springing up totally repugnant to the principles of congregationalism, resolved to obey the apostolic injunction, by coming out from among them, and forming an independent association. Accordingly a convention, consisting of Rev. Paul Dean, Rev. David Pickering, Rev. Charles Hudson, Rev. Adin Ballou, Rev. Lyman Maynard, Rev. Nathaniel Wright, Rev. Philemon K. Russell, and Rev. Seth Chandler, and several laymen, met at Mendon, Massachusetts, August 17, 1831, and formed themselves into a distinct sect, and took the name of Universal Restorationists.

Since the organization of this association, they have had accessions of six or seven clergymen, so that their whole number of clergymen may now (1834) be estimated at fourteen, and the number of their societies at ten or twelve. With all or nearly all these societies an organized church is associated. These societies are principally in Massachusetts, though there is a large society in Providence, Rhode Island, and one in New York city. The largest societies are those of Boston and Providence. The Independent Messenger, a paper published weekly at Mendon, Massachusetts, by Rev. Adin Ballou, is devoted to the cause of Restorationism. It ought also to be stated in connexion with this, that there are several clergymen who agree with the Restorationists in sentiment, who still adhere to the Universalist connexion. And if we were to present a complete list of those who believe that all men will ultimately be restored, we might enumerate many of the Unitarian and Christian clergymen. This sentiment prevails more or less among the laity of every sect. The Restorationists are Congregationalists on the subject of church government.

The difference between the Restorationists and Universalists relates principally to the subject of a future retribution. The Universalists believe that a full and perfect retribution takes place in this world, that our conduct here cannot affect our future condition, and that the moment man exists after death, he will be as pure and as happy as the angels. From these views the Restorationists dissent. They maintain that a just retribution does not take place in time; that the conscience of the sinner becomes callous, and does not increase in the severity of its reprovals with the increase of guilt; that men are invited to act with reference to a future life; that if all are made perfectly happy at the commencement of the next state of existence, they are not rewarded according to their deeds; that if death introduces them into heaven, they are saved by death and not by Christ; and if they are made happy by being raised from the dead, they are saved by physical, and not by moral means, and made happy without their agency or consent; that such a sentiment weakens the motives to virtue, and gives force to the temptations of vice; that it is unreasonable in itself, and opposed to many passages of Scripture. See Acts 24: 25. 17: 30, 31. Heb. 9: 27, 28. Matt. 11: 23, 24. 2 Pet. 2: 9. 2 Cor. 5: 8—11. John 5: 28, 29. Matt. 10: 28. Luke 12: 4, 5. 16: 19—31. 1 Pet. 3: 18—20.

RESURRECTION. The belief of a general resurrection of the dead, which will come to pass at the end of the world, and will be followed with an immortality either of happiness or misery, is an article of religion common to Jews and Christians. It is very expressly taught both in the Old and New Testaments: Psa. 16: 10. Job 19: 25, &c. Ezek. 37: 1, &c. Isa. 26: 19. John 5: 28, 29; and to these may be added, Wisd. 3: 1, &c. 4: 15. 2 Macc. 7: 14, 23, 29, &c. At the time when our Savior appeared in Judea, the resurrection from the dead was received as one of the principal articles of the Jewish religion by the whole body of the nation, the Sadducees excepted, Matt. 22: 23. Luke 20: 28. Mark 12: 18. John 11: 23, 24. Acts 23: 6, 8. Our Savior arose himself from the dead, to give us, in his own person, a proof, a pledge, and a pattern of our future resurrection. St. Paul, in almost all his epistles, speaks of a general resurrection, refutes those who denied or opposed it, and proves and explains it by several circumstances, Acts 24: 15. Rom. 6: 5. 1 Cor. 15: 12—15. Phil. 3: 10, 11. Heb. 6: 2. 11: 35. 1 Thess. 4: 13—17, &c. The following remarks are from Mr. Watson.

On this subject no point of discussion, of any importance, arises among those who admit the truth of Scripture, except as to the way in which the doctrine of the resurrection of the body is to be understood; whether a resurrection of the substance of the body be meant, or of some minute and indestructible part of it. The latter theory has been adopted for the sake of avoiding certain supposed difficulties. It cannot, however, fail to strike every impartial reader of the New Testament, that the doctrine of the resurrection is there taught without any nice distinctions. It is always exhibited as a miraculous work; and represents the same body which is laid in the grave as the subject of this change from death to life, by the power of Christ. Thus, our Lord was raised in the same body in which he died, and his resurrection is constantly held forth as the model of ours; and the apostle Paul expressly says, "Who shall change our rile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body?"

The only passage of Scripture which appears to favor the notion of the rising of the immortal body from some indestructible germ, is 1 Cor. 15: 35, &c.: "But some men will say, How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come? Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die; and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain," &c.

But, in the argument, the apostle confines himself wholly to the possibility of the resurrection of the body in a refined and glorified state; and omits all reference to the mode in which the thing will be effected, as being out of the line of the objector's questions, and in itself above human thought, and wholly miraculous. It is, however, clear, that when he speaks of the body, as the subject of this wondrous "change," he speaks of it popularly, as the same body in substance, whatever changes in its qualities or figure may be impressed upon it. Great general changes it will experience, as from corruption to incorruption, from mortality to immortality; great changes of a particular kind will also take place, as its being freed from deformities and defects, and the accidental varieties produced by climate, aliments, labor, and hereditary diseases.

It is also laid down by our Lord, that "in the resurrection they shall neither marry nor be given in marriage, but be like to the angels of God;" and this also implies a certain change of structure; and we may gather from the declaration of the apostle, that though "the stomach" is now adapted "to meats, and meats to the stomach," yet God will "destroy both it and them," that the animal appetite for food will be removed, and the organ now adapted to that appetite will have no place in the renewed frame. But great as these changes are, the human form will be retained in its perfection, after the model of our Lord's "glorious body," and the substance of the matter of which it is composed will not thereby be affected.

It has been made an objection that the same piece of matter may happen to be a part of two or more bodies, as in the instances of men feeding upon animals which have fed upon men, and of men feeding upon one another. The question here is one which simply respects the frustrating a final purpose of the Almighty by an operation of nature. To suppose that he cannot prevent this, is to deny his power; to suppose him inattentive to it, is to suppose him indifferent to his own desigus; and to assume that he employs care to prevent it, is to assume nothing greater, nothing in fact so great, as many instances of control, which are always occurring; as, for instance, the regulation of the proportion of the sexes in human births, which cannot be attributed to chance, but must either be referred to superintendence, or to some original law.

Another objection to the resurrection of the body has been drawn from the changes of its substance during life; the answer to which is, that, allowing a frequent and total change of the substance of the body (which, however, is but a hypothesis) to take place, it affects not the doctrine of Scripture, which is, that the body which is laid in the grave shall be raised up. But then, we are told, that if our bodies have in fact undergone successive changes during life, the bodies in which we have sinned or performed rewardable actions may not be, in many instances, the same bodies as those which will be actually rewarded or punished. We answer, that rewards and punishments have their relation to the body, not so much as it is the subject but as it is the instrument of reward and punishment. It is the soul only which perceives pain or pleasure, which suffers or enjoys, and is, therefore, the only rewardable subject. Were we, therefore, to admit such corporeal mutations as are assumed in this objection, they affect not the case of our accountability. The evidence of personal identity or sameness of a rational being, is self-consciousness: "By this," as Mr. Locke observes, "every one is to himself what he calls self, without considering whether that self be continued in the same or divers substances. It was by the same self which reflects on an action done many years ago, that the action was performed." If there were indeed any weight in this objection, it would affect the proceedings of human criminal courts in all cases of offences committed at some distance of time; but it contradicts the common sense, because it contradicts the common consciousness and experience, of mankind.

Our Lord has assured us, that "the hour is coming in which all that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation." Then we shall "all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump," and "the dead shall be raised incorruptible." It is probable that the bodies of the righteous and the wicked, though each shall in some respects be the same as before, will each be in other respects not the same, but undergo some change conformable to the character of the individual, and suited to his future state of existence; yet both, as the passage just quoted clearly teaches, are then rendered indistinguishable.

Respecting the good it is said, "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, we shall appear with him in glory;" "we shall be like him; our body shall be fashioned like his glorious body;" yet, notwithstanding this, "it doth not yet fully appear what we shall be." Col. 3: 4. 1 John 3: 2. Phil. 3: 21. This has a very obvious reason; language cannot communicate to us any such ideas as would render those matters comprehensible. But language may suggest striking and pleasing analogies; and with such we are presented by the holy apostle: "All flesh," says he, "is not the same flesh: but there is one flesh of men, another of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds;" and yet all these are fashioned out of the same kind of substance, mere inert matter, till God gives it life and activity. So will the body at the resurrection differ from what it is when committed to the grave. It is sown an animal body; a body which previously existed with all the organs, faculties, and propensities, requisite to procure, receive, and appropriate nutriment, as well as to perpetuate the species; but it shall be raised a spiritual body, refined from the dregs of matter, freed from the organs and senses required only in its former state, and probably possessing the remaining senses in greater perfection, together with new and more exquisite faculties, fitted for the exalted state of existence and enjoyment to which it is now arising.

In the present state, the organs and senses appointed to transmit the impressions of objects to the mind, have a manifest relation to the respective objects; the eye and seeing, for example, to light; the ear and hearing, to sound. In the refined and glorious state of existence to which good men are tending, where the objects which solicit attention will be infinitely more numerous, interesting, and delightful, may not the new organs, faculties, and senses, be proportionally refined, acute, susceptible, or penetrating? Human industry and invention have placed us, in a manner, in new worlds; what, then, may not a spiritual body, with sharpened faculties, and the grandest possible objects of contemplation, effect in the celestial regions to which Christians are invited? There the senses will no longer degrade the affections, the imagination no longer corrupt the heart; the magnificent scenery thrown open to view will animate the attention, give a glow and vigor to the sentiments; that roused attention will never tire; those glowing sentiments will never cloy; but the man, now constituted of an indestructible body, as well as of an immortal soul, may visit in eternal succession the streets of the celestial city, may "drink of the pure river of the water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God, and of the Lamb;" and dwell forever in those abodes of harmony and peace, which, though "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the imagination of man to conceive," we are assured "God hath prepared for them that love him," 1 Cor. 2: 9.

This doctrine is argued, 1. From the resurrection of Christ, 1 Cor. 15:—2. From the doctrines of grace, as union, election, redemption, &c.—3. From Scripture testimonies, Matt. 22: 23, &c. Job 19: 25, 27. Isa. 26: 19. Phil. 2: 20. 1 Cor. 15. Dan. 12: 2. 1 Thess. 4: 14. Rev. 20: 13.—4. From the general judgment, which of course requires it.

This doctrine is of great use and importance. It is one of the first principles of the doctrine of Christ; it is the whole gospel stands or falls with it. It serves to enlarge our views of the divine perfections. It encourages our faith and trust in God under all the difficulties of life. It has a tendency to regulate our affections and moderate our desires after earthly things. It supports the saints under the loss of near relations, and enables them to rejoice in the glorious prospect set before them. RESURRECTION OF CHRIST. Few articles are more important than this. It deserves our particular attention, because it is the grand hinge on which Christianity turns. Hence, says the apostle, he was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification. Infidels, however, have disbelieved it, but with what little reason we may easily see on considering the subject.

If the body of Jesus Christ, says Saurin, were not raised from the dead, it must have been stolen away. But this theft is incredible. Who committed it? The enemies of Jesus Christ? Would they have contributed to his glory by countenancing a report of his resurrection? Would his disciples? It is probable they would not, and it is next to certain they could not. How could they have undertaken to remove the body? Frail and timorous creatures, people who fled as soon as they saw him taken into custody; even Peter, the most courageous, trembled at the voice of a servant girl, and three times denied that he knew him. People of this character, would they have dared to resist the authority of the governor? Would they have undertaken to oppose the determination of the sanhedrim, to force a guard, and to elude, or overcome soldiers armed and aware of danger? If Jesus Christ was not risen again, (I speak the language of unbelievers,) he had deceived his disciples with vain hopes of his resurrection. How came the disciples not to discover the imposture? Would they have hazarded themselves by undertaking an enterprise so perilous in favor of a man who had so cruelly imposed on their credulity? But were we to grant that they formed the design of removing the body, how could they have executed it? How could soldiers armed, and on guard, suffer themselves to be overreached by a few timorous people? Either (says St. Augustine) they were asleep or awake; if they were awake, why should they suffer the body to be taken away? If asleep, how could they know that the disciples took it away? How dare they, then, depose that it was stolen?

The testimony of the apostles furnishes us with arguments, and there are eight considerations which give the evidence sufficient weight. 1. The nature of these witnesses. They were not men of power, riches, eloquence, credit, to impose upon the world; they were poor and mean. 2. The number of these witnesses. See 1 Cor. 15. Luke 24: 34. Mark 16: 14. Matt. 28: 10. It is not likely that a collusion should have been held among so many to support a lie, which would be of no utility to them. 3. The facts themselves which they avow; not suppositions, distant events, or events related by others, but real facts which they saw with their own eyes, 1 John 1. 4. The agreement of their evidence; they all deposed the same thing. 5. Observe the tribunals before which they gave evidence: Jews and heathens, philosophers and rabbins, courtiers and lawyers. If they had been impostors, the fraud certainly would have been discovered. 6. The place in which they bore their testimony. Not at a distance, where they might not easily have been detected, if false, but at Jerusalem, in the synagogues, in the pretorium. 7. The time of this testimony; not years after, but three days after, they declared he was risen: yea, before their rage was quelled, while Calvary was yet dyed with the blood they had spilt. If it had been a fraud, it is not likely they would have come forward in such broad daylight, amidst so much opposition. 8. Lastly, the motives which induced them to publish the resurrection; not to gain fame, riches, glory, profit; no, they exposed themselves to suffering and death, and proclaimed the truth from conviction of its importance and certainty.

"Collect," says Saurin, "all these proofs together; consider them in one point of view, and see how many extravagant suppositions must be advanced if the resurrection of our Savior be denied. It must be supposed that guards, who had been particularly cautioned by their officers, sat down to sleep; and that, however, they deserved credit when they said the body of Jesus Christ was stolen. It must be supposed that men, who have been imposed on in the most odious and cruel manner in the world, hazarded their dearest enjoyments for the glory of an impostor. It must be supposed that ignorant and illiterate men, who had neither reputation, fortune, nor eloquence, possessed the art of fascinating the eyes of all the church. It must be supposed either that five hundred persons were all deprived of their senses at a time, or that they were all deceived in the plainest matters of fact; or that this multitude of false witnesses had found out the secret of never contradicting themselves or one another, and of being always uniform in their testimony. It must be supposed that the most expert courts of judicature could not find out a shadow of contradiction in a palpable imposture. It must be supposed that the apostles, sensible men in other cases, chose precisely those places and those times which were most unfavorable to their views. It must be supposed that millions madly suffered imprisonments, tortures, and crucifixions to spread an illusion. It must be supposed that ten thousand miracles were wrought in favor of falsehood, or all these facts must be denied; and then it must be supposed that the apostles were idiots; that the enemies of Christianity were idiots; and that all the primitive Christians were idiots."

The doctrine of the resurrection of Christ affords us a variety of useful instructions. Here we see evidence of divine power; prophecy accomplished; the character of Jesus established; his work finished; and a future state proved. It is a ground of faith, the basis of hope, a source of consolation, and a stimulus to obedience. See Saurin's Sermons; Dutton and West on the Resurrection; Cook's Illustration of the General Evidence establishing the Reality of Christ's Resurrection, p. 323; Edectic Review, vol. iv.; Dwight's Theology; Douglass on the Truths of Religion; Fuller's Works; Works of Robert Hall; but especially a small but admirable Essay on the Resurrection of Christ, by Mr. Dore.—Hend. RETIREMENT; the state of a person who quits a public station in order to be alone. Retirement is of great advantage to a wise man. To him "the hour of solitude is the hour of meditation. He communes with his own heart. He reviews the actions of his past life. He corrects what is amiss. He rejoices in what is right; and, wiser by experience, lays the plan of his future life. The great and the noble, the wise and the learned, the pious and the good, have been lovers of serious retirement. On this field the patriot forms his schemes, the philosopher pursues his discoveries, the saint improves himself in wisdom and goodness. Solitude is the hallowed ground which religion, in every age, has adopted as its own. There her sacred inspiration is felt, and her holy mysteries elevate the soul; there devotion lifts up the voice; there falls the tear of contrition; there the heart pours itself forth before him who made, and him who redeemed it. Apart from men, we live with nature, and converse with God." Logan's Sermon's, vol. ii. ser. 2; Blair's Sermons, vol. i. ser. 9; Bates' Rural Philosophy; Brewster's Recluse; Zimmerman on Solitude; Works of Robert Hall.—Hend. RETRIBUTION, FUTURE. That man is a responsible being, and that his responsibility extends into his future state of existence, is generally admitted throughout the world. The denial of all punishment in a future state, is the result of certain modern discoveries of a very recent date and limited range; and rests chiefly on two unscriptural and contradictory dogmas, the immaculate spirituality and the mortal materialism of the human soul. These dogmas lie at the foundation of the respective systems of Messrs. Ballou and Balfour, the fathers of modern Universalism; to whose writings we must refer our readers for the full explanation and defence of these novel opinions. See also the articles ADAM, AION, HELL, MATERIALISM, and UNIVERSALISTS, in this work.

Among those who believe in a punishment after death, of different degrees of severity, proportioned to the character and conduct of the guilty, a difference of opinion exists as to its design and duration. See RESTORATIONISTS. As in that article the leading arguments are introduced in support of its remedial design, and limited duration, we shall here state some of the evidence on the opposite side of the question.

It is proper, however, to observe, that there is no dispute about the fact of the divine benevolence in punishment. The only question on this point is, whether benevolence requires the divine Lawgiver to consult the happiness of the transgressor beyond the limits of his present probationary state; or whether the general good be not better consulted by warning him beforehand that his probation terminates with his present life, and that if he does not turn from his sins here, he must hereafter be made a warning example to the universe.

This question cannot be settled by abstract reasoning. It must be decided by an appeal to divine revelation.

The position believed to be taught in the Scriptures, is this:—THAT ALL SINNERS WHO DO NOT REPENT AND TAKE REFUGE IN THE SAVIOR IN THE PRESENT LIFE, SHALL IN THE FUTURE STATE SUFFER EVERLASTING PUNISHMENT, AS THE NECESSARY AND JUST RETRIBUTION OF THEIR SINS.

This doctrine, however awful, it must be acknowledged by all, appears to be taught in the sacred Scriptures. It cannot be denied to have been believed by the vast majority of Christians since the Reformation; nor by the ancient Waldenses, those martyr-witnesses to the truth in the dark ages. It cannot be denied to have been believed by the fathers of the third, second, and first centuries. It is expressly taught by Clemens Romanus; by Justin Martyr; by Irenæus; by Tertullian; by Cyprian; by Minutius Felix; and is even recognised by Origen himself, who reckons this among the doctrines defined by the church, "that every soul, going out of this world, shall either enjoy the inheritance of life and bliss, if his deeds have rendered him fit for bliss; or be delivered up to eternal fire and punishment, if his sins have deserved that state." See Whitby in Scott on Heb. 6: 1-3. Gibbon, in his History, vol. ii. gives his testimony to the same fact. And more particular evidence can be brought forward if necessary.

These things are not brought forward now as proofs of the doctrine; though they afford what logicians call a violent presumption that it was an original part of Christianity. The only proper evidence is drawn, not from the decisions of fallible man, but from the unerring testimony of the divine oracles. The foregoing facts amount, as we have said, to no more than a strong presumption in favor of the doctrine. We proceed to the proof.

We urge, 1. Those passages of Scripture which declare that certain sinners shall not enter the kingdom of heaven:—Matt. 5: 20. 7: 21-23. Luke 13: 26. Matt. 18: 3. Mark 10: 23-27. Luke 13: 21. Matt. 7: 13. John 3: 3-5. 1 Cor. 6: 9, 10. Gal. 5: 19-21. Ephes. 5: 5. Heb. 3: 13. 4: 1, 13.

If some men, according to the language of these Scriptures, are to be excluded from heaven, they must necessarily sink to hell; for the Scriptures give us no intimation of a middle state. Purgatory was the invention of later ages.

2. Those passages of Scripture which describe the future and final state of men in contrast:—Ps. 17: 14, 15. Prov. 10: 28. 14: 35. Dan. 12: 2. Matt. 3: 12. 7: 13, 14. 21: 8, 11, 12. 13: 30-43, 47-50. 24: 46-51. 25: 23-46. Mark 16: 16. Luke 6: 23, 24, 47-49. John 3: 16. 5: 29. Rom. 9: 21-23. 2 Tim. 2: 19, 20. Gal. 6: 7, 8. Heb. 6: 8, 9. Phil. 3: 17-21. 2 Thes. 1: 5-12. 1 Pet. 4: 18. Rom. 6: 21-23.

These passages we consider as referring to the final state of man, for these reasons: 1. Because in several of them the state is expressly called their end. 2. Because the state of the righteous and the wicked are put in exact opposition to each other. If in respect to the former it is not denied to be final, it must therefore, by parity of reason, be true of the latter. 3. There is a dead silence about any succeeding state. And, 4. The phraseology of some of the passages will admit of no other interpretation. But if the final state of some men will be miserable, there will be some who will suffer everlasting punishment; for no other state can succeed that which is final.

3. Those passages of Scripture which apply the terms "everlasting," "eternal," "forever," and "forever and ever," to this future state:—Dan. 12: 2. Matt. 18: 8. 25: 41-46. 2 Thes. 1: 9. Mark 3: 29. Jude 7. 2 Peter 2: 17. Jude 13. Rev. 14: 10-12. 19: 3. 20: 10. 2 Cor. 4: 18.

On these terms, we would observe, 1. That they are as strong as any in the Greek language to express endless duration. 2. That although sometimes used improperly, for a limited duration, there is nothing in this case which requires them to be limited. The sound rule of interpretation is, always to give a word its usual and proper signification, unless there be something in the context, or in the nature of the subject itself, to indicate that it is used in a different sense. 3. The antithesis which occurs in several of the above passages, fixes the meaning, beyond all rational doubt. If the Spirit of God has chosen the same terms to express the duration of future punishment, which he employs to denote the duration of future felicity, he certainly would have us to understand them to be coextensive in duration.

4. Those passages which express future punishment by phrases which imply its eternity:—John 17: 9. Matt. 12: 31, 32. Mark 3: 29. 1 John 5: 16. Heb. 6: 6. 10: 26, 27. Luke 9: 25. Matt. 10: 28. Mark 9: 43-48. Luke 14: 26. John 3: 36. 8: 21. Phil. 3: 9. James 2: 13.

If there be some, for whom Christ refuses to intercede—some who shall not be forgiven, but are obnoxious to eternal damnation—some whose sin is unto death, and must not be prayed for—some whom it is impossible to renew to repentance, who are nigh unto cursing, whose end is to be burned—some who draw back unto perdition, who lose their own souls, or are cast away, for whom it had been good if they had not been born; then there are some who will suffer eternal punishment; for all these phrases imply it.

Furthermore, if there be a hell, a fire that never shall be quenched, where their worm dieth not, and their fire is not quenched; if between this dread abode and the world of bliss there be an impassable chasm; if they who believe not the Son of God shall not see life, but the wrath of God abide on them; if they die in their sins, and where Christ is they cannot come; if they shall have judgment without mercy, and their end is destruction; then there will be some who will suffer endless punishment.

5. Those passages which intimate that a change of heart, and a preparation for heaven, are confined to this life:—Is. 55: 6, 7. Prov. 1: 24-28. Luke 13: 24-29. John 12: 36. Matt. 25: 5-13. 2 Cor. 6: 1, 2. Heb. 3: 1-10. 13: 15-22. Rev. 22: 11.

If there are limits to the accepted time; if the day of salvation is to be succeeded by a night in which no man can work; if some shall find the door of acceptance closed against them; if a period is approaching beyond which there can be no change of moral character, and the character of some shall then be unholy and unjust; then it follows that some will suffer punishment without end.

To all these arguments one subtle objection has been made, which ought to be considered. These threatenings are all (it has been said) the voice of the law, denouncing merely what sinners deserve to suffer; but the gospel, notwithstanding, secures the salvation of all. To this it may be replied, the gospel ascertains the salvation of none but real believers, Rom. 1: 16. But all manifestly do not obey the gospel. Hence a long train of warning declarations in the Scriptures; which we shall embody into a sixth class of arguments, in support of the doctrine we maintain, as the doctrine of Holy Writ.

6. Those passages of Scripture which foretell the consequences of rejecting the gospel:—Ps. 2: 12. Prov. 29: 1. Acts 13: 40-46. 20: 26, 28, 26, 27. 1 Cor. 1: 18. 2 Cor. 4: 3. 2: 15, 16. 1 Cor. 16: 22. 1 Thes. 5: 3. 2 Thes. 1: 8. 2: 10-12. Heb. 2: 1-3. 4: 1-11. 10: 26-31, 38, 39. 22: 25-29. James 2: 14. 1 Peter 4: 17, 18. 2 Peter 2: 1-21. 3: 7. Rom. 10: 12.

The gospel, we well know, presents the only way of salvation to mankind, Acts 4: 12. To reject the gospel then, is to reject the only method by which we can be saved. Hence those who do it must necessarily and inevitably perish. In the words of the apostle, they judge themselves unworthy of everlasting life. And in these passages it is expressly declared that some do reject it; that they do perish; that the ministry of the gospel itself is to them but "a savor of death unto death."

Furthermore: as the gospel is the most signal display of the wisdom and mercy of God, its rejection must involve the sinner in deeper guilt and condemnation. Hence in the above passages the doom of the unbeliever and the apostate is represented as the most severe and dreadful, John 3: 19. Luke 15: 10-15.

At the thought of such a tremendous catastrophe awaiting such of our fellow-men as continue in sin, our hearts are moved. "Knowing the terror of the Lord," says the apostle, "we persuade men." Oh that they would be persuaded! Oh that they would in time take warning, and "flee from the wrath to come!" Oh that the glorious REFRUGES (Isa. 32: 2.) might be thronged with multitudes of true and penitent believers, from every kindred and clime, even now to begin the song, "Salvation to our God and to the Lamb!"—Chris. Sol.; Fuller's Works; Stuart's Essays.

RETZ, (JOHN FRANCIS PAUL DE GONDI, Cardinal de.) remarkable for his daring and intriguing spirit, was born, in 1614, at Montmirail; became coadjutor to the archbishop of Paris, archbishop of Corinth, and a cardinal; took a prominent part in the troubles of France, and in opposing Mazarin, during the minority of Louis XIV.; was imprisoned, but escaped, and remained in exile till 1661; practised in his declining years those virtues which he had trampled under foot in his youth; and died in 1679. His Memoirs are highly interesting.—Davenport.

REUBEN, (he, the Lord, sees the son; so called in reference to the sentiment of his mother, "The Lord hath looked on my affliction;") the eldest son of Jacob and Leah; born A. M. 2246, Gen. 29: 32. Reuben, having defiled his father's concubine Bilhah, lost his birthright, and all the privileges of primogeniture, Gen. 35: 22. When, however, Joseph's brethren had taken a resolution to destroy him, Reuben endeavored by all means to deliver him.

Moses, before his death, said of Reuben, (Deut. 33: 6.) "Let Reuben live and not die, yet let his number be but small." His tribe was never very numerous, nor very considerable in Israel. They had their inheritance beyond Jordan, between the brooks Arnon south, and Jazer north, having the mountains of Gilead east, and Jordan west. (See CANAAN.)—Calmet.

REVELATION; the act of revealing or making a thing public that was before unknown; it is also used for the discoveries made by God to his prophets, and by them to the world; and more particularly for the books of the Old and New Testament. (See BIBLE.)

A revelation is, in the first place, possible. God may, for any thing we can certainly tell, think proper to make some discovery to his creatures which they knew not before. As he is a Being of infinite power, we may be assured he cannot be at a loss for means to communicate his will, and that in such a manner as will sufficiently mark it his own.

2. It is desirable. For, whatever the light of nature could do for man before reason was depraved, it is evident that it has done little for man since. Though reason be necessary to examine the authority of divine revelation, yet, in the present state, it is incapable of giving us proper discoveries of God, the way of salvation, or of bringing us into a state of communion with God. It therefore follows,

3. That it is necessary. Without it we can attain to no certain knowledge of God, of Christ, of the Holy Ghost, of pardon, of justification, of sanctification, of happiness, of a future state of rewards and punishments.

4. No revelation, as Mr. Brown observes, relative to the redemption of mankind, could answer its respective ends, unless it were sufficiently marked with internal and external evidences. That the Bible hath internal evidence, is evident from the ideas it gives us of God's perfections, of the law of nature, of redemption, of the state of man, &c. As to its external evidence, it is easily seen by the characters of the men who composed it, the miracles wrought, its success, the fulfilment of its predictions, &c. (See SCRIPTURE.)

5. The contents of revelation are agreeable to reason. It is true there are some things above the reach of reason; but a revelation containing such things is no contradiction, as long as it is not against reason; for if every thing be rejected which cannot be exactly comprehended, we must become unbelievers at once of almost every thing around us. The doctrines, the institutions, the threatenings, the precepts, the promises, of the Bible, are every way reasonable. The matter, form, and exhibition of revelation are consonant with reason. (SEE REASON.)

6. The revelation contained in our Bible is perfectly credible. It is an address to the reason, judgment, and affections of men. The Old Testament abounds with the finest specimens of history, sublimity, and interesting scenes of providence. The facts of the New Testament are supported by undoubted evidence from enemies and friends. The attestations to the early existence of Christianity are numerous from Ignatius, Polycarp, Irenæus, Justin Martyr, and Tatian, who were Christians; and by Tacitus, Sueton, Seneca, Pliny, &c. who were heathens. (SEE CHRISTIANITY.)

7. The revelations contained in our Bible are divinely inspired. The matter, the manner, the scope, the predictions, miracles, preservation, &c. &c. all prove this. (SEE INSPIRATION.)

8. Revelation is attended for universal benefit. It is a common objection to it, that hitherto it has been confined to few, and therefore could not come from God, who is so benevolent; but this mode of arguing will equally hold good against the permission of sin, the inequalities of providence, the dreadful evils and miseries of mankind, which God could have prevented. It must be further observed, that none deserve a revelation; that men have despised and abused the early revelations he gave to his people. This revelation, we have reason to believe, shall be made known to all mankind. Already it is spreading its genuine influence. In the cold regions of the north, in the burning regions of the south, the Bible begins to be known; and from the predictions it contains, we believe the glorious sun of revelation shall shine and illuminate the whole globe.

9. The effects of revelation which have already taken place in the world have been astonishing. In proportion as the Bible has been known, arts and sciences have been cultivated, peace and liberty have been diffused, civil and moral obligations have been attended to. Nations have emerged from ignorance and barbarity, whole communities have been morally reformed, unnatural practices abolished, and wise laws instituted. Its spiritual effects have been wonderful. Kings and peasants, conquerors and philosophers, the wise and the ignorant, the rich and the poor, have been brought to the foot of the cross; yea, millions have been enlightened, improved, reformed, and made happy by its influences. Let any one deny this, and he must be a hardened, ignorant infidel, indeed. Great is the truth and must prevail.

See Dr. Leland's Necessity of Revelation. "This work," says Mr. Ryland, "has had no answer, and I am persuaded it never will meet with a solid confutation." Holyburton against the Deists; Leland's View of Deistical Writers; Bromm's Compendium of Natural and Revealed Religion; Stillingfleet's Origines Sacrae is, perhaps, one of the ablest defences of revealed religion ever written. Delony's Revelation examined with Candor; *Arch. REVELATION, (THE BOOK OF.) (SEE APOCALYPSE.)

REVOCATUS, a Christian martyr under Severus, was a catechumen of Carthage, and a slave. On the day appointed for the execution, he was led to the amphitheatre, and having denounced God's judgment upon his persecutors, was ordered to run the gantlope between the hunters, and be severely lashed as he passed. He was then destroyed by wild beasts, A. D. 205.—Fox, p. 24.

REVENGE, means the return of injury for injury, or the infliction of pain on another in consequence of an injury received from him, farther than the just ends of reparation or punishment require. Revenge differs materially from resentment, which rises in the mind immediately on being injured; but revenge is a cool and deliberate wickedness, and is often executed years after the offence is given. By some it is considered as a perversion of anger. Anger, it is said, is a passion given to man for wise and proper purposes; but revenge is the corruption of anger; is unnatural, and therefore ought to be suppressed. It is observable that the proper object of anger is vice; but the object in general of revenge is man. It transfers the hatred due to the vice to the man, to whom it is not due. It is forbidden by the Scriptures, and is unbecoming the character and spirit of a peaceful follower of Jesus Christ. (SEE ANGER.)—Hend. Buck.

REVENGER. (SEE AVENGER OF BLOOD.)

REVERENCE; a respectful, submissive disposition of mind, arising from affection and esteem, from a sense of superiority in the person revered. Hence children reverence their fathers, even when their fathers correct them by stripes; (Heb. 12: 9.) hence subjects reverence their sovereign; (2 Sam. 9: 6.) hence wives reverence their husbands; (Eph. 5: 33.) and hence all ought to reverence God. We reverence the name of God, the house of God, the worship of God, &c.; we reverence the attributes of God, the commands, dispensations, &c. of God; and we ought to demonstrate our reverence by overt acts, such as are suitable and becoming to time, place, and circumstances; for though a man may reverence God in his heart, yet, unless he behave reverentially, and give proofs of his reverence by demeanor, conduct, and obedience, he will not easily persuade his fellow-mortals that his bosom is the residence of this divine and heavenly disposition: for, in fact, a reverence for God is not one of those lights which burn under a bushel, but one of those whose sprightly lustre illuminates wherever it is admitted. Reverence is, strictly speaking, perhaps, the internal disposition of the mind; (phobos, Rom. 13: 7.) and honor, (timē), the external expression of that disposition. (See ANORATION, and LORD'S NAME TAKEN IN VAIN.)—Colmet.

REVEREND; venerable; deserving awe and respect. It is a title of respect given to ecclesiastics. The religious abroad are called reverend fathers; and abbesses, prioresses, &c., reverend mothers. In England, bishops are right reverend, and archbishops most reverend; private clergymen reverend. In France, before the revolution, their bishops, archbishops, and abbots, were all alike most reverend. In Scotland, the clergy, individually, are reverend; a synod is, very reverend; and the general assembly is, venerable. The Dissenters, also, in England have the title of reverend; though some of them suppose the term implies too much to be given to a mere creature, and that of God only it may be said with propriety, "holy and reverend is his name," Ps. 111: 4. In this country it is used in its abridged form, merely as a convenient ministerial designation. It were however to be wished, that all to whom it is applied would strive to be as venerable (semnos) as the term imports. The Christian law is, "Esteem them very highly in love, for their works' sake."—Hend. Buck.

REWARD; a recompense, requital, retribution for some service done; the fruit and benefit of labor. It is of several kinds: as mental; the reward of a good action is enjoyed in reflection, satisfaction, a sense of having been useful, &c.; pecuniary, or profitable; such as is due to laborers for their work; (1 Tim. 5: 18. Job 7: 2.) a gift, or acquisition, to counterbalance an injury, Prov. 21: 14. 22: 4.

Rewards are not always conferred by Providence on good men in this life, but their reward is in heaven, Matt. 5: 12. Luke 6: 23. (See JUDGMENT; RETRIBUTION.)

The essence of reward being satisfaction, a reward given freely, a reward prompted by grace and favor, is a donation not claimable by the party who receives it, on account of his own merit, but is bestowed in kindness by the giver; and therefore, though in strictness it is not reward for work done, yet it is no less a remuneration, and is at once a gift and a satisfaction. "Raphaelus has shown, (says Dr. Doddridge,) that mithon not only signifies a reward of debt, but also a gift of favor; and that the phrase mithon doreñe occurs in Herodotus: so that a reward of grace, or favor, is a classical as well as a theological expression." {Note on Rom. 4: 4.}—Calmet.

REYNOLDS, (EDWARD, D. D.,) bishop of Norwich, was born in Southampton, (Eng.) November, 1599. In 1615, he became post-master of Merton college, and in 1620, probationer-fellow. Having taken the degree of master of arts, he went into orders, was made preacher at Lincoln's inn, and rector of Braynton, in Northamptonshire. In the rebellion of 1642, he sided with the Presbyterian party; and in 1643, was one of the Westminster assembly of divines, a covenanter, a frequent preacher in London, and sometimes before the long parliament; by which he was appointed, in 1646, one of the six ministers to go to Oxford, and preach to the students their duty of submission to its authority. After this, he was one of the visitors in the university, was made dean of Christ church, and, in 1648, vice-chancellor, when he was created doctor of divinity. He was vice-chancellor the preceding year also. Being ejected from his deanery in 1650, for refusing to take the independent engagement, he retired to his former cure for a time; but afterwards preached in London, as vicar of St. Lawrence juxta. He exerted himself much for the restoration of Charles II. to the throne; and by that event was restored to his deanery, in 1659, and in 1660, was made chaplain to his majesty. He quit his deanery soon after, and was elected warden of Merton college. In 1661, he was consecrated bishop of Norwich; and in July, 1667, died, in the sixty-eighth year of his age.

As a man of learning, bishop Reynolds led a conspicuous place among his contemporaries; to a mind singularly endowed by nature, he added most extensive acquirements; but he appears to have been more particularly eminent as an eloquent preacher of evangelical truth. The duties of the ministry called into exercise his nobler powers, and he was much devoted to the work; nor when he was appointed to his see were his exertions slackened, but he afforded a singular example of diligence in the discharge of episcopal duty. He ever proved himself a man of God, thoroughly furnished to every good word and work.

His publications were many; among them are numerous sermons. The "Assembly of Divines' Annotations," which are on Ecclesiastes, came from his hand. His works were much read and commended by the adherents to various persuasions.—Middleton's Evan. Biog. vol. iii. p. 424.

REYNOLDS, (Sir JOSHUA,) a celebrated artist, was born, in 1723, at Plympton, in Devonshire; of the grammar-school of which place his father, a clergyman, was the master. As he early manifested a taste for drawing, he was placed under Hudson. He afterwards visited Rome, where he studied for three years. In 1752, he settled in the British metropolis, where he rapidly rose to eminence, and numbered Burke, Johnson, and other illustrious characters, among his friends. When the Royal academy was instituted, in 1768, he was unanimously chosen president, and was knighted. In 1783, he was appointed principal painter to the king. He died February 23, 1792.

His literary works, the principal of which are the masterly Discourses delivered to the Academy, form three volumes. In the British school of art, especially as a portrait painter, he stands the first of his age; as a writer he displays much elegance and sound sense; and as a man he was deservedly beloved. "He had (says Burke) too much merit not to excite some jealousy; too much innocence to provoke any enmity." Like Johnson and Burke, Sir Joshua was a Christian, and his last illness was cheered by the spirit of resignation and immortal hope. Life by Northcote.—Davenport.

REYNOLDS, (RICHARD;) a philanthropist of Bristol, England, a contemporary and kindred spirit with Howard. He possessed a character of signal moral excellence; modest, yet dignified, judicious, yet liberal in the disposition of his bounties; discriminating and successful in the detection of imposture, yet unbounded in his benevolence; combining the most unbending integrity with the utmost tenderness of heart. Humility was one of the most prominent features of his character. It was remarked by Rev. Mr. Thrope, that although the whole empire felt the effects of his beneficence, so industriously were his charities concealed, that after his decease many were heard to ask the question, Who is this Richard Reynolds?

It was not until the formation of the "Reynolds Commemoration Society," at Bristol, in 1816, that multitudes, who had never heard his name, began to inquire into his origin and connexions, the principles which formed the basis of his character, and the school whence those principles were derived. To those inquiries there is one short and comprehensive answer.

Richard Reynolds was a Christian. Under the regenerating influence of Christianity he became a new creature; on her lap he was nurtured, under her discipline he was trained, and the whole career of his benevolence was nothing more than a practical exemplification of the lessons she inculcated. In her school, under her tuition, and by her fostering hand only, such characters ever were or ever can be formed. How odious, when placed with the names of Howard, Hanway, Thornton, and Reynolds, are those of Paine, Voltaire, Hume, Bolingbroke, and of the whole race of infidels! Here we recognise angels of mercy amidst fiends of wrath, saviors amidst the destroyers of mankind.—Thorp's Address; Chris. Orator.

REZIN; a king of Syria, who combined with Pekah, king of Israel, to invade Judah, (2 Kings 15: 37, 38. 16: 5, 6.) A. M. 3262. See also 2 Chron. 28: 5—7. The Hebrew and the Vulgate (2 Kings 16: 6.) seem to intimate, that he conquered Elath for the Syrians. But the tenor of the discourse sufficiently shows, that we ought to read, "for the Idumeans;" and that the Hebrew should be read Edom, not Aram. The difference between these two words in the original, is hardly perceivable: Leadom instead of Learam.—Calmet.

RHEGIUM; a city of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, at which Paul landed in his way to Rome, A. D. 61, Acts 28: 13, 14.—Calmet.

RHODES; an island and famous city of the Levant, the ancient name of which was Asteria, Ophiusa, and Etheria. Its modern name alludes to the great quantity and beauty of the roses that grew there. It is chiefly famous for its brazen Colossus, which was one hundred and five feet high; made by Chares, of Lyndus: it continued perfect only fifty-six years, being thrown down by an earthquake, under the reign of Ptolemy Evergetes, king of Egypt, who began to reign B. C. 244. When Paul went to Jerusalem, A. D. 58, he visited Rhodes, Acts 21: 1.—Calmet.

RIBLAH; a delightful city of Syria, in the country of Emath, the situation of which, however, is unknown. Jerome has taken it for Antioch of Syria, or for the country of Emath, or Emmas, which was still in his time the first stage of those who travelled from Syria into Mesopotamia. However, this lies under great difficulties. Antioch was at a distance from Emesa, nor was it on the road from Judea to Mesopotamia.—Calmet.

RICE, (JOHN H., D. D.), professor in the Union Theological Seminary, in Prince Edward county, Virginia, was for many years the most distinguished Presbyterian minister in that state. The theological seminary was established in 1824. He was for some years the editor of the Evangelical and Literary Magazine. He died September 3, 1831, aged fifty-two. A paper of "Resolutions" was found in his pocket-book, among which were the following:—"Never spare person, property, or reputation, if I can do good; necessary, that I should die poor. Endeavor to feel kindly to every one; never indulge anger, envy, jealousy towards any human being. Endeavor to act so as to advance the present comfort, the intellectual improvement, and the purity and moral good of my fellow-men."

He published Memoirs of S. Davies; and Illustration of the Presbyterian Church in Virginia, 1816; on the Qualifications for the Minister, in the American Quarterly Register; a Discourse before the Foreign Board of Missions, 1828. See Memoirs, by Mr. Maxwell.—Allen.

RICHARDS, (WILLIAM, LL. D.) was born in 1749, in the parish of Penrhudd, in the vicinity of Haverfordwest, county of Pembroke, South Wales. When he had attained the age of twelve, he had had only one year's schooling; and with the exception of the little assistance he received from his father, he was wholly indebted for the rudiments of his education to his own native genius, and indefatigable application, which rendered him, by the time he was twenty, a prodigy of learning and knowledge. Though the Bible was the favorite theme of his studies, his reading was not confined to it; he had made himself acquainted with the best authors in the English language, was well versed in civil and ecclesiastical history, and deemed an admirable critic in the Cambro-British tongue.

Mr. Richards, previously to the decease of his father, had been baptized on a profession of his faith in Christ, and admitted into the fellowship of a Christian church assembling at Rhydwillim, in the county of Carmarthen. Having determined to devote his life to the ministry of the gospel, he placed himself in the Baptist academy at Bristol, in the year 1773, where he continued two years. It was then under the superintendance of the Rev. Hugh Evans, and his son, Caleb Evans. On leaving the academy at Bristol, Mr. Richards accepted an invitation to Pershore, in Worcestershire, where he became assistant to Dr. John Ash, pastor of the Baptist church at that place, and of whose friendship and virtues he spoke highly. In 1776 he accepted an invitation from the Baptist church at Lynn, in Norfolk, to become their pastor.

In the year 1781 he published a "Review of Mr. Carter's Strictures on Infant Baptism." This was followed, soon afterwards, by two other tracts, the first entitled, "Observations on Infant Sprinkling." The other, and by far the most elaborate one, was "The History of Antichrist; or, Free Thoughts on the Corruptions of Christianity." His greatest effort, as an author, was "The History of Lynn," in two large octavo volumes, embellished with engravings.

At length an ossification of the heart proved fatal, on the 13th of September, 1818, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. He was amiable, kind, affectionate, and sincere; and through life as much beloved, as at his death he was lamented. His library, which was very considerable, he bequeathed to the college of Rhode Island, (Brown university,) in America. See Le moirs, by Dr. J. Evans.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

RICHARDS, (JAMES), a missionary, was born in Abington, Massachusetts, February 23, 1784; his parents, while he was young, removed to Plainfield. He graduated at Williams college, in 1809, being there the associate of Mills. Having studied theology at Andover, and medicine at Philadelphia, he embarked for Ceylon in October, 1815. Of a pulmonary disorder, which interrupted his missionary labors, he died, August 3, 1822, aged thirty-eight. He was eminently pious, and died in peace. Miss. Herald, No. 19, pp. 241—247.—Allen.

RICHMOND, (LEON,) well known as the author of that interesting tale, "The Dairyman's Daughter," was born at Liverpool, on the 29th of January, 1772. His father was a physician, and educated his son at home, in consequence of an accident which befell the latter when a youth, and produced a lameness, to which he was subject through life. Having received all the advantages which private tuition and a respectable school could afford, Mr. Richmond was removed to Trinity college, Cambridge, in August, 1789, where he completed his course of study, intending, without any religion, to enter on the Christian ministry in the established church. He consequently received episcopal ordination, and obtained a curacy in the Isle of Wight.

It was not long after this that he unexpectedly met with Mr. Wilberforce's treatise on "Practical Christianity," to which, under God, he attributed a total revolution of his opinions and principles on the nature of the gospel system. This change led him to examine the writings of the reformers, at home and abroad, which issued in his becoming decidedly evangelical in his doctrinal sentiments. One of the first fruits of his pen was the narrative of the "Dairyman's Daughter," which was followed by the "Negro Servant," and the "Young Cottager;" all of which tracts acquired unexampled celebrity, and were, in 1814, collected into one volume, and published under the title of "Annals of the Poor."

Mr. Richmond was now drawn from a state of obscurity, and prevailed on to take an active part in most of the benevolent institutions, which have so remarkably signalized the present age,—the Bible, Missionary, and Religious Tract societies; all of which received from him effective co-operation. He also undertook the task of editing an edition of the writings of the English reformers, whom he rescued from obscurity; and became instant in every good work. He obtained the rectorship of Turvey, in Bedfordshire, and was made chaplain to his royal highness the duke of Kent. He died on the 8th of May, 1828, highly respected and esteemed. See Life by Grimsbam.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

RIDLEY, (BP. NICOLAS, D. D.) an eminent English prelate and martyr, descended from an ancient family in Northumberland, was born, early in the sixteenth century, at Wilmontswick, in that county. About 1518 he was entered of Pembroke hall, Cambridge; and was taught Greek by Robert Crook, who had begun a course of that language at Cambridge. To his knowledge of the learned languages, he added that of philosophy and theology. For further improvement in the latter, he went to the Sorbonne, at Paris, and from thence to Louvaine; continuing on the continent till 1529. Returning to Cambridge, he applied with more than ordinary industry to the study of the Scriptures. For this purpose he used to walk in the orchard at Pembroke hall, and there commit to memory almost all the epistles in Greek; which walk is still called Ridley's Walk. In 1533 he was chosen senior proctor of the university; and while in that office the important point of the pope's supremacy was examined, on the authority of Scripture. The decision of the university was, that "the bishop of Rome had no more authority and jurisdiction derived to him from God in this kingdom of England, than any other foreign bishop;" which was signed by the vice-chancellor, and by Nicholas Ridley and Richard Wilkes, proctors. In 1538 Ridley was collated to the vicarage of Herne, in Kent.

King Edward ascended the throne in 1547; and Dr. Ridley, in his sermons before the king, as well as on other occasions, exposed, with boldness and eloquence, the errors of popery. In the same year he was promoted to the bishopric of Rochester. In 1548 bishop Ridley appears to have been employed in compiling the Common Prayer, in conjunction with archbishop Cranmer and others; and, in 1549, he was put into a commission, together with Cranmer, and several others, to search after all Anabaptists, heretics, and contemners of the Common Prayer. This produced the execution of Bocher and Paris. What Christian can read "as without regret? In 1549, Bonner, bishop of London, was deprived, and Ridley, who was one of the commissioners before whom his cause was determined, was thought the most proper person to fill that important see; and he was accordingly installed in 1550. Bishop Ridley filled his high station with great dignity, and was a pattern of piety, temperance, and regularity to all around him. To promote more generally a reformation in the doctrine of the church, the council, this year, appointed Cranmer and Ridley to prepare a book of articles of faith.

Upon the death of Edward VI., Ridley was earnestly attempting to set lady Jane Grey on the throne; but when the design had miscarried, he went to Mary, to do her homage, and submit himself to her clemency. His reception was such as he might have expected: he was immediately committed to the Tower. It has been thought he might have recovered the queen's favor, if he would have brought the weight of his learning and authority to countenance her proceedings in religion. He was, however, too honest to act against his conviction; and after eight months' imprisonment in the Tower, was conveyed from thence to Oxford, where, on the 1st of October, 1555, he was condemned to death for heresy.

Ridley now prepared himself for his approaching death; which a good conscience made him look upon as a matter of joy and triumph. He called it his marriage; and, in the evening preceding his execution, behaved himself with as much cheerfulness as ever. His brother offered to watch all night with him, but he would not suffer him, saying, "that he minded (God willing) to go to bed, and to sleep as quietly that night as ever he did in his life." When Ridley arrived at the place of execution, he earnestly lifted up his hands and eyes to heaven, till he saw, shortly after, Latimer descending to the spot; upon which, with a most cheerful countenance, he ran to him, embraced, and kissed him, and comforted him, saying, "Be of good heart, brother, for God will either assuage the fury of the flame, or else strengthen us to abide it." Then, moving to the stake, he knelt down and prayed earnestly, as did Latimer likewise. Dr. Marshall urged him to recant, saying, "If you will not do so, then there is no remedy, but you must suffer for your deserts." "Well," replied the noble martyr, "so long as the breath is in my body, I will never deny my Lord Christ, and his known truth. God's will be done in me." The fire being given to them, when Ridley saw it flaming up towards him, he cried, with an exceeding loud voice, "Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit. O Lord, receive my spirit." He suffered on the 13th of October, 1555. See Dr. Glover Ridley's Life of Bishop Ridley; also Wordsworth's Eccles. Biog.; Middleton's Biog. Even.—Hend. Buck.

RIGHT, DIVINE; the sanction supposed to be found for certain ecclesiastical forms or arrangements in the word of God. Hence we read of the divine rights of episcopacy, presbytery, tithes, &c. When most of the texts, however, to which the appeal jure divino has been made, are examined by the light of enlightened criticism, and in accordance with consistent principles of interpretation, it will be found, that they could never have been made to speak the language which has been forced upon them, had it not been for the blindness of party prejudice, or the unblushing effrontery of interested party zeal. Not unfrequently they afford countenance to none of the parties who make the appeal, but authoritatively inculcate a doctrine, or establish a practice, of an altogether different nature from the matters in dispute.—Hend. Buck.

RIGHTEOUSNESS; justice, holiness. The righteousness of God is the absolute and essential perfections of his nature; sometimes it is put for his justice. The righteousness of Christ denotes not only his absolute perfection, but is taken for his perfect obedience to the law, and suffering the penalty thereof in our stead.

The righteousness of the law is that obedience which the law requires. As men have, at best, but a broken, damaged, and imperfect righteousness, this word is applied to men in a very limited and qualified sense; and also with respect to a better righteousness than merely human; that obtained by faith; that freely bestowed by God, and as bestowed, so received, through Christ. Righteousness denotes conformity to the ordinances of God, Matt. 3: 15. 21: 32. Righteousness is sometimes much the same as holiness, Acts 10: 35. Eph. 5: 9. The righteousness of the Pharisees, which was in their own eyes excellent, was precise to superstition, yet was unsound in principle, and worthless before God, Luke 18: 9. Matt. 9: 13.

The righteousness of faith is the righteousness of Christ as received by faith. (See JUSTIFICATION.)

Christians have a threefold righteousness. 1. The righteousness of their persons, as in Christ, his merit being imputed to them, and they accepted on the account thereof, 2 Cor. 5: 21. Eph. 5: 27. Isa. 45: 24. 2. The righteousness of their principles, being derived from, and formed according to, the rule of right, Ps. 119: 11. 3. The righteousness of their lives, produced by the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit, without which no man shall see the Lord, Heb. 13: 14. 1 Cor. 6: 11. See IMPUTATION; JUSTIFICATION; SANCTIFICATION; Dickinson's Letters, let. 12; Witherspoon's Essay on Imputed Righteousness; Hervey's Theron and Aspasio; Dr. Owen on Justification; Watts' Works, vol. iii. p. 532, oct. ed.; Jenks on Submission to the Righteousness of God; Edward's Sermons; Fuller's Works; Dwight's Theology.—Hend. Buck; Calmet.

RIGHT HAND, denotes power, or strength; whence Scripture generally imputes to God's right hand the effects of his omnipotence, Exod. 15: 6. Ps. 21: 8. 44: 3, &c. Matt. 26: 64. Col. 3: 1. Heb. 1: 3. 10: 12.

The right hand commonly denotes the south, as the left hand denotes the north.

"To depart from the law of God neither to the right hand nor to the left," is a frequent Scripture expression, meaning a strict adherence to it: we must observe it closely, constantly, invariably; as a traveller, who does not quit his way, either to the right or the left, lest he should lose it entirely.

To give the right hand, is a mark of friendship. Paul says, that James, Cephas, and John, gave him the right hand of fellowship, Gal. 2: 9. And in the books of the Maccabees this expression occurs very often.

In taking an oath the Hebrews lifted up their right hand, Isa. 62: 8. Gen. 14: 22. Deut. 32: 40. (See ΟΑΤΑ.) Hence, in Ps. 144: 8, "their right hand is a right hand of falsehood."

To seat a person at the right hand, is a token of peculiar honor; so Bathsheba, as the king's mother, was placed at the right hand of Solomon: (1 Kings 2: 19. comp. Ps. 45: 9.) and when Christ is said to be seated on the right hand of God, (Acts 7: 55. Rom. 8: 34. Col. 3: 1.) it imports merited and unequalled dignity and exaltation.

It is evident, that when a hand, or the right hand, is attributed to Deity, the expression should be taken only after the manner of men. Deity has neither right hand nor left hand; but, the strength, the skill, the power of man lying much, and principally, in his right hand, the idea is transferred to God, by an inevitable, and therefore justifiable, liberty of speech.—Calmet.

RIGHTS OF CONSCIENCE. (See RELIGIOUS LIBERTY; TOLERATION; and PERSECUTION.)

RIMMON; an idol of Damascus, where he had a temple, 2 Kings 5: 18. It is thought this god was the sun, named Rimmon, or high, because of his elevation. Grotius takes it for Saturn, because that planet is the most elevated.—Calmet.

RINGS. The antiquity of rings, and their use, not only as ornaments, but as pledges, and seals, appears from Scripture and from profane authors. Judah left his ring with Tamar, Gen. 38: 18. When Pharaoh committed the government of Egypt to Joseph, he took his ring from his finger and gave it to Joseph, Gen. 41: 42. When God threatened Jeconiah with the utmost effects of his anger, he tells him, that though he were the signet or ring on his finger, yet he should be torn off, Jer. 22: 24. The ring was used chiefly to seal with, and Scripture generally assigns it to princes and great persons; as the king of Egypt, Joseph, Ahaz, Jezebel, king Ahasuerus, his favorite Haman, Mordecai, king Darius, 1 Kings 21: 8. Est. 3: 10, &c. Dan. 6: 17. The patents and orders of these princes were sealed with their rings or signets, an impression from which was their confirmation. The ring was one mark of sovereign authority. Pharaoh gave his ring to Joseph, as a token of authority. When Alexander the Great gave his ring to Perdicas, this was understood as nominating him his successor. (See SEAL).—Watson.

RITE; a solemn act of religion; an external ceremony. (See CEREMONY, and POSITIVE INSTITUTIONS.) For the rites of the Jews, see Lowman's Hebrew Ritual; Spencer de Heb. Leg.; Durell on the Mosaic Institution; Bishop Law's Theology of Religion, p. 89, 6th ed.; Godwyn's Moses and Aaron; Edwards' Survey of All Religions, vol. i. ch. 9; Jennings' Jewish Antiquities; John's Archaeology.—*Hend. RITTENHOUSE, (DAVID, LL. D.,) an eminent American philosopher, was born in Pennsylvania, in 1732. During his early life he was employed in agriculture, but as his constitution was feeble, he became a clock and mathematical instrument maker. In 1770 he removed to Philadelphia, and practised his trade. His mathematical talents were of the highest order. He was elected a member, and on the death of Franklin, president of the Philosophical Society, and was annually re-elected till his death. His unassuming dignity secured him universal respect, and his conscientious integrity won him the public confidence. He was chosen one of the commissioners employed to determine the boundary line between Pennsylvania and Virginia, and between New York and Massachusetts. He was treasurer of Pennsylvania from 1777 to 1789, and, from 1792 to 1795, director of the United States mint. He died June 26, 1796, aged sixty-four, in the full belief of the Christian religion, and in the anticipation of clearer discoveries of the perfections of God in the eternal world.

Dr. Rittenhouse was a man of extensive knowledge. From the French, German, and Dutch languages he derived the discoveries of foreign nations. His house and his manner of living exhibited the taste of a philosopher, the simplicity of a republican, and the temper of a Christian. His researches into natural philosophy gave him just ideas of the divine perfections. But he did not confine himself to the instructions of nature; he saw the necessity of something more; he believed the Christian revelation. He observed as one argument in favor of its truth, that the miracles of our Savior differed from all pretended miracles, in being entirely of a benevolent nature. The testimony of a man possessed of so exalted an understanding to the fulness of Christian evidence, outweighs the declamation of thousands. He published an oration, delivered before the Philosophical Society, 1775, the subject of which is the history of astronomy; and a few memoirs on mathematical and astronomical subjects, in the first four volumes of the Transactions of the Society.—Davenport; Allen.

RITUAL; a book directing the order and manner to be observed in performing divine service in a particular church, diocese, or the like.—Hend. Buck.

RIVER. The Hebrews give the name of THE RIVER, without addition, sometimes to the Nile, sometimes to the Euphrates, and sometimes to the Jordan. The tenor of the discourse must determine the sense of this uncertain and indeterminate way of speaking. They give also the name of river to brooks and rivulets that are not very considerable.

The principal rivers of Palestine were, the JORDAN, the Arnon, the Jabbok, the Karith, the Sorek, the Besor, the Kishon, the Belus, the brook of Jezebel, the Eleutherus, the brook of Reeds, or of Kanah, the Barrady, or Abanah and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus. See their proper articles.

The name of river is sometimes given to the sea. (See SEA).—Calmet.

RIVET, (ANDREW, D. D.,) a learned and godly French divine, was born July, 1572. On account of his religion, he was obliged to flee his native country; when he took up his residence in Holland, and continued in that country during the remainder of his life, which ended January, 1651, in the seventy-ninth year of his age.

He published a few works in French and Latin, among which are expositions on a number of books of the Old Testament, and a learned refutation of popery.

An extended account of the exercises of his mind during his last sickness has been published, which places him in a most interesting light, and proves him to have been one who walked emphatically by faith, not by sight—to have had his treasure laid up in heaven, while on earth it was his ruling desire that God would make him an instrument of his glory. He was called, "a man beyond all praise, and the most burning and shining light of the French and Dutch churches." See Middleton's Evang. Biog., vol. iii. p. 205.

RIZPAH; the daughter of Aiah, and concubine to Saul, celebrated in Scripture for her maternal love and sorrows, 1 Sam. 25.—Calmet; Brief Remark.

ROBINSON, (JOHN,) minister of the church in Holland, to which the first settlers of New England belonged, was born in Great Britain, in 1575, and educated at Cambridge. In 1602 he became pastor of a dissenting congregation in the north of England, and removed with them to Holland in 1608. It was his intention to follow his congregation to the new world, but his sudden death in 1625 prevented. He was a man of good genius, quick penetration, ready wit, great modesty, integrity, and candor. His classical learning and acuteness in disputation were acknowledged by his opponents. He was also discerning and prudent in civil affairs. In his principles of church government he was himself an Independent or Congregationalist. In his farewell address to the first emigrants to New England, he said to them, "If God reveal any thing to you by any other instrument of his, be as ready to receive it, as ever you were to receive my truth by my ministry; for I am verily persuaded, I am very confident, that the Lord has more truth yet to break forth out of his holy word. For my part, I cannot sufficiently bewail the condition of the reformed churches, who are come to a period in religion, and will go at present no further than the instruments of their reformation. The Lutherans cannot be drawn to go beyond what Luther saw: whatever part of his will our good God has revealed to Calvin, they will rather die than embrace it. And the Calvinists, you see, stick fast where they were left by that great man of God, who yet saw not all things." He published a Defence of the Brownists; Justification of the Separation from the Church of England; People's Plea for the Exercise of Prophecy, 1618; Essays, Moral and Divine, 1628. Belknap's Amer. Biog. ii. 151—178.—Allen.

ROBERTSON, (WILLIAM, LL. D.,) a divine and a celebrated historian, was born, in 1721, at Borthwick, in Mid Lothian, of which parish his father was the minister. After having been educated at Dalkeith, and at Edinburgh university, he was presented, in 1743, to the living of Gladsmuir. During the rebellion he bore arms as a volunteer. His first work was a Sermon, published in 1755, which passed through numerous editions. It was not, however, till 1759, that, by his History of Scotland, he acquired a place among British classical writers. Fame was accompanied by preferment. He was transferred from Gladsnair to Edinburgh; and, in 1759, 1761, 1762, and 1764, became chaplain at Stirling castle, one of the king's chaplains, principal of the university of Edinburgh, and royal historiographer for Scotland. Advancement in the English church was offered to him, but was refused. In 1769, he brought out the History of Charles V.; in 1775, the History of America; and in 1790, an Historical Disquisition concerning Ancient India. He died June 11, 1793.

ROBINSON, (ROBERT,) eminently distinguished, during the last century, among the dissenters in England, was born at Swaffham, in Norfolk, January 8, 1735. He received a tolerable education at Swaffham; and his master used to say, "that he never knew a child who discovered such a capacity. His mother was an excellent woman, and early instilled into his mind a love of truth and religion. In 1749, his mother removed him from school, and apprenticed him to Joseph Anderson, a hair dresser, in Crutched Friars, London. During his apprenticeship to London, his favorite preachers were Dr. Gill, Dr. Guyse, and Mr. Romaine; but the minister to whom he was most attached was George Whitfield, whom he called his spiritual father. Having received his indentures from his master, and leaving behind him an unblemished character in London, he went to Norfolk, his native county. There he commenced a preacher; where the innocence of his youth, the agreeableness of his manners, and his extraordinary genius, all conspired to render him popular. On leaving the Calvinistic Methodists, Robinson, with thirteen other persons attached to his ministry, formed a congregation, or independent church, in the parish of St. Paul's, Norwich. At this place he became the settled pastor, and administered baptism and the Lord's supper; but was invited from Norwich to Cambridge, in July, 1759. Previous to that, he had become a Baptist, and had accordingly been personally baptized. For two years Robinson preached on trial at Cambridge, but in 1761 he became the stated pastor. His income was very small, and his family increasing; but, possessed of gentle manners and a modest demeanor, he became the idol of the poor and the friend of the wealthy. He now regularly preached on the Sunday at Cambridge twice or three times, and on the week days delivered lectures at most of the neighboring villages, in which he was assisted and encouraged by the Rev. John Berridge, a clergyman of the church of England. Robinson was thus improving his intellectual powers, and advancing in knowledge as much when talking with a day laborer, or rocking the cradle, as when studying Latin or Greek, or translating Saurin. Being, at length, provided with a genteel meeting-house, and attended by a numerous audience, Robinson soon acquired the reputation of a speaker; and his superior abilities soon drew the attention of the collegians, and many became, from serious motives, regular attendants on his ministry.

In 1772, he published a sermon "On the Nature and Necessity of Early Piety." In 1774, his "Arcana." In 1775, "A Discussion of the Question, Is it lawful and right for a Man to marry the Sister of his deceased Wife?" In 1776, "A Lecture on becoming Behavior in a religious Assembly;" and, between the years 1770 and 1782, "A Translation of three volumes of Saurin's Sermons." Prefixed to the latter volumes are, "Memoirs of the Reformation in France;" and the "Life of the Rev. James Saurin," which are justly and generally admired.

In June, 1773, he removed to Chesterton, a village about two miles from Cambridge, where he became a farmer. His time was now divided between an attention to his agricultural and literary pursuits and his ministerial duties. At this time he also wrote and published "A Plea for the Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, in a Pastoral Letter, addressed to a Congregation of Protestant Dissenters at Cambridge." (See JESUS CHRIST.) This Plea excited the most singular attention, and the highest dignitaries of the church of England pronounced that it was the best defence of the divinity of Christ that had ever been published. He was invited to become a clergyman of the establishment, to which, however, he refused to listen. In 1777, Robinson translated the celebrated Essay of Claude, "On the Composition of a Sermon." In 1778, he published "A Plan of Lectures, on the Principles of Non-conformity, for the Instruction of Catechumens." The merit of this work was uncommon; and it contained the outlines of the whole controversy of the dissenters and the church of England, from the period of the Reformation to the year in which it was written. About that time Robinson appears to have drawn up some memorials of the celebrated John Bunyan, which were subsequently inserted in the Biographia Britannica. In 1778, he took a very active part in the national proceedings for obtaining the abolition of the slave-trade; and the first petition to the house of commons on the subject was from Cambridge, drawn up by Robinson. In 1780, he published a small pamphlet, entitled "The General Doctrine of Toleration, applied to the particular case of Free Communion;" and, in this year, made a long tour through England and Scotland.

Robinson, by his various publications, had now amassed a little property, and his farm increased in size and importance. In 1781, he undertook to write the history of baptism, at the request of the London committee, composed of ministers and gentlemen of the greatest eminence. Mr. Robinson now resided for some time in London, and devoted most of his time to the compilation of his work. In 1782, he published a Political Catechism, which has been admired by those who, like him, cherished an attachment for the principles of the whigs.

In 1786, Mr. Robinson published "Sixteen Discourses on several Texts of Scripture, addressed to Christian Assemblies in Villages near Cambridge; to which are added, Six Morning Exercises;" a unique performance, of which it may not improperly be said, that "we scarcely can praise it, or blame it too much." The work abounds with traces of that natural eloquence which was so peculiar to the author; with passages which, for simplicity and beauty united, may vie with the most celebrated writings of the age.

That a considerable change actually took place in Robinson's mind, about this time, on theological subjects, there can be no doubt, though the feelings of his heart on this occasion cannot be easily traced. The orthodox party, perceiving the change, gradually forsook him, and Robinson also retired from them. In 1787, he met with a severe domestic affliction, in the loss of a lovely daughter, of seventeen years of age. With his congregation at Cambridge he still continued his ministerial labors; by them his decreasing popularity among the Calvinist churches was easily dispensed with. "He was," they said, "the minister of our choice, and still is of our esteem."

Mr. Robinson now prepared his "History of Baptism," which is a learned and elaborate work. During the last year of his life he pursued no new speculations, and attempted few compositions. But, previously, he had prepared a recapitulation at the end of his work on baptism, which has been since published, under the title of "Ecclesiastical Researches." These were his two favorite works; and to the severe application with which he engaged in them, he fell an untimely sacrifice. Having been for some time in a declining state of health, he was advised to travel, and accordingly visited Birmingham, where, on Wednesday morning, the 9th of June, 1790, he was found dead in his bed; and, as the clothes were not the least decomposed, nor his features distorted, it is probable that he expired, as he often expressed his wish to do, "softly, suddenly, and alone."

Robinson was amiable, benevolent, and generous. As a preacher, he was unrivalled for pure and native eloquence.

In doing good and getting good, he spent his days. Learning, charity, and piety have wept at his grave, and each have claimed him as her champion. His miscellaneous works have been collected and published, in six volumes octavo, with a Life of the Author, by B. Flower, Harlow, 1807. See Life of Robinson, by George Dyer, late of Emmanuel college, Cambridge.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

ROBINSON, (THOMAS,) a divine of the church of England, was born at Wakefield, in the county of York, on the 29th of August, 1749. His father was a respectable hosier in that town, and gave his son the best education which the grammar-school of the place would afford, intending to bring him up to his own business. But the son, taking a dislike to the counter, prevailed on his father to let him go to college, with a view to the ministry in the establishment, to which he eventually acceded. When the time drew nigh that he was to quit the place of his nativity, he one day met in the streets of Wakefield a poor shoemaker, who asked him if he was not going to be a clergyman; and, on his answering in the affirmative, the man replied, "Then, sir, I hope you will study your Bible, that you may be qualified for feeding the flock of Christ with the bread of eternal life." The propriety of the remark carried conviction to the young man's mind, and he never forgot it while he lived.

He entered Trinity college, Cambridge, in October, 1768, and prosecuted his course of study with unremitting ardor. In 1772, he was elected fellow of the college, and soon after presented to the curacies of Witcham and Wichford, in the county of Cambridge, where he lifted up his voice like a trumpet, and roused the attention of the surrounding neighborhood to the great concern of mortals. This continued for about two years, when the cry of "Methodism" was raised against him, and he was compelled reluctantly to quit a sphere of growing usefulness. He then removed to Leicester, where he obtained the curacy of St. Martin's; and, in 1788, was presented with the valuable living of St. Mary's, in the same town, which he obtained through the influence of the earl of Dartmouth. Here he commenced a course of lectures on the history of the patriarchs, which were subsequently published under the title of "Scripture Characters," and which were so very favorably received, that he was induced to extend them to four octavo volumes. In 1805, Mr. Robinson published "The Christian System," in three volumes octavo, but it has been less popular than his former work. In 1809, he was called to preach the church missionary sermon in London, which he did at St. Anne's, Blackfriars. The place being large and crowded with hearers, he was led to extend his voice, in order to make himself heard, and to exert himself beyond his powers. The effects of this he never surmounted; his health began visibly to decline; yet he lingered to the 24th of March, 1813, when death closed his labors and his pains, at the age of sixty-four. His learning and talents were considerable, and he had made himself greatly respected among his parishioners. See Life by Veughan, and Works of Robert Hall.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

ROCHUS; a carver of St. Lucar, in Spain, whose principal business was to make images of saints, and other popish idols. Becoming convinced, however, of the errors of Romanism, he embraced the Protestant faith, threw aside his former occupation, and for subsistence followed the business of a seal engraver only. He had, however, retained one image of the virgin Mary for a sign. A papal inquisitor once passing by, asked if he would sell it, and the price. Rochus mentioned a price, when the inquisitor offered him half the money; he replied, "I had rather break it to pieces than take such a trifle." "Break it to pieces!" said the inquisitor; "break it to pieces if you dare!" Rochus then took up a chisel, and cut off the nose of the image. This was sufficient; he was soon after apprehended, and was burnt; a victim of the inquisition.—Fox, p. 134.

ROCK. Palestine, being a mountainous country, had also many rocks, which formed a part of the country's defence; for in time of danger the people retired to them, and found a refuge against any sudden irruption of the enemy. The Benjamites took shelter in the rock Rimmon, Judges 20: 47. Samson kept garrison in the rock of Eth-am, Judges 15: 8. David found shelter in the rocks of Maon, Engedi, &c., 1 Sam. 22: 1. 23: 25, 28. 24: 2—5. Jerome says that the southern parts of Judea were full of caves under ground, and of caverns in the mountains, to which the people retired in time of danger. The Kenites dwelt in the hollow places of the rocks, Num. 24: 21. Even at this day the villages of this country are subterraneous, or in the rocks. Josephus in several places speaks of hollow rocks, where thieves and robbers had their haunts; and travellers still find a great number of them in Palestine, and in the adjoining provinces. Towards Lebanon, the mountains are high, but covered in many places with as much earth as fits them for cultivation. Among the crags of the rocks, the beautiful and far-famed cedar waves its lofty top, and extends its powerful arms, surrounded by the fir and the oak, the fig and the vine. On the road to Jerusalem, the mountains are not so lofty nor so rugged, but become fitter for tillage. They rise again to the south-east of mount Carmel; are covered with woods, and afford very picturesque views; but advancing toward Judea, they lose their verdure, the valleys become narrow, dry, and stony, and terminate at the Dead sea, in a pile of desolate rocks, precipices, and caverns. These vast excavations, some of which will contain fifteen hundred men, are the grottoes of Engedi, which have been a refuge to the oppressed or the discontented in all ages. Westward of Jordan and the lake Asphaltites, another chain of rocks, still loftier and more rugged, presents a yet more gloomy aspect, and announces the distant entrance of the desert, and the termination of the habitable regions.

The name of rock is also given to God, by way of metaphor, because God is the strength, the refuge, and defence of Israel, as those places were to the people who resided among them, Ps. 18: 2, 31. 31: 2, 3. Deut. 32: 15, 18, 30, 31. Ps. 61: 2, &c.—Watson.

ROD; an instrument of correction. The empire of the Messiah is sometimes represented by a rod of iron, to show its power and its might, Ps. 2: 9. Rev. 2: 27. 12: 5. 19: 15. Rod is sometimes put, by a pastoral metaphor, to signify a tribe or a people: "Remember thy congregation which thou hast purchased of old, the rod of thine inheritance which thou hast redeemed," Ps. 74: 2. "Israel is the rod of his inheritance," Jer. 10: 16. The rod of Aaron is the staff commonly used by the high-priest. This is the rod that budded and blossomed like an almond-tree, Num. 17. (See AARON.)—Watson.

ROE. (See ANTELOPE.)

ROGERENES; so called from John Rogers, their chief leader. They appeared in New England about 1677. The principal distinguishing tenet of this denomination was, that worship performed the first day of the week was a species of idolatry which they ought to oppose. In consequence of this, they used a variety of measures to disturb those who were assembled for public worship on the Lord's day.—Hend. Buck; Benedict's History.

ROGERS, (JOHN,) the first martyr under queen Mary, was educated at the university of Cambridge, where he attained to a great proficiency in learning. From Cambridge he went to Antwerp, where he had been chosen chaplain to a company of merchants. He here assisted in the translation of the Bible into English, and became enlightened in the true doctrines of the gospel; so that he cast off the idolatrous worship of the church of Rome, and received the truth as it is in Jesus. From Antwerp he went to Wittenberg, where he made such proficiency in the Dutch language, that he was soon chosen pastor of a church there, over which he remained in great fidelity for some years. In the reign of king Edward VI., he was called home by bishop Ridley, and made prebendary and divinity lecturer at St. Paul's, where he preached faithfully and zealously until the accession of queen Mary. He soon rendered himself obnoxious to her zeal for popery, and was confined for six months in his own house; after which, he was confined in Newgate a long time, and passed through three examinations, in which he manfully defended himself; but was finally condemned and sentenced to be burnt, which was earned into execution, February 4th, 1555. Notwithstanding Mr. Rogers had every thing to bind him to life, and in his trials every thing to aggravate his sufferings, he yet ever preserved a remarkable equanimity of mind, and yielded up his testimony at last with great joy.

During his imprisonment, he wrote an account of his examinations, and also other papers, which were providentially preserved, and have been transmitted to the present time. They may be found in Fox's Martyrology, p. 415.

ROGERS, (JOHN,) president of Harvard college, was graduated in that seminary in 1649. He was the son of Nathaniel Rogers, with whom he preached some time as an assistant at Ipswich; but at length his inclination to the study of physic withdrew his attention from theology. After the death of president Oakes, he was elected his successor, in April, 1682, and was installed August 12, 1683. He died suddenly, July 2, 1684, the day after commencement, aged fifty-three, and was succeeded by Increase Mather. He was remarkable for the sweetness of his temper, and he united to unfeigned piety the accomplishments of the gentleman.

His wife was Elizabeth Dennison; his daughter married president Leverett; his son Daniel, a physician in Ipswich, died in a snow storm on Hampton beach, December 1, 1722, leaving a son, Daniel, the minister of Littleton, who died November, 1782, aged seventy-five; his son Nathaniel was the minister of Portsmouth, and died October 3, 1723, aged fifty-three; his son John, the minister of Ipswich, died December 28, 1745, aged seventy-eight, leaving three sons, who were ministers,—John, of Kittery, who died October 16, 1773, aged eighty-one; Nathaniel, of Ipswich, a colleague, who died in 1775, aged seventy-two; and Daniel, of Exeter, who died in December, 1785, aged seventy-nine. John Rogers, the minister of Gloucester, who died October 4, 1782, aged sixty-three, was the son of John Rogers of Kittery, or Eliot. Truly this was a family of ministers. Magnolia, iv. p. 130.—Allen.

ROGERS, (WILLIAM, D. D.,) a valuable minister in Philadelphia, was born at Newport, Rhode Island, July 22, 1751, and was the first student at the college of Rhode Island; graduating in 1769. In May, 1771, he was ordained over the first Baptist church in Philadelphia. During five years he was a chaplain in the army. In 1789, he was appointed professor of belles-lettres in the college of Philadelphia, which office he resigned in 1812. He died April 24, 1824, aged seventy-three. He published a Sermon on the Death of Rev. O. Hart, 1796.—Allen.

ROLL. (See BOOK.)

ROLLIN, (CHARLES,) an eminent historian, was born, in 1661, at Paris. He was the son of a cutler, who designed him to follow his own trade; but a Benedictine monk obtained his admission in the college of Du Plessis. After having acquired there a knowledge of languages and philosophy, he studied theology for three years at the Sorbonne. Between 1683 and 1693, he filled the chairs of professor of rhetoric and of eloquence at the college of Du Plessis and the Royal college. In 1694, he was appointed rector of the university, and in 1696, coadjutor of the college of Beauvais. The last post he held for fifteen years, greatly to the advantage of the students; but he was at length driven from it by the intrigues of the Jesuits. Thenceforth he gave his time wholly to literature. He died in 1741.

Rollin is much better known as a literary, than as a religious character; yet, all his works are designed to promote the interests of religion; and he was as much distinguished for personal piety, as for the virtuous sentiments contained in his writings. It must, however be added, that as, in his literary capacity, he paid too much credit to the exaggerations of the ancient historians, and was in a great measure void of that critical sagacity, which should be characteristic of the historian; so also he was too credulous in religious affairs, giving implicit credit to the pretended miracles of the abbé Paris. His principal works are, Ancient History; Roman History; and a Treatise on the Mode of Studying. See Memoir of Rollin; and Rees's Cyclopædia.—Davenport; Jones's Chris. Biog.

ROLLOCK, (ROBERT,) was born in Scotland, in the year 1555, and received his education in the university of St. Andrews, where he pursued his studies with such application and success, that, four years after his entrance, he was appointed professor of philosophy. In the year 1583, when an application was made to the university for a proper person to erect and govern an university at Edinburgh, Mr. Rollock was unanimously recommended as a man the best qualified for that undertaking. The result verified the recommendation; his fame became extensive, and great numbers resorted to Edinburgh to enjoy his instructions.

Mr. Rollock did not confine himself to the business of the university exclusively; he engaged also with much fervor and success in the duties of the ministry, and published commentaries on several parts of the Scriptures, of which Beza spoke in the highest terms. He died in 1598, and yielded a distinguished testimony to the supporting power of faith in Christ.

Although, from his abilities, he was rendered very conspicuous and public, he is yet spoken of as a man of great humility, and disposed to prefer others to himself. His writings, which are not said to be numerous, were chiefly confined to the elucidation of Scripture.—Middleton's Evan. Biog. vol. ii. p. 290.

ROMAINE, (WILLIAM,) was born on the 25th of September, 1714, at Hartlepool, in the county of Durham. His father was a man of exemplary piety, though not of great wealth; and was one of the refugees upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He educated his son in those principles which were, through life, his shield and buckler, and which he would not have exchanged, could the world have been laid at his feet.

His parents discovering his early genius, placed him at the celebrated grammar-school, founded by Bernard Gilpin. There he gained much sound learning and religious knowledge, and there the foundation was laid of his future fame. In the year 1730, his father having previously determined him to become a minister of the church of England, he was sent to Oxford, and entered at Hertford college, and from thence he was removed to Christ Church college. In October, 1737, he took his degree of master of arts, after having been ordained a deacon, at Hereford, by Dr. Henry Egerton. He then became curate of Loe Trenchard, in Devonshire. In 1739 his great love of truth roused him publicly to attack Dr. Warburton, on his "Divine Legation of Moses." In the same year he was ordained priest, by bishop Hoadley; and became curate to a clergyman of the name of Edwards, who had in his possession the two livings of Banstead and Horton, both in Middlesex. In the year 1748, he was chosen lecturer of St. Botolph's. In the following year he was chosen lecturer of St. Dunstan's-in-the-West, and at St. George's, Hanover square, to which he was appointed morning preacher. His faithfulness, united to his eloquence, induced many to attend his ministry, and in a short time his congregations were immense. His success created violent clamors and opposition against him. The rector refused him the use of the pulpit, and the affair was brought into the court of king's bench. The decision deprived him of one of the lectureships, but confirmed him in the other, and endowed it with a salary of eighteen pounds a year. Here his labor of love was again interrupted by the church-wardens, who refused to open the doors of the church till seven o'clock, and to light it when required; so that he was compelled to preach by the light of one candle, till, by the interference of Dr. Terrick, (the then bishop of London,) with the rector and church-wardens, he was allowed to continue quietly in his ministerial labors for six years; when he became curate and morning preacher at St. Olave's. In February, 1755, he was married to Miss

Price; and, in the following year, accepted the rectory of St. Andrew Wardrobe, and St. Anne's, Blackfriars; both of which he held till his death. The benevolence of Mr. Romaine was very extensive. The Royal Humane society, and the Bible society, for distributing Bibles among his majesty's forces, both by sea and land, derived great benefit from his exertions.

His end was peaceful and serene, and he could reflect on the moment of his dissolution with that happy composure which the good man alone can feel. On the Sabbath day, July 28, 1795, he expired, and was interred in the rectory vault of Blackfriars' church.

The publications of this venerable man were numerous and valuable. The principal among them consisted of "A Concordance and Lexicon of Marius de Calasio," four vols. folio; "Nine Sermons on the 107th Psalm;" "A Discourse on the Self-existence of Jesus Christ;" "The Life of Faith;" "The Scriptural Doctrine of the Lord's Supper briefly stated;" "The Walk of Faith," two vols.; "The Triumph of Faith," &c. &c. See Hawcis' Life of Mr. Romaine; also his Life and Works—Jones' Chris. Biog.

ROME, the capital of Italy, and seat of the Roman government, was for many ages esteemed the mistress of the whole world. Though the writers of the Old Testament have nowhere mentioned this city, yet we frequently find it adverted to in the New; for which reason it will be proper to give some account of it in this place.

The foundations of this renowned city were laid by Romulus and Remus, according to the chronology of Usher, in the year of the world 3256, about 748 before Christ, and towards the end of the reign of Hezekiah, king of Judah. From a small beginning, and by slow progress, the city of Rome gradually rose to eminence, until it became the seat of the fourth great empire, (Dan. 2: 40.) and obtained the name of the lord of the whole earth, the head and queen of it, Luke 2: 1.

As the population of the city increased, the buildings were necessarily multiplied, until a space of ground not less than twenty miles in circumference was covered by them, and including in it seven distinct hills, the names of which were, Mons Palatinus, Capitolinus, Aventinus, Quirinalis, Cælius, Viminalis, and Exquelinus. This peculiarity of the city, namely, its being seated on seven hills, is pointedly mentioned by several of the Latin poets; by Martial, (l. iv. ep. 64.) where he speaks of "septem domini montes;" by Propertius, (l. iii. ix. 57,) in a still more famous line—which is very similar to the idea of the writer of the Apocalypse, when he describes Rome papal as "a woman, seated on seven hills, and reigning over the kings of the earth," Rev. 17: 9. But there is a passage in Virgil, (Georg. l. ii. ver. 532,) if possible still more remarkably to the purpose:—

"Septem urbs alta jugis, toto que præsidet orbi:"

"Scilicet et rerum facta est putcherrima Roma, Septemque una sibi muro circumdedit arces."

The religion of the ancient Romans was that of paganism, which was the established religion of the empire, until the times of Constantine the Great, A. D. 315. Several different forms of government obtained among them, at different periods of their history, namely, that of kings, consuls, decemvirs, military tribunes, dictators, emperors, &c. In the days of these last-mentioned magistrates, Rome had arrived at its meridian splendor, in population, arts, and arms. The number of its inhabitants upon a moderate calculation has been computed at one million. The city contained no less than four hundred and twenty temples, crowded with statues of their deities. The priests were numerous, and each divinity had a college of sacerdotal servants. Their worship and sacrifices were superstitious in the extreme. The will of the gods was consulted on every trifling occasion, and no general marched against an enemy, until he was assured by the soothsayers that the omens were propitious. Altars were raised and dedicated not only to the gods who, as they supposed, presided over their city, but also to the deities of conquered nations.

It is probable that the city of Rome occupied a less space of ground than the city of London now does, and fewer houses; but it contained full as many inhabitants, for their edifices were much loftier. House rent was excessively dear; the nobles acquired, at an enormous expense, the ground which they covered with palaces and gardens; but the bulk of the common people were crowded into a narrow space, and the different floors and apartments of the same house were divided among several families. There were seventeen hundred and eighty superb mansions belonging to opulent citizens, each of them, according to one of their own poets, equal to a small city. Of the riches and luxury of these nobles an estimate may be formed from this circumstance, that several examples are upon record of individuals who celebrated the year of their prætorship by a festival that lasted seven days, and cost above one hundred thousand pounds sterling!

The Scriptures do not inform us at what time, or by whom the gospel was first preached in Rome; but it is highly probable that it was conveyed there soon after the day of Pentecost, which followed our Lord's resurrection by some of the "strangers from Rome, Jews and proselytes," mentioned (Acts 2: 10.) as being at Jerusalem when the Holy Spirit was poured out upon the apostles. Such of them as were converted to the Christian faith, would not fail, on their return home, to carry with them the glad tidings of salvation and communicate it to others; and in the case of the church of Rome, we have an illustration of our Lord's parable of the grain of mustard-seed, Matt. 13: 31. For a Christian church appears to have been very early formed in that city, whose "faith was spoken of throughout the whole world," (Rom. 1: 8. and 16: 19.) and whose numbers attracted the notice of the government early as A. D. 68, and drew upon them the implacable rage of the sanguinary tyrant Nero.—Jones.

ROMAN. The term Roman is used in the New Testament, 1. As denoting a person, native, or inhabitant of the city of Rome; or, at least, of the country around that metropolis; as in the epistle to the Romans. 2. For the power of the Roman government: (John 11: 48.) "The Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation;" (Acts 25: 16.) "It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die, till we have heard his defence," ch. 28: 17, &c. In the books of the Old Testament written in Hebrew, we find no express mention of Rome, Romans, or Italy. Indeed Rome had not grown into consequence during the life of Malachi. But in the Maccabæes, and in the New Testament, they are often mentioned, 1 Mac. 8: 1, 2. Judas Maccabæus had been informed of their conquests in Spain, &c.; that they had subdued Philip and Perseus, kings of Macedonia, (or Chittim), and Antiochus the Great, king of Syria; that they had deprived him of various provinces; and had also reduced the Greeks, who attempted to resist them; in a word, that they confirmed in their kingdoms all whom they desired should reign, or deprived those of their crowns whom they intended to punish. Nevertheless, that none of them wore the diadem or the purple, but that they had a senate, consisting of three hundred and twenty senators, who consulted every day about the affairs of the republic; and that they committed every year the sovereign magistracy to one person, who commanded through all their territories, and thus all were obedient to one, without envy or jealousy. The first alliance between the Jews and the Romans was made B. C. 162. 3. For a person who possessed the privileges attached to the citizenship of Rome: (Acts 22: 25) "Is it lawful for you to scourge a man who is a Roman, he being as yet uncondemned?" Paul, who pleads this privilege, was not actually a Roman, by having been born at Rome, or in Italy. Some think, that being born in a city favored with the communication of the privileges of the imperial city, he was competent to claim Roman exemptions by his birthright; being native of a municipium—a city thus favored, and born of parents thus entitled. Others think, that Paul's father had been rewarded with this privilege, for services rendered to the Romans; whether of a military or other nature; which would render it so much the more disgraceful to degrade, by the treatment of a slave, a man entitled to especial marks of honor. This might be the fact, as such a reward was received by many Jews about this time.

The Valerian law forbade that a Roman citizen should be bound; the Sempronian law forbade that he should be scourged, or beaten with rods. If any man falsely claimed the privileges of a Roman citizen, he was severely punished:—by the emperor Claudius with death.—Calmet.

ROMANS, (EPISTLE TO THE.) This is placed before the other epistles of Paul, not because it was first composed in order of time, but because of the dignity of the imperial city, to which it is directed, or of the excellence of its contents; or, of the magnificence and sublimity of the evangelical mysteries of which it treats.

Paul's design, in his epistle to the Romans, is, by a full development of the gospel, to confirm their faith, and to terminate certain domestic disputes, which then prevailed among the believers at Rome, and divided the converted Jews and Gentiles into two parties. The Jews insisted on their birthright, and the promises made to their fathers; on account of which, when they became Christians, they assumed a certain priority or preference over the converted Gentiles, whom they regarded as foreigners, out of pure favor admitted into the society of believers, and to the participation of Christian privileges. The Gentiles, on the other hand, maintained the merit of their sages and philosophers, the prudence of their legislators, the purity of their morality, and their exactness in following the law of nature. Hence, after becoming Christians, their hereditary prejudices were precisely in antagonism with those of their brethren, and were drawn out by any instances of illiberality or weakness displayed by them. They reproached the Jews for the general infidelity of their nation toward God, and violation of his laws. They aggravated their faults and those of their fathers, which had excluded the greater part of them from the inheritance of the saints, from the faith, &c., as witnessed by their own Scriptures.

To terminate these contentions, Paul applies himself to restrain the presumption of both parties, by going down to first principles. He shows that neither could pretend to merit, or had reason to glory, or boast of their calling; which proceeded from the mere grace and mercy of God.

He lays down the grand position, that the gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile; because it reveals God's method of gratuitous justification by faith in a common Redeemer. The need of such a plan of salvation, he argues by an inductive view of the moral condition of both Gentiles and Jews—that is, of all mankind, not in one age only, but in every age of the world. He opens his argument by a clear statement of the obligations which mankind are under to God their Creator, as manifested in the works of his creation, and of the deplorable condition of the Gentile world, who have apostatized from his worship and service, ch. 1. He then proceeds to evince, that though the Jews were blessed with a written revelation of the divine will, they had treated it in much the same way that the Gentiles had done the law of nature, or the notices of God which were impressed upon their conscience by the works of creation; (ch. 2.) hence he infers the universal sinfulness of both Jew and Gentile, that the whole world is guilty before God, and the consequent impossibility of any of the fallen race of Adam being justified by their own obedience, ch. 3. From a survey of this awful state of men by nature and practice, he proceeds to exhibit the revealed way of deliverance through the redemption effected by the Son of God, and the doctrine of justification by faith in his blood, which he proves, illustrates, and exemplifies very fully, ch. 4. and 5. He next shows that this way of justification by faith in the blood of Christ is intimately connected with sanctification and evangelical obedience; (ch. 6.) expatiates on the inefficiency of the law, compared with the gospel, to aid the believer in his experience and conflicts; (ch. 7.) and from a review of the exalted privileges of Christians, and the motives and aids to holiness thence derived, he leads our reflections back to the source of all these spiritual blessings, which he traces to the eternal gratuitous election and sovereign love of God, ch. 8. and 9. Having stated, proved, and answered objections to his doctrine, and discussed several questions respecting the calling of the Gentiles, and the rejection of the Jews, he foretells the ultimate conversion of both to Christianity in the millennium, and closes his great argument with awful adoration of God's magnificent designs, and a practical improvement of the whole discourse, by various exhortations, instructions, and precepts, enforced by evangelical motives, ch. 11. Particularly in chapters 12—15, the apostle gives the rules of Christian morality, and advice concerning mutual harmony, mutual forbearance, and reciprocal concession to infirmities, for fear of scandalizing or offending one another by indiscreet liberties. He describes false teachers, and exhorts believers to avoid them. Chapter 16. contains salutations and commendations, addressed to particular persons.

The epistle of Paul to the Romans is "a writing," says Dr. Macknight, "which, for sublimity and truth of sentiment, for brevity and strength of expression, for regularity in its structure, but above all for the unspeakable importance of the discoveries which it contains, stands unrivalled by any mere human composition, and as far exceeds the most celebrated productions of the learned Greeks and Romans, as the shining of the sun exceeds the twinkling of the stars."

This epistle was written A. D. 57, or 58, in Corinth. No doubt has ever been made of its authenticity. Tertius was Paul's secretary on this occasion.

The Marcionites made great defalcations in the epistles of Paul, especially in this to the Romans, of which they suppressed the last two chapters. There is much probability that Paul designed to finish this epistle at the end of the fourteenth; but afterwards added the concluding chapters. At the end of the fifteenth chapter, we find this conclusion: "Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen;" which seems to show that the letter was then finished. We see the same conclusion no less than three times in the sixteenth chapter, (verses 20, 24, 27.) which leads us to imagine that these additions were composed at intervals. Probably, while waiting for an opportunity of sending it off; whether by Phebe, or any other safe hand.

Paul visited Rome twice; first, A. D. 61, when he appealed to Cæsar; and then, A. D. 65, a year before his martyrdom, which happened in A. D. 66.—Calmet; Jones.

ROMAN CATHOLICS IN THE UNITED STATES. The Roman Catholic population of the United States is estimated at eight hundred thousand; and the number of churches at seven hundred and eighty-four. These are included in ten dioceses; viz. those of Baltimore, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Charleston, Mobile, New Orleans, Bardstown, Cincinnati, and St. Louis. An archbishop resides at Baltimore, and over each diocese presides a bishop. Those of Philadelphia and Bardstown have, also, each a coadjutor or assistant bishop. The number of priests is probably about three hundred and fifty. According to a recent statement in "The Jesuit," there are two hundred and forty-six priests, exclusive of those employed as professors in colleges and ecclesiastical seminaries, whose number, there is reason to believe, is not less than one hundred. There are eight or ten colleges, besides many academies and other literary institutions, entirely under the control of the Catholics; as many theological seminaries; and more than twice that number of convents or nunneries.

We shall proceed to consider the state of the several dioceses which have been already enumerated.

1. Arch-diocese of Baltimore. This comprises the states of Maryland and Virginia, and the District of Columbia. It was created a bishopric in 1789, by a bull of pope Pius VI., and erected into a metropolitan see in 1808, by a brief of Pius VII. Maryland, as is probably well known, was at first settled chiefly by Catholics. It was granted to lord Baltimore, a Catholic, whose son, Leonard Calvert, was the first governor of the colony. Among the first laws he enacted were the following:—that no one who professed to believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ should be molested in his religion or in the free exercise thereof; that no one should reproach his neighbor for his religious tenets, on penalty of paying ten shillings to the person reproached; that any one who should speak reproachfully of the blessed virgin or the apostles should forfeit five pounds; but blasphemy against God should be punished with death.

On the accession of William and Mary, the Protestant Episcopal church was established in Maryland by law, and the laws of England against Roman Catholics introduced with it. Our revolution abolished the church establishment, and placed all denominations of Christians upon an equal footing. For the reasons already stated, the Catholics in Maryland are not only the most numerous, but probably the most wealthy and influential religious sect.

In the arch-diocese of Baltimore there are three colleges, viz. St. Mary's, at Baltimore; Mount St. Mary's, near Emmetsburg; and Georgetown college, at Georgetown; (D. C.) one diocesan seminary; two other respectable seminaries; two regularly instituted convents; six other female academies, under the direction of the sisters of charity; and sixty-seven priests, not including those connected with the colleges and theological seminaries.

"The city of Baltimore," say the Catholics in the Metropolitan, "has not improperly been called the Rome of the United States." And they add, that their denomination is "first among the foremost." Their number is not far from twenty thousand. Their public property is worth more than a million of dollars; being more valuable than that of any other denomination in the city.

The cathedral is a larger and more splendid building than any other for public worship in the United States. It cost upwards of three hundred thousand dollars, exclusive of its ornaments and appendages. It is built on high ground, and overlooks the city and vicinity, including the bay, which is usually covered with ships. The ground plan is in the form of a cross, one hundred and ninety by one hundred and seventeen feet; or, without reckoning the portico and arms of the cross, one hundred and sixty-six by seventy-seven feet. The walls are of granite, and the noble dome rises to the height of one hundred and sixteen feet from the base. It is surmounted by a cross, eleven feet high. The diameter of the dome is sixty feet within, and seventy-seven on the outside. Two towers, each one hundred and twenty feet in height, are erected at one end of the building. A very large bell, imported in 1831 from France, was blessed, baptized, &c. with much ceremony, previous to its elevation into the south tower. A chime of bells is to be procured for the north tower. The altars are three in number, one in front, with two side altars. The "grand altar" is of the richest variegated marble, and was sent from Italy as a present from the pope. It bears the inscription, "Altare privilegium concessione Pii VII. 1822." Some of the ornaments of the cathedral are exceedingly splendid. Two paintings are worthy of particular examination; one representing the "Descent of the Cross," which was presented by Louis XVIII. of France; the other, "The Burial of a Knight of the Cross," during the crusades, was presented by Charles X.

The public worship in this cathedral is very imposing. The service in a foreign tongue, the superb dresses of the archbishop, who has them of seven different colors for as many different occasions, the statues, crosses, images of Christ and of the virgin, which everywhere meet the eye, and, above all, the paintings scattered around with a liberal hand, make a powerful impression on the mind of any one who does not reflect, that "in every bell and bowl and vest of the Romish service, there is hid a device against the liberty and welfare of mankind." The whole congregation consists of six thousand, and in respect to wealth, intelligence, and influence, is inferior to none in the city. They have secured a strong influence in almost every benevolent institution in the city.

"At Georgetown, D. C.," says the archbishop of Baltimore in one of his letters, "the reverend fathers, the Jesuits, have their principal house, with a magnificent college of twenty instructors and one hundred and fifty students." The library contains seven thousand volumes.

2. Diocese of Boston. This diocese comprises the whole of New England. The Catholic population of this territory amounts to twenty thousand, of whom ten thousand are in the city of Boston and vicinity. There are eighteen priests and twenty-three congregations; of which six are in Maine, two in New Hampshire, one in Vermont, nine in Massachusetts, three in Rhode Island, and two in Connecticut. In this diocese there are, one diocesan seminary; one academy for boys; one regularly established convent of Ursuline nuns near Boston, who have under their direction an extensive academy of young ladies; and another female establishment, conducted by the sisters of charity. The building and property of the convent at Charlestown was destroyed by a mob in August, 1834. Its seat has been transferred to Roxbury.

3. Diocese of New York, comprising the state of New York, and part of New Jersey. There are in this diocese twenty-three priests; also, four female academies, under the direction of the sisters of charity.

4. Diocese of Philadelphia. This includes Pennsylvania, Delaware, and a part of New Jersey. It contains thirty-six priests; one diocesan seminary; two male academies; one convent; and three female academies, under the care of the sisters of charity. There are four handsome churches in the city of Philadelphia.

5. Diocese of Charleston, comprising North and South Carolina and Georgia. There are twelve priests; one diocesan seminary; an academy conducted on the plan of a college; and a female academy, under the direction of the sisters of mercy.

6. Diocese of Mobile. This comprehends Alabama and Florida. Here are also eight or nine priests; one college at Mobile, and two convents. A large cathedral has been commenced at Mobile, about two-thirds of whose inhabitants are papists. Several priests have recently arrived from Europe, and large sums of money have been granted by the pope to aid the bishop in propagating the faith in this diocese. In Florida, the Spanish part of the population have Catholic churches at Pensacola and St. Augustine.

7. Diocese of New Orleans, comprises Louisiana and Mississippi. There are twenty-three priests; one theological seminary; one convent of Ursuline nuns, who have charge of an extensive female academy; one young ladies' academy, under the direction of the nuns of the sacred heart; and another conducted by the sisters of charity. In Louisiana, the Catholics have almost undisturbed possession. In 1812, there was not one Protestant church of any denomination in the state; and most of those which have since been formed are small and feeble.

8. Diocese of Bardstown. This includes the states of Kentucky and Tennessee. In this diocese are twenty-three priests, exclusive of those who are professors of colleges and ecclesiastical seminaries. There are also two regular colleges; one diocesan seminary; two other seminaries for young men; three convents; and two academies for females. Several of the priests of Kentucky are constantly employed as missionaries; each having three or four churches under his care. St. Joseph's college, at Bardstown, Kentucky, has fifteen instructors, and one hundred and fifty students.

9. Diocese of Cincinnati. This diocese comprehends Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan. There are also nineteen priests; one college; one Dominican friary; one seminary for young men; and one academy for young ladies, under the care of the sisters of charity. A large cathedral has been erected at Cincinnati, and at least twelve other churches in the state, while many more are in prospect. A literary institution, called the Athenaeum, has been commenced at Cincinnati, under the auspices and control of the bishop. The Catholics say that their "number is rapidly increasing in that city and throughout Ohio, both by the arrival of foreigners and by frequent conversions."

10. Diocese of St. Louis. This diocese comprises the state of Missouri and adjoining territories. Here are at least twenty priests, exclusive of professors in colleges; two colleges; one diocesan seminary; three convents of the sacred heart, having each an extensive female academy; three convents of the sisters of Loretto, having each also an academy for females; and one female academy under the direction of the sisters of charity. In this diocese and that of New Orleans are more than one hundred priests. About one-third of the inhabitants of St. Louis are Catholics. In that city is a "splendid cathedral; a college of one hundred and sixty students, under the control of the Jesuits; a nunnery, containing, besides nuns, a considerable number of novices and postulants. Here also resides the superintendent of all the Jesuits in the valley of the Mississippi. In St. Genevieve county is a theological seminary, and at St. Charles is a college. Other schools of considerable reputation are established at Flovissant, Perryville, and several other places. In no western state, save Louisiana, is the influence of the Catholics so likely to predominate as in Missouri.

In the year 1828, the Propaganda, a society formed by the papists of France, appropriated the sum of one hundred and ten thousand dollars for the purpose of advancing the Romish church in the United States. The money was apportioned among the dioceses as follows; viz. Cincinnati, twenty thousand dollars; Detroit, seven thousand and five hundred dollars; Bard-stown, twenty thousand dollars; St. Louis, thirty thousand dollars; Mobile, fifteen thousand dollars; Baltimore, five thousand dollars; New York, seven thousand and five hundred dollars; Charleston, five thousand dollars.—Report appended to Memoirs of American Missionaries. (See POPERY, and JESUITS.)

ROMANUS; a Christian martyr under the emperor Valerian. He became convinced of the reality of the Christian faith by witnessing the fortitude of the martyr Laurentius, whom he attended in the capacity of a soldier. He could not but feel the highest veneration for a God who inspired his votaries with such courage, and rendered his martyrs superior to all the cruelties of their persecutors. The change of Romanus soon became known, when he was apprehended, scourged severely, and, about the year 258, beheaded.—Fox, p. 33.

ROMANUS, a Christian martyr under Diocletian and Maximian, was a native of Palestine, and deacon of the church at Casarea. Being at Antioch when the imperial order arrived for sacrificing to idols, he was much afflicted to see many Christians, through fear, submit to the idolatrous mandate, and deny their faith to preserve their lives. Having reprehended some of the recreant Christians for their perfidy, he was informed against, and soon after apprehended. Being brought to the tribunal, he boldly avowed himself a Christian, and ready to suffer any infliction his faith might bring upon him. His body was dreadfully mangled, but he considered his wounds as only so many mouths to preach the doctrines of Christ, and submitted with the most perfect composure to the last, when he was strangled, A. D. 303.—Fox, p. 45.

ROMANES, (FRANCIS), a victim to the Spanish inquisition, was a native of Spain, but afterwards became a resident of Breme, where he transacted business for merchants of Antwerp. Having become convinced of the errors of popery, he surrendered his agency, informed his employers of his change, and devoted himself to the service of religion. He went to Spain, to exert himself for the conversion of his parents; and while there, was informed against by his former employers; he was accordingly seized, imprisoned for some time, and finally burnt. During his last torture, so long as he was able to speak, he kept repeating the seventh Psalm.—Fox, p. 133.

ROMEYN, (THEOPHORIC DIRCK, D. D.) minister of Schenectady, N. Y. was born January 12, 1744, at New Barbadoes, New Jersey. His early studies were directed by his brother, Thomas Romeyn, then a minister in Delaware. He graduated at Princeton, in 1765; was ordained by the Cetus over the Dutch church in Ulster county, May 14, 1766, and afterwards installed at Hackensack, where he remained until his removal to Schenectady, in November, 1784. His colleague, Mr. Meyer, represents him as a son of thunder in the pulpit. He was highly instrumental in promoting the independence of the Dutch churches, or their separation from the jurisdiction of Holland. In 1797, he was appointed professor of theology in the Dutch church. The establishment of the college at Schenectady is principally to be ascribed to his efforts. He died April 16, 1804, aged sixty.

His only son, Dr. John B. Romeyn, successively minister of Rhinebeck, Schenectady, Albany, and Cedar street, New York, whose sermons were published two vols. 1816, died February 22, 1825, aged forty-six.—Allen.

ROMISH CHURCH. (See CHURCH OF ROME, POPERY, ANTICHRIST, and JESUITS.)

ROOF. (See HOUSE.)

ROOT. The root metaphorically denotes the stock, the race, or the posterity, Prov. 12: 3. The root of the just shall not be disturbed, shall not fail.

Paul says, (Rom. 11: 16—18.) that the Jews are, as it were, the root that bears the tree into which the Gentiles are grafted, inasmuch as from them Christ came according to the flesh, and among them the first Christian church was collected. Jesus Christ is the root on which Christians depend, and from which they derive life and subsistence, Col. 2: 7. John 15: 1. Rev. 22: 16.—Calmet.

ROSARY; a bunch or string of beads, on which the Roman Catholics count their prayers.—Hend. Buck.

ROSCOE, (WILLIAM,) a religious biographer and miscellaneous writer, was born, about 1751, at Liverpool. His parentage was humble; his education imperfect; and he began his career in life as articled clerk to an attorney. In the few hours, however, which he could snatch from the law, he made himself master of the Latin, Italian, and French languages; and he subsequently acquired a considerable knowledge of Greek. His first literary attempt, a poem called Mount Pleasant, was written in his sixteenth year. On the expiration of his clerkship, he entered into partnership with Mr. Aspinwall, an attorney of Liverpool. After having followed the profession for several years, he entered himself at Gray's inn, with the purpose of becoming a barrister; and he subsequently became a partner in a banking house. As a banker he unfortunately failed. In 1806 he was elected one of the members for Liverpool; but he declined a contest at the next election. His two great works, the Lives of Lorenzo the Magnificent, and of Leo X. were published in 1796 and 1805, and gave him an enduring reputation. He died June 30, 1831. His family are still devoted to religion and literature. Among his other works are, Poems; a translation of Tansillo's Nurse; and various pamphlets on politics, and against the slave-trade.—Davenport.

ROSE, (chabatazeleth, Cant. 2: 1. Isa. 35: 1.) The rose, so much and so often sung by the poets of Persia, Arabia, Greece, and Rome, is, indeed, the pride of the garden for elegance of form, for glow of color, and fragrance of smell. Tournefort mentions fifty-three kinds, of which the Damascus rose, and the rose of Sharon, are the finest. The beauty of these flowers is too well known to be insisted on; and they are at this day much admired in the East, where they are extremely fragrant. In what esteem the rose was among the Greeks, may be learned from the fifth and fifty-third odes of Anacreon. Among the ancients it occupied a conspicuous place in every chaplet; it was a principal ornament in every festive meeting, and at every solemn sacrifice; and the comparisons in the Apocrypha (Ecclesi. 24: 14. and 50: 8.) show that the Jews were likewise much delighted with it. The rose-bud, or opening rose, seems in particular a favorite ornament. The Jewish sensualists, in Wisdom 2: 8, are introduced saying, "Let us fill ourselves with costly wine and ointments; and let no flower of the spring pass by us. Let us crown ourselves with rose-buds before they are withered."—Watson.

ROSENMUELLER, (JOHN GEORGE,) a celebrated German theologian, (born in 1736, and died in 1815,) was professor of theology at Eulagen and Leipsic, and distinguished himself as a preacher, and by his activity in the cause of education. Of his numerous works, we shall mention only his Scholia in Nov. Testament., and his Hist. Interpretationis Librorum, five vols. 1795—1814.—Enc. Am.

ROSENMUELLER, (ERNEST FREDERIC CHARLES,) a distinguished orientalist and theological critic, born in 1768, was educated at Leipsic, where he heard the lectures of Morus, Platner, Beck, &c. In 1795, he was extraordinary professor of Arabic, and in 1813, ordinary professor of oriental literature. Among his works are his valuable Scholia in Vet. Testamentum; Scholia in Nov. Testamentum; The East in Ancient and Modern Times, six vols. 1818—1820; Manual of Biblical Antiquities, and Manual of Biblical Criticism and Exegesis, four vols. in German. These works contain a great mass of valuable matter, critical, exegetical, geographical, and historical. His latest editions of them are greatly improved; his early diffuseness is retrenched, and many unripe theological opinions are exchanged for more mature, just, and evangelical views. (See NEOLOGY.) Rosenmueller has also rendered important services to oriental literature by, his Institutiones Linguae Arabicæ; (1818;) Arabum Adagia; Analecta Arabica; (1826, two vols.) &c.—Ency. Am.; Spirit of the Pilgrims; Robinson's Bibl. Repos.

ROSH; Ezekl. 38: 2, 3. (See МЕСЕНЪ, and ГОЪ.)

ROSIUCRUCIANS; a name assumed by a sect or cabal of hermetical philosophers, who arose, as it has been said, or at least became first taken notice of, in Germany, in the beginning of the fourteenth century. They bound themselves together by a solemn secret, which they all swore inviolably to preserve; and obliged themselves, at their admission into the order, to a strict observance of certain established rules. They pretended to know all sciences, and chiefly medicine; whereof they published themselves the restorers. They pretended to be masters of abundance of important secrets, and, among others, that of the philosopher's stone; all which they professed to have received by tradition from the ancient Egyptians, Chaldeans, the Magi, and Gymnosophists. They have been distinguished by several names, accommodated to the several branches of their doctrine. Because they pretend to protract the period of human life by means of certain nostrums, and even to restore youth, they were called Immortales; as they pretended to know all things, they have been called Illuminati; and, because they have made no appearance for several years, (unless the sect of Illuminated which lately started up on the continent derives its origin from them,) they have been called the Invisible Brothers. Their society is frequently signed by the letters F. R. C., which some among them interpret Frates Roris Cocti; it being pretended that the matter of the philosopher's stone is dew concocted, exalted, &c.—Hend. Buck.

ROTHWEL, (RICHARD,) an English divine, was born in Lancashire, (Eng.) near Bolton in the Moors, about A. D. 1563. He received his education at Cambridge, where he distinguished himself as a skillful linguist, a subtle disputant, and an eloquent orator. After spending a number of years in the university, he was ordained presbyter by Dr. Whight, then archbishop of Canterbury. It was not till after he had preached very learnedly a number of years, and had indulged in the constant gratification of self, that he became an humble, fervent, fearless, and faithful preacher of a risen Savior. Through the faithfulness of one, who was in learning and abilities far below himself, by the grace of God, he was led to see the error of his ways, and afterwards to indulge the hopes of the gospel. He then became a preacher of singular power, and knew no other joy than to devote the energies of a vigorous constitution to the glory of his heavenly Father.

He was made chaplain to a regiment under the earl of Essex, in Ireland, in which capacity he was very useful.

He afterwards attended to the controversies between the conformists and non-conformists; and anticipating persecution, he neither married, nor accepted a benefice, although several were offered him; but contented himself with being lecturer at a chapel in Lancashire, and domestic chaplain to the earl at Devonshire. A very common expression of his was, "Persecution is a pledge of future happiness."

He afterwards spent most of his time in the bishopric of Durham, having gone there at the proposal of lady Bowes. When it was suggested to him, that on account of the fierce disposition of the people, and their never having heard the gospel, they might deal unkindly with him, he answered, "If I thought I should not meet the devil there I would not go; he and I have been at odds in other places; and I hope we shall not agree there." He did indeed meet with opposition; and his life was attempted; but by his patience and courage he overcame, and was the instrument of doing much good.

His death, which took place in 1627, in the sixty-fourth year of his age, was most happy. While at his request the one hundred and twentieth Psalm was sung in his presence, his soul ascended to join the purer anthems of the just made perfect. It is not known that he left any writings. He seems to have confined himself entirely to preaching.—Middleton's Evan. Biog., vol. ii. p. 450.

ROUNDHEADS; a name of reproach coined about the time of the civil wars, and applied to such as refused to join in the profane practices of their neighbors, set up the worship of God in their families, and insisted on the necessity of spiritual religion. "Down with the Round heads!" was a common watchword. It was bestowed either because the Puritans usually wore short hair, and the royal party long; or, because, some say, the queen, at Strafford's trial, asked, in reference to Prynne, who that roundheaded man was who spoke so strongly. The device on the standard of colonel Cook, a parliamentary officer, was a man in armor cutting off the corner of a square cap with a sword. His motto was, Muto quadrata rotunditas.—Hend. Buck.

ROUSSEAU, (JOHN JAMES,) one of the most eloquent, sceptical, and paradoxical of French writers, and the head of the school of sentimental infidelity, was the son of a watchmaker, and was born, in 1712, at Geneva. His education was neglected; and romances formed the chief part of his early reading. After having been dismissed, as incapable, from an attorney's office, he was apprenticed to an engraver, from whom he received such ill treatment that he ran away before he was sixteen. He found a friend in Madame de Warens, who afterwards became his mistress. With her he lived for some years at intervals; and, when not with her, he spent a wandering life, in various characters, some of them of the humblest kind. It was not till 1750, that he manifested his splendid literary talents. In that year he gained the prize given by the academy of Dijon, for his celebrated Essay, in answer to the question, "Whether the progress of the sciences and arts has contributed to corrupt or purify manners?" He maintained that the effect had been injurious. From this period his pen became fertile and popular. He produced, in succession, the words and music of the Village Conjuror; a Letter on French Music; the Origin of the Inequality of Ranks; the Social Contract; the New Eloisa; and Emilius. The last of these, which appeared in 1762, was condemned by the parliament, and he was compelled to fly from France. Thenceforth his existence was passed in frequent changes of place, to escape real or fancied persecution, and in suspecting all his friends of insulting and conspiring against him. To disease of body and mind must, no doubt, be attributed much of his strange conduct. He died July 3, 1778. Of his latest works his Confessions are the most remarkable. His eloquent tribute to the character of our Savior is well known. Andrew Fuller has preserved it in his admirable work, The Gospel its own Witness. See Fuller's Works; Douglas on Errors concerning Religion; Foster's Essays.—Davenport.

ROWE, (MRS. ELIZABETH,) whose maiden name was Singer, a lady remarkable for the graces of her person and mind, was born, in 1674, at Ilchester, in Somersetshire. When she received her first serious impressions of religion is uncertain; but from the earliest period she displayed a taste for those noble and elevated subjects, which gave her a high relish for the pleasures of devotion. To poetry and writing she was devoted; the former was her favorite employment in youth. Indeed, so great were her poetical talents, that even her prose possessed the charms of verse; the same fire and elevation; the same bright images, bold figures, and rich and flowing diction. She could hardly write a familiar letter, but it bore the stamp of a poet. One of her friends remembered to have heard her say, she began to write verses at twelve years old, which was almost as soon as she could write at all.

In the year 1696, the twenty-second of her age, a collection of her poems, on various occasions, was published, at the desire of two of her friends. Her "Paraphrase on the Thirty-eighth Chapter of Job" was written at the request of bishop Ken, and gained her a great deal of reputation. She was married to Mr. Thomas Rowe in 1710, but was left a widow in 1715.

It was in retirement, after the death of her husband, that she composed the most celebrated of her works, "Friendship in Death," and the several parts of her "Letters, Moral and Entertaining." The intention of the "Letters from the Dead" is to impress the notion of the soul's immortality; without which all virtue and religion, with their temporal and eternal good consequences, must fall to the ground; and to make the mind contract an habitual persuasion of our future existence, by writings built on that foundation, and addressed to the affections and imagination. It may also be added, that the design, both of these and the "Letters, Moral and Entertaining," is, by fictitious examples of heroic virtue, and the most generous benevolence, to allure the reader to the practice of every thing that ennobles human nature, and benefits the world. She died of apoplexy, February 20th, 1736.

Mrs. Rowe appeared, by the gayety and cheerfulness of her temper, to be peculiarly fitted to enjoy life, and all its innocent satisfactions; yet, instead of any excessive fondness for things present and visible, the ardor with which she breathed after the divine enjoyments of a future world was inconceivably great. When her acquaintance expressed to her the joy they felt at seeing her look so well, and possessed of so much health as promised many years to come, she used to reply, "that it was the same as telling a slave his fetters were likely to be lasting; or compelling him on the strength of the walls of his dungeon." Among her works are, Poems; The History of Joseph, a poem; and Devout Exercises of the Heart. Life of Mrs. Rowe, by Dr. Watts.—Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.

RUBY; a beautiful gem, whose color is red, with an admixture of purple, and is, in its most perfect state, a gem of extreme value. In hardness it is equal to the sapphire, and second only to the diamond. It is mentioned in Job 28: 18. Prov. 8: 11, See.—Watson.

RUE; (pégauon, Luke 11: 42.) a small shrubby plant, common in gardens. It has a strong, unpleasant smell, and a bitterish, penetrating taste.—Watson.

RUFINA, a Christian martyr under Valerian, was the daughter of an eminent gentleman at Rome. Her suitor, who had professed Christianity, to avoid danger and save his fortune, renounced his faith. He then endeavored to dissuade Rufina from her profession; but she remained steadfast. She afterwards left the city; and when her suitor found her unyielding, he informed against her, which occasioned her apprehension. She passed through several tortures; but remaining inflexible, was beheaded, A. D. 257. Her sister SECUNDA came to her death in precisely the same way, and at the same time.

RUFUS; son of Simon the Cyrenian, who assisted our Savior in carrying his cross, Mark 15: 21. Rufus probably was famous among the first Christians, since Mark names him with distinction. His father was probably the same as Simeon, mentioned Acts 13: 1.

There is more attached to the character of the Rufus mentioned in Rom. 16: 13. than appears at first sight; inasmuch as Paul calls the mother of Rufus "his mother." Now she could not be the natural mother of Paul, unless Paul and Rufus were brothers; nor could she be the mother-in-law of Paul by natural relation to his wife, unless Rufus were brother-in-law to Paul. Perhaps, however, he means no more than that the mother of Rufus had favored him with those attentions and services, truly maternal, which a mother might have done; and therefore the apostle salutes her son and herself under this affectionate recollection.

This leads to an inquiry where this intimacy could have taken place. If Simeon the teacher at Antioch were her husband, then, as we know that Paul was long at Antioch, we see time, place, and occasion, of the services rendered by the mother of Rufus to Paul; and of mutual kindness and intimacy between them.

As to the residence of this pious woman at Rome with her son Rufus, we may well suppose that her husband, Simeon, was dead at Antioch; and that she accompanied her son to the capital of the empire, where many Jews had settled. In what capacity Rufus dwelt at Rome, we have no means of determining. If he were a Christian teacher, as his father was, it should appear that he visited Philippi in his journeyings, where he suffered many adversities; for Polycarp, in his epistle to the Philippians, speaks of the "patience, which ye have seen set forth before your eyes, in the blessed Ignatius, and Zozimus, and Rufus, and in Paul himself." This association of persons contributes to confirm to Rufus the character of a distinguished teacher; and to mark him as the same Rufus, elect in the Lord, with whom Paul was familiar; his brother, not only by profession and grace, but also by intimacy, and, perhaps, by constant residence in the same family.—Calmet.

RULE, RULERS. These words are applied to different stations of authority. God ruleth over all; and the proud Nebuchadnezzar was degraded from his throne till he acknowledged this truth, Dan. 4: 26. The Messiah rules among the sons of men, and even rules, in power, over his enemies, (Ps. 110: 2.) but in goodness over his people. Husbands rule their wives and their own families. Pastors rule the churches which they teach. Princes and nobles rule wherever their power extends; and sovereign rule is over all for the benefit and advantage of its subjects. In proportion as the sphere of regulating authority is enlarged, it requires greater energy of mind, greater capability of apprehension, greater fortitude, and greater rectitude, to discharge the duties attached to its importance, its dignity, and its influence.—Calmet.

RUMP of the sacrifices. Moses ordained that the rump and fat of the sheep, offered for peace-offerings, should be given to the fire of the altar, Exod. 29: 22. Lev. 3: 9. 7: 3. 8: 25. 9: 19. The rump was esteemed the most delicate part of the animal, being the fattest. Travellers, ancient and modern, speak of the rumps of certain breeds of sheep in Syria and Arabia, as weighing twenty or thirty pounds.—Calmet.

RUN, is used metaphorically not only for rapidity, and strenuous exertion of the powers, but for regularity and perseverance: (1 Cor. 9: 24—27.) "I therefore so run, not as uncertainly;" not passing over the boundaries, the limits of the course. "So run that ye may obtain" the crown, the reward, Heb. 12: 1. "Let us run with patience," perseveringly, steadily, "the race set before us." (See GAMES; RACE.) To run to excess of riot, (1 Pet. 4: 4.) is to pursue with avidity, to follow with prolonged attention, sensual gratifications, indulgences, &c.—Calmet.

RUSH. (See BULRUSH, and FLAG.)

RUSH, (BENJAMIN, M. D.), a distinguished physician of our country, was born at Byberry, near Philadelphia, December 24, 1745. After the death of his father, his mother sent him to the academy of his uncle, Dr. Finley, in Nottingham, Maryland, where he lived eight years and became deeply impressed with moral and religious sentiments.

Having graduated at Princeton, in 1760, he studied physic with Redman and Shippen, and also at Edinburgh, from 1766 to 1768. He returned to Philadelphia, in 1769, and was elected the professor of chemistry in the college; in 1791, he was appointed professor of medicine. In his practice he relied much on the lancet and on cathartic medicines. In the yellow fever of 1793, when four thousand and forty-four persons died, he successfully resorted to his favorite remedies. Being a member of congress in 1776, his name is affixed to the declaration of independence. In 1777, he was appointed physician general of the hospital in the middle military department. In 1787, he was a member of the convention for adopting the constitution of the United States; and for the last fourteen years of his life treasurer of the United States mint. He was president of the society for the abolition of slavery; vice-president of the Philadelphia Bible society; and connected also with many other charitable and literary societies. His short inquiry into the effect of ardent spirits upon the human body and mind was a most valuable treatise, and one of the earliest productions on the subject of temperance. He also wrote against the use of tobacco, describing the effect of its habitual use on health, morals, and property. His zeal for the interests of learning induced him to be one of the founders of Dickinson college, at Carlisle; he also eloquently advocated the universal establishment of free schools, and the use of the New Testament in moulding the youthful mind in schools. He died of the pleurisy, after an illness of five days, April 19, 1813, aged sixty-seven.

Dr. Rush was one of the most eminent physicians and most learned medical writers of our country. His writings contain many expressions of piety. He avows the firm conviction, that the influence of the Christian religion, through the mind, in promoting health, if there were no other evidence, would be sufficient to prove it the benevolent religion, and the most precious gift of God to man. It was his usual practice at the close of each day to read to his collected family a chapter in the Bible, and to address God in prayer. His character is fully described in Thacher's Medical Biography, where may be found a list of the subjects of his various writings. His medical works are in six vols. He published also a volume of Essays, literary, moral, and philosophical, 1798. Thacher, ii. 29—71; Staughton's Esology; Davenport; Ency. Am.—Allen.

RUSSELL, (LADY RACHEL,) was the second daughter of the earl of Southampton, and widow of lord Vaughan. In 1667, she was united to lord William Russel, and for sixteen years they enjoyed uninterrupted felicity. On his trial she assisted him nobly. Lord Russel, on being asked if he wished for a person to take notes for him, replied, "My wife is here to do it." While making every human exertion to obtain a mitigation of the sentence; while every plan was being tried; while nobly offering to accompany him into perpetual exile, his heroic and lovely wife never for one moment requested him to swerve from the strictest honor and integrity. Lord Russel said, "there was a signal providence of God in giving him such a wife, where there was birth, fortune, great understanding, great religion, and a great kindness to him." She parted from him at last without shedding a tear, and retired, in silent but expressive anguish, to her wretched and dreary home.

Though, after the execution of lord Russel, his lady was deeply affected, yet her mind never sunk. She survived him forty years, but constantly refused to enter again into the marriage state. She died at the age of eighty-seven, in 1723. Lady Russel was a woman of deep, ardent, and unaffected piety, and an excellent understanding. Her Letters have been often reprinted. See Life of Lady Russel; Biographies of Good Wives, by Mrs. Child.—Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.

RUSSIAN CHURCH. (See Church, GREEK.)

RUTH. The book of Ruth is so called from the name of the person, a native of Moab, whose history it contains. It may be considered as a supplement to the book of Judges, to which it was joined in the Hebrew canon, and the latter part of which it greatly resembles, being a detached story belonging to the same period. Ruth had a son called Obed, who was the grandfather of David, which circumstance probably occasioned her history to be written, as the genealogy of David, from Pharez the son of Judah, from whom the Messiah was to spring, is here given; and some commentators have thought, that the descent of our Savior from Ruth, a Gentile woman, was an intimation of the comprehensive nature of the Christian dispensation. We are nowhere informed when Ruth lived; but as king David was her great-grandson, we may place her history about B. C. 1250. This book was certainly written after the birth of David, and probably by the prophet Samuel, though some have attributed it to Hezekiah, and others to Ezra. Its canonical authority was never disputed.

The story related in this book is extremely interesting; the widowed distress of Naomi, her affectionate concern for her daughters, the reluctant departure of Orpah, the dutiful attachment of Ruth, and the sorrowful return to Bethlehem, are very beautifully told. The simplicity of manners, likewise, which is shown in Ruth's industry and attention to Naomi; the elegant charity of Boaz; and his acknowledgment of his kindred with Ruth, afford a pleasing contrast to the turbulent scenes described in the book of the Judges. The respect, likewise, which the Israelites paid to the law of Moses, and their observance of ancient customs, are represented in a very lively and animated manner, Ruth 4. It is a pleasing digression from the general thread of the sacred history.—Watson.

RUTHERFORTH, (THOMAS,) a divine, was born in 1712, at Papworth Everard, in Cambridgeshire; was educated at Saint John's college, Cambridge; became professor of divinity in 1745; and died, in 1771, rector of Barley, in Hertfordshire, and archdeacon of Essex. Of his works, the most important are, a System of Natural Philosophy; Institutes of Natural Law; a Discourse on Miracles; and Sermons.—Davenport.

RYLAND, (JOHN, D. D.,) one of the most learned divines and best of men, was born at Warwick, January 29, 1753. His father was a Baptist minister of that town, who afterwards removed to Northampton, in 1759, where he conducted a respectable seminary for twenty-six years; after which he retired to Enfield, near London, where he died, on the 24th of July, 1792, at the age of sixty-nine. His son, the subject of this article, began early to discover a capacity for learning, which induced his father to put into his hands a Hebrew grammar and vocabulary, when he was only four or five years old; and he recollects to have read the twenty-third Psalm in the original to the pious Mr. James Hervey, in the summer of 1758, a few months only before the death of that distinguished clergyman. He was educated by his father, and in process of time became, first his assistant, and afterwards his successor in the school at Northampton. On the 13th of September, 1767, he was baptized on a personal profession of his faith, along with three others, and became a member of the church of which his father was pastor.

In 1771, he began to preach in and about Northampton, with much acceptance and usefulness, until, having attained the age of twenty-eight, he was, in 1781, united with his father in the pastoral office, which in five years afterwards devolved upon himself entirely, in consequence of the removal of his parent to Enfield. For the succeeding ten years, he continued to labor in his Master's vineyard, and to conduct the academy, with growing reputation and extensive usefulness, both in the church and the world. But a circumstance at this time intervened which greatly changed his plans and prospects in life, and was the occasion of introducing him into a far more widely extended sphere of exertion and utility. By the death of Dr. Caleb Evans, in August, 1791, the two offices of pastor of the Baptist church in Broadmead, Bristol, and president of the academical institution connected with it, became vacant; and in the following year, Mr. Ryland was prevailed upon, by the pressing solicitations of his friends, to accept the presidency of the academy, and the pastoral office in the church, and to remove thither, which accordingly took place, in December, 1793.

While this change was in progress, the Baptist mission to India was planned and carried into effect; an undertaking that will ever redound to the honor of its founders, and of which Dr. Ryland was entitled to say, quorum pars magna fuit. In promoting the interests of this grand plan of benevolence, he may be said from its commencement to have "found the life of his hand." And when death had deprived the society of the able services of Mr. Fuller, who for several years filled the office of secretary to the mission, Dr. Ryland labored beyond his measure to make up the deficiency during the remaining ten years of his useful life.

It was his happiness to enjoy a sound and healthy constitution, and he took the best method of preserving it unbroken, by the practice of early rising, and a systematic temperance, which he carried to a degree bordering upon austerity. Having completed his seventy-second year, he closed his public services of more than half a century; and on the 25th of May, 1825, he gently "fell asleep."

He was a man of great simplicity of character, totally exempt from the pedantry and pompous deportment of the priesthood; humble, meek, and unassuming; of undisssembled piety, and unwearied zeal in behalf of the best interests of mankind. His theological sentiments were, what is termed, moderate Calvinism; not the Calvinism of Crisp, and Brine, and Gill, but of Jonathan Edwards, to whose writings he was warmly attached, particularly his treatises on the "Freedom of the Will," and on the "Affections."

Though his multifarious avocations prevented Dr. Ryland from engaging in any elaborate literary undertaking, he published no less than thirty-four detached pieces during his lifetime, consisting of single sermons, tracts, &c.; and since his decease, the public have been favored with two octavo volumes, under the title of "Pastoral Memorials," consisting of one hundred and fifty short discourses, and about a dozen essays. It seems also to be in the contemplation of his friends, to collect and reprint, in an octavo volume, the pamphlets published by himself, almost all of which have been some time out of print. See his Life prefixed to Pastoral Memorials; and Robert Hall's Funeral Sermon on his Death, one of the most beautiful things in the English language.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

S.

SABACTHANI; a Syriac phrase, signifying "Thou hast forsaken me," Mark 15: 35.

SABAOTH, or rather Zabaoth; a Hebrew word, signifying hosts or armies; Jehovah Sabaoth, The Lord of Hosts. By this phrase we may understand the angels and ministers of the Lord, either the stars and planets, which, as an army ranged in battle array, perform the will of God; or both collectively. It is only with this comprehensive word that Jehovah is ever found in construction.—Watson.

SABBATARIANS; those who keep the seventh day as the Sabbath. They are to be found principally, if not wholly, among the Baptists. They object to the reasons which are generally alleged for keeping the first day; and assert, that the change from the seventh to the first was effected by Constantine on his conversion to Christianity. The three following propositions contain a summary of their principles as to this article of the Sabbath, by which they stand distinguished:—1. That God hath required the observance of the seventh, or last day of every week, to be observed by mankind universally for the weekly Sabbath. 2 That this command of God is perpetually binding on man till time shall be no more. And, 3. That this sacred rest of the seventh-day Sabbath is not (by divine authority) changed from the seventh and last to the first day of the week, or that the Scripture doth nowhere require the observance of any other day of the week for the weekly Sabbath, but the seventh day only.

They hold, in common with other Christians, the distinguishing doctrines of Christianity. There were likely two congregations of the Sabbatarians in London; one among the General Baptists, meeting in Mill Yard, the trust-deeds of which date as far back as 1678, but which is now greatly reduced in number; the other among the Particular Baptists, in Cripple-gate. There are, also, a few to be found in different parts of the kingdom; and in America there are eighteen churches, twenty-nine ministers, and two thousand eight hundred and six-two communicants. They are there called Seventh-day Baptists. A tract, in support of this doctrine, was published by Mr. Cornthwaite, in 1740. See Evans' Sketch of the Denominations of the Christian World; the Protestant Sentinel, published at Homer, (N. Y.); and books under next article.—Hend. Buck.

SABBATH. The obligation of the Sabbath upon Christians, as well as the extent of it, has been the subjects of much controversy. Christian churches themselves have differed; and the theologians of the same church. Much has been written upon the subject on each side, and much research and learning employed, sometimes to darken a very plain subject.

The question respects the will of God as to this particular point,—whether one day in seven is to be wholly devoted to religion, exclusive of worldly business and worldly pleasures. Now, there are but two ways in which the will of God can be collected from his word; either by some explicit injunction upon all, or by incidental circumstances. Let us then allow, for a moment, that we have no such explicit injunction; yet we have certainly none to the contrary: let us allow that we have only for our guidance in inferring the will of God in this particular, certain circumstances declarative of his will; yet this important conclusion is inevitable, that all such indicative circumstances are in favor of a sabbatical institution, and that there is not one which exhibits any thing contrary to it.

The seventh day was hallowed at the close of the creation; its sanctity was afterwards marked by the withholding of the manna on that day, and the provision of a double supply on the sixth, and that previous to the giving of the law from Sinai: it was then made a part of that great epitome of religious and moral duty, which God wrote with his own finger on tables of stone; it was incorporated with the public political law of the only people to whom Almighty God ever made himself a political Head and Ruler; its observance is connected throughout the prophetic age with the highest promises, its violations with the severest maledictions; it was among the Jews in our Lord's time a day of solemn religious assembling, and was so observed by him; when changed to the first day of the week, the day on which the first Christians assembled; it was called, by way of eminence, "the Lord's day;" and we have inspired authority to say, that, both under the Old and New Testament dispensations, it is used as an expressive type of the heavenly and eternal rest. Now, against all these circumstances so strongly declarative of the will of God, as to the observance of a sabbatical institution, what circumstance or passage of Scripture can be opposed, as bearing upon it a contrary indication? Certainly, not one; for those passages in St. Paul, in which he speaks of Jewish Sabbaths, with their Levitical rites, and of a distinction of days, the observance of which marked a weak or a criminal adherence to the abolished ceremonial dispensation, do not touch the Sabbath as a branch of the moral law, or as it was changed, by the authority of the apostles, to the first day of the week. If, then, we were left to determine the point by inference, the conclusion must be irresistibly in favor of the institution.

But strong as this ground is, we quit it for a still stronger. It is wholly a mistake, that the Sabbath, because not re-enacted with the formality of the decalogue, is not explicitly enjoined upon Christians, and that the testimony of Scripture to such an injunction is not unequivocal and irrefragable. The Sabbath was appointed at the creation of the world, and sanctified, or set apart for holy purposes, "for man," for all men, and therefore for Christians; since there was never any repeal of the original institution. To this we add, that if the moral law be the law of Christians, then is the Sabbath as explicitly enjoined upon them as upon the Jews. But that the moral law is our law, as well as the law of the Jews, all but Antinomians must acknowledge; and few, we suppose, will be inclined to run into the fearful mazes of that error, in order to support lax notions as to the obligation of the Sabbath; into which, however, they must be plunged, if they deny the law of the decalogue to be binding. That it is so bound upon us, a few passages of Scripture will prove as well as many. Our Lord declares, that he "came not to destroy the law and the prophets, but to fulfil," Matt. 5: 17. Some divines have, it is true, called the observance of the Sabbath a positive, and not a moral, precept. If it were so, its obligation is precisely the same, in all cases where God himself has not relaxed it; and if a positive precept only, it has surely a special eminence given to it, by being placed in the list of the ten commandments, and being capable, with them, of an epitome which resolves them into the love of God and our neighbor. The truth seems to be, that, like the law of marriage, likewise instituted in paradise, it is a mixed precept, not wholly positive, but lutimately, perhaps essentially, connected with several moral principles of homage to God, and mercy to men, as a means to an end; with the obligation of religious worship, of public religious worship, and of undistracted public worship: and this will account for its collocation in the decalogue with the highest duties of religion, and the leading rules of personal and social morality. The passage from our Lord's sermon on the mount, with its context, therefore, is a sufficiently explicit enforcement of the moral law, generally, upon his followers; but when he says, "The Sabbath was made for man," he clearly refers to its original institution, as a universal law, and not to its obligation upon the Jews only, in consequence of the enactments of the law of Moses. It "was made for MAN," not as he may be a Jew, or a Christian, but AS MAN, a creature bound to love, worship, and obey his God and Maker, and on his trial for eternity.

Another explicit proof that the law of the ten commandments, and, consequently, the law of the Sabbath, is obligatory upon Christians, is found in the answer of the apostle to an objection to the doctrine of justification by faith: "Do we then make void the law through faith?" (Rom. 3: 31.) which is equivalent to asking, Does Christianity teach that the law is no longer obligatory on Christians, because it teaches that no man can be justified by it? To this he answers, in the most solemn form of expression, "God forbid; yea, we establish the law." Now, the sense in which the apostle uses the term, "the law," in this argument, is indubitably marked in Rom. 7: 7: "I had not known sin but by the law; for I had not known lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet;" which, being a plain reference to the tenth command of the decalogue, as plainly shows that the decalogue is "the law" of which he speaks. This, then, is the law which is established by the gospel; and this can mean nothing else but the establishment and confirmation of its authority, as the rule of all inward and outward holiness. Whoever, therefore, denies the obligation of the Sabbath on Christians, denies the obligation of the whole decalogue; and there is no real medium between the acknowledgment of the divine authority of this sacred institution, as a universal law, and that gross corruption of Christianity, generally designated Antinomianism.

Nor is there any force in the dilemma into which the Anti-sabbatarians would push us, when they argue, that, if the case be so, then are we bound to the same circumstantial exactitude of obedience with regard to this command, as to the other precepts of the decalogue; and, therefore, that we are bound to observe the seventh day, reckoning from Saturday, as the Sabbath day. But, as the command is partly positive, and partly moral, it may have circumstances which are capable of being altered in perfect accordance with the moral principles on which it rests, and the moral ends which it proposes. Such circumstances are not indeed to be judged of on our own authority. We must either have such general principles for our guidance as have been revealed by God, and cannot therefore be questioned, or some special authority from which there can be no just appeal. Now, though there is not on record any divine command issued to the apostles, to change the Sabbath from the day on which it was held by the Jews, to the first day of the week; yet, when we see that this was done in the apostolic age, and that the change was made under the sanction of inspired men; and those men, the appointed rulers in the church of Christ; whose business it was to "set all things in order," which pertained to its worship and moral government,—we may rest well satisfied with this,—that as a Sabbath is obligatory upon us, we act under apostolic authority for observing it on the first day of the week, and thus commemorate at once the creation and the redemption of the world.

But it would not follow even from this change, that they did in reality make any alteration in the law of the Sabbath, either as it stood at the time of its original institution at the close of the creation, or in the decalogue of Moses. The same portion of time which constituted the seventh day from the creation, could not be observed in all parts of the earth; and it is not probable, therefore, that the original law expresses more, than that a seventh day, or one day in seven, the seventh day after six days of labor, should be thus appropriated, from whatever point the enumeration might set out, or the weekly cycle begin. For if more had been intended, then it would have been necessary to establish a rule for the reckoning of days themselves, which has been different in different nations; some reckoning from evening to evening, as the Jews now do, others from midnight to midnight, &c. So that those persons in this country who hold their Sabbath on Saturday, under the notion of exactly conforming to the Old Testament, and yet calculate the days from midnight to midnight, have no assurance at all that they do not desecrate a part of the original Sabbath, which might begin, as the Jewish Sabbath now, on Friday evening; and, on the contrary, hallow a portion of a common day, by extending the Sabbath beyond Saturday evening. Even if this were ascertained, the differences of latitude and longitude would throw the whole into disorder; and it is not probable that a universal law should have been fettered with that circumstantial exactness, which would have rendered difficult, and sometimes doubtful, astronomical calculations necessary in order to its being obeyed according to the intention of the lawgiver. Accordingly we find, as Mr. Holden observes, that in the original institution it is stated in general terms, that God blessed and sanctified the seventh day, which must undoubtedly imply the sanctity of every seventh day; but not that it is to be subsequently reckoned from the first demiurgic day. Had this been included in the command of the Almighty, something, it is probable, would have been added declaratory of the intention; whereas expressions the most undefined are employed; not a syllable is uttered concerning the order and number of the days; and it cannot reasonably be disputed that the command is truly obeyed by the separation of every seventh day from common to sacred purposes, at whatever given time the cycle may commence. Just so we find it in the decalogue, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God;" not the seventh according to any particular method of computing the septenary cycle, but, in reference to the six before mentioned, every seventh day in rotation after six of labor.

Thus that part of the Jewish law, the decalogue, which, on the authority of the New Testament, we have shown to be obligatory upon Christians, leaves the computation of the weekly cycle undetermined; and, after six days of labor, enjoins the seventh as the Sabbath, to which the Christian practice as exactly conforms as the Jewish. It is not, however, left to every individual to determine which day should be his Sabbath, though he should fulfil the law so far as to abstract the seventh part of his time from labor. It was ordained for worship, for public worship; and it is therefore necessary that the Sabbath should be uniformly observed by a whole community at the same time. The divine Legislator of the Jews interposed for this end, by special direction, as to his people. The first Sabbath kept in the wilderness was calculated from the first day in which the manna fell; and with no apparent reference to the creation of the world. By apostolic authority, it is now fixed to be held on the first day of the week; and thus one of the great ends for which it was established, that it should be a day of "holy convocation," is secured.

Traces of the original appointment of the Sabbath, and of its observance prior to the giving forth of the law of Moses, have been found by the learned in the tradition which universally prevailed of the sacredness of the number seven, and the fixing of the first period of time to the revolution of seven days. The measuring of time by a day and night is pointed out to the common sense of mankind by the diurnal course of the sun. Lunar months and solar years are equally obvious to all rational creatures; so that the reason why time has been computed by days, months, and years, is readily given: but how the division of time into weeks of seven days, and this from the beginning, came to obtain universally amongst mankind, no man can account for, without having respect to some impressions on the minds of men from the constitution and law of nature, with the tradition of a sabbatical rest from the foundation of the world. Yet plain intimations of this weedy revolution of time are to be found in the earliest Greek poets; Hesiod, Homer, Linus; as well as among the nations of the Chaldeans, Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans. It deserves consideration, too, on this subject, that Noah, in sending forth the dove out of the ark, observed the septenary revolution of days; (Gen. 8: 10, 12.) and at a subsequent period, in the days of the patriarch Jacob, a week is spoken of as a well-known period of time, Gen. 29: 27. See also Judg. 14: 12, 15, 17. These considerations are surely sufficient to evince the futility of the arguments which are sometimes plausibly urged for the first institution of the Sabbath under the law; and the design of which in most cases is, to set aside the moral obligation of appropriating one day in seven to the purposes of the public worship of God, and the observation of divine ordinances. But the truth is, that the seventh day was set apart from the beginning as a day of rest; and it was also strictly enjoined upon the Israelites in their law, both on the ground of its original institution, (Exod. 20: 8—11.) and also to commemorate their deliverance from the bondage of Egypt, Deut. 5: 15.

We are informed by Eusebius, that from the beginning the Christians assembled on the first day of the week, called by them the "Lord's day," for the purposes of religious worship, "to read the Scriptures, to preach, and to celebrate the Lord's supper;" and Justin Martyr observes, "that on the Lord's day, all Christians in the city, or country, meet together, because that is the day of our Lord's resurrection, and then we read the writings of the apostles and prophets; this being done, the president makes an oration to the assembly, to exhort them to imitate, and to practise the things they have heard; then we all join in prayer, and after that we celebrate the sacrament. Then they who are able, and willing, give what they think proper, and what is collected is laid up in the hands of the president, who distributes it to orphans and widows, and other necessitous Christians, as their wants require." See 1 Cor. 16: 20. A very honorable conduct and worship! would to God it were more prevalent among us; with the spirit and piety of primitive Christianity!

The evils arising from sabbath-breaking are greatly to be lamented; they are an insult to God, an injury to ourselves, and an awful example to our servants, our children, and our friends. To sanctify this day, we should consider it, 1. A day of rest; not, indeed, to exclude works of mercy and charity, but a cessation from all labor and care.—2. As a day of remembrance; of creation, preservation, redemption.—3. As a day of meditation and prayer, in which we should cultivate communion with God, Rev. 1: 10.—4. As a day of public worship, Acts 20: 7. John 20: 19.—5. As a day of joy, Isa. 56: 2. Ps. 118: 24.—6. As a day of praise, Ps. 116: 12—14.—7. As a day of anticipation; looking forward to that holy, happy, and eternal Sabbath, that remains for the people of God.

SABBATH DAY'S JOURNEY. Origen says that the journey of a Sabbath day is one mile, or two thousand cubits. The Jews also used to make a mile consist of two thousand cubits; so that their cubit must be two feet and a half, since their mile contains a thousand paces, or five thousand feet, taking their paces at five feet each. The Syriac translator of the Acts of the Apostles puts about seven stadia for a Sabbath day's journey; which is according to what some rabbins say, that a mile is seven stadia and a half.—Calmet.

SABBATICAL YEAR, was to be celebrated among the Jews from seven years to seven years, when the land was to rest, and be left without culture, Exod. 23: 10. Lev. 25: 2, 3, &c. It began probably in autumn, after the harvest. They were then to set slaves at liberty, to remit all debts, and each was to re-enter on his inheritance that had been alienated. God appointed the observation of the sabbatical year, to preserve the remembrance of the creation of the world; to enforce the acknowledgment of the sovereign authority over all things, particularly over the land of Canaan, which he had given to the Hebrews, by delivering up the fruits of their fields to the poor and the stranger. It was a kind of tribute which they paid for it to the Lord. Besides, he intended to inculcate humanity on his people, by commanding that they should resign to the slaves, to the poor, to strangers, and to brutes, the produce of their fields, of their vineyards, and of their gardens, Lev. 25: 2, &c.—Calmet.

SABEANS; a people mentioned Isa. 45: 14: "The Sabeans, men of stature." Probably the Sabeans of Arabia Felix, who were descended from Saba. But as there are several of this name, who were all heads of peoples, or of tribes, we must distinguish them.—(1.) Those Sabeans who seized the flocks of Job (1: 15.) were, probably, a people of Arabia Deserta, about Bozra; or, perhaps, a flying troop of Sabeans which infested that country. (2.) Descendants from Sheba, son of Cush, (Gen. 10: 7;) and probably of Arabia Felix: they are famous for spices; the poets give them the epithet of soft and effeminate, and say they were governed by women. Several are of opinion, that from hence came the queen of Sheba, (1 Kings 10: 1, 2.) and that of these Sabeans the Palmist speaks: Isa. 10.) The kings of Arabia and Sheba shall give gifts; (72: 60: 6. Jer. 6: 20. (3.) Descendants from Joktan may very well be those mentioned by Ezekiel, 27: 23. Calmet thinks they inhabited beyond the Euphrates; whence they are connected with Assur and Chelmad. Compare Gen. 10: 28. 1 Chron. 1: 22. (4.) Sabeans are also placed in Africa, in the isle of Meroë. Josephus brings the queen of Sheba from hence, and pretends that it had the name of Shebah, or Saba, before that of Meroë. Bruce, also, is of this opinion.—Calmet.

SABELLIANS; a sect in the third century that embraced the opinions of Sabellius, a philosopher of Egypt, who openly taught that there is but one person in the God-head. (See MODALISTS.)

The Sabellians maintained that the Word and the Holy Spirit are only virtues, emanations, or functions of the Deity; and held that He who is in heaven is the Father of all things; that he descended into the Virgin, became a child, and was born of her as a Son; and that, having accomplished the mystery of our salvation, he diffused himself on the apostles in tongues of fire, and was then denominated the Holy Ghost. This they explained by resembling God to the sun; the illuminating virtue or quality of which was the Word, and its warming virtue the Holy Spirit. The Word, they taught, was dated, like a divine ray, to accomplish the work of redemption; and that, having reascended into heaven, the influences of the Father were communicated after a like manner to the apostles.—Head. Buck.

SABIANS, MENDAITES. (See CHRISTIANS OF ST. JOHN.)

SABIANS, (from Isaba, a host,) is also the name given to an ancient sect of idolaters, whose religion consisted in the worship of the planets, or the host of heaven: hence the appellation.—Head. Buck.

SABTAH, the third son of Cush, (Gen. 10: 7.) peopled part of Arabia Felix, where is a city called Sabta, and a people called Sabatheans.—Calmet.

SABTECHA; fifth son of Cush, who also peopled, as is thought, part of Arabia, or some country toward Assyria, or Armenia, or Caramania: for in all these regions are found traces of the name Sabtecha, Gen. 10: 7.—Calmet.

SACCOPHORI; a denomination in the fourth century, so called, because they always went clothed in sackcloth, and affected great austerity and penance.—Head. Buck.

SACK, SACKCLOTH. These are pure Hebrew words, and have spread into almost all languages.—In great calamities, in penitence, in trouble, the Jews wore sackcloth about their bodies, 2 Sam. 3: 31. The prophets were often clothed in sackcloth; and generally in coarse clothing.—Calmet.

SACK, BRETHREN OF THE; a religious order, which was established about the beginning of the thirteenth century, and had monasteries in France, Germany, Italy, and England. The brethren were very austere; for they neither ate flesh nor drank wine. Besides the sack which they wore, and from which they took the name, they went bare-legged, and had only wooden sandals on their feet.—Hend. Buck.

SACRAMENT, is derived from the Latin word sacramentum, which signifies an oath, particularly the oath taken by soldiers to be true to their country and general. The word was adopted by the writers of the Latin church, to denote those ordinances of religion by which Christians came under an obligation of obedience to God, and which obligation, they supposed, was equally sacred with that of an oath. (See Vow.) Of sacraments, in this sense of the words, Protestant churches admit of but two; and it is not easy to conceive how a greater number can be made out from Scripture. (See BAPTISM, and LORD'S SUPPER.) The Romanists, however, add to this number, confirmation, penance, extreme unction, ordination, and marriage, holding in all seven sacraments. (See POPE.) The Socinians consider the sacrament merely as something external and material, designed to represent what is spiritual and invisible; and that they are to be used as means, like the reading the Scriptures, for instance, for purposes of moral improvement. The true doctrine undoubtedly is, that a rite, in order to come up to the idea of a sacrament, should not merely present a vague and general resemblance between the external matter which is the visible substance of the rite, and the thing thereby signified, but also words of institution, and a promise by which the two are connected together.—Hend. Buck.

SACRAMENTARIANS; a general name given to all such as have held erroneous opinions respecting the Lord's supper. The term is chiefly applied among Catholics, by way of reproach, to the Lutherans, Calvinists, and other Protestants.—Hend. Buck.

SACRIFICE, properly so called, is the solemn infliction of death on a living creature, generally by the effusion of its blood, in a way of religious worship; and the presenting of this to God, as a supplication for the pardon of sin, and a sort of satisfaction for the insult and injury thereby offered to his majesty and government. (See PRIEST.)

Sacrifices have, in all ages, and by almost every nation, been regarded as necessary to placate the divine anger, and render the Deity propitious. Though the Gentiles had lost the knowledge of the true God, they still retained such a dread of him, that they sometimes sacrificed their own offspring for the purpose of averting his anger. Unhappy and bewildered mortals, seeking relief from their guilty fears, hoped to atone for past crimes by offering up objects most dear to their affections; they gave their first-born for their transgression, the fruit of their body for the sin of their soul.

Various have been the conjectures of the learned concerning the origin of sacrifices. Some suppose that they had their origin in superstition, and were merely the inventions of men; others, that they originated in the natural sentiments of the human heart; others imagine that God, in order to prevent their being offered to idols, introduced them into his service, though he did not approve of them as good in themselves, or as proper rites of worship.

An objection to the divine origin of sacrifices has been drawn from the Scriptures themselves, particularly Jer. 7: 22, 23. Dr. Doddridge, however, justly remarks, that, according to the genius of the Hebrew language, one thing seems to be forbidden, and another commanded, when the meaning only is, that the latter is generally to be preferred to the former. The text before us is a remarkable instance of this; as likewise Joel 2: 13. Matt. 6: 19, 20. John 6: 27. Luke 12: 4, 5, and Col. 3: 2. And it is evident that Gen. 45: 8. Exod. 16: 8. John 5: 30. 7: 19, and many other passages, are to be expounded in the same comparative sense; (Paraph. on the New Test., sect. 59.) so that the whole may be resolved into the apophthegm of the wise man: (Prov. 21: 3.) "To do justice and judgment is more acceptable to the Lord than sacrifice."

The Scriptures sufficiently indicate that sacrifices were instituted by divine appointment, immediately after the entrance of sin, to prefigure the sacrifice of Christ. Accordingly, we find Abel, Noah, Abraham, Job, and others, offering sacrifices in the faith of the Messiah; and the divine acceptance of their sacrifices is particularly recorded. But, in religious institutions, the Most High has ever been jealous of his prerogative. He alone prescribes his own worship; and he regards as vain and presumptuous every pretence of honoring him which he has not commanded. The sacrifice of blood and death could not have been offered to him without impiety, nor would he have accepted it, had not his high authority pointed the way by an explicit prescription.

Under the law, sacrifices of various kinds were appointed for the children of Israel; the paschal lamb; (Exod. 12: 3.) the holocaust, or whole burnt-offering; (Lev. 7: 8.) the sin-offering, or sacrifice of expiation; (Lev. 4: 3, 4.) and the peace-offering, or sacrifice of thanksgiving, Lev. 7: 11, 12.

Such were the sacrifices of the Hebrews; sacrifices, in deed, very imperfect, and altogether incapable, in themselves, to purify the soul! Paul has described these and other ceremonies of the law, "as weak and beggarly elements," Gal. 4: 9. They represented grace and purity, but they did not communicate it. They convinced the sinner of the necessity to purify himself, and make satisfaction to God; but they did not impart holiness to him. Of this fact the pious Jew was not insensible. Hence the profound feeling of David; (Ps. 51: 17.) "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise." The Jews were taught that without these dispositions they could not present any offering agreeable to God; and he often explains himself on this matter in the prophets, Isa. 1: 11—14. Jer. 35: 15. Amos 5: 21, 22. Hos. 14: 2—4. Joel 2: 12, 13, &c. Psal. 51: 16. But this is not all. The Psalmist often looks beyond even the sacrifice of a broken heart, Ps. 110: 4. 40: 6. All emblematically set forth the sacrifice of Christ, being the instituted types and shadows of it, Heb. 9: 9—15. 10: 1. Accordingly, Christ abolished the whole of them when he offered his own sacrifice, Heb. 10: 8—10. 1 Cor. 5: 7. In illustrating this fundamental doctrine of Christianity, the apostle Paul, in his epistle to the Hebrews, sets forth the excellency of the sacrifice of our great High-Priest above those of the law in various particulars. (See HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO.)

The term sacrifice is often used in a secondary or metaphorical sense, and applied to the good works of believers, and to the duties of prayer and praise, as in the following passages: "But to do good, and to communicate, forget not; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased," Heb. 13: 16. "I beseech you, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, which is but your reasonable service," Rom. 12: 1. "There is peculiar reason," says Dr. Owen, "for assigning this appellation to moral duties; for in every sacrifice there was a presentation of something unto God. The worshipper was not to offer that which cost him nothing; part of his substance was to be transferred from himself to God. So it is in these duties; they cannot be properly observed without the alienation of something that was our own—our time, ease, property, &c., and a dedication of it to the Lord. Hence they have the general nature of sacrifices." SACRILEGE; the crime of profaning sacred things, or things devoted to God. The ancient church distinguished several sorts of sacrilege. The first was the diverting things appropriated to sacred purposes to other uses. 2. Robbing the graves, or defacing and spoiling the monuments of the dead. 3. Those were considered as sacrilegious persons who delivered up their Bibles and the sacred utensils of the church to the pagans, in the time of the Diocletian persecution. 4. Profaning the sacraments, churches, altars, &c. 5. Molesting or hindering a clergyman in the performance of his office. 6. Depriving men of the use of the Scriptures or the sacraments, particularly the cup in the eucharist. The Romish casuists acknowledge all these but the last.—Hend. Buck.

SADDUCEES; a sect among the Jews. It is said that the principles of the Sadducees were derived from Antigo-nus Sochæus, president of the sanhedrim, about B. C. 250, who, rejecting the traditional doctrines of the scribes, taught that man ought to serve God out of pure love, and not from hope of reward, or fear of punishment; and that they derived their name from Sadoc, one of his followers, who, mistaking or perverting this doctrine, maintained that there was no future state of rewards and punishments. (See SADOC.)

Whatever foundation there may be for this account of the origin of the sect, it is certain, that in the time of our Savior the Sadducees denied the resurrection of the dead, (Acts 23: 8.) and the existence of angels and spirits, or souls of departed men; though, as Mr. Hume observes, it is not easy to comprehend how they could at the same time admit the authority of the law of Moses. They carried their ideas of human freedom so far as to assert that men were absolutely masters of their own actions, and at full liberty to do either good or evil. Josephus even says that they denied the essential difference between good and evil; and, though they believed that God created and preserved the world, they seem to have denied his particular providence. These tenets, which resemble the Epicurean philosophy, led, as might be expected, to great profligacy of life; and we find the licentious wickedness of the Sadducees frequently condemned in the New Testament; yet they professed themselves obliged to observe the Mosaic law, because of the temporal rewards and punishments annexed to such observance; and hence they were always severe in their punishment of any crimes which tended to disturb the public tranquillity.

The Sadducees rejected all tradition, and some authors have contended that they admitted only the books of Moses; but there seems no ground for that opinion, either in the Scriptures or in any ancient writer. Even Josephus, who was himself a Pharisee, and took every opportunity of reproaching the Sadducees, does not mention that they rejected any part of the Scriptures; he only says that "the Pharisees have delivered to the people many institutions as received from the fathers, which are not written in the law of Moses. For this reason the Sadducees reject these things, asserting that those things are binding which are written, but that the things received by tradition from the fathers are not to be observed." Besides, it is generally believed that the Sadducees expected the Messiah with great impatience, which seems to imply their belief in the prophecies, though they misinterpreted their meaning. Confining all their hopes to this present world, enjoying its riches, and devoting themselves to its pleasures, they might well be particularly anxious that their lot of life should be cast in the splendid reign of this expected temporal king, with the hope of sharing in his conquests and glory; but this expectation was so contrary to the lowly appearance of our Savior, that they joined their inveterate enemies, the Pharisees, in persecuting him and his religion. Josephus says, that the Sadducees were able to draw over to them the rich only, the people not following them; and he elsewhere mentions that this sect spread chiefly among the young.

The Sadducees were far less numerous than the Pharisees, but they were in general persons of greater opulence and dignity. The council before whom our Savior and St. Paul were carried consisted partly of Pharisees and partly of Sadducees.—Watson.

SADI, or SAABI, one of the most celebrated of the Persian poets, was a native of Shiraz, and studied at Bagdad. He is said to have visited Mecca forty times on foot; and he fought against the crusaders, by whom he was taken prisoner in Syria. Sadi lived to the age of one hundred and two; and died in 1296. His principal works are, The Gulistan, or Rose Garden; The Bostan, or Fruit Garden.—Davenport.

SADOC, a Jewish doctor, flourished about B. C. 248, and was a disciple of Antigonus Sochæus, who succeeded Simon the Just as president of the sanhedrim. He, in conjunction with his fellow-pupil Baithosus, was the founder of the sect of Sadducees.—Davenport.

SAFFRON, a well-known flower, of a blue color, in the midst of which are small yellow threads, of a very agreeable smell. Solomon (Cant. 4: 14.) joins it with other aromatics; and Jeremiah is made to speak of cloths of a saffron color, Lam. 4: 5. The passage, however, rather signifies purple or crimson.—Calmet.

SALNT; (from sanctus, holy;) one of the New Testament designations of real Christians. It belongs to all who are "sanctified by the Spirit of our God." The word is generally applied to the apostles and other holy persons mentioned in the Scriptures; but the Romanists restrict its application to those who are canonized. (See CANONIZATION.)

Saints, though a scriptural term, is generally used by the world as a term of reproach. In Norway, a sect has lately sprung up, for which we have no other name. Their religious principles are said, in some respects, to resemble those of "The Society of Friends." They do not, however, lay aside the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's supper. Their leader, whose name is Hans Neilson Houghe, has labored abundantly, and suffered much on account of his zeal.—London Bap. Mag., 1815.—Hend. Buck; Williams.

SALNT-PIERRE, (BERNARDIN.) (See BERNARDIN.) SALNT SIMON, (CLAUDIUS HENRY, COUNT de.) was born in 1760, at Paris, and died in that city in 1825. He is the founder of the politico-philosophical school of the Industriels; the leading dogma of which school is, that industry is the definitive purpose of human society, and that those engaged in it constitute the superior class of society. Saint Simon published an Introduction to the Scientific Labors of the Nineteenth Century; Political, Moral, and Philosophical Discussions; and other works, to disseminate his doctrines.—Davenport.

SALADIN, (MALEK NASSER YUSSUF,) sultan of Egypt and Syria, one of the most celebrated champions of Islamism during the crusades, was born in 1137, at Tekrit, on the Tigris; raised himself from the station of an officer to that of a sovereign; obtained various successes over the Christians, but was defeated by Richard Cœur de Lion; and died, deeply regretted by his subjects, in 1193.—Davenport.

SALAMIS; once a famous city in the isle of Cyprus, opposite to Seleucia, on the Syrian coast; and as it was the first place where the gospel was preached, it was in the primitive times made the see of the primate of the whole island. It was destroyed by the Saracens, and from the ruins was built Famagusta, which was taken by the Turks in 1570. Here St. Paul preached, A. D. 44, Acts 13: 5.—Watson.

SALE, (GEORGE,) an author and oriental scholar, was born about 1680, and died in 1736. He wrote a part of the Ancient Universal History, and translated the Koran. His preface to the latter is of great value. He was one of the founders of a society for the encouragement of learning.—Davenport.

SALATHIEL, son of Jecooniah, and father of Zerubbabel, (1 Chron. 3: 17.) died at Babylon during the captivity. He was also son of Neri, according to Luke, (3: 27.) who makes him to have descended from Solomon by Nathan; while Matthew (1: 12.) derives him from Solomon by Rehoboam. In Salathiel then were united the two branches of this illustrious genealogy; so that Salathiel was, according to Calmet, son to Jecooniah, according to the flesh, as appears from the Chroniclers, which say, that Jecooniah had two sons, Assir and Salathiel, at Babylon; and son of Neri by marriage, or adoption.—Calmet.

SALEM. (See JERUSALEM.) SALMASIUS, (CLAUDIUS,) an eminent French scholar, was born in 1588, at Semur. He was educated by his father, and at Paris and Heidelberg; and translated Pindar, and composed Latin and Greek verses, when he was only ten years old. His knowledge of languages was extensive, and such was his memory that he retained whatever he once heard read. In 1632 he succeeded Scaliger at the university of Leyden. He twice visited Christiana of Sweden at Stockholm, and was received in the most distinguished manner. In 1649 he wrote a Defence of Charles I., to which Milton bitterly and victoriously replied. Salmasius died in 1653. His printed works amount in number to eighty, and he left sixty in manuscript, and as many unfinished.—Davenport.

SALOME, the dancer, daughter of Herodias, and of Herod Philip. Nicophorus and Metaphrastes state that Salome accompanied her mother Herodias, and her father-in-law Herod, in their banishment to Vienne in Dauphiny; and that the emperor having obliged them to go into Spain, as she passed over a river that was frozen, the ice broke under her feet, and she sunk in up to her neck; when the ice uniting again, she remained thus suspended by it, and suffered the same punishment she had made John the Baptist undergo. But none of the ancients mention this; and Josephus tells us, she first married Philip the tetrarch, son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra, who died about A. D. 33 or 34; and afterwards Aristobulus, son of Herod king of Chalcis, her cousin-german, by whom she had several children. Thus she lived above thirty years after the exile of her father-in-law.—Calmet.

SALOME, wife of Zebedee, mother of James the Great and John the evangelist; one of those holy women who attended our Savior in his journeys, and ministered to him, Matt. 27: 56. and Mark 15: 40. See also Mark 15: 40. Matt. 27: 55, 56. Mark 16: 1, 2.—Calmet.

SALT. God appointed that salt should be used in all the sacrifices that were offered to him, Lev. 2: 13. Salt is esteemed the symbol of wisdom and grace; (Col. 4: 6. Mark 9: 50.) also of perpetuity and incorruption, Num. 18: 19.—2 Chron. 13: 5.

The Orientals were accustomed also to ratify their federal engagements by salt. This substance was, among the ancients, the emblem of friendship and fidelity, and therefore used in all their sacrifices and covenants. It was a sacred pledge of hospitality, which they never ventured to violate. Numerous instances occur of travellers in Arabia, after being plundered and stript by the wandering tribes of the desert, claiming the protection of some civilized Arab, who, after receiving them into his tent, and giving them salt, instantly relieves their distress, and never forsakes them till he has placed them in safety. An agreement thus ratified is called in Scripture, "a covenant of salt."

Although salt, in small quantities, may contribute to the communicating and fertilizing of some kinds of stubborn soil, yet, according to the observations of Pliny, "all places in which salt is found are barren, and produce nothing." The effect of salt, where it abounds, on vegetation, is described by burning, in Deut. 29: 23: "The whole land thereof is brimstone, and salt of burning." Thus Volney, speaking of the borders of the Asphaltic lake, or Dead sea, says, "The true cause of the absence of vegetables and animals is the acrid saltiness of its waters, which is infinitely greater than that of the sea. The land surrounding the lake, being equally impregnated with that saltiness, refuses to produce plants; the air itself, which is by evaporation loaded with it, and which moreover receives vapors of sulphur and bitumen, cannot suit vegetation; whence that dead appearance which reigns around the lake." So a salt land, (Jer. 17: 6.) is the same as the "parched places of the wilderness," and is descriptive of barrenness, as saltiness also is, Job 39: 6. Ps. 107: 34. Ez. 47: 11. Zech. 2: 9. Hence the ancient custom of sowing an enemy's city, when taken, with salt, in token of perpetual desolation; (Judg. 4: 45.) and thus in after times the city of Milan was burnt, razed, sown with salt, and ploughed by the exasperated emperor, Frederick Barbarossa.

The salt used by the ancients was what we call rock or fossil salt; and also that left by the evaporation of salt lakes. Both these kinds were impure, being mixed with earth, sand, &c., and lost their strength by deliquescence. Maudrell, describing the valley of Salt, says, "On the side towards Gibul there is a small precipice, occasioned by the continual taking away of the salt; and in this you may see how the veins of it lie. I broke a piece of it, of which that part that was exposed to the sun, rain, and air, though it had the sparks and particles of salt, yet it had perfectly lost its savor; the inner part, which was connected with the rock, retained its savor, as I found by proof." Christ reminds his disciples, (Matt. 5: 13.) "Ye are the salt of the earth; but if the salt have lost its savor, wherewith shall it be salted? It is thenceforth good for nothing but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men." This is spoken in allusion to the mineral salt as mentioned by Maudrell, a great deal of which was made use of in offerings at the temple; such of it as had become insipid was thrown out to repair the road. The existence of such a salt, and its application to such a use, Schoetgenius has largely proved in his "Hora Hebraica."—Watson.

SALT SEA; a name given to the DEAD SEA. See the preceding article.

SALT, VALLEY OF. Interpreters generally place this valley south of the Red sea, towards Idumea; because it is said (2 Sam. 8: 13.) that Abishai there killed eighteen thousand Idumeans, and Joab twelve thousand; (1 Chron. 18: 12. Ps. 60, title;) and long after that, Amaziah, king of Judah, killed ten thousand, 2 Kings 14: 7. 2 Chron. 25: 11. Dr. Hahlfax, in his account of Palmyra, speaks of a great plain covered with salt, from whence the country round about is supplied. It is about a league from Palmyra, and extends towards the eastern parts of Idumea, whose capital city was Bozra. David beat the Idumeans in the valley of Salt, as he returned from Syria of Zobah. It is probable, that this plain of salt is the valley of Salt of Scripture.—Calmet.

SALUTATIONS at meeting are not less common in the East than in the countries of Europe, but are generally confined to those of their own nation or religious party. When the Arabs salute each other, it is generally in these terms: Salam aleikum, "Peace be with you;" laying, as they utter the words, the right-hand on the heart. The answer is, Aleikum essalem, "With you be peace;" to which aged people are inclined to add, "and the mercy and blessing of God." The Mohammedans of Egypt and Syria never salute a Christian in these terms; they content themselves with saying to them, "Good day to you;" or, "Friend, how do you do?" Niebuhr's statement is confirmed by Mr. Bruce, who says that some Arabs, to whom he gave the salam, or salutation of peace, either made no reply, or expressed their astonishment at his impudence in using such freedom. Thus it appears that the Orientals have two kinds of salutations; one for strangers, and the other for their own countrymen, or persons of their own religious profession. The Jews in the days of our Lord seem to have generally observed the same custom; they would not address the usual compliment of, "Peace be with you," to either heathens or publicans; the publicans of the Jewish nation would use it to their countrymen who were publicans, but not to heathens, though the more rigid Jews refused to do it either to publicans or heathens.

Our Lord required his disciples to lay aside the moroseness of Jews, and cherish a benevolent disposition towards all around them: "If ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? Do not even the publicans so?" They were bound by the same authority to embrace their brethren in Christ with a special affection, yet they were to look upon every man as a brother, to feel a sincere and cordial interest in his welfare, and at meeting to express their benevolence, in language corresponding with the feelings of their hearts. This precept is not inconsistent with the charge which the prophet Elisha gave to his servant Gehazi, not to salute any man he met, nor return his salutation; for he wished him to make all the haste in his power to restore the child of the Shunamite, who had laid him under so many obligations. To avoid this useless waste of time, also, our Lord commanded his disciples on their first mission, to avoid the customary salutations of those whom they might happen to meet by the way.

In Persia, the salutation among intimate friends is made by inclining the neck over each other's neck, and then inclining cheek to cheek; which Mr. Morier thinks is most likely the falling upon the neck and kissing, so frequently mentioned in Scripture, Gen. 33: 4. 45: 14. Luke 15: 20.—Watson.

SALVATION imports, in general, some great deliverance from any evil or danger. Thus, the conducting the Israelites through the Red sea, and delivering them out of the hands of the Egyptians, is called a great salvation.

But salvation, by way of eminence, is applied to that wonderful deliverance which our blessed Savior procured for mankind, by saving them from the punishment of their sins; and in the New Testament is the same as our redemption by Christ. This is that salvation referred to by St. Paul: "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?" The salvation which Christ purchased, and the gospel tenders to every creature, compre-hends the greatest blessings which God can bestow ; a deliverance from the most dreadful evils that mankind can suffer. It contains all that can make the nature of man perfect or his life happy, and secures him from whatever can render his condition miserable. The blessings of it are inexpressible, and beyond imagination. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." For, to be saved as Christ saves, is to have all our innumerable sins and transgressions forgiven and blotted out ; all those heavy loads of guilt which oppressed our souls perfectly removed from our minds. It is to be reconciled to God, and restored to his favor, so that he will be no longer terrible and retributive, but a most kind, compassionate, and tender Father. It is to be at peace with him and with our consciences ; to have a title to his peculiar love, care, and protection, all our days ; to be rescued from the bondage and dominion of sin, and the tyranny of the devil. It is to be translated from the power of darkness into the kingdom of Christ ; so that sin shall reign no longer in our mortal bodies, but we shall be enabled to serve God in newness of life. It is to be placed in a state of true freedom and liberty, to be no longer under the control of blind passions, and hurried on by our impetuous lusts to do what our reason condemns. It is to have a new principle of life infused into our souls ; to have the Holy Spirit resident in our hearts, whose comfortable influence must ever cheer and refresh us, and by whose counsels we may be always advised, directed, and governed. It is to be transformed into the image of God ; and to be made like him in wisdom, righteousness, and all other perfections of which man's nature is capable.

Finally, to be saved as Christ came to save mankind, is to be translated, after this life is ended, into a state of eternal felicity, never more to die or suffer, never more to know pain and sickness, grief and sorrow, labor and weariness, disquiet or vexation, but to live in perfect peace, freedom and liberty, and to enjoy the greatest good after the most perfect manner forever. It is to have our bodies raised again, and reunited to our souls ; so that they shall be no longer gross, earthly, corruptible bodies, but spiritual, heavenly, immortal ones, fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body, in which he now sits at the right hand of God. It is to live in the city of the great King, the heavenly Jerusalem, where the glory of the Lord fills the place with perpetual light and bliss. It is to spend eternity in the most noble and hallowed employments, in viewing and contemplating the wonderful works of God, admiring the wisdom of his providence, adoring his infinite love to the sons of men, reflecting on our own inexpressible happiness, and singing everlasting hymns of praise, joy, and triumph to God and our Lord Jesus Christ for vouchsafing all these blessings. It is to dwell forever in a place where no objects of pity or compassion, of anger or envy, of hatred or distrust, are to be found ; but where all will increase the happiness of each other, by mutual love and kindness. It is to converse with the most perfect society, to be restored to the fellowship of our friends and relations who have died in the faith of Christ, and to be with Jesus Christ, to behold his glory, to live forever in seeing and enjoying the great God, in "whose presence is fulness of joy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for evermore." This is the salvation that Christ has purchased for us ; and which his gospel freely offers to all mankind.

SALVATION OF INFANTS. (See INFANTS.)

SAMARIA ; one of the three divisions of the Holy Land, having Galilee on the north, Judea on the south, the river Jordan on the east, and the Mediterranean sea on the west. It took its name from its capital city, Samaria ; and formed, together with Galilee and some cantons on the east of Jordan, during the reigns of the kings of Israel and Judah, the kingdom of the former. The general aspect and produce of the country are nearly the same as those of Judea. But Mr. Backingham observes, that "while in Judea the hills are mostly as bare as the imagination can paint them, and a few of the narrow valleys only are fertile, in Samaria, the very summits of the eminences are as well clothed as the sides of them. These, with the luxuriant valleys which they inclose, present scenes of unbroken verdure in almost every point of view, which are delightfully variegated by the picturesque forms of the hills and vales themselves, enriched by the occasional sight of wood and water, in clusters of olive and other trees, and rills and torrents running among them."

2. SAMARIA ; the capital city of the kingdom of the ten tribes that revolted from the house of David. It was built by Omri, king of Israel, who began to reign A. M. 3079, and who died 3086. He bought the hill Samaria of Shemer for two talents of silver, or for the sum of six hundred and eighty-four pounds seven shillings and six-pence. It took the name of Samaria from Shemer, the owner of the hill, 1 Kings 16: 24.

Samaria was advantageously situated upon an agreeable and fruitful hill, twelve miles from Dothaim, twelve from Merrom, and four from Atharath. Josephus says it was a day's journey from Jerusalem. The kings of Samaria omitted nothing to make this city the strongest, the finest, and the richest that was possible. Abab built there a palace of ivory, (1 Kings 22: 39.) that is, in which there were many ivory ornaments ; and, according to Amos, (3: 15. 4: 1, 2,) it became the seat of luxury and effeminacy. It was taken by Shalmaneser, A. M. 3283. The prophet Hosea (10: 4, 8, 9.) speaks of the cruelties exercised against the besieged ; and Micah (1: 6.) says that the city was reduced to a heap of stones. However, the Cushites had rebuilt some of the houses of Samaria, even from the time of the return of the Jews from the captivity, since the inhabitants of Samaria are spoken of, Ezra 4: 17. Neh. 4: 2. (See SAMARITANS.)

It continued in this state till A. M. 3947, when Anlus Gabinus, the proconsul of Syria, rebuilt it, and gave it the name of Gabiniana. Yet it remained very inconsiderable till Herod the Great restored it to its ancient splendor.

The sacred authors of the New Testament speak but little of Samaria ; and when they do mention it, the country is rather to be understood than the city, (Luke 17: 11. John 4: 4, 5.) except in Acts 8.

Travellers give the following account of its present state : Sebaste is the name which Herod the Great gave to the ancient Samaria, the imperial city of the ten tribes, in honor of Augustus (Gr. Sebastos) Cæsar, when he rebuilt and fortified it, converting the greater part of it into a citadel, and erecting here a noble temple. The situation, says Dr. Richardson, is extremely beautiful, and strong by nature ; more so, I think, than Jerusalem. It stands on a fine, large, insulated hill, compassed all around by a broad deep valley ; and when fortified, as it is stated to have been by Herod, one would have imagined that, in the ancient system of warfare, nothing but famine could have reduced such a place. The valley is surrounded by four hills, one on each side, which are cultivated in terraces up to the top, sown with grain, and planted with fig and olive trees, as is also the valley. The hill of Samaria likewise rises in terraces to a height equal to any of the adjoining mountains. The present village is small and poor, and, after passing the valley, the ascent to it is very steep. Ascending to the third or highest terrace, the traces of former building were not numerous, but we enjoyed a delightful view of the surrounding country. The eye passed over the deep valley that encompasses the hill of Sebaste, and rested on the mountains beyond, that retreated as they rose with a gentle slope, and met the view in every direction, like a book laid out for perusal on a reading desk. This was the seat of the capital of the short-lived and wicked kingdom of Israel ; and on the face of these mountains the eye surveys the scene of many bloody conflicts and many memorable events. Here those holy men of God, Elijah and Elisha, spoke their tremendous warnings in the ears of their incorrigible rulers, and wrought their miracles in the sight of all the people. From this lofty eminence we descended to the south side of the hill, where we saw the remains of a stately colonnade that stretches along this beautiful exposure from east to west. Sixty columns are still standing in one row. The shafts are plain ; and fragments of Ionic volutes, that lie scattered about, testify the order to which they belonged.

These are probably the relics of some of the magnificent structures with which Herod the Great adorned Samaria. None of the walls remain.—Watson.

SAMARITANS; an ancient but still existing sect among the Jews, whose origin was in the time of king Rehoboam, under whose reign the people of Israel were divided into two distinct kingdoms—that of Judah and that of Israel. The capital of the kingdom of Israel was Samaria, where the Israelites took the name of Samaritans.

Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, having besieged and taken Samaria, carried away all the people captives into the remotest parts of his dominions, and filled their place with Babylonians, Cuthians, and other idolaters. These, finding that they were exposed to wild beasts, desired that an Israelitish priest might be sent among them, to instruct them in the ancient religion and customs of the land. They now embraced the law of Moses, with which they mixed a great part of their ancient idolatry; and in this state the sacred narrative leaves them, at least for some ages. Upon the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, it is thought they had entirely quitted the worship of their idols. But though they were united in religion, they were not so in affection with the Jews; for they employed various calumnies and stratagems to hinder their rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem; and when they could not prevail, they erected a temple on mount Gerizim, in opposition to that of Jerusalem. See 2 Kings 17. Ezra 4, 5, 6.

The Samaritans revolted from Alexander, who drove them out of Samaria, introduced Macedonians in their room, and gave the province of Samaria to the Jews. This circumstance contributed in no small degree to increase the hatred and animosity between those two people. When any Israelite deserved punishment on account of the violation of some important point of the law, he presently took refuge in Samaria or Shechem, and embraced the worship at the temple of Gerizim. (See GERIZIM.) When the affairs of the Jews were prosperous, the Samaritans did not fail to call themselves Hebrews, and of the race of Abraham. But when the Jews suffered persecution, the Samaritans disowned them, and alleged that they were Phœnicians originally, or descended from Joseph, or Manasseh his son. This was their practice in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. It is certain, the modern Samaritans are far from idolatry; some of the most learned among the Jewish doctors own, that they observe the law of Moses more rigidly than the Jews themselves. They have a Hebrew copy of the Pentateuch, differing in some respects from that of the Jews; and written in different, commonly called Samaritan characters; which Origen, Jerome, and other fathers and critics, ancient and modern, take to be the primitive character of the ancient Hebrew, though others maintain the contrary. The point of preference, as to purity, antiquity, &c., of the two Pentateuchs, is also much disputed by modern critics. (See SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH.)

The Samaritans are now few in number; though it is not very long since they pretended to have priests descended directly from the family of Aaron. They were chiefly found at Gaza, Neapolis or Shechem, (the ancient Sichem or Naplouse,) Damascus, Cairo, &c. They had a temple, or chapel, on mount Gerizim, where they performed their sacrifices. They have also synagogues in other parts of Palestine, and also in Egypt.—Hend. Buck; Watson.

SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH; the collection of the five books of Moses, written in Samaritan or Phœnician characters; and, according to some, the ancient Hebrew characters which were in use before the captivity of Babylon. This Pentateuch was unknown in Europe till the seventeenth century, though quoted by Eusebius, Jerome, &c. Archbishop Usher was the first, or at least among the first, who procured it out of the East, to the number of five or six copies.

The generality of divines hold, that the Samaritan Pentateuch, and that of the Jews, are one and the same work, written in the same language, only in different characters; and that the difference between the two texts is owing to the inadvertency and inaccuracy of transcribers, or to the affectation of the Samaritans, by interpolating what might promote their interests and pretensions; that the two copies were originally the very same, and that the additions were afterwards inserted. And in this respect the Pentateuch of the Jews must be allowed the preference to that of the Samaritans. Certain critics have ventured to express a preference for the Samaritan, as an original, preserved in the same character and in the same condition in which Moses left it; but professor Stuart regards this opinion as forever exploded by the recent labors of Gesenius. The variations, additions, and transpositions, which are found in the Samaritan Pentateuch, are carefully collected by Hottinger, and may be seen on confronting the two texts in the last volume of the English Polyglot, or by inspecting Kennicott's edition of the Hebrew Bible, where the various readings are inserted. Some of these interpolations serve to illustrate the text; others are a kind of paraphrase, expressing at length what was only hinted at in the original; and others, again, such as favor their pretensions against the Jews, namely, the putting Gerizim for Ebal. See the N. A. Review, No. LI.; and Robinson's Bib. Repos., 1833.—Hend. Buck.

SAMARITAN VERSION. (See BIBLE, ancient versions, 13.)

SAMMANS, SCHAMANS, or SHAMANS, (as the first letter is differently pronounced,) were originally worshippers of the heavens (in Chaldee Shemin) and the heavenly bodies. Such were the ancient Chaldeans, Syrians, and Canaanites.

From these early Sammans seem to have sprung the Sammanes, or Sammanæans, an ancient sect of philosophers in India, from whom Dr. Priestley thinks the Hindoo religion was originally derived. "The Sammanæans, being persecuted by the Brahmias, and driven by them out of India Proper, are thought to have taken refuge in Pegu, Siam, and other countries beyond the Ganges; and it is supposed, that the religion of those countries was derived from their principles. The religion of the lamas in Tibet (or Thibet) is also said to be a reformed Schamanism. And from the same source this author, with probability, derives the modern Schamans of Siberia, who are opposed to the worshippers of Delai Lama.

The Sammans of India are at present described as wholly illiterate; but their predecessors are said to have written many books on philosophy and religion. Priestley's Institutions of Moses and the Hindoos; and Tooke's Russia, (from whom he quotes,) introduction; Hobwell's Mythol. Dict.; Enfield's Philos.—Williams.

SAMSON; son of Manoah, of the tribe of Dan, Judges 13: 2, &c. He was born A. M. 2819, and was a Nazirite from his infancy, by the divine command. His extraordinary achievements are particularly recorded in Judges 14—16. "Faith" is attributed to him by St. Paul, though he is not inaptly called by an old writer, "a rough believer."—Watson.

SAMUEL, the son of Elkanah and of Hannah, of the tribe of Levi, and family of Kohath, was born A. M. 2848. He was an eminent inspired prophet, historian, and the seventeenth and last judge of Israel; and died in the ninety-eighth year of his age, two years before Saul, A. M. 2947, 1 Sam. 25.

To Samuel are ascribed the book of Judges, that of Ruth, and the first book of Samuel. There is, indeed, great probability that he composed the first twenty-four chapters of the first book of Samuel; since they contain nothing but what he might have written, and such transactions as he was chiefly concerned in. However, in these chapters there are some small additions, which seem to have been inserted after his death. Samuel began the order of the prophets, which was never discontinued till the death of Zechariah and Malachi, Acts 3: 24.

From early youth to hoary years, the character of Samuel is one on which the mind rests with veneration and delight.—Watson.

SANBALLAT; chief, or governor, of the Cuthites, or Samaritans; and a great enemy to the Jews, (Neh. 2: 10, 19.) B. C. 454. Josephus makes Sanballat to flourish in the time of Darius Codomannus, and to build his temple upon mount Gerizim by license from Alexander the Great; whereas, says Dr. Prideaux, it was erected by leave from Darius Nothus, in the fifteenth year of his reign. This removes the difficulty arising from the great age of Sanballat, and allows him to be contemporary with Nehemiah, as the Scripture history requires.—Calmet.

SANCROFT, (WILLIAM), an English prelate, was born, in 1615, at Fresingfield, in Suffolk; and was educated at St. Edmundsbury school, and at Emanuel college, Cambridge, of which latter seminary he became master in 1662. After having been dean of York, and of St. Paul's, he was raised to the archbishopric of Canterbury, in 1677. Sancroft was one of the seven prelates who were tried for resisting the tyranny of James II.; but he refused to take the oaths to William III., and was in consequence deprived of his see. He died in 1693. He wrote Fur Predestination; Modern Politics; Sermons; and Letters.—Davenport.

SANCTIFICATION; that glorious work of God's grace in the human soul by which we are renewed after the image of God, set apart for his service, and enabled to die unto sin and live unto righteousness. It must be carefully considered in a twofold light. 1. As an inestimable privilege granted us from God, 1 Thess. 5: 23. And, 2. As an all-comprehensive duty required of us by his holy word, 1 Thess. 4: 3.

It is distinguished from justification thus: Justification changeth our state in law before God as a Judge; sanctification changeth our heart and life before him as our Father. Justification precedes, and sanctification follows, as the fruit and evidence of it. The surety righteousness of Christ imputed is our justifying righteousness; but the grace of God implanted is the matter of our sanctification. Justification is an act done at once; sanctification is a work which is gradual. Justification removes the guilt of sin; sanctification the power of it. Justification delivers us from the avenging wrath of God; sanctification conforms us to his image. Yet justification and sanctification are inseparably connected in the promise of God; (Rom. 8: 28—30.) in the covenant of grace; (Heb. 8: 10.) in the doctrines and promises of the gospel; (Acts 5: 31.) and in the experience of all true believers, 1 Cor. 6: 11.

Sanctification is, 1. A divine work, and not to be begun or carried on by the power of man, Tit. 3: 5. 2. A progressive work, and not perfected at once, Prov. 4: 18. 3. An internal work, not consisting in external profession or bare morality, Psalm 51: 6. 4. A necessary work; necessary as to the evidence of our state, the honor of our characters, the usefulness of our lives, the happiness of our minds, and the eternal enjoyment of God's presence in a future world, John 3: 3. Heb. 12: 14. Sanctification evidences itself by, 1. A holy reverence, Neh. 5: 15. 2. Earnest regard, Lam. 3: 24. 3. Patient submission, Psal. 38: 9. Hence archbishop Usher said of it, "Sanctification is nothing less than for a man to be brought to the entire resignation of his will to the will of God, and to live in the offering up of his soul continually in the flames of love, and as a whole burnt-offering to Christ." 4. Increasing hatred to sin, Psal. 119: 133. 5. Communion with God, Isa. 26: 8. 6. Delight in his word and ordinances, Psal. 27: 4. 7. Humility, Job 42: 5, 6. 8. Prayer, Psal. 109: 4. 9. Holy confidence, Psal. 27: 1. 10. Praise, Psal. 103: 1. 11. Uniform obedience, John 15: 8.

SANCTIFY, often signifies to set apart, but oftener to prepare sacredly for the presence and service of God. Thus Joshua says to the people, (chap. 3: 5) "Sanctify yourselves, for to-morrow the Lord will do wonders among you." In Isa. 13: 3, the Lord calls the Medes his sanctified. I have appointed, and, as it were, consecrated, them to be the executors of my vengeance against Babylon. See also Num. 11: 18. Josh. 7: 13. Jer. 6: 4. 12: 3. 51: 27, 28. Joel 1: 14. Mic. 3: 5. Zeph. 1: 7. Comp. Hoiv.

We desire of God, that his name may be sanctified, or hallowed; that is, honored, praised, and glorified throughout the world; especially by those who have the happiness of knowing him. Let them sanctify it by their good lives, their fidelity, their submission to his orders; and they who know him not, that they may obtain the knowledge of him, may hear his word, may become obedient to his instructions, &c. We may apprehend yet better what is meant by sanctifying the name of God, by the opposite to it; that is, profaning the name of God, by vain swearing, blaspheming, ascribing his name to idols; by furnishing wicked men and infidels with occasion of blaspheming it by our bad lives, and scandalous conversation, &c. SANCTIONS, (DIVINE,) are those acts or laws of the Supreme Being which render any thing obligatory, or the promises and penalties attached to them. (See LAW.)—Hend. Buck.

SANCTUARY. (See TEMPLE.)

SANCTUS, a Christian martyr under Marcus Antoninus, was a deacon of Vienna. When put to the torture, he bore it with great fortitude, only exclaiming, "I am a Christian." Red-hot plates of brass were applied to the most tender parts of his body, which contracted the sinews; but remaining inflexible, he was remanded to prison. On being brought out from his confinement, a few days after, his tormentors were astonished to find his wounds healed, and his person as perfect as before. He was again tortured, and reconducted to prison, where he remained some time after. He at length received the crown of martyrdom by being beheaded; which took place about the middle of the second century.—Fox, p. 20.

SAND. A similitude taken from the aggregate sand of the sea is often used, to express a very great multitude, or a very great weight. (See RAIN, and PILLARS.)—Calmet.

SANDALS, at first, were only soles tied to the feet with strings or thongs; afterwards they were covered; and at last they called even shoes sandals. When Judith went to the camp of Holofernes, it is said she put sandals on her feet, and her sandals ravished his eyes. They were a magnificent kind of buskins, proper only to ladies of condition, and such as dressed themselves for admiration. But there were sandals also belonging to men, and of mean value.

The business of untying and carrying the sandals being that of a servant, the expressions of the Baptist, "whose shoes I am not worthy to bear," "whose shuclatchet I am not worthy to unloose," was an acknowledgment of his great inferiority to Christ, and that Christ was his Lord. To prill off the sandals on entering a sacred place, or the house of a person of distinction, was the usual mark of respect. They were taken care of by the attendant servant. At the doors of an Indian temple, there are as many sandals and slippers hung up, as there are hats in our places of worship.—Watson.

SANDEMAN, (ROBERT,) after whom the sect of the Sandemanians is called in England, but which, in Scotland, are better known as Glasites, was a native of Perth, where his family were of long standing and considerable respectability. He was born in the year 1723, and prosecuted his studies at Edinburgh, with a view, as would seem from some hints in his writings, to the ministry in the kirk of Scotland. It does not, however, appear that he connected himself with the national establishment; for the deposition of Mr. John Glas, which about that time took place, on account of the testimony which he publicly bore against all national establishments of Christianity, as being utterly at variance with the nature of the Kingdom of Christ, which is not of this world, raised a flame throughout Scotland, and excited very general attention. Among others, Mr. Sandeman adopted Glas' views of the subject; and, consequently, abandoning all thoughts of the clerical profession, he turned his attention to trade. Taking up his residence in Edinburgh, he joined the Glasites, married one of Mr. Glas' daughters, and became an elder in the church that was formed in that city; carrying on the linen trade for the support of himself and family.

He early began to distinguish himself as an author; and his first production seems to have been, "Some Thoughts on Christianity, in a Letter to a Friend," written about the year 1750, at the request of a freethinker, who had kindly entertained the author at his house, and earnestly requested him to give his thoughts on that important subject in writing. This pamphlet, though small, discovers an original train of thinking. The subject is placed in a new and striking light; and the deductions which the writer makes from his first principles, show him to be possessed of the powers of cogent reasoning. In 1757, he published his celebrated "Letters on Theron and Aspasio," addressed to Mr. Hervey, in two volumes, 12mo, in which he attacked his opinion on the nature of faith, with uncommon acuteness, and no little effect. In opposition to Mr. Hervey's favorite principle of appropriation, in which he rested the essence of justifying faith, Mr. Sandeman strenuously insisted, that it was nothing more nor less than "the bare belief of the bare truth," witnessed or testified concerning the person and work of Christ. To do him justice, however, it must be always kept in mind, that he had no idea of any one obtaining a correct or scriptural notion of that truth, but through divine teaching or illumination, according to 1 Cor. 2: 14.

Complaints have not unjustly been made of the severity of his style, and the caustic with which it is frequently seasoned, especially where the characters of what he terms "the popular preachers" come in his way. Viewing these men as corrupters of the gospel which they professed to preach, and, consequently, as misleading their fellow-creatures in the all important concerns of another world, he certainly does not spare them. It is due to him, however, to say, that it is only on such occasions that his severity appears. "If I must give my opinion of my own performance," says he, "I am ready to say: This writer proposes to contend for the divine righteousness finished on the cross, as the sole requisite to justification. In evincing this, he looks around him on all sorts of men, and examines their various pretensions to righteousness on every side. Whatever he finds opposed, or set up instead of the divine righteousness, he resolutely attacks. In doing this he makes use of every weapon he can lay his hand upon, and, according to his various occasions, he lays hold on whatever weapon he can most readily wield, by which he may cut deepest, whether it be keen satire, disdainful irony, the contemptuous smile, indignant frown, or more cool reasoning. He seems particularly to have had in his eye Jeremiah's maxim of war, 'Spare no arrows!' while the popular doctrine, with its contrivers and followers, as being the thing most highly lifted up among men, and with the greatest artifice too, against the revealed righteousness, behooved to be the greatest object of his attention and opposition."

In the year 1764, Mr. Sandeman, having accepted an invitation from some persons in America, who had read his writings and professed a strong attachment to them, to come and settle among them, sailed for New England. There is reason to believe, that he was much disappointed in the persons who had invited him over, and in the expectations he had formed generally respecting America. Dissensions began to arise, soon after his arrival, between the colonies and mother country. Mr. Sandeman's principles led him to avow the most implicit allegiance to the latter, which rendered him obnoxious to the colonists; his days were embittered; his prospects of usefulness in a great measure blighted; and, after collecting a few small societies, he ended his life at Danbury, in Connecticut, Fairfield county, in the year 1771. Since his death there has appeared from his pen, "The Honor of Marriage opposed to all Impurities;" "An Essay on Solomon's Song;" "On the Sign of the Prophet Jonah," &c. &c. all of which may be read with profit. Fuller's Letters on Sandemanianism.—*Jones' Chris. SANDEMANIANS, a sect that originated in Scotland about the year 1728; where it is, at this time, distinguished by the name of Glasite, after its founder, Mr. John Glas. (See GLAS, JOHN.) For the distinguishing views of this body on the subject of justifying faith, see the preceding article, and Fuller's masterly Letters on Sandemanianism.

The other opinion and practices in which this sect differs from other Christians, are, their weekly administration of the Lord's supper; their love-feasts, of which every member is not only allowed but required to partake, and which consist of their dining together at each other's houses in the interval between the morning and afternoon service; their kiss of charity, used on this occasion at the admission of a new member, and at other times when they deem it necessary and proper; their weekly collection before the Lord's supper, for the support of the poor, and paying their expenses; mutual exhortation; abstinence from blood and things strangled; washing each other's feet, when, as a deed of mercy, it might be an expression of love, the precept concerning which, as well as other precepts, they understand literally; community of goods, so far as that every one is to consider all that he has in his possession and power liable to the calls of the poor and the church; and the unlawfulness of laying up treasures upon earth, by setting them apart for any distant, future, and uncertain use. They allow of public and private diversions, so far as they are unconnected with circumstances really sinful; but apprehending a lot to be sacred, disapprove of lotteries, playing at cards, dice, &c.

They contend for a plurality of elders, pastors, or bishops, in each church; and the necessity of the presence of two elders in every act of discipline, and at the administration of the Lord's supper.

In the choice of these elders, want of learning and engagement in trade are no sufficient objection, if qualified according to the instructions given to Timothy and Titus; (but second marriages disqualify for the office!) and they are ordained by prayer and fasting, imposition of hands, and giving the right hand of fellowship.

In their discipline they are strict and severe, and think themselves obliged to separate from the communion and worship of all such religious societies as appear to them not to profess the simple truth for their only ground of hope, and who do not walk in obedience to it. We shall only add, that in every transaction they esteem unanimity to be absolutely necessary. SANDYS, SANDS, or SANDES, (EDMUND, D. D.) archbishop of York, was born at Hawkshead, in Lancashire, England, in the year 1519. He received his education at Cambridge. In 1542, he was junior proctor of the university; and in or about the year 1547, was elected master of Catharine hall. In 1548, he was vicar of Haversham, and the year following was presented to a prebend in the cathedral of Peterborough. The same year he took the degree of D. D. In 1552, Edward VI. granted him a prebend in the church of Carlisle. At the time of the king's decease, 1553, Dr. Sandys was vice-chancellor of Cambridge; and having espoused the cause of lady Jane Grey, he rendered himself obnoxious to the vindictive Mary. In consequence of this, on her accession to the throne, he was imprisoned in the tower of London, where he remained twenty-nine weeks. He was, however, through the mediation of Sir Thomas Holcroft, the night marshal, set at liberty; but, it having been suggested to bishop Gardiner that he was the greatest heretic in the country, the bishop caused immediate search to be made for him. He however succeeded in procuring a safe residence in Strasburg. On the death of Mary, he returned to England, and was appointed by Elizabeth one of the nine Protestant divines, who were to hold a disputation before both houses of parliament with the same number of the Romish persuasion. He was subsequently bishop of Worcester; afterwards bishop of London, and at length archbishop of York. He was consulted on every occasion, and appointed to every work which demanded extensive learning and a strong mind. He was most bitter in his hostility to popery, and ever exhibited a mind of the sternest order. Attempts were made to ruin his character; but he died, after a life of continual strife, occasioned by the turbulence of the times, in the confidence of the church, July 10th, 1558, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. He published many esteemed works.—Middleton, vol. ii. p. 256.

SANHEDRIM, SANHEDRIN, or SYNEDRIM; among the ancient Jews, the supreme council, or court of judicature, of that republic; in which were dispatched all the great affairs both of religion and policy. The word is derived from the Greek sunhedrion, a council, assembly, or company of people sitting together; from sun, together, and hedra, a seat.

Many of the learned agree, that it was instituted by Moses, (Num 11.) and consisted at first of seventy elders, who judged finally of all causes and affairs; and that they subsisted, without intermission, from Moses to Ezra, Deut. 27: 1. 31: 9. Josh. 24: 1, 31. Judg. 2: 7. 2 Chron. 19: 8. Ezek. 8: 11. Others will have it, that the council of seventy elders, established by Moses, was temporary, and did not hold after his death; adding, that we find no sign of any such perpetual and infallible tribunal throughout the whole Old Testament; and that the sanhedrim was first set up in the time when the Maccabees, or Asmoneans, took upon themselves the administration of the government under the title of high-priests, and afterwards of kings, that is, after the persecution of Antiochus. This is by far the most probable opinion. The Jews, however, contend strenuously for the antiquity of their great sanhedrim: M. Simon strengthens and defends their proofs, and M. Le Clerc attacks them.

Whatever may have been the origin and establishment of the sanhedrim, it is certain that it was subsisting in the time of our Savior, since it is spoken of in the gospels: (Matt. 5: 21. Mark 13: 9. 14: 55. 15: 1.) and since Jesus Christ himself was arraigned and condemned by it; that it was held at Jerusalem; and that the decision of all the most important affairs among the Jews belonged to it. The president of this assembly was called nasi, or prince; his deputy was called ab Beth-din, father of the house of judgment; and the sub-deputy was called chagan, the wise: the rest were denominated tzekanim, elders or senators. The room in which they sat was a rotunda, half of which was built without the temple, and half within; that is, one semicircle of the room was within the compass of the temple; and as it was never allowed to sit down in the temple, they tell us this part was for those who stood up; the other half, or semicircle, extended without the holy place, and here the judges sat. The nasi, or prince, sat on a throne at the end of the hall, having his deputy at his right hand, and his sub-deputy at his left; the other senators were ranged in order on each side.

The rabbins maintain that it consisted of seventy counsellors, six out of each tribe, and Moses as president; and thus the number was seventy-one: but six senators out of each tribe make the number seventy-two, which, with the president, constitute a council of seventy-three persons; and therefore it has been the opinion of some authors that this was the number of the members of the sanhedrim. As to the personal qualifications of the judges of this court, it was required that they should be of untainted birth; and they were often of the race of the priests or Levites, or of the number of inferior judges, or of the lesser sanhedrim, which consisted of twenty-three judges. They were to be skillful in the written and traditional law; and they were obliged to study magic, divination, fortune-telling, physic, astrology, arithmetic, and languages. It was also required, that none of them should be eunuchs, usurers, decrepit, deformed, or gamblers; and that they should be of mature age, rich, and of good countenance and body. Thus say the rabbins.

The authority of the sanhedrim was very extensive. This council decided causes brought before it by appeal from inferior courts. The king, high-priest, and prophets, were subject to its jurisdiction. The general officers of the nation were brought before the sanhedrim. How far their right of judging in capital cases extended, and how long it continued, have been subjects of controversy. Among the rabbins it has been a generally received opinion, that, about forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem, their nation had been deprived of the power of life and death. And most authors assert, that this privilege was taken from them ever since Judea was made a province of the Roman empire, that is, after the banishment of Archelaus. Others, however, maintain that the Jews had still the power of life and death; but that this privilege was restricted to crimes committed against their law, and depended upon the governor's will and pleasure.

Before the death of our Savior, two very famous rabbins had been presidents of the sanhedrim, namely, Hillel and Schammai, who entertained very different opinions on several subjects, and particularly that of divorce. This gave occasion to the question which the Pharisees put to Jesus Christ upon that head, Matt. 19: 3. (See Divorce.)

There were several inferior sanhedrim in Palestine, all depending on the great sanhedrim at Jerusalem. The inferior sanhedrim consisted each of twenty-three persons; and there was one in each city and town. Our Savior in Matt. 5: 22, alludes to the two tribunals. (See Justice, ADMINISTRATION OF.)—Watson.

SAPPHIRE; (saphir, beauty, Exod. 24: 10. 28: 18. Job 28: 6, 16. Cantic. 5: 14. Isa. 54: 11. Ezek. 1: 26. 10: 1. 28: 13; sappheiros, Rev. 21: 19, only.) That this is the sapphire, there can be no doubt. The Septuagint, the Vulgate, and the general run of commentators, ancient and modern, agree in this.

The sapphire is a pellucid gem. In its finest state it is extremely beautiful and valuable, and second only to the diamond in lustre, hardness, and value. Its proper color is pure blue; in the choicest specimens it is of the deepest azure; and in others varies into paleness, in shades of all degrees between that and a pure crystal brightness, without the least tinge of color, but with a lustre much superior to the crystal. The Oriental sapphire is the most beautiful and valuable. It is transparent, of a fine sky color, sometimes variegated with veins of a white sparry substance, and distinct separate spots of a gold color.—Watson.

SARABAITES; wandering fanatics, or rather impostors, of the fourth century, who, instead of procuring a subsistence by honest industry, travelled through various cities and provinces, and gained a maintenance by fictitious miracles, by selling relics to the multitude, and other frauds of a like nature.—Hend. Buck.

SARAH; (a princess) the wife of Abraham, and his sister, as he himself informs us, by the same father, but not the same mother, Gen. 20: 12. (See ABRAHAM.)—Watson.

SARDIS, now called Sart, a city of Asia Minor, formerly the capital of Cræsus, king of the Lydians, is situated at the foot of the famous mount Tmolus, on the north, having a spacious and delightful plain before it, watered with several streams that flow from the neighboring hill to the south-east, and with the Pactolus, rising from the same, on the east, and increasing with its waters the stream of Hermus, into which it runs.

It is now a very pitiful village, but, for the accommodation of travellers, it being the road for the caravans that come out of Persia to Smyrna with silk, there is a large khan built in it, as is usual in most of these towns. The inhabitants are for the most part shepherds, who look to those numerous flocks and herds which feed in the plains.

To the southward of the town are very considerable ruins still remaining, which reminds us of what Sardis was, before earthquake and the sword had caused those desolations which have visited it. The Turks have a mosque here, which was formerly a Christian church; at the entrance of which are several curious pillars of polished marble. Some few Christians live among them, working in gardens, or otherwise employed in such like drudgery. The church in Sardis was reproached by our Savior for its declension in vital religion. It had a name to live, but was really dead, Rev. 3.—Calmet.

SARDIUS; (adam, so called from its redness, Exod. 28: 17. 39: 10. Ezek. 28: 13; sardios, Rev. 21: 20.) a precious stone of a blood-red color. Calmet says it has a mixture of white, as a man's nail; and so differs from the ruby. If so, it seems to be the modern cornelian. It took its Greek name from Sardis, where the best of them were found.—Calmet; Watson.

SARDONYX; (sardonix, Rev. 21: 20.) a precious stone, which seems to have its name from its resemblance partly to the sardius and partly to the onyx. It is generally tinged with black and blood color, which are distinguished from each other by circles or rows, so distinct that they appear to be the effect of art.—Watson.

SARPI, (PETER,) better known under the name of Father Paul, or Fra Paolo, was born, in 1552, at Venice. So precocious were his talents, that, at the age of seventeen, he publicly maintained theological and philosophical theses, consisting of three hundred and nine articles. His eloquence was equal to his learning. He did not confine his studies to theology; for anatomy and astronomy also engaged much of his attention. He was of the order of the Servites, and became provincial of the order. The Venetian government appointed him its consulting theologian, and reposed unbounded confidence in him; which he justified and repaid, by defending the ecclesiastical liberties of his country against the encroachments of the Roman pontiff. His patriotism roused the vengeance of Rome against him, and, in 1607, five ruffians made an attempt to assassinate him. They failed, however, in their purpose, though they gave him fifteen wounds. He died in 1628. His greatest work is, a History of the Council of Trent.—Davenport.

SATAN is a Hebrew word, and signifies an adversary, or enemy, and is commonly applied in Scripture to the devil, or the chief of the fallen angels. (See ANVERSARY, and DEMONIACS.) "By collecting the passages," says Cruden, "where Satan, or the devil, is mentioned, it may be observed, that he fell from heaven with all his company; that God cast him down from thence for the punishment of his pride; that, by his envy and malice, sin, death, and all other evils, came into the world; that, by the permission of God, he exercises a sort of government in the world over his subordinates, over apostate angels like himself; that God makes use of him to prove good men and chastise bad ones; that he is a lying spirit in the mouth of false prophets, seducers, and heretics; that it is he, or some of his, that torment or possess men; that inspire them with evil designs, as he did David, when he suggested to him to number his people; to Judas, to betray his Lord and Master; and to Ananias and Sapphira, to conceal the price of their field. That he roves full of rage like a roaring lion, to tempt, to betray, to destroy, and to involve us in guilt and wickedness; that his power and malice are restrained within certain limits, and controlled by the will of God. In a word, that he is an enemy to God and man, and uses his utmost endeavors to rob God of his glory, and men of their souls." (See articles ANGEL; DEVIL; TEMPTATION.)

More particularly as to the temptations of Satan:—1. He adapts them to our temper and circumstances. 2. He chooses the fittest season to tempt: as youth, age, poverty, prosperity, public devotion, after happy manifestations; or when in a bad frame; after some signal service; when alone or in the presence of the object; when unemployed and off our guard; in death. 3. He puts on the mask of religious friendship, 2 Cor. 11: 14. Matt. 4: 6. Luke 9: 50. Gen. 3. 4. He manages temptation with the greatest subtlety. He asks but little at first; leaves for a season in order to renew his attack. 5. He leads men to sin with a hope of speedy repentance. 6. He raises suitable instruments, bad habits, relations, Gen. 3. Job 2: 9, 10. Gilpin on Temptations; Brooks on Satan's Devices; Bishop Porteus' Sermons, vol. ii. p. 63; Burgh's Critic. vol. i. ess. 3; vol. ii. ess. 4; Howe's Works, vol. ii. p. 360; Gurnall's Christian Armor; Works of John Newton; Works of Robert Hall; Dwight's Theology; Balfour's Second Inquiry; and Cooke's Examination of Balfour; Letters of Canonics.—Hend. Buck.

SATANIANS; a branch of the Messalians, who appeared about the year 390. It is said, among other things, that they believed the devil to be extremely powerful, and that it was much wiser to respect and adore than to curse him.—Hend. Buck.

SATISFACTION, in general, signifies the act of giving complete or perfect pleasure. In the Christian system it denotes that which Christ did and suffered in order to satisfy divine justice, to secure the honors of the divine government, and thereby make an atonement for the sins of his people. Satisfaction is distinguished from merit thus: The satisfaction of Christ consists in his answering the demands of the law on man, which were consequent on the breach of it. These were answered by suffering its penalty. The merit of Christ consists in what he did to fulfil what the law demanded before man sinned, which was obedience. The satisfaction of Christ is to free us from misery, and the merit of Christ is to procure happiness for us. See ATONEMENT, and PROPITIATION. Also, SATURNIANS; a denomination which arose about the year 115. They derived their name from Saturnus of Antioch, one of the principal Gnostic chiefs. (See GNOSTICS).—Hend. Buck.

SATURNINUS, a Christian martyr under Diocletian, was a priest of Albitina, in Africa, who, having been informed against for officiating in his clerical capacity, was apprehended, with four of his children, and sent to Carthage, to be examined before Amelinus, the proconsul of that quarter of the globe. On his examination, Saturninus vindicated the Christian religion with great eloquence. The proconsul, enraged at his superior arguments, which he could not confute, ordered him to cease from speaking, and to be put to a variety of tortures. After these, he was remanded to prison, where he died from starvation, about A. D. 305. His children met the same fate.—Fox, p. 48.

SAUL; the son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, the first king of the Israelites, 1 Sam. 9: 1, 2, &c. Saul's fruitless journey when seeking his father's asses; (see Ass;) his meeting the prophet Samuel; the particulars foretold to him, with his being anointed as king, about A. M. 2909; his prophesying along with the young prophets; his appointment by the lot; his modesty in hiding himself; his first victory over the Ammonites; his rash sacrifice in the absence of Samuel; his equally rash curse; his victories over the Philistines and Amalekites; his sparing of king Agag, with the judgment denounced against him for it; his jealousy and persecution of David; his barbarous massacre of the priests and people of Nob; his repeated confessions of his injustice to David, &c., are recorded in 1 Sam. 9—31.

The character of Saul is that of a gloomy, apprehensive, melancholy man; and after taking, without success, what remedies were customary, his servants, or physicians, (see 1 Sam. 16: 15.) finding his case beyond the reach of their art, thought proper to represent it as a visitation from on high; yet to recommend the use of music, as a recipe whose effects might be favorable. The event justified their expectations; and the amusement, the sympathy, and the enjoyment of Saul, while his attention was engaged, produced an interval of disease, which gradually improved to convalescence. Calmet does not consider Saul as a maniac, but as an hypochondriac, whose low spirits were relieved by the cheerful and animating vibrations of the young shepherd's careless harp: the sprightly effusions

Of linked sweetness long drawn out
With wanton heed, and giddy cunning,
The melting voice through mazes running,
Untwisting all the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony.

How well adapted the unstudied strains of a shepherd swain, whose harp, at the same time, was bold through the courage of its master, free through his "native wood-notes wild," and sedate through his piety; how well such a remedy was adapted to the cure of Saul, may be estimated by a moment's reflection. See 2 Kings 3: 15, for the tranquilizing effects of the harp in the instance of the prophet Elisha. He reigned forty years, but exhibited to posterity a melancholy example of a monarch, elevated to the summit of worldly grandeur, who, having cast off the fear of God, gradually became the slave of jealousy, duplicity, treachery, and the most malignant and diabolical tempers. His behavior towards David shows him to have been destitute of every generous and noble sentiment that can dignify human nature; and it is not an easy task to speak with any moderation of the atrocity and baseness which uniformly mark it. His character is that of a wicked man, "waxing worse and worse;" but while we are shocked at its deformity, it should be our study to profit by it, which we can only do by using it as a beacon to warn us, "lest we also be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin."—Watson; Calmet.

SAUNDERS, (LAWRENCE,) an English divine and martyr under queen Mary, was educated at Cambridge

In the reign of Edward VI. he received orders, and was made lecturer of Fotheringhay. He was next made leader in the cathedral of Litchfield, where he was very successful in winning souls to God. He was thence removed to Church Langton, in Leicestershire; and afterwards to the rectory of Allhallows, in Bread street, London.

When Mary came to the throne, the fervent, faithful, and successful labors of Saunders could not pass unnoticed; and accordingly, he was apprehended, and, after a series of imprisonments and trials before the insolent Gardiner and Bonner, in which he nobly defended himself, and the cause for which he suffered, was condemned to be burnt. On the 8th of February, 1555, he was led to the place of execution; having come within sight of it, a proposal was made to him by the officer, to which he replied, "I hold no heresies, but the doctrine of God, the blessed gospel of Christ; it is that I hold, it is that I believe, it is that I have taught, and it is that I will never revoke." When he came to the place, he fell to the ground and prayed; he then arose, and embracing the stake to which he was chained, kissed it, saying, "Welcome the cross of Christ, welcome everlasting life." The holy man, having endured his torments with the utmost fortitude and patience, sweetly fell asleep in Jesus.—Middleton, vol. i. p. 304.

SAURIN, (JAMES,) a celebrated French pulpit orator and divine, was the son of an eminent lawyer, and born at Nismes, in the year 1677. His father was an exile, with his family, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes; and during that time he made considerable advances in literature, though he resigned this delightful employment for the purpose of becoming a soldier. Accordingly, in 1694, at the early age of seventeen, he made a campaign as a cadet in lord Galloway's company; and in the next year, obtained a pair of colors from his commander; but, upon the signing of the peace between France and Savoy, he quitted a life for which he was never designed, and applied himself to philosophy and divinity, under those great masters, Turretin, Tronchin, Pictet, Chouet, and other very learned men, with whom Geneva at that time was crowded, some as natives, and others as refugees. Under these eminent men Saurin became a student, and applied himself particularly to divinity; and in 1696, he began to think of devoting himself to the ministry.

In 1700, Mr. Saurin visited Holland and England, in which last place he staid five years, and preached with very great acceptance among his fellow-exiles in London. During his continuation in England, in 1703, he married Miss Catharine Boynton, by whom he had a son named Philip. Two years after his marriage he returned to Holland, and accepted the situation of chaplainship to some of the nobility at the Hague, and afterwards acceded to the call of a French church there (which was given to the refugees, and in which they constantly worshipped,) to become one of their pastors, in which office he continued till his death. He was constantly attended by a very crowded audience, was heard with the utmost attention and pleasure, and the happy effects of his preaching were exemplified in the conversion of great numbers of his people.

At the request of queen Caroline of England he drew up a Treatise on the Education of Princes. His most considerable work was entitled, "Discourses, Historical, Critical, and Moral, on the most memorable Events of the Old and New Testament." This work was undertaken by the desire of a Dutch merchant, who expended an immense sum in the engraving of copper-plates, which adorn the work. It consists of six folio volumes. Mr. Saurin died before the third was finished, but Mr. Roques finished the third, and added a fourth on the Old Testament; and M. de Beausobre subjoined two on the New Testament. The whole is replete with very extensive learning, and well worth the careful perusal of students in divinity. The first of these was translated into English by Chamberlayne, soon after its first publication in French.

His "Dissertation on the Expediency of sometimes disguising the Truth," raised a great clamor against Saurin. At length, the synod decided the dispute in his favor. He also published a small but valuable piece, "On the State of Christianity in France." There are twelve volumes of his sermons, in the original, of which the greater part have been translated into English, by Mr. Robinson, and others, and of which a handsome edition was published in 1824, in six volumes octavo. They are distinguished for sound learning, evangelical sentiment, eloquence, sublimity, and pathos. Saurin died at the Hague, on the 30th of December, 1730, most sincerely regretted by all his acquaintances, as well as by his church.

His voice was strong, clear, and harmonious, and he never lost the management of it. His style was pure, unaffected, and eloquent, sometimes plain, and sometimes flowery. Though his language was rich and varied, it was always adapted to the audience for whose sake he spoke. In the introductions of his sermons, he used to deliver himself in a tone modest and low: in the body of the sermon, which was suited to the understanding, he was clear, plain, and argumentative, pausing at the close of each period, that he might discover, by the countenances and motions of his hearers, whether they were convinced by his arguments. His church lost in him a truly primitive Christian minister, who spent his life in watching over his flock, as one who knew that he must give an account.—See Life of Saurin, prefixed to a Translation of his Sermons, by the Rev. Robert Robinson.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

SAVIOR; one who delivers from sin, danger and misery. Thus Jesus Christ is called the Savior, as he delivers us from the greatest evils, and brings us into the possession of the greatest good. (See JESUS CHRIST; LIBERTY; PROPITIATION; REDEMPTION; SALVATION.)—Hend. Buck.

SAVIOR, ORDER OF ST.; a religious order of the Romish church, founded by St. Bridget, about the year 1345; and so called from its being pretended that our Savior himself declared its constitution and rules to the foundress.—Hend. Buck.

SAVOR; (1.) Scent, or smell, Eccl. 10. (2.) That sharp quality in salt by which it renders other bodies agreeable to the taste, Matt. 5: 13. (3.) Character, reputation; thus men's savor becomes abhorred, when their name becomes hateful and detested, Exod. 5: 21.

The ancient sacrifices were of a sweet savor, or savor of rest unto God: he accepted of and delighted in them, as typical of the obedience and suffering of Christ, which sufficiently honor all his perfections, and more than balance our offences, Gen. 8: 21. Exod. 29: 18. Eph. 5: 2. The savor of the knowledge of Christ is the refreshing and pleasant nature of his truth, when known, and of the grace and virtue that proceed from him as our Mediator, 2 Cor. 2: 14. Sol. Song 1: 3. Ps. 45: 8. Faithful ministers are to God a sweet savor of Christ, in their hearers: the faithful discharge of their duty is acceptable to God, whether men be saved by it or not; and are a savor of death unto death to some, and a savor of life unto life to others; they are the occasion of double destruction to unbelievers, and the means of eternal life here and hereafter to others, 2 Cor. 2: 15, 16. To savor the things of men, and not the things of God, is to contrive, choose, and delight in things agreeable to carnal ease or sinful lusts, and not what is commanded of God, and tends to his honor, Matt. 16: 23.—Brown.

SAVOY CONFERENCE; a series of meetings held by royal commission at the residence of the bishop of London, in the Savoy, in the year 1661, between the bishops and the non-conformist ministers, in order so to review, alter, and reform the liturgy, as to meet the feelings of those who had serious scruples against its use, and thereby promote the peace of the church. The individuals chosen comprehended the archbishop of York, with twelve bishops on the one side, and eleven non-conformist ministers on the other. Had the episcopal commissioners entered into a fair and open discussion on the points at issue, reconciliation, to a certain extent, might have taken place; but as they were, from the beginning, averse from conceding a single iota to the dissenters, the whole proved a farce, and the negotiation turned out a complete failure. At a convocation of the bishops, held almost immediately after, instead of removing any thing that was at all likely to stumble tender consciences, they rendered the liturgy still more objectionable, by adding the story of Bel and the dragon to the lessons taken from the Apocrypha.—Hend. Buck.

SAVOY CONFESSION OF FAITH; a declaration of the faith and order of the Independents, agreed upon by their elders and messengers in their meeting at the Savoy, in the year 1658. This was reprinted in the year 1729. It differs from the Westminster only in relation to church government. See Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. ii. p. 507, quarto edit.—Hend. Buck.

SCALIGER, (JOSEPH JUSTUS,) son of Julius Cæsar Scalliger, a learned critic, and his rival in learning and arrogance, was born, in 1540, at Agen, and was educated at the college of Bordeaux, and, finally, by his father and Turnebus. Languages he acquired with wonderful ease, and is said to have been master of no less than thirteen. His friends denominated him "an ocean of science," and "the masterpiece of nature." He died in 1609, professor of the belles-lettres at Leyden. His works, most of which are commentaries on the classics, are numerous. Of his other productions, one of the most valuable is a treatise De Emendatione Temporum.—Davenport.

SCANDAL; a saare, encumbrance, or obstacle to piety. In Scripture, and in ecclesiastical authors, it is put for any thing that a man finds in his way, which may occasion him to trip. Thus Moses (Lev. 19: 14. apud LXX.) forbids to put a stumbling-block (or scandal) before the blind; that is, neither wood, stone, nor any thing else, that may make him stumble or fall. Calmet remarks that the Greek word skandalon, or proskomma, or skōlon, answers to the Hebrew mischol, which signifies fall, ruin, sin, what hinders from walking, and makes one fall; which comes from the root cashal, to fall, to tumble; and in the conjugation hiphil, signifies to cause to fall, to overthrow, to lay snares, &c. (See OFFENCE.)

When we read, that the Jews were scandalized at the mean family of Christ, (Matt. 13: 57. Luke 7: 23.) it implies mistake, since his family was truly royal; at the doctrine of the cross, (Gal. 5: 11.) it implies mistake, since the resurrection had removed that cause of scandal; and also at the persecutions suffered by Christians, since that was really their glory, &c.

Christ has promised to remove out of his kingdom every thing that can smelt scandal, Matt. 13: 41.—Calmet.

SCAPE-GOAT. (See GOAT.)

SCAPULA, (JOHN,) a lexicographer, was born in Germany, about the middle of the sixteenth century, and died at the beginning of the seventeenth. He was employed as a corrector by Henry Stephens, while that eminent man was printing the Greek Thesaurus; and he basely availed himself of the opportunity to pillage it, and form a Lexicon, by the publication of which he ruined his master.—Davenport.

SCARLET; a deep, bright, and shining red color. Our translators have not everywhere rightly used this word. TOBAHU ought indeed to be rendered scarlet, but SHANI, or double dye, as well as CARMIL, ought to be rendered crimson; but as these colors are near of kin to one another, there is the less importance in mistaking the one for the other. (See VERMILION.) Scarlet was much worn by great men, 2 Sam. 1: 24. The scarlet color of the horse and robes of Antichrist may typify his royal power, and his bloody persecution of the saints, Rev. 17: 3, 4. Sin is likened to scarlet and crimson, to mark its horrible nature and aggravated heinousness, Isa. 1: 18.—Brown.

SCEPTIC, (skeptikos, from skeptomai, "I consider, look about, or deliberate,") properly signifies one considerate and inquisitive; it is used in a bad sense for one who is always weighing reasons on one side and the other, without ever deciding between them. An ancient sect of philosophers, founded by Pyrrho, who denied the real existence of all qualities in bodies, except those which are essential to primary atoms; and referred every thing else to the perceptions of the mind produced by external objects; in other words, to appearance and opinion, were first designated sceptics. In modern times the word has been applied to deists, or those who doubt of the truth and authenticity of the sacred Scriptures. One of the greatest sceptics in later times was Hume: he endeavored to introduce doubts into every branch of physics, metaphysics, history, ethics, and theology. He has been confuted, however, by doctors Reid, Campbell, Gregory, Beattie, and others; indeed, as Mr. Douglas observes, every new writer who has examined the argument of Hume, has detected a new flaw in his reasonings.

Robert Haldane, Esq. of Scotland, in his admirable work on the Evidence and Authority of the Christian Revelation, has clearly shown that the little attention usually paid to the concerns of a future world does not arise from indifference to futurity itself. On the contrary, we are all much alive to every thing which relates to the future events of this present world. But as to a state of existence beyond the grave, our notion of it is so general and undefined as to be easily overborne by sceptical reasonings; by the business and pleasures of life, or by surrounding example. Thus many are brought to the conclusion that nothing certain can be known respecting it. They resolve therefore to make the most of the present life, and to take their chances of another along with many whose judgment and character they respect. To this they add some general maxims, that they are no worse than others; perhaps in many things more correct; that God is merciful, and that he could never have formed creatures to be finally condemned and rendered miserable.

Such scepticism as this is lodged in the minds of numbers, and influences their practice in life, without their ever having expressed it to others in words, or perhaps even suspected it themselves. They, no less than the avowed infidel, stake their all against the truth of Christianity.

If the Bible be not a fiction, although they gain the whole world, they will lose their own souls. (See INFIDELITY.) Pascal's Thoughts on Religion; Lond. Chris. Observer, 1832; Douglas on Errors regarding Religion; Foster's Essay on the Importance of Religion; Wayland's Discourses; and works on the Evidences of Christianity.—Hend. Buck.

SCEPTRE, a word derived from the Greek, properly signifies a rod of command, a staff of authority, which is supposed to be in the hands of kings, governors of a province, or of the chief of a people, Gen. 49: 10. Num. 24: 17. Isa. 14: 5. The sceptre is put for the rod of correction, and for the sovereign authority that punishes and humbles, Ps. 2: 9. Prov. 22: 15. The term sceptre is frequently used for a tribe, probably because the prince of each tribe carried a sceptre, or a wand of command, to show his dignity.—Watson.

SCHISM, from schisma, a rent, cleft, fissure; in its general acceptation it signifies division or separation; but is chiefly used in speaking of separations happening from diversity of opinions among people of the same religion and faith. All separations, however, must not properly speaking, be considered as schisms.

Schism, says Mr. Arch. Hall, is, properly, a division among those who stand in one connexion of fellowship; but where the difference is carried so far, that the parties concerned entirely break up all communion one with another, and go into distinct connexions for obtaining the general ends of that religious fellowship which they once did, but now do not carry on and pursue with united endeavors, as one church joined in the bonds of individual society; where this is the case, it is undeniable there is something very different from schism; it is no longer a schism in, but a separation from, the body. Dr. Campbell also supposes that the word schism in Scripture does not signify open separation, but that men may be guilty of schism by such an alienation of affection from their brethren as violates the internal union subsisting in the hearts of Christians, though there be no error in doctrine, nor separation from communion. See 1 Cor. 3: 3, 4. 12: 24—26.

The following have been proposed as remedies for schism:—"1. Be disposed to support your brethren by all the friendly attentions in your power, speaking justly of their preaching and character. Never withhold these proofs of your brotherly love, unless they depart from the doctrines or spirit of the gospel. 2. Discourteance the silly reports you may hear, to the injury of any of your brethren. Oppose backbiting and slander to the utmost. 3. Whenever any brother is sinking in the esteem of his flock through their caprice, perverseness, or Antinomianism, endeavor to hold up his hands and his heart in his work. 4. Never espouse the part of the factious schismatics, till you have heard your brother's account of their conduct. 5. In cases of open separation, do not preach for separatists till it be evident that God is with them. Detest the thought of wounding a brother's feelings through the contemptible influence of a party spirit; for through this abominable principle schisms are sure to be multiplied. 6. Let the symptoms of disease in the patients, arouse the benevolent attention of the physicians. Let them check the forward, humble the proud, and warn the unruly, and many a schismatic distemper will receive timely cure. 7. Let elderly ministers and tutors of academies pay more attention to these things, in proportion as the disease may prevail; for much good may be accomplished by their influence.

The great schism of the West is that which happened in the times of Clement VII. and Urban VI., which divided the church for forty or fifty years, and was at length ended by the election of Martin V. at the council of Constance.

The Romanists number thirty-four schisms in their church; they bestow the name English schism on the reformation of religion in that kingdom. Those of the church of England apply the term schism to the separation of the Presbyterians, Independents, Baptists, and Methodists. See King on the Primitive Church, p. 152; Hales and Henry on Schism; Dr. Campbell's Præl. Disc. to his Gospels, part 3; Haweis' Appen. to the first volume of his Church History; Archibald Hall's View of a Gospel Church; Dr. Owen's View of the Nature of Schism; Buck's Ser., ser. 6, on Divisions; *James' Ch. SCHISM BILL, THE; an act passed in the reign of queen Anne, in virtue of which, non-conformists teaching schools were to be imprisoned three months. Each schoolmaster was to receive the sacrament, and take the oaths. If afterwards present at a conventicle, he was to be incapacitated and imprisoned: he was bound to teach only the Church Catechism. But offenders conforming were to be reciprocated; and schools for reading, writing, and the mathematics were excepted. It was to have extended to Ireland; and if it had, its course was designed to have been followed with an attempt to deprive the dissenters, all over the kingdom, of their right to vote in elections for members of parliament. But the queen died the very day the act was to have received her signature and taken force, and consequently fell to the ground. (See conclusion of the article NON-CONFORMIST.)—Hend. Buck.

SCHLEIERMACHER, (FREDERIC DANIEL ERNEST), one of the most distinguished German theologians and philologists, was born at Breslau, in 1768, and received his education at the academy of the Moravian Brethren at Niesky. In 1787, he ceased to be member of this society, left Barby, where he had begun the study of theology, and went to Halle to continue it. In 1791, after having been employed as a teacher, he was ordained a clergyman, and appointed assistant preacher at Landsberg, on the Warte. From 1796 to 1802, he was minister in the Charite, a great hospital, at Berlin. During this period, he translated Fawcett's Sermons, (two vols.,) contributed to the Athenæum, conducted by the two Schlegels, (q. v.,) and wrote the Discourses on Religion, and the Manologues, and Letters of a minister out of Berlin. He soon undertook his translation of Plato. Five volumes of this work had appeared in 1828, and the whole is probably now completed. Few men have ever entered so deeply into the spirit of Plato.

In 1802, he published his first collection of sermons, which has since been followed by two others. In 1802, he removed to Stolpe, where he wrote his Critical View of Ethics. In the same year, he was appointed professor extraordinary of theology at Halle, and preached to the university. In 1807, when Halle was separated from Prussia, he went to Berlin and lectured there, as well as preached, with the greatest boldness, on the existing state of things, although a hostile force under Davoust occupied the city. In 1809, he was appointed preacher at the Trinity church in Berlin, and married. In 1810, when the new university was opened in that city, he was appointed professor ordinarius, as he had been at Halle during the last part of his residence there. In 1811, he was elected a member of the academy of sciences, and in 1814, secretary of the philosophical class when he was released from the duties which he had discharged in the department of public instruction in the ministry of the interior. At this period, he wrote his View of the Study of Theology. His last work is his Doctrines of the Christian Faith. He died in 1834, with the peace of Christ in his heart.

Few men have equalled Schleiermacher in activity. He delivered lectures in various departments of theology and philosophy. He preached every Sunday, (always without notes,) beside writing much, and having a large circle of official labors. For many years his large church was crowded, and his lectures at the university were attended by great numbers of the students. He had many enthusiastic admirers; but the mystical party regarded him with dislike. Schleiermacher has done much for the intellectual and religious advancement of his countrymen.—Ency. Amer.; Robinson's Bib. Repos., 1834.

SCHNEIDER, (JOHN GOTTLÖB.) This celebrated philologist, born at Kolm, in 1752, studied under Ernesti, at Leipsic, where a wealthy relation in London supported him. For thirty-four years Schneider was professor of ancient languages there, and published a great number of critical editions of the classics. His excellent Greek Lexicon, which has passed through three editions, is the basis of that of Passow, and of the English-Greek Lexicon of Donnegan, London, 1831. It has contributed not a little to give a new impulse to the study of the Greek language in Germany. When the university was removed, in 1811, from Frankfort on the Oder to Breslau, Schneider went thither, and was made chief librarian, in addition to his other office. He died there, January 12, 1832.—Ency. Amer.; Robinson's Bib. Repos.

SCHOLASTIC; in the manner of the schoolmen: what is treated in a subtle and metaphysical way.—Hend. Buck.

SCHOLIA; short notes of a grammatical or exegetical nature. Many scholia are found on the margin of manuscripts, or interlined, or placed at the end of a book. They have also been extracted and brought together, forming what is called Catena Patrum, (q. v.)—Hend. Buck.

SCHOLIASTS; writers of such brief notes on passages of Scripture. A multitude of scholia from the ancient Christian fathers, especially those of the Greek church, have come down to us in their works. Their value, of course, depends on the learning and critical acumen of the authors. Theodoret, Theophylact, and Cæcumenius are among the best of them.—Hend. Buck.

SCHOOLMASTER, (pedagogos.) Few offices are higher than that of an educator of youth. Among the ancients a pedagogue was a person to whom they committed the care of their children, to lead them, to observe them, and to instruct them in their first rudiments. Thus the office of a pedagogue nearly answered to that of a governor or tutor, who constantly attends his pupil, teaches him, and forms his manners. Paul (1 Cor. 4: 15.) says, "For though you have ten thousand instructors (pedagogos) in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers;" representing himself as their father in the faith, since he had begotten them in the gospel. The pedagogue indeed may have some power and interest of his pupil, but he can never have the natural tenderness of a father for him. To the Galatians, the apostle says, (3: 24, 25.) "The law was our schoolmaster (pedagogos) to bring us to Christ." It pointed out Christ in the precepts, the figures, the prophecies, of the Old Testament; it trained us to feel our need of a Savior: but since committed to the tuition of the faith which we have embraced, we have no longer need of a schoolmaster, or pedagogue; as such are of no further use to young persons when advanced to years of maturity.—Calmet.

SCHOOLMEN; a set of men, in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries, who framed a new sort of divinity, called scholastic theology. Their divinity was founded upon, and confirmed by, the philosophy of Aristotle, and lay, says Dr. Gill, in contentions and litigious disputations, in thorny questions and subtle distinctions. Their whole scheme was chiefly directed to support Anti-christianism; so that by their means popish darkness was the more increased, and Christian divinity almost banished out of the world.

"Considering them as to their metaphysical researches," says Robert Hall, "they fatigued their readers in the pursuit of endless abstractions and distinctions; and their design seems rather to have been accurately to arrange and define the objects of thought, than to explore the mental faculties themselves. The nature of particular and universal ideas, time, space, infinity, together with the mode of existence to be ascribed to the Supreme Being, chiefly engaged the attention of the mightiest minds in the middle ages. Acute in the highest degree, and endowed with a wonderful patience of thinking, they yet, by a mistaken direction of their powers, wasted themselves in endless logomachies, and displayed more of a teasing subtlety than of philosophical depth. They chose rather to strike into the dark and intricate by-paths of metaphysical science, than to pursue a career of useful discovery; and as their disquisitions were neither adorned by taste, nor reared on a basis of extensive knowledge, they gradually fell into neglect, when juster views in philosophy made their appearance. Still they will remain a mighty monument of the utmost which the mind of man can accomplish in the field of abstraction. If the metaphysician does not find in the schoolmen the materials of his work, he will perceive the study of their writings to be of excellent benefit in sharpening his tools. They will aid his acuteness, though they may fail to enlarge his knowledge."

Some of the most famous were, Abelard, Damascene, Lanfranc, P. Lombard, Alex. Hales, Bonaventure, Thomas Aquinas, Duns Scotus, and Durandos. Mosheim; Brown's Philosophy of the Mind; Gill's Body of Div., preface; Electric Rev. for Dec. 1805; H. More's Hints to a Young Princess, vol. ii. pp. 267, 268; Works of Robert Hall.—Hend. Buck.

SCHREVELIUS, (CORNELIUS,) a lexicographer, was born, about 1615, at Haarlem; succeeded his father as rector of the grammar-school at Leyden; and died either in 1664 or 1667. He edited various classics, but is only remembered by his Greek and Latin Lexicon, the first edition of which was published in 1645. In this country it has been translated by Pickering into Greek and English.—Davenport.

SCHULTENS, (ALBERT,) who has been called the restorer of oriental literature in the eighteenth century, was born, in 1686, near Groningen; became professor of the eastern languages at Franeker, and afterwards at Leyden; and died in 1750. Among his works are, Origines Hebrææ; and a Commentary on the Book of Job. JOHN JAMES, his son, and HENRY ALBERT, his grandson, were also eminent orientalis.—Davenport.

SCHURMANN, (ANNA MARIA,) a female of varied talents, was born, in 1607, at Cologne; became, in 1653, one of the disciples of the fanatic Labadie, to whom she was even said to be privately married; and died in 1678. She was mistress of painting, engraving, sculpture, and music, and of the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Chaldee, Ethiopic, and several modern languages. She wrote various works, which were collected under the title of Opuscula Hebræa, Græca, Latina, Gallica, Prosaica, et Metrica.—Davenport.

SCHWARTZ, (CHRISTIAN FREDERICK,) the celebrated Danish missionary in India, was born October 26, 1726, at Sonnenburgh, in the New Mark. At the age of eight years he was sent to the town school, where he received many good impressions under the then rector, Mr. Helm, who, in his instructions in religion, affectionately recommended prayer to his scholars, and showed how they might, in their own words, lay their concerns before God. Schwartz related, in an account written by himself, that he often, at that time, went into a solitary place, where he poured out his heart before God; and in doing which he felt himself very happy. When he had done any thing amiss at home, he could not be easy till he had earnestly implored pardon of God.

In the year 1746, he went to Halle, with a view to attend the Latin school of the Orphan house; but the Rev. Benjamin Schultz, who had been an English missionary at Madras till the year 1743, and who now resided at Halle, advised him to enter immediately at the college, as he was already twenty years of age, and sufficiently grounded in elementary knowledge. He took his advic.; and diligently attended the lectures of the professors at the university, Baumgarten, Michaelis, Knapp, Freylinghausen, &c., while he lodged and boarded at the Orphan house. It was, at that time, in contemplation to print the Bible in the Talmul language, at Halle, under the superintendance of the missionary Schultz. Schwartz, together with another student of this place, was commissioned to learn the Talmul language, in order to be employed in correcting the press. Although the printing of the Bible here was not carried into execution, yet the pains which Schwartz had bestowed, for a year and a half, upon the acquisition of the Talmul language, were not thrown away, since this became the occasion (the late Mr. Francke being also acquainted with his upright intentions) of his being appointed to go in the capacity of a missionary to the East Indies: He accepted this appointment; and although, some days after, an advantageous situation, as preacher, not far from Halle, was offered him, he declined it, in the firm persuasion, that it was the will of God he should go to the East Indies.

On the 8th day of August, 1749, Schwartz set out, with two other missionary candidates, Polzenhagen and Huetemann, (the latter being destined for the English mission,) for Copenhagen. After they had there received ordination, they returned to Halle; from thence they proceeded on their way to London. On the 21st of January, 1750, they left London, embarked the 29th, and arrived on the 16th of July at Cadelar, and on the 30th at Traquebar, in good health. As early as the 5th of November following, Schwartz delivered his first discourse in the Talmul language. In the year 1767, he was transferred to the English society, as missionary in Tirutchinapalli, after having several times already preached the gospel there, and met with great attention. In the year 1779, he went to Tanschaur, where he had already founded a congregation during his abode at Tirutchinapalli, and where he remained till his decease. At both places he received, from the government at Madras, an annual salary of one hundred pounds, as garrison preacher. At Tirutchinapalli, he expended the whole of this sum in the service of the mission, particularly in the building of the church and school, and also in augmenting the allowances of the national helpers. At Tanschaur, he gave one-half of his salary to Mr. Kohlhoff, whom he had educated and instructed until he was ordained, at Traquebar, to be missionary at Tanschaur. The other half he likewise expended upon the mission.

The fidelity with which he labored; the self-denial which he exercised; the blessing which attended his preaching of the gospel; the esteem in which he was held, both by the Europeans and Talmuls; the veneration which all his brethren paid to him, as to their father, counsellor, and pattern, appear sufficiently from the missionary accounts. Much did he labor—great will be his reward. He enjoyed an almost uninterrupted good state of health, and could always perform his functions with ease. Only in the last years he wrote, that he was no longer able to go about among the heathen as formerly.

In 1798, the seventy-third year of his life, he expired in the arms of the faithful and affectionate Malabar fellow-laborers. Not only the congregations, the schools, and the mission, but the whole country lamented him as a father. A monument to the memory of Schwartz has been executed by Bacon, at the expense of the East India company, and has been erected in India.—Jones' Chris. Dig.

SCHWENKELDIANS; a denomination in the sixteenth century; so called from one Gasper Schwenkfeldt, a Silesian knight. He differed from Luther in the three following points. The first of these points related to the doctrine concerning the eucharist. Schwenkfeldt inverted the following words of Christ, "this is my body," and insisted on their being thus understood, "my body is this;" i. e. such as this bread which is broken and consumed; a true and real food, which nourisheth, satisfieth, and delighteth the soul. "My blood is this," that is, such its effects, as the wine which strengthens and refresheth the heart. Secondly, he denied that the external word which is committed to writing in the Holy Scriptures was endowed with the power of healing, illuminating, and renewing the mind; and he ascribed this power to the internal word, which, according to his notion, was Christ himself. Thirdly, he would not allow Christ's human nature, in its exalted state, to be called a creature, or a created substance, as such a denomination appeared to him infinitely below its majestic dignity; united as it is in that glorious state with the divine essence.—Head. Buck.

SCORPION; (akreb, Deut. 8: 15. 1 Kings 12: 11, 14. 2 Chron. 10: 11, 14. Ezek. 2: 6; skorpios, Luke 10: 19. 11: 12. Rev. 9: 3. Eccus. 26: 7. 39: 30.) Parkhurst derives the name from ak, to press, squeeze, and reb, much, greatly, or kreb, near, close. Calmet remarks, that "it fixes so violently on such persons as it seizes upon, that it cannot be plucked off without difficulty."

The scorpion is generally two inches in length, and resembles so much the lobster in form, that the latter is called by the Arabs akerb d'elbahar, the "sea-scorpion." It has several joints or divisions in its tail, which are supposed to be indicative of its age; thus, if it have five, it is considered to be five years old. The poison of this animal is in its tail, at the end of which is a small, curved, sharp-pointed sting, similar to the prickle of a buckthorn tree; the curve being downwards, it turns its tail upwards when it strikes a blow.

The scorpion delights in stony places and in old ruins. Some are of a yellow color, others brown, and some black. The yellow possess the strongest poison, but the venom of each affects the part wounded with frigidly, which takes place soon after the sting has been inflicted. Dioscorides thus describes the effect produced: "Where the scorpion has stung, the place becomes inflamed and hardened; it reddens by tension, and is painful by intervals, being now chillily, now burning. The pain soon rises high, and rages, sometimes more, sometimes less. A sweating succeeds, attended by a shivering and trembling; the extremities of the body become cold; the groin swells; the hair stands on end; the visage becomes pale; and the skin feels, throughout it, the sensation of perpetual pricking, as if by needles." This description strikingly illustrates Rev. 9: 3-5, 10, in its mention of "the torment of a scorpion, when he striketh a man."—Calmet; Harris; Watson.

SCOTISTS; a set of school divines and philosophers; thus called from their founder, J. Duns Scotus, a Scottish cordelier, who maintained the immaculate conception of the Virgin, or that she was born without original sin, in opposition to Thomas Aquinas and the Thomists.—Hend. Buck.

SCOTT, (JONN, D. D.,) an English divine of the seventeenth century, distinguished for piety and learning, was born in the parish of Chippingham, in Wiltshire, in 1638. He was admitted of New Inn, a commoner, in 1657, and made great progress in logic and philosophy; but left the university without taking a degree; and getting into orders, at last became minister of St. Thomas's in Southwark. In 1677, he was made rector of St. Peter-le-Poer, in London, and was collated to a prebend in St. Paul's cathedral, in 1684. In 1691, he succeeded Sharp, afterwards archbishop of York, in the rectory of St. Giles's-in-the-Fields; and the same year was made canon of Windsor.

Dr. Scott was a faithful, zealous, and pious preacher; much attached to the doctrines and discipline of the church of England, and very anxious to promote the welfare of his fellow-creatures. His learning and piety excited general attention and respect, and he might soon have been made a bishop, had not some scruples of conscience prevented him; and he refused the bishopric of Chester, because he could not take the oath of homage; and afterwards another bishopric, the deanery of Worcester, and a prebend of the church of Windsor, because they were all places of deprived men. He died in 1694, and was buried in St. Giles's church. He wrote an excellent work, called "The Christian Life," which has been often printed, and attracted, as it deserves, attention and respect. He also published, at different times, twelve Sermons, preached upon public and particular occasions. See General Biog. Dict.; Biog. Brit.; and Funeral Sermon, preached by Dr. Isham; Doddridge on Preaching.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

SCOTT, (THOMAS, D. D.,) the most judicious commentator of his time, was a native of Lincolnshire. He was born February 16, 1747, at Braytoft, a small farmhouse, five miles from Spilsby. He was the tenth of thirteen children, all of whom he survived. His father was ambitious of bringing up one of his family to a profession; and the eldest son was consequently educated, and apprenticed to a surgeon; but dying young, Thomas was sent to school to learn Latin. At the age of sixteen he was bound apprentice to a medical practitioner at Alford; but at the end of two months the master was dissatisfied with his behavior, and sent him home. He was now employed about the farm for some time, and compelled to labor in the most servile occupations; sometimes tending the sheep, and at others following the plough. In this menial situation he continued more than nine years, yet continually cherishing the wish of becoming a clergyman. Thoughts of the university, of learning, and of study, often presented themselves to his mind: and he at length consulted a clergyman at Boston, who encouraged his attempt at qualifying himself for the ministry; and having acquired a competent knowledge of Greek, as well as Latin, he eventually obtained ordination from Dr. Green, bishop of Lincoln, the 20th of September, 1772. His first situation was a curacy in Buckinghamshire, where he became acquainted with Mr. John Newton, then curate of Olney, whom he succeeded, on the removal of the latter to the metropolis, in 1781.

His intercourse with Mr. Newton was the means of giving an entire new turn to his whole course of life. In the memoir written by himself, Mr. Scott honestly admits that when he received ordination, he was totally ignorant of the gospel, and destitute of the power of godliness. But his correspondence with Mr. Newton led to an important change in both his sentiments and practice. He embraced the sentiments commonly termed Calvinistic, and in process of time became an able advocate of that system. In 1785, he was removed from Olney to the chaplainship of the Lock hospital, near Hyde Park corner, and held, besides, two lectureships in the city. In 1801, he obtained the living of Aston Sandford, in Buckinghamshire, which he held to the period of his happy death, April 16, 1821.

He first appeared as an author in a small volume, entitled "The Force of Truth," 1779, in which he details the singular events which issued in his change of mind and character. This little piece has gone through not less than twenty editions. But his most important work is, "A Family Bible, with original Notes, practical Observations, and marginal References," first published in four volumes, quarto, 1796; and of which the ninth edition, with the author's last corrections and improvements, appeared in 1825, in six volumes quarto. He was also the author of a great number of valuable pieces, which have recently been collected and published uniformly, in ten volumes octavo, including "Remarks on the Bishop of Lincoln's Refutation of Calvinism;" "Essays on Important Subjects;" Sermons, "Synod of Dort," Tracts, &c. &c. He left in manuscript, at his decease, a copious account of his own life, replete with interest, which has been published by his son, and very extensively read. It was followed by a volume of his letters. See Memoirs, by his Son.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

SCOTT, (SIR WALTER,) who has augmented the stores of English literature beyond any other man of his age, was born in Edinburgh, August 15, 1771. He was, like Byron, lame in one foot, and his frequent ill health rendered his course of education irregular. For the same reason he was obliged to remove to Sandyknow; and here it was, in the depth of retirement and silent suffering, that he acquired mental discipline, and much of the romantic border lore afterwards wrought into his poetry and lighter prose works. It was chiefly from his excellent mother that he is said to have derived his powers, and his introduction into literary society. He was originally designed for the legal profession, and in 1792 was called to the bar. In 1799, he was made sheriff of Selkirkshire, with a salary of three hundred pounds a year. Soon after this he gave up his legal profession for employments more congenial to his taste and inclination.

His first literary efforts were in poetry, and consisted of translations from the German. They were failures. Undiscouraged by the "dead loss," he continued to write, tried his powers repeatedly in original composition, and by perpetual improvement upon himself, at length rose to the highest literary reputation of his time. From 1805, the era of his "Lay of the Last Minstrel," his biography is little more than a history of his publications. His "Waverley" in 1814, was the beginning of a new series of works, which gained their concealed author the title of the "Great Unknown," and spread his fame over the whole civilized world. In 1820, he was created a baronet of the United Kingdom by George IV.

In 1826, owing to the failure of the house of Constable & Co., his publishers, the secret of his authorship transpired, and he was involved in their debts, as security, to the amount of a hundred thousand pounds. To liquidate this immense sum, Sir Walter entered into new and severe literary labors; writing on an average the number of sixteen printed pages a day, till the last year of his life. To a friend who condoled with him, he said, "It is very hard thus to lose all the labors of a lifetime, and be made a poor man at last, when I ought to have been otherwise. But if God grant me health and strength for a few years longer, I have no doubt that I shall redeem it all." The effort was full of magnanimity; but it was too late in life, and his health sunk under it, though his earnings, the revenue of his intellect, for the last four or five years, were nearly ten thousand pounds annually. He died December 21, 1832.

His literary character rests almost exclusively upon his peculiar power of combining and embellishing past events, and his skill in delineating natural character. Memory, imagination, and the love of antiquity, were his intellectual traits, and these have been developed in every variety of form with a wonderful opulence. His diction is rich, but far from pure or elegant. His writings abound with benevolence, with humor, and lively illustration, yet they rarely open glimpses of Christian excellence, or touch upon the higher destinies reserved for man as seen in the light of divine revelation. An author of seventy volumes of popular literature, and a professor, no doubt sincerely, of Christian faith, a member of the church of England, might surely, it would seem, have made some higher offering to religion than even the purity of his blameless example, and the general moral tendency of his writings.

Scott's fictitious works are entirely free, it is true, from the moral blemishes of Byron and Moore, or even of Shakspeare and Pope; they teach neither licentiousness, pride, envy, nor misanthropy; they abound in sound sense, and practical wisdom for every-day life; but we fear they must be pronounced sadly deficient in the wisdom for eternity. Yet the author knew and felt that there was a higher wisdom; as is manifest from his Lay Sermons on the Atonement, &c. and his valuable Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft. And in his account of his own life, there occurs a passage which is worthy of record here, as much for the sake of his readers as of our own. "It was my first resolution," he observes, "to keep as far as was in my power abreast of society; continuing to maintain my place in general company, without yielding to the very natural temptation of narrowing myself to what is called literary society. By doing so, I imagined I should escape the besetting sin of listening to language which, from one motive or another, ascribes a very undue degree of consequence to literary pursuits, as if they were indeed the business rather than the amusement of life." Till literature becomes impregnated with a more Christian spirit, this is the true estimate of its value; and this, doubtless, accounts for Sir Walter's habit of depreciating conscientiously the merit of his own large contributions to it. A higher praise awaits that glorious genius, yet to appear, who, with equal powers to win the public attention, shall spread abroad a literature, like the beautiful parables of our Lord, adapted not merely to please, but to reform, bless, and save mankind.

Besides the works already mentioned, Sir Walter wrote the Life of Napoleon and the History of Scotland, with various productions of minor value and inferior ability. SCOU GAL, (HENRY,) some time professor of divinity in the university of Aberdeen, was a divine of the Episcopal church of Scotland in the seventeenth century. He was educated in the university of St. Andrews. In 1673, he was presented by his college to a living, but recalled the following year, and made professor of theology. His great exertions, both in this capacity and as a preacher, threw him into a consumption, and he died, greatly lamented, in 1678, at the early age of twenty-eight.

Dr. Doddridge says, "He was a writer of the first rank, though he wrote but little. Every page abounds with noble and proper thoughts, clothed with a decent eloquence, suited to the subject. He appears to be the best model of all his class. His Life of God in the Soul of Man, and Sermons, should be often read. His early death, at the age of twenty-eight, was an unspeakable loss to the world." — Ency. Amer.; Doddridge's Lect. on Preaching.

SCOURGE, or WHIP. This punishment was very common among the Jews, Deut. 25: 1—3. There were two ways of giving the lash; one with thongs, or whips, made of ropes' ends, or straps of leather; the other with rods, or twigs. St. Paul informs us, that at five different times he received thirty-nine stripes from the Jews, (2 Cor. 11: 24.) namely, in their synagogues, and before their courts of judgment. For, according to the law, punishment by stripes was restricted to forty at one beating, Deut. 25: 3. But the whip, with which these stripes were given, consisting of three separate cords, and each stroke being accounted as three stripes, thirteen strokes made thirty-nine stripes, beyond which they never went. He adds, that he had been thrice beaten with rods, namely, by the Roman lictors, or beades, at the command of the superior magistrates.—Watson.

SCRIBE; (in Hebrew sepher; in Greek grammateus;) a word very common in Scripture, and having several significations. 1. A clerk, writer, or secretary, which constituted an important employment in the court of the kings of Judah, in which Scripture mentions the secretaries as officers of the crown, 2 Sam. 8: 17. 1 Chron. 24: 6. 1 Kings 4: 3. 2 Kings 19: 2. 22: 8—10. 2. A scribe is put for a commissary or muster-master of an army, who reviews the troops, keeps the list or roll, and calls them over, Judg. 5: 14. 2 Chron. 24: 11. Jer. 52: 25. 2 Kings 25: 19. 3. Scribe is also put for an able and skilful man, a doctor of the law, a man of learning, or one who understands affairs, 1 Chron. 27: 32. Jer. 36: 10, 12, 20, 26. Eccles. 10: 5. Ezra 7: 6. The scribes of the people, frequently mentioned in the gospels, were public writers, professed doctors of the law, which they read and explained to the people. The word is equivalent to our modern term literati.—Colmet.

SCRIPTURE; a word derived from the Latin scriptura, and in its original sense of the same import with writing, signifying "any thing written." It is, by emphasis, however, commonly used to denote the writings of the Old and New Testaments, which are called sometimes the Scriptures, sometimes the sacred or holy Scriptures, and sometimes canonical Scriptures. These books are called the Scriptures by way of eminence, as they are the most important of all writings. They are said to be holy, or sacred, on account of the sacred doctrines which they teach; and they are termed canonical, because, when their number and authenticity were ascertained, their names were inserted in ecclesiastical canons, to distinguish them from other books, which, being of no authority, were kept out of sight, and therefore styled "apocryphal." (See ΑΠΟΚΡΥΦΑ.)

Among other arguments for the divine authority of the Scriptures, the following may be considered as worthy of our attention:—

"1. The sacred penmen, the prophets and apostles, were holy, excellent men, and would not—artless, illiterate men, and therefore could not, lay the horrible scheme of deluding mankind. The hope of gain did not influence them, for they were self-denying men, that left all to follow a Master who had not where to lay his head; and whose grand initiating maxim was, 'Except a man forsake all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple.' They were so disinterested that they secured nothing on earth but hunger and nakedness, stocks and prisons, racks and tortures; which, indeed, was all that they could, or did, expect, in consequence of Christ's express declarations. Neither was a desire of honor the motive of their actions; for their Lord himself was treated with the utmost contempt, and had more than once assured them that they should certainly share the same fate; besides, they were humble men, not above working as mechanics, for a coarse maintenance; and so little desirous of human regard, that they exposed to the world the meanness of their birth and occupations, their great ignorance and scandalous falls. Add to this, that they were so many, and lived at such a distance of time and place from each other, that, had they been impostors, it would have been impracticable for them to contrive and carry on a forgery without being detected. And, as they neither would nor could deceive the world, so they neither could nor would be deceived themselves; for they were days, months, and years, eye and ear witnesses of the things which they relate; and, when they had not the fullest evidence of important facts, they insisted upon new proofs, and even upon sensible demonstrations; as, for instance, Thomas, in the matter of our Lord's resurrection; (John 20: 25.) and, to leave us no room to question their sincerity, most of them joyfully sealed the truth of their doctrines with their own blood. Did so many and such marks of veracity ever meet in any other authors? (See RESURRECTION.)

"2. But even while they lived, they confirmed their testimony by a variety of miracles wrought in divers places, and for a number of years; sometimes before thousands of their enemies, as the miracles of Christ and his disciples; sometimes before hundreds of thousands, as those of Moses. (See MIRACLE.)

"3. Reason itself dictates, that nothing but the plainest matter of fact could induce so many thousands of prejudiced and persecuting Jews to embrace the humbling, self-denying doctrine of the cross, which they so much despised and abhorred. Nothing but the clearest evidence arising from undoubted truth could make multitudes of lawless, luxurious heathens receive, follow, and transmit to posterity, the doctrine and writings of the apostles; especially at a time when the vanity of their pretensions to miracles and the gift of tongues could be so easily discovered, had they been impostors; and when the profession of Christianity exposed persons of all ranks to the greatest contempt and most imminent danger. (CHRISTIANITY.)

"4. When the authenticity of the miracles was attested by thousands of living witnesses, religious rites were instituted and performed by hundreds of thousands, agreeable to Scripture injunctions, in order to perpetuate that authenticity; and these solemn ceremonies have ever since been kept up in all parts of the world; the passover by the Jews, in remembrance of Moses' miracles in Egypt; and the eucharist by Christians, as a memorial of Christ's death, and the miracles that accompanied it; some of which are recorded by Phlegon the Trallian, a heathen historian.

"5. The Scriptures have not only the external sanction of miracles, but the eternal stamp of the omniscient God by a variety of prophecies, some of which have already been most exactly confirmed by the event predicted. (See PROPHECY.)

"6. The scattered, despised people, the Jews, the irreconcilable enemies of the Christians, keep, with amazing care, the Old Testament, full of the prophetic history of Jesus Christ, and by that means afford the world a striking proof that the New Testament is true; and Christians, in their turn, show that the Old Testament is abundantly confirmed and explained by the New. (See JEWS.)

"7. To say nothing of the harmony, venerable antiquity, and wonderful preservation of those books, some of which are by far the most ancient in the world; to pass over the inimitable simplicity and true sublimity of their style; the testimony of the fathers and the primitive Christians; they carry with them such characters of truth, as command the respect of every unprejudiced reader.

"They open to us the mystery of the creation; the nature of God, angels, and man; the immortality of the soul; the end for which we were made; the origin and connexion of moral and natural evil; the vanity of this world, and the glory of the next. There we see inspired shepherds, tradesmen, and fishermen, surpassing as much the greatest philosophers as these did the herd of mankind, both in meekness of wisdom and sublimity of doctrine. There we admire the purest morality in the world, agreeable to the dictates of sound reason, confirmed by the witness which God has placed for himself in our breast, and exemplified in the lives of men of like passions with ourselves. There we discover a vein of ecclesiastical history and theological truth consistently running through a collection of sixty-six different books, written by various authors, in different languages, during the space of above fifteen hundred years. There we find, as in a deep and pure spring, all the genuine drops and streams of spiritual knowledge which can possibly be met with in the largest libraries. There the workings of the human heart are described in a manner that demonstrates the inspiration of the Searcher of Hearts. There we have a particular account of all our spiritual maladies, with their various symptoms, and the method of a certain cure—a cure that has been witnessed by multitudes of martyrs and departed saints, and is now enjoyed by thousands of good men, who would account it an honor to seal the truth of the Scriptures with their own blood. There you meet with the noblest strains of penitential and joyous devotion, adapted to the dispositions and states of all travellers to Zion. And there you read those awful threatenings and cheering promises which are daily fulfilled in the consciences of men, to the admiration of believers, and the astonishment of attentive infidels.

"8. The wonderful efficacy of the Scriptures is another proof that they are of God. When they are faithfully opened by his ministers, and powerfully applied by his Spirit, they wound and heal; they kill and make alive; they alarm the careless, direct the lost, support the tempted, strengthen the weak, comfort mourners, and nourish pious souls.

"9. To conclude: It is exceedingly remarkable, that the more humble and holy people are, the more they read, admire, and value the Scriptures; and, on the contrary, the more self-conceited, worldly-minded, and wicked, the more they neglect, despise, and asperse them.

"As for the objections which are raised against their perspicuity and consistency, those who are both pious and learned, know that they are generally founded on prepossession, and the want of understanding in spiritual things; or on our ignorance of several customs, idioms, and circumstances, which were perfectly known when those books were written. Frequently, also, the immaterial error arises merely from a wrong punctuation, or a mistake of copiers, printers, or translators; as the daily discoveries of pious critics, and ingenuous confessions of unprejudiced inquirers, abundantly prove." SCRIPTURES, RULES FOR SEARCHING THE. To understand the Scriptures, says Dr. Campbell, we should, 1. Get acquainted with each writer's style. 2. Inquire carefully into the character, the situation, and the office of the writer; the time, the place, the occasion of his writing; and the people for whose immediate use he originally intended his work. 3. Consider the principal scope of the book, and the particulars chiefly observable in the method by which the writer has purposed to execute his design. 4. Where the phrase is obscure, the context must be consulted. This, however, will not always answer. 5. If it do not, consider whether the phrase be any of the writer's peculiarities; if so, it must be inquired what is the acceptation in which he employs it in other places. 6. If this be not sufficient, recourse should be had to the parallel passages, if there be any such, in the other sacred writers. 7. If this throws no light, consult the New Testament and the Septuagint, where the word may be used. 8. If the term be only once used in Scripture, then recur to the ordinary acceptance of the term in classical authors. 9. Sometimes reference may be had to the fathers. 10. The ancient versions, as well as modern scholiasts, annotators, and translators, may be consulted. 11. The analogy of faith, and the etymology of the word, must be used with caution.

Above all, let the reader unite prayer with his endeavors, that his understanding may be illuminated, and his heart impressed with the great truths which the sacred Scriptures contain. SCRIPTURES, PUBLIC READING OF. As to the public reading of the Scriptures, it may be remarked, that this is a very laudable and necessary practice. "One circumstance," as a writer observes, "why this should be attended to in congregations, is, that numbers of the hearers, in many places, cannot read them themselves, and not a few of them never hear them read in the families where they reside. It is strange that this has not, long ago, struck every person of the least reflection in all our churches, and especially the ministers, as a most conclusive and irresistible argument for the adoption of this practice.

"It surely would be better to abridge the preaching and singing, and even the prayers, to one-half of their length or more, than to neglect the public reading of the Scriptures. Let these things, therefore, be duly considered, together with the following reasons and observations, and let the reader judge and determine the case, or the matter, for himself.

"Remember that God no sooner caused any part of his will, or word, to be written, than he also commanded the same to be read, not only in the family, but also in the congregation, and that even when all Israel were assembled together; (the men, women, and children, and even the strangers that were within their gates;) and the end was, that they might hear, and that they might learn, and fear the Lord their God, and observe to do all the words of his law, Deut. 31: 12.

"Afterward, when synagogues were erected in the land of Israel, that the people might every Sabbath meet to worship God, it is well known that the public reading of the Scriptures was a main part of the service there performed; so much so, that no less than three-fourths of the time was generally employed, it seems, in reading and expounding the Scriptures. Even the prayers and songs used on those occasions appear to have been all subservient to that particular and principal employment or service, the reading of the law.

"This work, or practice, of reading the Scripture in the congregation, is warranted and recommended in the New Testament, as well as in the Old. As Christians, it is fit and necessary that we should first of all look unto Jesus, who is the author and finisher of our faith. His example, as well as his precepts, is full of precious and most important instruction; and it is a remarkable circumstance, which ought never to be forgotten, that he began his public ministry, in the synagogue of Nazareth, by reading a portion of Scripture out of the book of the prophet Isaiah, Luke 4: 15—19. This alone, one would think, might be deemed quite sufficient to justify the practice among his disciples through all succeeding ages, and even inspire them with zeal for its constant observance.

"The apostle Paul, in pointing out to Timothy his ministerial duties, particularly mentions 'reading,' 1 Tim. 4: 13. 'Give attendance,' says he, 'to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine;' evidently distinguishing reading as one of the public duties incumbent upon Timothy. There can be no reason for separating these three, as if the former was only a private duty, and the others public ones; the most natural and consistent idea is, that they were all three public duties; and that the reading here spoken of, was no other than the reading of the Scriptures in those Christian assemblies where Timothy was concerned, and which the apostle would have him by no means to neglect. If the public reading of the Scriptures was so necessary and important in those religious assemblies which had Timothy for their minister, how much more must it be in our assemblies, and even in those which enjoy the labors of our most able and eminent ministers!" See Doddridge's Lectures on Preaching.—Hend. Buck.

SCYTHOPLIJS. (See BETHSAN.)

SEA. The Hebrews gave the name of sea to all great collections of water, to great lakes or pools. Thus the sea of Galilee, or of Tiberias, or of Cinnereth, is no other than the lake of Tiberias, or Gennesareth, in Galilee. The Dead sea, the sea of the Wilderness, the sea of the East, the sea of Sodom, the sea of Salt, or the Salt sea, the sea of Asphaltites, or of Bitumin, is no other than the lake of Sodom. The Arabians and Orientals in general frequently gave the name of sea to great rivers, as the Nile, the Euphrates, the Tigris, and others, which, by their magnitude, and the extent of their overflows, seemed as little seas, or great lakes. In Isaiah 11: 15, these words particularly apply to the Nile at the Delta. See the above articles.—Watson.

SEABURY, (SAMUEL, D. D.,) first bishop of the Episcopal church in the United States, the son of Mr. Seabury, Congregational minister at Groton, and afterwards Episcopal minister at New London, was born in 1728. After graduating at Yale college, in 1751, he went to Scotland, where he studied theology. He took orders in London, in 1753. On his return he was settled at Brunswick, New Jersey. In the beginning of 1757 he removed to Jamaica, on Long Island; and thence, in December, 1766, to West Chester. In this place he remained till the commencement of the war, when he went into the city of New York. At the return of peace he settled in New London.

In 1784, he went to England to obtain consecration as bishop of the Episcopal church of Connecticut, but meeting with some obstruction to the accomplishment of his wishes, he went to Scotland, where he was consecrated by three non-juring bishops. After this period he discharged, for a number of years, at New London, the duties of his office in an exemplary manner. He died February 25, 1796, aged sixty-eight. He published, besides various discourses, two volumes of sermons, which evince a vigorous and well informed mind.—Benedict's History of all Religions; Allen.

SEAH; a Hebrew measure, containing about two gallons and a half, liquid measure; or about a peck, dry measure.—Calmet.

SEAL. The ancient Hebrews wore their seals, or signets, in rings on their fingers, or in bracelets on their arms, as is now the custom in the East. Their principal uses were for authentication, secrecy, or security. Haman seals the decree of king Ahasuerus against the Jews with the king's seal, Esth. 3: 12. The priests of Bel desired the king to seal the door of their temple with his own seal. The bridegroom in the Canticles (5: 6.) wishes that his spouse would wear him as a signet on her arm, and a seal upon her heart.

Pliny observes, that the use of seals or signets was rare at the time of the Trojan war, and that they were under the necessity of closing their letters with several knots. But among the Hebrews they are much more ancient. Judah left his seal as a pledge with Tamar, Gen. 38: 25. Moses says, (Deut. 32: 34.) that God keeps sealed up in his treasures, under his own seal, the instruments of his vengeance. Job says, (9: 7.) that he keeps the stars as under his seal, and allows them to appear when he thinks proper, Job 14: 7.

When they intended to seal up a letter, or a book, they wrapped it round with flax, or thread, then applied the wax to it, and afterwards the seal. Isa. 8: 16, 17. Dan. 12: 4. Seals usually contained not merely the initials of the owner's name, but also inscriptions and mottoes of various kinds. This illustrates that beautiful passage in 2 Tim. 2: 19. The church of God is known by two great characteristics—safety and sanctity.

As a seal is the confirmation of some previous fact, grant, or engagement, we see how circumcision, as received by Abraham, became to him a seal of his previous justification by faith, Gen. 15: 6. Rom. 4: 11. So the conversion of the Corinthians sealed the divine commission of Paul.

The book that was shown to St. John the evangelist, (Rev. 5: 1. 6: 1, 2, &c.) was sealed with seven seals. It was a rare thing to affix such a number of seals; but this insinuated the great importance and secrecy of the matter. In civil contracts they generally made two originals: one continued open, and was kept by him for whose interest the contract was made; the other was sealed and deposited in some public office. (See INK.)—Watson.

SEASON; to season a thing with salt, or spice, &c. that it may keep fresh, or taste well, Lev. 2: 13. Speech is seasoned with the salt of grace when it proceeds from holy wisdom and love, and tends to honor God and profit our neighbor, Col. 4: 6. (See TIME.)—Brown.

SEAT. The seat of Moses, on which the scribes and Pharisees sat, expresses the authority of the doctors of the law, and their office of teaching. The seat of the scorner, mentioned in the first Psalm, alludes to the abominable discourse, and the licentious manners, of libertines, who corrupt equally by their scandalous example and conduct, as by their loose principles. The seat of honors, (Eccles. 7: 4.) is the chief places in the synagogues, which the Pharisees assumed; (Matt. 13: 6.) the seat prepared for Job in the assemblies; (Job 29: 7.) the seat or throne of the king, and that of God, are clear enough in their meaning. The throne belongs to God, and to the king; the seat of honor to the friends of the king, and to great men. (See BEH, and ACCURATION.)—Calmet.

SEATS OF SUBJECTS; a phrase used to describe a principle of great importance in the study of the Bible. The seat of a subject, says Francke, is any place in the Scriptures where such subject is treated; whether professedly, or in subordination to another subject; or, more especially, when it is regularly discussed and grounded by the obvious appointment of the Holy Spirit. This last may be termed its proper seat; and is that of which we at present chiefly speak. It should, however, be remarked, that the same subjects are thus treated in more than one chapter and book of Scripture; and hence there is an evident difference even between the proper seats of the same subject. The doctrine of justification, for instance, is considered in the third chapter of Philipians, as in its proper seat; but the epistle to the Romans and Galatians are, more eminently, the seats of that doctrine.

A knowledge of the seats of subjects is requisite, in order that the Scriptures may be digested in the mind, as it were, into common places, whence passages parallel to any text that may occur, will readily suggest themselves. With a view to this it is recommended not to measure our reading by the chapters into which the Holy Writ has been divided, but to peruse an entire subject at one time. Were this monition strictly regarded, students would clearly perceive that to explain Scripture by Scripture, and difficult passages by others of easier solution, is an invaluable expository help; and they would likewise have in constant readiness a system of divinity, compiled from the sacred volume itself, and divested of all human glosses.

The student will find it a beneficial practice, if he draw up, as he reads, for his own private use, an index of subjects digested according to their proper seats. To form such an index will not require much labor, and will certainly be productive of abundant advantage. Those which are prepared by others do not so forcibly affect the memory. Young persons are not indeed capable of arranging such an index with the requisite precision. They ought to be assisted, at least in a few chapters.

The exercises of discussion and examination are better adapted to fix the seats of subjects in the mind than any other means whatever. Students do not, indeed, usually appreciate the important advantages which result from a perfect acquaintance with the seats, and therefore do not cultivate this branch of study with correspondent attention; but experience will demonstrate and enforce its claims.—Francke's Guide to the Reading of the Scriptures.

SE-BAPTISTS; a sect of small note, which was formed in England about the beginning of the seventeenth century, by one John Smith, who maintained that it was lawful for every one to baptize himself. There is at this day an inconsiderable sect in Russia who are known by this name, and who perform the rite upon themselves, from an idea that no one is left on earth sufficiently holy to administer it aright.—Hend. Buck.

SEBASTIAN, a Christian martyr under Diocletian, was born at Narbonne, in Gaul, instructed in the principles of Christianity at Milan, and afterwards became a member of the emperor's guard at Rome. He remained a true Christian in the midst of idolatry; unallured by the splendors of a court, untainted by evil examples, and uncontaminated by the hopes of preferment. Having been informed against, on account of his rank he was called before the emperor, who charged him with ingratitude, &c. for being an enemy to the gods. Sebastian replied with Christian spirit, and expressed his regard for the imperial person. But remaining inflexible, he was sentenced to be shot at with arrows, which was executed accordingly. Some Christians coming to the place of execution, in order to bury him, perceived signs of life in him. In a short time, under their care, he recovered; but went out, and intentionally placed himself in the emperor's way. The emperor was much astonished both at the appearance of his person, and the reprehensive language with which Sebastian addressed him. He was afterwards ordered to be beat to death, and the Christians were forbidden either to use means for his recovery, or to bury him.—Fox, p. 40.

SEBAT; the fifth month of the Jewish civil year; and the eleventh of the ecclesiastical year, Zech. 1: 7.—Calmet.

SECEDERS; a numerous body of Presbyterians in Scotland, who have withdrawn from the communion of the established church.

In 1732, more than forty ministers presented an address to the general assembly, specifying, in a variety of instances, what they considered to be great defections from the established constitution of the church, and craving a redress of these grievances. A petition to the same effect, subscribed by several hundreds of elders and private Christians, was offered at the same time; but the assembly refused a hearing to both, and enacted, that the election of ministers to vacant charges where an accepted presentation did not take place, should be competent only to a conjunct meeting of elders and heritors, being Protestants. To this act many objections were made by numbers of ministers and private Christians, which led at length to their exclusion from the general assembly, and from the church of Scotland. This sentence being intimated to them, they protested that their ministerial office and relation to their respective charges should be held as valid as if no such sentence had passed; and that they were now obliged to make a secession from the prevailing party in the ecclesiastical courts; and, that it shall be lawful and warrantable for them to preach the gospel, and discharge every branch of the pastoral office, according to the word of God, and the established principles of the church of Scotland. Mr. Ralph Erskine, minister at Dunfermline, Mr. Thomas Mair, minister at Orwell, Mr. John M'Laren, minister at Edinburgh, Mr. John Currie, minister at Kinglassie, Mr. James Wardlaw, minister at Dunfermline, and Mr. Thomas Nairn, minister at Abbotshall, protested against the sentence of the commission, and that it should be lawful for them to complain of it to any subsequent general assembly of the church.

The secession properly commenced at this date. And accordingly the ejected ministers declared in their protest, that they were laid under the disagreeable necessity of seceding, not from the principles and constitution of the church of Scotland, to which, they said, they steadfastly adhered, but from the present church-courts, which had thrown them out from ministerial communion. The assembly, however, which met in May, 1734, did so far modify the above sentence, that they empowered the synod of Perth and Stirling to receive the ejected ministers into the communion of the church, and restore them to their respective charges; but with this express direction, "that the said synod should not take upon them to judge of the legality or formality of the former procedure of the church judicatories in relation to this affair, or either approve or censure the same." As this appointment neither condemned the act of the preceding assembly, nor the conduct of the commission, the seceding ministers considered it to be rather an act of grace than of justice; and, therefore, they said they could not return to the church-counts upon this ground; and they published to the world the reasons of their refusal, and the terms upon which they were willing to return to the communion of the established church. They now erected themselves into an ecclesiastical court, which they called the Associated Presbytery, and preached occasionally to numbers of the people, who joined them in different parts of the country. They also published what they called an Act, Declaration, and Testimony, to the doctrine, worship, government, and discipline of the church of Scotland; and against several instances, as they said, of defection from these, both in former and in the present times. Some time after this, several ministers of the established church joined them, and the Associated Presbytery now consisted of eight ministers. But the general assembly which met in 1738, finding that the number of Seceders was much increased, ordered the eight ministers to be served with a libel, and to be cited to the next meeting of the assembly, in 1739. They now appeared at the bar as a constituted presbytery, and having formally declined the assembly's authority, they immediately withdrew. The assembly which met next year deposed them from the office of the ministry; which, however, they continued to exercise in their respective congregations, who still adhered to them, and erected meeting-houses, where they preached till their death. Mr. James Fisher, the last survivor of them, was, by an unanimous call, in 1741, translated from Kinclaven to Glasgow, where he continued in the exercise of his ministry among a numerous congregation, respected by all ranks in that large city, and died in 1775, much regretted by his people and friends. In 1745, the seceding ministers were become so numerous, that they were erected into three different presbyteries under one synod, when a very unprofitable dispute divided them into two parties. (See BURGHERS, and ANTI-BURGHERS.)

The constitution of the Anti-burgher church differed very little from that of the Burghers. The supreme court among them was designated The General Associate Synod, having under its jurisdiction three provincial synods in Scotland, and one in Ireland. They, as well as the Burgher Seceders, had a divinity hall, and a professor of theology, whose lectures every candidate for the office of a preacher was obliged to attend.

After many unsuccessful attempts to bring about a reunion of these two bodies, measures were more vigorously renewed about twelve or fourteen years ago, and in 1820 it was happily accomplished; and the communion thus formed took the name of the United Secession Church, and now constitutes the most numerous and influential body among the Dissenters in Scotland. Though unendowed, and laboring under many disadvantages in a pecuniary point of view, it is rich in the intelligence and piety of its ministers, and the extent in which true religion is found to exist among its members. With much of that hereditary profession which is so common in the north, there are, nevertheless, in its congregations numbers who have experienced the gospel to be the power of God unto salvation, and who adorn the doctrine of God their Savior in all things. It is every day acquiring fresh strength by the increase of its members; and instead of a coalition being any longer expected between this church and the establishment, the probability of any such union is every day becoming less and less, owing partly to a growing jealousy of the Dissenters, and an indisposition to co-operate with them in religious matters on the part of the mother church, and partly to the rapid progress that is making, both among the ministers and people of the Secession, of principles decidedly hostile to all ecclesiastical establishments.

The number of settled ministers at present in the united body is about three hundred and twenty, vacant churches from thirty to forty, and the number of licensed preachers on the list nearly a hundred. In the most populous towns the congregations belonging to this body not only rival, but often exceed, in numerical strength, the congregations of the establishment. About two hundred ministers attached to this church labor in England in the cause of evangelical truth and Christian liberty, and form there an independent body. In the northern counties a considerable number of congregations have been formed in this connexion. These have regular presbyteries. There are in London four congregations. In North America, much of the supply of evangelical Presbyterian ministers has been obtained from this body; and in Nova Scotia, the Presbyterian church not only had its origin, but also, till very lately, its entire supply from them.—Hend. Buck.

SECEDERS, (OLD LIGHT;) an insignificant section of the old Secession church, otherwise known by the name of Original Seceders, and agreeing pretty much with those next mentioned, yet keeping themselves distinct from them, and holding no fellowship with any other body of professors. They are described as few in number, and remarkable for nothing but illiberality and intolerance. Edin. Theol. Rev., Nov., 1830.—Hend. Buck.

SECEDERS, (ORIGINAL;) a small party of Presbyterians in Scotland, which has lately coalesced under the auspices of Dr. M'Crie and Mr. Paxton, who refused to unite with the United Secession church, on the ground of the mere abstract question about the "magistrates' power" in matters of religion. Dependent entirely on old prejudices, upheld and recommended merely by the respectability of the names of their leaders, this body, which is extremely small, cannot subsist long, but must gradually merge into one or other of the larger bodies of Presbyterian Dissenters.—Hend. Buck.

SECHEM, SICHAM, SYCHEM, or SHECHEM, called also Sychar in the New Testament, afterwards Neapolis, and in the present day Nablous, Naplous, Naplose, and Naplosa; (for it is thus variously written;) a city of Samaria, near the parcel of ground which Jacob bought of Hamor, the father of Shechem, and gave to his son Joseph. Here Joseph's bones were brought out of Egypt to be interred; and on the same piece of ground was the well called Jacob's well, at which our Savior sat down when he had the memorable conversation with the woman of Samaria, (John 4.) which caused her, and many other inhabitants of Sechem, or Sychar, as it is there called, to receive him as the Messiah.

On contemplating this place and its vicinity, Dr. E. D. Clarke says, "The traveller, directing his footsteps towards its ancient sepulchres, as everlasting as the rocks in which they are hewn, is permitted, upon the authority of sacred and indisputable record, to contemplate the spot where the remains of Joseph, of Eleazar, and of Joshua, were severally deposited. If any thing connected with the memory of past ages be calculated to awaken local enthusiasm, the land around this city is pre-eminently entitled to consideration. The sacred story of events transacted in the field of Sechem, from our earliest years, is remembered with delight; but with the territory before our eyes where those events took place, and in the view of objects existing as they were described above three thousand years ago, the grateful impression kindles into ecstasy. Along the valley, we behold 'a company of Ishmaelites coming from Gilead,' as in the days of Reuben and Judah, 'with their camels, bearing spicery, and balm, and myrrh,' who would gladly have purchased another Joseph of his brethren, and conveyed him as a slave to some Potiphar in Egypt. Upon the hills around flocks and herds were feeding, as of old; nor in the simple garb of the shepherds of Samaria was there any thing repugnant to the notions we may entertain of the appearance presented by the sons of Jacob." The celebrated well called Jacob's well, but which, with the inhabitants of Sechem, is known by the name of Bir Samaria, or the "well of Samaria," is situated about half an hour's walk east of the town. (See JACOB'S WELL.)—Watson.

SEEKER, (THOMAS,) an eminent and pious prelate, was born, in 1693, at Sibthorpe, in Nottinghamshire, and was educated, at various seminaries, with the view of becoming a preacher among the Dissenters. In 1716, however he went to Leyden, studied physic, and took his degree. In 1721 he entered at Exeter college, Oxford. Having conformed to the church, he took orders, and obtained preferment. After having filled various minor ministries, he was consecrated bishop of Bristol in 1734. He was translated to Oxford in 1737. On the death of archbishop Hutton, in 1758, the duke of Newcastle, then at the head of the cabinet, placed bishop Seeker in the vacant primacy, without any solicitation on his part, or previous consciousness of the dignity about to be conferred on him. In this exalted situation he conducted himself with great dignity. As a scholar, he was elegant rather than profound.

Archbishop Secker died at Lambeth palace, on the 3d of August, 1768, highly esteemed and regretted. Moderation and discretion, without negligence or laxity, formed the basis of his ecclesiastical policy; and although some difference of opinion has been entertained in respect to his general merit, perhaps few have filled the same station more usefully to the public, and reputably to themselves.

Life prefixed to his Sermons.—Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.

SECRET; hidden, or known only to a few, Mark 4: 22. In secret is in such a place or manner as that few know it, or where one cannot be hurt, Job 40: 13. Ps. 27: 5. The secret of God is, (1.) His purpose concerning persons and nations, and the reasons of his dispensing his mercy and judgment in such a manner and time, Deut. 29: 29. Amos 3: 7. (2.) His secret favor and blessing, his instructing men in the mysteries of his word and providence, and his directing, succeeding, and protecting them in their station and work, Ps. 25: 14. The secrets of men are, (1.) That which few do or ought to know; such secrets talebearers reveal, Prov. 20: 19. (2.) The meaning of a dream or vision which is hard to be known, Dan. 4: 9. (3.) Their inward purposes, dispositions, aims, and acts, which are known only to God and one's self, 1 Cor. 14: 25. Eccl. 12: 14. Rom. 2: 16. (4.) Those parts of the human body which modestly requires to be covered, Deut. 25: 11. The secrets of wisdom are the unknown mysteries contained in the knowledge and practice of true religion, particularly those relating to the divine excellence, Job 11: 6. God's secret place is where his peculiar presence is, but is unseen, as amid the flames of Sinai; (Ps. 81: 7.) and in the temple, chiefly its most holy place; (Ezek. 7: 22.) or Christ, and intimate fellowship through him, by which one has unseen instruction, and great happiness and safety, Ps. 91: 1. 27: 5.—Brown.

SECT; a collective term, comprehending all such as follow the doctrines and opinions of some divine, philosopher, &c. The word sect, says Dr. Campbell, (Prelim. Diss.) among the Jews, was not, in its application, entirely coincident with the same term as applied by Christians to the subdivisions subsisting among themselves. We, if I mistake not, invariably use it of those who form separate communions, and do not associate with one another in religious worship and ceremonies. Thus, we call Papists, Lutherans, Calvinists, different sects, not so much on account of their differences in opinion, as because they have established to themselves different fraternities, to which, in what regards public worship, they confine themselves; the several denominations above mentioned having no intercommunity with one another in sacred matters. High church and low church we call only parties, because they have not formed separate communions. Great and known differences in opinion, when followed by no external breach in the society, are not considered with us as constituting distinct sects, though their differences in opinion may give rise to mutual aversion. Now, in the Jewish sects, (if we except the Samaritans,) there were no separate communities erected. The same temple and the same synagogues were attended alike by Pharisees and Sadducees; nay, there were often of both denominations in the sanhedrim, and even in the priesthood. Another difference was, also, that the name of the sect was not applied to all the people who adopted the same opinions, but solely to the men of eminence among them who were considered as the leaders of the party.—Hend. Buck.

SECTARIANISM. (See BIGOTRY.)

SECULAR CLERGY. (See CLERGY.)

SECUNDIANS; a denomination in the second century, which derived their name from Secundus, a disciple of Valentine. He maintained the doctrine of two eternal principles, viz. light and darkness, whence arose the good and evil that are observable in the universe. (See VALENTINIANS.)—Hend. Buck.

SECURE; (1.) Not exposed to apparent danger, Job 12: 6. (2.) Without fear of danger, Judg. 8: 11. Mic. 2: 8. And to secure one is to keep him free from danger, and the fear of it, Matt. 28: 14. To take security of one is to get bail for his good behavior, or his appearance at court, Acts 17: 9. Men's secure fearlessness of danger is either sinful, when not afraid of their bad state or condition, and of the just judgments of God; or holy, when one by a firm faith commits himself and all his concerns to God in Christ, as his own God, Job 12: 6. 11: 18.—Brown.

SEDITION; a rebellions uproar in a city or country, contrary to the command and authority of the civil magistrate, Gal. 5: 20.—Brown.

SEDUCE; to decoy, or draw away one from correct principles or practice, 1 Tim. 4: 1. The way of the wicked seduceth them; and leads them on to further impiety, and keeps their consciences quiet, while they hasten to eternal wo, Prov. 12: 26. God's people are seduced when taught, advised, or commanded to forsake what is truth, and lawful, and to follow what is sinful, 2 Kings 21: 9. Ezek. 13: 10. The Egyptians were seduced by their rulers when led to worship idols, work wickedness, and follow schemes ruinous to the nation, Isa. 9: 13. Evil men and seducers was worse and worse when God justly leaves them to proceed from one error or wicked way to another still worse, and to become more bold in their seducing work, 2 Tim. 3: 13.—Brown.

SEDUCTION; the diabolical crime of insuaring the affections of a virgin to destroy her chastity. (See FORNICATION; MARRIAGE.)

SEE, APOSTOLIC; the chair or throne of such bishops as were supposed to have been formed by an apostle.

The title, thus originally common to many, was, in process of time, by the ambition of the bishops of Rome, appropriated to their own. They had, as they thought, till the year 1662, a pregnant proof, not only of St. Peter's erecting their chair, but of his sitting in it himself: for till that year the very chair on which they believed, or would make others believe, he had sat, was shown and exposed to public adoration on the 15th of January, the festival of the said chair. But while it was cleaning, in order to be set up in some conspicuous place of the Vatican, the twelve labors of Hercules unluckily appeared engraved on it. Our worship, however, says Giacomo Bartholini, who was present at this discovery, and relates it, was not misplaced, since it was not to the wood we paid it, but to the prince of the apostles, St. Peter. An author of no mean character, unwilling to give up the holy chair, even after this discovery, as having a place and a peculiar solemnity among the other saints, has attempted to explain the labors of Hercules in a mystical sense, as emblems representing the future exploits of the popes. But the ridiculous and distorted conceits of that writer are not worthy our notice, though by Clement X. they were judged not unworthy of a reward.—Hend. Buck.

SEED, the prolific principle of future life, is taken in Scripture for posterity, whether of man, beasts, trees, &c., all of which are said to be sown and to fructify, as the means of producing a succeeding generation, Jer. 31: 27. This word is occasionally restricted to one principal descendant, one who by excellence is the SEE; as, the seed of the woman, (Gen. 3: 15. Gal. 3: 16.) the seed of Abraham, the seed of David, meaning the most excellent descendant of the woman, of Abraham, of David. Or, we may understand by "the seed of the woman," the son of a virgin; as verified in the supernatural conception of Jesus, Matt. 1: 18, &c. Luke 1: 26, &c.

Seed is taken figuratively for the word of God; (Luke 8: 5. 1 Pet. 1: 23.) for a disposition of divine origin; (1 John 3: 9.) and for truly pious persons, Matt. 13: 38.

The seed of Abraham denotes not only those who descend from him, by natural issue, but those who imitate his chafacter; (Rom. 4: 16.) for, if he be "the father of the faithful," then the faithful are his seed, by character, independent of natural descent; and hence the Messiah is said to see his seed, by grace or conversion only, Isa. 53: 10.—Calmet.

SEEING, (Heb. nabat, to see,) in Scripture is used to express the sense of vision; knowledge of spiritual things; and even the supernatural knowledge of hidden things, of prophecy, of visions, of ecstasies. Whence it is that formerly those were called seers who were afterwards termed prophets; and that prophecies were called visions.

Moreover, to see, is used for expressing all kinds of sensations. It is said in Exodus, (20: 18.) that the Israelites saw voices, thunder, lightning, the sounding of the trumpet, and the whole mountain of Sinai covered with clouds, or smoke. And Augustine observes, that the verb, to see, is applied to all the five natural senses; to see, to hear, to smell, to taste, to touch. "To see goodness," is to enjoy it. "To see the goodness of the Lord;" (Ps. 27: 13.) that is, to enjoy the mercy or blessing which God hath promised. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God;" that is, they shall have the perfect and immediate fruition of the glorious presence of God in heaven; or they shall understand the mysteries of salvation; they shall perceive the loving kindness of God towards them in this life, and shall at length perfectly enjoy him in heaven.—Watson.

SEEK; to endeavor to obtain, whether by searching for; (Gen. 37: 16.) asking by prayer; (Ezra 8: 21.) or by the use of any other means that tends to procure the enjoyment of a thing, Gen. 43: 18. God seeks men when he fixes his love on them, and by his Son's righteousness and intercession, and by the ministry of his word, and the efficacy of his Spirit, he recovers them from their miserable state or condition, Ezek. 34: 16. Ps. 119: 176. Luke 15: 4—9, and 19: 10. To seek God, or his name, or face, is to ask his direction, pray for his favors, and depend on him as our helper and portion, Ps. 63: 1, and 83: 16. Hypocrites seek him when they pretend to be sensible of their wants, and to pray for and desire the enjoyment of himself and favors, Prov. 1: 28. The Jews sought Christ after his ascension; but found him not; they had, to no purpose, an eager desire to enjoy the appearance of their Messiah, John 8: 21. To seek to an altar or temple is to frequent it religiously, 2 Chron. 1: 5. Deut. 12: 5. Amos 5: 5. To seek God's works is to endeavor to understand them, Ps. 111: 2. To seek God's precepts is to endeavor to know and obey them, Ps. 119: 115, 155. To seek judgment, or mischief, is to employ one's self in practising justice or doing mischief, Isa. 1: 17. Prov. 11: 27, and 17: 11, 19. To seek peace is to endeavor to promote it, Ps. 34: 14. Jer. 29: 7. To seek one's soul, or life, is to desire and use all possible means for murdering or ruining him, Ps. 35: 4. 38: 12. The gracious law of spiritual blessings Christ affirms to be, "Seek, and ye shall find."—Brown; Miss Graham's Test of Truth.

SEEKERS; a denomination which arose in England in the year 1645. They derived their name from their maintaining that the true church ministry, Scripture, and ordinances, were lost, for which they were seeking. They taught that the Scriptures were uncertain; that present miracles were necessary to faith; that our ministry is without authority; and that our worship and ordinances are unnecessary or vain. They were, if the phrase may be allowed, a sort of Christian septics.—Hend. Buck.

SEIR, the Horite. (See next article.)

SEIR, (Μοϋρτ;) a mountain tract, extending from the southern extremity of the Dead sea to the gulf of Acaaba, or Ezion-Geber. The whole of this tract was probably before called mount Hor, and was inhabited by the Horites, the descendants, as it is thought, of Hor, who is no otherwise known, and whose name is now only retained in that part of the plain where Aaron died. These people were driven out from their country by the Edomites, or the children of Esau, who dwelt there in their stead, and were in possession of this region when the Israelites passed by in their passage from Egypt to the land of Canaan. The country had, however, been previously overrun, and no doubt very much depopulated, by the invasion of Chedorlaomer, king of Elam. At what time the name of Hor was changed to that of Seir cannot be ascertained.

Mount Seir rises abruptly on its western side from the valleys of El Ghor and El Araba; presenting an impregnable front to the strong country of the Edomite mountaineers, which compelled the Israelites, who were unable (if permitted by their leader) to force a passage through this mountain barrier, to skirt its western base, along the great valley of the Ghor and Araba, and so to "compass the land of Edom by the way of the Red sea;" that is, to descend to its southern extremity at Ezion-Geber, as they could not penetrate it higher up. To the southward of this place Burckhardt observed an opening in the mountains, where he supposed the Israelites to have passed. This passage brought them into the high plains on the east of mount Seir, which are so much higher than the valley on the west, that the mountainous territory of the Edomites was everywhere more accessible: a circumstance which perhaps contributed to make them more afraid of the Israelites on this border, whom they had set at defiance on the opposite one. The mean elevation of this chain cannot be estimated at less than four thousand feet. In the summer it produces most of the European fruits, namely, apricots, figs, pomegranates, olives, apples, and peaches; and while in winter deep snows occasionally fall, with frosts to the middle of March. The inhabitants, like those of most mountainous regions, are very healthy. Burckhardt says, that there was no part of Syria in which he saw so few invalids: a circumstance which did not escape the observation of the ancients; who denominated it, Palestina tertia sive salutaris.—Watson; Bib. Ripos.

SELA; 2 Kings 14: 7. Sela, in Hebrew, signifies a rock, and answers to the Greek word petra; whence it has been reasonably inferred that the city bearing this name, and which was the celebrated capital of Arabia Petraea, is the place mentioned by the sacred historian. The remains in the valley of Wady Mousa, which are described by Burckhardt and Legh, and by captains Irby and Mangles, attest the splendor of the former city. At the western end of the valley, the road ascends to the high platform on which mount Hor and the tomb of Aaron stand; in the vicinity of which Josephus and Eusebius agree in placing the ancient Petra. (See CANAAN.)—Calmet.

SELAH. This expression is found in the Psalms seventy-four times, and thrice in the prophet Habakkuk. Some moderns pretend that selah has no signification, and that it is only a note of the ancient music, whose use is no longer known. Calmet says it intimates the end, or a pause, and that is its proper signification; but as it is not always found at the conclusion of the sense, or of the psalm or song, so it is highly probable, as Gesenius suggests, that it signifies a repeat. It is clear that it always follows some highly important sentiment, and is a proper call to reflection.—Calmet; Jones; Watson.

SELDEN, (JONN,) an eminent lawyer and writer, was born, in 1584, at Salvington, in Sussex; was educated at Chichester, and at Hart hall, Oxford; and studied the law at Clifford's Inn and the Inner Temple. After having been called to the bar, he practised chiefly as a chamber counsel, and much of his time was devoted to studying the history and antiquities of his native land. Between 1607 and 1640, he produced several works, of which the chief are, Titles of Honor; a Treatise on the Syrian Deities; the History of Tithes; and Mare Clausum. In 1640, he was chosen M. P. for Oxford. Though Selden had more than once been persecuted and imprisoned by the court for his love of liberty, yet he acted with great moderation at the commencement of the disputes between Charles and the parliament. The house of commons appointed him keeper of the records in the Tower, and subsequently, one of the commissioners of the admiralty, and voted him five thousand pounds. He died in 1654. His Table Talk was published after his death, by his amanuensis. Selden was a decided Christian, and one of the most learned men of his time.—Davenport.

SELEUCIA; a city of Syria, situated upon the Mediterranean, near the place where the Orontes discharges itself into the sea. St. Paul and Barnabas were at this place when they embarked for Cyprus, Acts 13: 4.—Watson.

SELEUCIANS; disciples of Seleucus, a philosopher of Galatia, who, about the year 380, adopted the sentiments of Hermogenes and those of Audeus. He taught, with the Valentinians, that Jesus Christ assumed a body only in appearance. He is said also to have maintained that the world was not made by God, but was co-eternal with him; and that the soul was only an animated fire created by the angels; that Christ does not sit at the right hand of the Father in a human body, but that he lodged his body in the sun, according to Ps. 19: 4; and that the pleasures of beatitude consisted in corporeal delight.—Hend. Buck.

SELF-BAPTIZERS. (See SE-BAPTISTS.)

SELF-DECEPTION, includes all those various frauds which we practise on ourselves in forming a judgment, or receiving an impression of our own state, character, and conduct; or those deceits which make our hearts impose on us in making us promises, if they may be so termed, which are not kept, and contracting engagements which are never performed.

Self-deception, as one observes, appears in the following cases:—“1. In judging of our own character, on which we too easily confer the name of self-examination, how often may we detect ourselves in enhancing the merit of the good qualities we possess, and in giving ourselves credit for others which we really have not! 2. When several motives or passions concur in prompting us to any action, we too easily assign the chief place and effect to the best. 3. We are too prone to flatter ourselves by indulging the notion that our habits of vice are but individual acts, into which we have been seduced by occasional temptations, while we are easily led to assign the name of habits to our occasional acts and individual instances of virtue. 4. We confound the mere assent of the understanding naturally, attended by some correspondent but transient sensibilities, with the impulses of the affections and determination of the will. 5. We are apt to ascribe to settled principles the good actions which are the mere effect of natural temper. 6. As sometimes, in estimating the character of others, we too hastily infer the right motive from the outward act; so, in judging of ourselves, we overrate the worth, by overvaluing the motives of our actions. 7. We often confound the non-appearance of a vicious affection with its actual extinction. 8. We often deceive ourselves by comparing our actual with our former character and conduct, and perhaps too easily ascribing to the extirpation of vicious, or the implantation of virtuous habits, that improvement which is owing merely to the lapse of time, advancing age, altered circumstances, &c. 9. Another general and fertile source of self-deception is our readiness to excuse, or at least to extenuate, the vices of our particular station: while we congratulate ourselves on the absence of other vices which we are under no temptation to commit. 10. We deceive ourselves by supposing our remorse for sin is genuine, when, alas, it does not lead to repentance. 11. By forming improper judgments of others, and forming our own conduct upon theirs.

From this view we may learn, 1. That the objects as to which men deceive themselves are very numerous; God, Jesus Christ, the Holy Spirit, the Bible, and gospel doctrines, religious experience, sin, heaven, hell, &c. 2. The causes are great and powerful; sin, Satan, the heart, the world, interest, prejudice. 3. The numbers who deceive themselves are great; the young, the aged, the rich, the poor, self-righteous, hypocrites, apostates, the ungodly. 4. The evil are many and awful. It renders us the slaves of pre-destination, leads us to overrate ourselves, flatters us with an idea of easy victory, confirms our evil habits, and exposes us to the greatest danger. 5. We should endeavor to understand and practise the means not to be deceived; such as strict self-inquiry, prayer, watchfulness, and ever taking the Scriptures for our guide. 6. And lastly, we should learn to ascertain the evidences of not being deceived, which are such as these: when sin is the object of our increasing fear, a tenderness of conscience; when we can appeal to God as to the sincerity of our motives and aims; when dependent on God's promise, providence, and grace; and when conformed to him in all righteousness and true holiness. (See SELF-EXAMINATION.) Chris. Obs. 1802, pp. 632, 633.—Hend. Buck.

SELF-DEDICATION, the giving up of ourselves unreservedly to God; that we may serve him in righteousness and true holiness, Rom. 6: 13. 12: 1. See SACRIFICATION; Howe's Works, vol. i. 8vo edit.—Hend. Buck.

SELF-DEFENCE, implies not only the preservation of one's life, but also the protection of our property, because without property life cannot be preserved in a civilized nation.

Some condemn all resistance, whatsoever be the evil offered, or whosoever be the person that offers it; others will not admit that it should pass any further than bare resistance; others say that it must never be carried so far as hazarding the life of the assailant; and others, again, who deny it not to be lawful in some cases to kill the aggressor, at the same time affirm it to be a thing more laudable and consonant to the gospel to choose rather to lose one's life in imitation of Christ, than to secure it at the expense of another's, in pursuance of the permission of nature.

But, “notwithstanding,” says Grove, “the great names which may appear on the side of any of these opinions, I cannot but think self-defence, though it proceeds to the killing of another to save one's self, is in common cases not barely permitted, but enjoined by nature; and that a man would be wanting to the Author of his being, to society, and to himself, to abandon that life with which he is put in trust. That a person forfeits his own life to the sword of justice, by taking away another's unprovoked, is a principle not to be disputed. This being so, I ask, whence should arise the obligation to let another kill me, rather than venture to save myself by destroying my enemy? It cannot arise from a regard to society, which, by my suffering another to kill me, loses two lives; that of an honest man by unjust violence, and that of his murderer, if it can be called a loss, by the hand of justice. Whereas, by killing the invader of my life, I only take a life which must otherwise have been forfeited, and preserve the life of an innocent person. Nor, for the same reason, can there be any such obligation arising from the love of our neighbor; since I do not really save his life by parting with my own, but only leave him to be put to death after a more ignominious manner by the public executioner. And if it be said that I despatch him with his sins upon him into the other world, which he might have lived long enough to repent of, if legally condemned; as he must answer for that, who brought me under the necessity of using this method for my own preservation; so I myself may not be prepared, or may not think myself so, or so well assured of it, as to venture into the presence of my great Judge; and no charity obliges me to prefer the safety of another's soul to my own.

“Self-defence, therefore, may be with justice practised, 1. In case of an attempt made upon the life of a person, against which he has no other way of securing himself but repelling force by force. 2. It is generally esteemed lawful to kill in the defence of chastity, supposing there be no other way of preserving it.” It should be maturely considered whether our Lord's maxim, (Matt. 5: 39) “Resist not evil,” was intended to apply to these extreme cases; since his illustrations of the maxim are of a different order. His laws, after all, are our only safe rules of conduct. See Grove's Moral Philosophy. Also Hints on the Lawfulness of Self-defence, by a Scotch Dissenter.—Hend. Buck.

SELF-DENIAL; a term that denotes our relinquishing every thing that stands in opposition to the divine command, and our own spiritual welfare, Matt. 16: 24. It does not consist in denying what a man is, or what he has; in refusing favors conferred on us in the course of providence; in rejecting the use of God's creatures; in being careless of life, health, and family; in macerating the body, or abusing it in any respect; but in renouncing all those pleasures, profits, views, connexions, or practices, that are prejudicial to the true interests of the soul.

The understanding must be so far denied as not to lean upon it, independent of divine instruction, Prov. 3: 5, 6. The will must be denied, so far as it opposes the will of God, Eph. 5: 17. The affections, when they become inordinate, Col. 3: 5. The gratification of the appetites of the body must be denied when out of their due course, Rom. 6: 12, 13. 1 Cor. 9: 27. The honors of the world and praise of men, when they become a snare, Heb. 11: 24—26. Worldly emoluments, when to be obtained in an unlawful way, or when standing in opposition to religion and usefulness, Matt. 4: 20—22. Friends and relatives, so far as they oppose the truth, and would influence us to oppose it too, Gen. 12: 1. Our own righteousness, so as to depend upon it, Phil. 3: 8, 9. Life itself must be laid down, if called for in the cause of Christ, Matt. 16: 24, 25. In fine, every thing that is sinful must be denied, however pleasant and apparently advantageous, since without holiness no man shall see the Lord, Heb. 12: 14.

To enable us to practise this duty, let us consider the injunction of Christ; (Matt. 16: 24.) his eminent example; (Phil. 2: 5, 8.) the encouragement he gives; (Matt. 16: 25.) the example of his saints in all ages; (Heb. 11.) the advantages that attend it; and, above all, learn to implore the agency of that Divine Spirit, without whom we can do nothing.—Hend. Buck.

SELF-EXAMINATION, is the calling ourselves to a strict account for all the actions of our lives, comparing them with the word of God, the rule of duty; considering how much evil we have committed, and good we have omitted. It is a duty founded on a divine command. (2 Cor. 13: 5.) and ought to be done, 1. Deliberately. 2. Frequently. 3. Impartially. 4. Diligently. 5. Wisely. And, 6. With a desire of amendment.

This, though some modern Christians would call it a legal duty, is essential to our improvement, our felicity, and interest, 1 Cor. 11: 28. Gal. 6: 4.

"They," says Mr. Wilberforce, "who, in a crazy vessel, navigate a sea wherein are shoals and currents innumerable, if they would keep their course, or reach their port in safety, must carefully repair the smallest injuries, and often throw out their line, and take their observations. In the voyage of life, also, the Christian who would not make shipwreck of his faith, while he is habitually watchful and provident, must make it his express business to look into his state and ascertain his progress." See SELF-DECEPTION; Wilberforce's Practical View; Owen's Works; Fuller's Works; Barr's Help.—Hend. Buck.

SELF-EXISTENCE OF GOD, is his entire existence of himself, not owing it to any other being whatsoever; and thus God would exist, if there were no other being in the whole compass of nature but himself. (See EXISTENCE, INDEPENDENCE, and ETERNITY OF GOD; JEHOVAH.)—H. Buck.

SELF-GOVERNMENT; the wise and conscientious regulation of all our appetites, affections, and habits, on Christian principles. (See PHYSIOLOGY; APPETITES; HEART; AFFECTIONS; HABIT; and SELF-DENIAL.)

SELFISHNESS; inordinate self-love. (See SELF-LOVE, and SELF-SEEKING.)—Hend. Buck.

SELF-KNOWLEDGE; the knowledge of one's own nature, character, abilities, duties, principles, prejudices, tempers, secret springs of action, thoughts, memory, taste, views in life, virtues and vices.

This knowledge is commanded in the Scriptures, (Ps. 4: 4. 2 Cor. 13: 5.) and is of the greatest utility, as it is the spring of self-possession, leads to humility, steadfastness, charity, moderation, self-denial, and promotes our usefulness in the world.

To obtain it, there should be watchfulness; frequent and close attention to the operations of our own minds; regard had to the opinions of others; conversation; reading the Scriptures; and dependence on divine grace. See the articles ANAM; MAN; PHYSIOLOGY; SELF-EXAMINATION; SELF-DECEPTION; DEPRIVITY. SELF-LOVE, is that instinctive principle which impels every animal, rational and irrational, to preserve its life and promote its own happiness.

"It is very generally confounded with selfishness; but the one is distinct from the other. Every man loves himself, but every man is not selfish. The selfish man grasps at all immediate advantages, regardless of the consequences which his conduct may have upon his neighbor.

Self-love only prompts him who is actuated by it to procure to himself the greatest possible sum of happiness during the whole of his existence. In this pursuit, the rational self-lover will often forego a present enjoyment to obtain a greater and more permanent one in reversion; and he will as often submit to a present pain to avoid a greater hereafter. Self-love, as distinguished from selfishness, always comprehends the whole of a man's existence; and, in that extended sense of the phrase, every man is a self-lover; for, with eternity in his view, it is surely not possible for the most disinterested of the human race not to prefer himself to all other men, if their future and everlasting interests could come into competition. This, indeed, they never can do; for though the introduction of evil into the world, and the different ranks which it makes necessary in society, put it in the power of a man to raise himself in the present state by the depression of his neighbor, or by the practise of injustice; yet, in the pursuit of the glorious prize which is set before us, there can be no rivalryship between the competitors. The success of one is no injury to another; and, therefore, in this sense of the phrase, self-love is not only lawful, but absolutely unavoidable."

Self-love, however, says Jortin, (ser. 13, vol. iv.) is vicious, 1. When it leads us to judge too favorably of our faults. 2. When we think too well of our righteousness, and overvalue our good actions, and are pure in our own eyes. 3. When we overvalue our abilities, and entertain too good an opinion of our knowledge and capacity. 4. When we are proud and vain of inferior things, and value ourselves upon the station and circumstances in which, not our own deserts, but some other cause, has placed us. 5. When we make our worldly interest, convenience, ease, or pleasure, the great end of our actions. (See LOVE OF OUR NEIGHBOR.)

Much has been said about the doctrine of disinterested love to God. It must be confessed that we ought to love him for his own superlative excellence; yet it is difficult to form an idea how we can love God unconnected with any interest to ourselves. A distinction should be made between disinterested and uninterested love. What, indeed, we ought to do, and what we really do, is very different. There is an everlasting obligation on men to love God for what he is, but, at the same time, our love to him is our interest; nor can we love God without including a sense of his relative goodness. (See LOVE to GOD.) Dwight's Theology; Scott's Works; Fuller's Works.—Hend. Buck.

SELF-SEEKING; the aiming at our own interest, only, or supremely, in every thing we do. It must be distinguished from that regard which we ought to pay to the preservation of our health, the cultivation of our minds, the lawful concerns of business, and the salvation of our souls. It is called in Scripture conscientiousness.

Self-seeking, which is only another name for selfishness, evidences itself by parsimoniousness, oppression, neglect, and contempt of others, rebellion, sedition, egotism, immoderate attempts to gain fame, power, pleasure, money; and frequently by gross acts of lying and injustice.

Its evils are numerous. It is directly opposed to Christian love, or charity, which "seeketh not her own," 1 Cor. 13: 5. It is highly dishonorable and debasing; transforming a man into any thing, or every thing, for his own interest. It is sinful, and the source of innumerable sins; as perjury, hypocrisy, falsehood, idolatry, persecution, and murder itself. It is dangerous. It excites contempt, is the source of tyranny, discord, war, and makes a man a slave, and exposes him to the just-indignation of God.

The remedies to prevent or suppress this evil are these: Consider that it is absolutely prohibited; (Jer. 45: 5. Luke 6: 23. Heb. 13: 5. Col. 3: 5.) a mark of a wicked, degenerate mind; that the most awful curses are pronounced against it; (Isa. 5: 18. Hab. 6: 9, 12. Isa. 15: 1, 2. Amos 6: 1. Mic. 7: 1, 2.) that it is contrary to the example of all wise and good men; that the most awful examples of the punishment of this sin are recorded in Scripture; as Pharaoh, Achan, Haman, Gehazi, Absalom, Ananias and Sapphira, Judas, and many others.—Hend. Buck.

SELLING. To sell freemen for slaves, was a crime which the law punished with death, Exod. 21: 16. Etem. 24: 7. The Hebrews, in case of necessity, might sell their own liberty; and fathers might sell that of their children, Lev. 25: 39. Exod. 21: 7. They sold also insolvent debtors, and their children, Matt. 18: 25. 2 Kings 4: 1. Esau sold his birthright; and for this, it appears, Paul calls him profane, Heb. 12: 16. "Thou hast sold thyself to work evil in the sight of the Lord," said the prophet Elijah to Ahab; (1 Kings 21: 20, 25.) and the wicked Israelites mentioned in 1 Mac. 1: 15, sold themselves as slaves to sin, being subject to their evil inclinations, as slaves are to their masters.

These expressions were familiar to the Hebrews; and hence Paul, speaking of himself, or rather of mankind in his own person, says, (Rom. 7: 14.) "I am carnal, sold under sin; the slave of concupiscence and of sin by nature, but set at liberty by the grace of Jesus Christ." The difference is, that Ahab sold himself; that is, freely, voluntarily; whereas Paul was sold; that is, against his will; by force, by constraint of circumstances, not of choice.—Calmet.

SEMBIANI; so called from Sembianus, their leader, who condemned all use of wine as evil of itself. He persuaded his followers that wine was a production of Satan and the earth, denied the resurrection of the body, and rejected most of the books of the Old Testament. (See Gnostics.)—Hend. Buck.

SEMI-ARIANS were thus denominated, because, in profession, they condemned the errors of the Arians, but in reality maintained their principles, only palliating and concealing them under softer and more moderate terms. They would not allow, with the orthodox, that the Son was omniscious, of the same substance, but only omnoiscious, of a like substance with the Father; and thus, though in expression they differed from the orthodox in a single letter only, yet in effect they denied the divinity of Jesus Christ.

The Semi-Arianism of the moderns consists in their maintaining that the Son was, from all eternity, begotten by the will of the Father; contrary to the doctrine of those who teach that the eternal generation is necessary. Such, at least, are the respective opinions of Dr. Clarke and bishop Bull.—Hend. Buck.

SEMI-PELAGIANS; a name anciently, and even at this day, given to such as retain some tincture of Pelagianism.

Cassian, who had been a deacon of Constantinople, and was afterwards a priest at Marselles, was the chief of these Semi-Pelagians, whose leading principles were, 1. That God did not dispense his grace to one more than another, in consequence of predestination, i. e. an eternal and absolute decree, but was willing to save all men, if they complied with the terms of his gospel. 2. That Christ died for all men. 3. That the grace purchased by Christ, and necessary to salvation, was offered to all men. 4. That man, before he received grace, was capable of faith and holy desires. 5. That man was born free, and was, consequently, capable of resisting the influences of grace, or of complying with its suggestion. The Semi-Pelagians were very numerous; and the doctrine of Cassian, though variously explained, was received in the greatest part of the monastic schools in Gaul, from whence it spread itself far and wide through the European provinces. As to the Greeks, and other Eastern Christians, they had embraced the Semi-Pelagian doctrines before Cassian. In the sixth century the controversy between the Semi-Pelagians and the disciples of Augustine prevailed much and continued to divide the western churches.—Hend. Buck.

SEMPLE, (ROBERT BAYLOR, D. D.), a distinguished Baptist minister of Virginia, was born in 1769. He commenced his ministerial career at twenty years of age, and for upwards of forty years was one of the most useful and beloved ministers of his time. On the death of Dr. Staughton he was chosen president of the Baptist Triennial Convention of the United States, and president of the board of trustees of the Columbian college. He wrote the History of the Virginia Baptists. He died December 25, 1831, aged sixty-two, finishing his course with joy. The evening before his death he exclaimed, "Forty-two years this evening, I preached my first sermon. I have fought a good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day," 2 Tim. 4: 7, 8.—Chris. Index.

SENECA, (LUCIUS ANNEUS,) a celebrated Roman philosopher, statesman, and moralist, the son of Marcus Anneus, an eminent orator, was born at Corduba, in Spain, about B. C. 2. His education, which he received at Rome, was of the most liberal kind. The stoical philosophy was that which he adopted. Messalina having accused him of adultery with Julia, the daughter of Germanicus, he was banished to Corsica, where he remained eight years. Agrippina recalled him, and intrusted to him the tuition of Nero. After his accession to the throne, his imperial pupil for a while loaded him with favors; but at length resolved to rid himself of him. Seneca was charged with being concerned in the conspiracy of Piso, and the emperor sent him an order to terminate his existence, which he obeyed by opening his veins, A. D. 65. He was a man of genius, but by no means a praiseworthy character. Several of his works have been translated into English, by Lodge, L'Estrange, and Morell, and have much influence on the illustration of morals.—Davenport.

SENNACHERIB, king of Assyria, son and successor of Salmanneser, began to reign A. M. 3290, and reigned but four years, 3294. (See ASSYRIA.)

Most commentators are of opinion, that the army of Sennacherib was destroyed before Jerusalem, by the instrumentality of a pestilential wind, 2 Kings 19. Isa. 10. 38: 7.

Mr. Bruce's account of this wonderful natural phenomenon, affords some very interesting particulars:—

"On the 16th, at half-past ten, we left El Mout. At eleven o'clock, while we contemplated with great pleasure the rugged top of Chiggré, to which we were fast approaching, and where we were to solace ourselves with plenty of good water, Idris cried out, 'Fall upon your faces, for here is the simoon.' I saw from the south-east a haze come, in color like the purple part of the rainbow, but not so compressed or thick. It did not occupy twenty yards in breadth, and was about twelve feet high from the ground. It was a kind of bluish upon the air, and it moved very rapidly, for I scarce could turn to fall upon the ground, with my head to the northward, when I felt the heat of its current plainly upon my face. We all lay flat on the ground, as if dead, till Idris told us it was blown over."

The following extract is from D'Ossonville's "Essays, &c. on the East:" "I have twice had an opportunity of considering the effect of these siphons (simoons) with some attention. I shall relate simply what I have seen in the case of a merchant and two travellers, who were struck during their sleep, and died on the spot. I ran to see if it was possible to afford them any succor, but they were already dead; the victims of an interior suffocating fire. There were apparent signs of the dissolution of their fluids; a kind of serous matter issued from the nostrils, mouth, and ears; and in something more than an hour, the whole body was in the same state. However, as, according to their custom, they [the Arabs] were diligent to pay them the last duties of humanity, I cannot affirm that the putrefaction was more or less rapid than usual in that country. As to the meteor itself, it may be examined with impunity at the distance of three or four fathoms, and the country people are only afraid of being surprised by it when they are asleep; neither are such accidents very common, for these siphons are only seen during two or three months of the year; and as their approach is felt, the camp guards and the people awake are always very careful to rouse those that sleep, who also have a general habit of covering their faces with their mantles." The army of Sennacherib was destroyed by night. No doubt the unwarrantable pride of the king had extended also to his army, (witness the arrogance of Rabshakeh,) so that, being in full security, the officers and soldiers were negligent; their discipline was relaxed; the "camp guards" were not alert, or, perhaps, they themselves were the first taken off; and those who slept not wrapped up, imbibed the poison plentifully. Lord Byron has immortalized this scene in one of his Hebrew Melodies, beginning

"The Assyrian came down like a wolf on the fold,
And his cohorts were gleaming in purple and gold;" &c.
Calmet.

SENSATION, properly signifies that internal act by which we are made conscious of pleasure or pain felt at the organ of sense. As to sensations and feelings, says Dr. Reid, some belong to the animal part of our nature, and are common to us with the brutes; others belong to the rational and moral part. The first are more properly called sensations; the last, feelings or emotions. The French word sensiment is still better to express the latter, and is getting into general use.

The design of the Almighty in giving us both the painful and agreeable feelings is, for the most part, obvious, and well deserving our notice. 1. The painful sensations are admonitions to avoid what would hurt us; and the agreeable sensations to invite us to those actions that are necessary to the preservation of the individual, or the kind. 2. By the same means, nature invites us to moderate bodily exercise, and admonishes us to avoid idleness and inactivity on the one hand, and excessive labor on the other. 3. The moderate exercise of all our rational powers gives pleasure. 4. Every species of beauty is beheld with pleasure, and every species of deformity with disgust. 5. The benevolent affections are all accompanied with an agreeable feeling; the malevolent on the contrary. And, 6. The highest, the noblest, and the most durable pleasure, is that of doing well; and the most bitter and painful sentiment, the anguish and remorse of a guilty conscience. See Théorie des Sentiments Agréables; Reid on the Intellectual Powers, p. 332; Kames' Elements of Criticism, vol. ii. p. 501; Oliver's Hints; Brown's Philosophy; Upham's do.—Hend. Buck.

SENSE, a faculty of the soul, whereby it perceives external objects by means of impressions made on the organs of the body.

Moral sense is said to be an apprehension of that beauty or deformity which arises in the mind by a kind of natural instinct, previously to any reasoning upon the remoter consequences of actions. Whether this really exists or not, is disputed. On the affirmative side it is said, that, 1. We approve or disapprove certain actions without deliberation. 2. This approbation or disapprobation is uniform and universal. But against this opinion it is answered, that, 1. This uniformity of sentiment does not pervade all nations. 2. Approbation of particular conduct arises from a sense of its advantages. The idea continues when the motive no longer exists; receives strength from authority, imitation, &c. The efficacy of imitation is most observable in children. 3. There are no maxims universally true, but bend to circumstances. 4. There can be no idea without an object, and instinct is inseparable from the idea of the object. See MORAL OBLIGATION; Paley's Moral Philosophy; Hutcheson on the Passions, p. 245, &c.; Mason's Sermons, vol. i. p. 253.—Hend. Buck.

SENSE OF SCRIPTURE. In interpreting the Bible the Catholics hold to a fourfold sense. The first is, the sensus grammaticus, or litera; the second, or sensus mysticus, they subdivide into three; viz. tropologicus, or moralis; allegoricus, and anagogicus. This theory of hermeneutics was expressed in the following distich:—

*Litera gesta docet; quid credas allegoria;
Moralis quid agas; quid speres anagogia.*

The reformers, on the other hand, and most of the older divines, held only one sense, namely, the grammatical. So strong were the feelings of Luther upon the subject, that he did not scruple to affirm that the grammatical sense of Scripture is the only sense on which we can rest at the hour of death; or, to use his own words, "the only sense that it will do to die by." Latterly, this has received the name of historico-grammatical. Robinson's Bib. Repos. 1831.—Hend. Buck.

SENTENCES, BOOK OF. (See LOMBARD.)

SEPARATES. This appellation was given, about the year 1740, to a number of people, whose zeal was produced by the instrumentality of the celebrated George Whitfield, and other itinerant preachers. Soon after these reformers, who were at first called "New Lights," and afterwards "Separates," were organized into distinct societies, they were joined by Shubal Stearns, a native of Boston, who, becoming a preacher, labored among them until 1751, when he embraced the sentiments of the Baptists, as many others of the Pedobaptist Separates did about this time.—Williams; Benedict's His. Bap.

SEPHAR; Gen. 10. 30. (See SEPHARVAIM.)

SEPHARVAIM; a country of Assyria, 2 Kings 17: 24, 31. This province cannot now be exactly delineated in respect to its situation. The Scripture speaks of the king of the city of Sepharvaim, which probably was the capital of the people of this name, 2 Kings 19: 13. Isa. 37: 13.—Watson.

SEPTUAGESIMA; the third Sunday before the first Sunday in Lent; so called because it was about seventy days before Easter.—Hend. Buck.

SEPTUAGINT; the name given to the most ancient Greek version of the books of the Old Testament, from its being supposed to be the work of seventy-two Jews, who are usually called the seventy interpreters, because seventy is a round number.

Aristobolus, who was tutor to Ptolemy Physcon; Philo, who lived in our Savior's time, and was contemporary with the apostles; and Josephus, speak of this translation as made by seventy-two interpreters, by the care of Demetrius Phalereus, in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus. All the Christian writers during the first fifteen centuries of the Christian era, have admitted this account of the Septuagint as an undoubted fact; but, since the Reformation, critics have boldly called it in question. But whatever differences of opinion there have been as to the mode of translation, it is universally acknowledged that such a version, whole or in part, existed; and it is pretty evident that most of the books must have been translated before our Savior's time, as they are quoted by him. It must also be considered as a wonderful providence in favor of the religion of Jesus. It prepared the way for his coming, and afterwards greatly promoted the setting up of his kingdom in the world; for hitherto the Scriptures had remained locked up from all other nations but the Jews, in the Hebrew tongue, which was understood by no other nation; but now it was translated into the Greek language, which was a language commonly understood by the nations of the world. It has also been with great propriety observed, "that there are many words and forms of speech in the New Testament, the true import of which cannot be known but by their use in the Septuagint. This version also preserves many important words, some sentences, and several whole verses, which originally made a part of the Hebrew text, but have long ago entirely disappeared. This is the version, and this only, which is constantly used and quoted in the gospels and by the apostles, and which has thereby received the highest sanction which any writings can possibly receive."

The principal editions of this important version are the following:—The Complutensian, 1517. This was the Polyglot, and from the text of it editions were afterwards published in the Antwerp Polyglot, 1572; in the Triglot of Commeline, at Middleburg, in 1586; by Wolter in 1596, at Hamburg; by Hutter, at Nuremberg, in 1599; and in the Paris Polyglot, 1645.—The Aldine or Venetian, 1518. This edition was from the celebrated press of Aldus, and in regard to its publication was prior to the Complutensian; the text is also much more correct. From this text other editions were printed; at Strasburg, by Cephalæus, in 1526; Basle, 1545, 1550, and 1582; and Frankfurt, 1597.—The Roman or Vatican, 1587. Published from the celebrated Vatican MS. by order of Sixtus V. It has received the commendations of all learned men, from Morinus to Masch. Editions of it were printed in 1628, at Paris; at London, in 1653, and in the Polyglot, 1657, Cambridge, 1665; Amsterdam, 1683; Leipsic, 1697; Franeker, 1709, by Bos; Amsterdam, 1725, by Mill, Leipsic, 1730, and 1757; Halle, 1759; Oxford, 1805, and 1817.—The Alexandrine. First published from the MS. of that name in the British museum, by Grabe and Lee 1707—1720, four vols. fol. and eight vols. octavo. It was republished by Bretinger in four vols. quarto, at Zurich, in 1730—1733. This is the best edition of the Septuagint.—Holmes'. This splendid edition is not yet completed. The book of Genesis was published in 1798, and the Pentateuch was completed in 1804. Dr. Holmes died in 1805, after having published the book of Daniel. Since then, the work has been committed to the Rev. J. Parsons, who has finished the second volume, and is now in progress with the last. About seven thousand pounds were subscribed to assist in procuring the collation of MSS. in every part of Europe; and fourteen years were spent in this preparatory process. To the Pentateuch is prefixed a valuable preface, giving a full account of the nature of the undertaking. When finished, it will be the most perfect work of its kind, and leave nothing to be desired but the formation of a critical text from the treasure of its collected readings. An extended account of this edition is given in volume the second of the first series of the Eclectic Review.

If the reader wish to examine into the history and importance of this version, in addition to the works of Walsh and Le Long, which treat of the editions, he may consult Walton's Prolegomena, cap. ix.; Holy's Dissertation in Historiam Aristee de LXX. Interpretibus; Prideaux's Connexion, part II. b. i.; and Bauer, Tract. The book, says Michaelis, most necessary to be read and understood by every man who studies the New Testament, is, without doubt, the Septuagint, which alone has been of more service than all the passages from the profane authors collected together. It should be read in the public schools by those who are destined for the church, should form the subject of a course of lectures at the university, and be the constant companion of an expositor of the New Testament.

SEPTUAGINT CHRONOLOGY; the chronology which is formed from the dates and periods of time mentioned in the Septuagint translation of the Old Testament. It reckons fifteen hundred years more from the creation to Abraham than the Hebrew Bible. Dr. Kennicott, in the dissertation prefixed to his Hebrew Bible, has attempted to show that it is very probable that the chronology of the Hebrew Scriptures, since the period just mentioned, was corrupted by the Jews between the years 175 and 200; and that the chronology of the Septuagint is more agreeable to truth. It is a fact, that, during the second and third centuries, the Hebrew Scriptures were almost entirely in the hands of the Jews, while the Septuagint was confined to the Christians; and they had, therefore, a very favorable opportunity for this corruption; but no proof can be brought home to them; and the religious, or rather superstitious veneration in which they have ever held their Scriptures, and which is clearly discoverable in the integrity of the rest of these writings, renders it in the highest degree improbable that they corrupted the chronology. (See CHRONOLOGY.)—Hend. Buck.

SEPULCHRES. The descriptions of the Eastern sepulchres by travellers serve to explain several passages of Scripture.

Dr. Clarke discovered, and has fully described, a number of sepulchres, which extend along the side of the ravine to the south-west and west of mount Zion. He describes them as a series of subterranean chambers, hewn with considerable art, each containing one or many repositories for the dead, like cisterns carved in the rock, upon the sides of the chambers. The doors are so low, that to look into any one of them, it is necessary to stoop, and in some instances to creep on the hands and knees. (See Luke 24: 12.)

Shaw says, "If we except a few persons who are buried within the precincts of some sanctuary, the rest are carried out at a small distance from their cities and villages, where a great extent of ground is allotted for that purpose. Each family has a particular portion of it, walled in like a garden, where the bones of their ancestors have remained undisturbed for many generations: for in these inclosures the graves are all distinct and separate, having each of them a stone placed upright, both at the head and feet, inscribed with the name of the person who lieth there interred, whilst the intermediate space is either planted with flowers, bordered round with stone, or paved all over with tiles. The graves of the principal citizens are further distinguished by some square chambers or cupolas that are built over them, Mark 5: 3. Now, as all these different sorts of tombs and sepulchres, with the very walls likewise of the inclosures, are constantly kept clean, whitewashed every year, and beautified, they continue to this day to be an excellent comment upon that expression of our Savior, where he mentions the garnishing of the sepulchres; (Matt. 23: 29.) and again, (verse 27.) where he compares the scribes, Pharisees, and hypocrites, to whitened sepulchres."

With respect to the demoniacs who are said by St. Matthew to come out of the tombs, Light observes, "I trod the ground celebrated for the miracle of the unclean spirit, driven by our Savior amongst the swine. The tombs still exist in the form of caverns, on the sides of the hills that rise from the shore of the lake; and from their wild appearance may well be considered the habitation of men exceeding fierce, possessed by a devil; they extend at a distance for more than a mile from the present town."

In the account we have of the resurrection of Lazarus, when Mary went suddenly out to meet Jesus, the Jews supposed that she was gone to the grave, "to weep there." The following extract from Buckingham illustrates this: "Not far from the spot at which we halted to enjoy this enchanting view, was an extensive cemetery, at which we noticed the custom so prevalent among Eastern nations of visiting the tombs of their deceased friends. These were formed with great care, and finished with extraordinary neatness; and at the foot of each grave was inclosed a small earthen vessel, in which was planted a sprig of myrtle, regularly watered every day by the mourning friend who visited it. Throughout the whole of this extensive place of burial we did not observe a single grave to which this token of respect and sorrow was not attached; and, scattered among the tombs, in different quarters of the cemetery, we saw from twenty to thirty parties of females, sitting near the honored remains of some recently lost and deeply regretted relative or friend, and either watering their myrtle plants, or strewing flowers over the green turf that closed upon their heads." (See BURIAL.)—Watson; Calmet.

SERAPHIM; (burning ones;) an order of angels, which encircle the throne of the Lord. Those described by Isaiah (ch. 6: 2.) had each six wings; with two of which he covered his face, with two his feet, and with the two others flew. They cried to one another, and said, "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts! the whole earth is full of his glory." (See ANGELS.)—Calmet.

SERGEANT, (JOHN,) missionary among the Indians, was born at Newark, New Jersey, in 1710, and was graduated in 1729, at Yale college, where he was afterwards a tutor for four years. In October, 1734, he went to Houssatonnoe, an Indian village in the western part of Massachusetts, and began to preach to the Indians. That he might be enabled to administer to them the Christian ordinances, he was ordained at Deerfield, August 31, 1735. He died at Stockbridge, July 27, 1749, aged thirty-eight. He had baptized one hundred and twenty-nine Indians, and forty-two were communicants at the time of his death. With great labor he translated the whole of the New Testament, excepting the Revelation, into the Indian language, and several parts of the Old Testament. In his life he was just, kind, and benevolent. Hopkins' Memoirs of Houss. Indians; Panoplist, ii.—Allen.

SERGIUS, (PAULUS,) proconsul or governor of the isle of Cyprus, was converted by the ministry of Paul, A. D. 41, or 45, Acts 13: 7.—Calnet.

SERIOUSNESS, a term often used as synonymous with religion, denotes a calm, earnest concentration of the mind. (See GRAVITY.) Watts' Sermons, and Paley's two admirable discourses on Seriousness in Religion.—Hend. Buck.

SERMON; a discourse delivered in public for the purpose of religious instruction and improvement.

The preparation of sermons belongs to the department of homiletics. See Lectures on Homiletics, Preaching, &c. by the late Dr. Porter, of Andover; probably the best book that has yet appeared on the subject.

In order to make a good sermon, the following things must be attended to. The exordium, or introduction, should correspond with the subject on which we are about to treat. For this purpose the context often forms a source of appropriate remark. There are some subjects in which it is best to begin with some passage of Scripture apposite to the subject, or some striking observation. It has been debated, indeed, whether we should begin with any thing particularly calculated to gain the attention, or whether we should rise gradually in the strength of remark and aptness of sentiment. As to this, we may observe, that although it is acknowledged that a minister should flame most towards the end, perhaps it would be well to guard against a too low and feeble manner in the exordium. It has been frequently the practice to make apologies, by way of introduction. Though this may be admitted in some singular cases, as on the sudden death of a minister, or disappointment of the preacher, through unforeseen circumstances, yet it is often made use of where it is entirely unnecessary, and carries with it an air of affectation and pride. An apology for a man's self is often more a reflection than any thing else. If he be not qualified, why have the effrontery to engage? and if qualified, why tell the people an untruth?

Exordiums should be short; some give us an abridgment of their sermon in their introduction, which takes off the people's attention afterwards; others promise so much, that the expectation thereby raised is often disappointed. Both these should be avoided; and a simple, correct, modest, deliberate, easy gradation to the text attended to.

As to the plan. Sometimes a text may be discussed by exposition and inference; sometimes by raising a proposition, as the general sentiment of the text, from which several truths may be deduced and insisted on; sometimes by general observations; and sometimes by division. If we discuss by exposition, then we should examine, but not abtrude, the authenticity of the reading, the accuracy of the translation, and the scope of the writer. If a proposition be raised, care should be taken that it is founded on the meaning of the text. If observations be made, they should not be too numerous, foreign, nor upon every particle in the text. If by division, the heads should be distinct and few, yet have a just dependence on and connexion one with the other. It was common in the last two centuries to have such a multitude of heads, subdivisions, observations, and inferences, that hardly any one could remember them; it is the custom of the present day, among many, to run into the other extreme, and to have no division at all. This is equally as injurious. We should ever remember that we are speaking to the plainest capacities; and as the arranging our ideas properly is necessary to our being understood, so the giving each division of our discourse its denomination of number has a happy effect to assist the attention and memory of our hearers.

As to the amplification. After having laid a good foundation on which to build, the superstructure should be raised with care. "Let every text have its true meaning, every truth its due weight, every hearer his proper portion." The reasoning should be clear, deliberate, and strong. No flights of wit should be indulged; but a close attention to the subject, with every exertion to inform the judgment and impress the heart. It is in this part of a sermon that it will be seen whether a man understands his subject, enters into the spirit of it, or whether, after all his parade, he be a mere trifler. Some, after having given a pleasing exordium and ingenious plan, have been very deficient in the amplification of the subject; which shows that a man may be capable of making a good plan, and not a good sermon, which, of the two, perhaps, is worse than making a good sermon without a good plan. The best of men, however, cannot always enter into the subject with that ability which at certain times they exhibit. If in our attempts, therefore, to enlarge on particulars, we find our thoughts do not run freely on any point, we should not urge them too much—this will tire and jade the faculties too soon; but pursue our plan. Better thoughts may occur afterwards, which we may occasionally insert.

As to the application. There are also some doctrinal preachers who reject application altogether, and who affect to discharge their office by narrating and reasoning only; but such should remember that reasoning is persuasion; and that themselves, as often as any men, slide into personal application, especially in discussing certain favorite points in divinity. Application is certainly one of the most important parts of a sermon. Here both the judgment and the passions should be powerfully addressed. Here the minister must reason, expostulate, invite, warn, and exhort; and all without harshness and an insulting air. Here pity, love, faithfulness, concern, must be all displayed. The application, however, must not be too long, unanatural, nor concluded abruptly. We shall now subjoin a few remarks as to the style and delivery.

As to style: it should be simple, clear, and forcible. Singular terms, hard words, bombastic expressions, are not at all consistent. Quoting Latin and Greek sentences will be of little utility. Long argumentations, and dry metaphysical reasoning, should be avoided. A plain, manly style, so clear that it cannot be misunderstood, should be pursued. The Scriptures are the best model. Mr. Flavel says, "The devil is very busy with ministers in their studies, tempting them to lofty language, and terms of art, above their hearers' capacities."

As to the use of illustration. "A noble metaphor, when it is placed to an advantage, casts a kind of glory round it, and darts a lustre through a whole sentence." The Scriptures abound with illustrations. Our Lord and his disciples constantly used them; and people understand a subject better when represented by a striking figure, than by learned disquisitions.

As to the delivery of sermons, we refer to the articles DECLAMATION and ELOQUENCE. See also MINISTER, PASTOR, and PREACHING.—Hend. Buck.

SERPENT. In Egypt and other Oriental countries, a serpent was the common symbol of a powerful monarch; it was embroidered on the robes of princes, and blazoned on their diadem, to signify their absolute power and invincible might; and that, as the wound inflicted by them is incurable, so the fatal effects of their displeasure were neither to be avoided nor endured.

1. But the symbol of regal power which the Oriental kings preferred to all others, was the basilisk. This fact is attested by its Arabian name, melecha, from the Hebrew verb melech, "to reign;" from its Greek name, basiliskos, and its Latin name, regulus: all of which, it is asserted, referred to the conspicuous place it occupied among the regal ornaments of the East. The basilisk is of a reddish color, and its head is decorated with a crest in the form of a crown; it is not entirely prostrate, like other serpents, but moves along with its head and half the body erect; the other parts sweep the ground behind,

And wind its spacious back in rolling spires.

All the other species of serpents are said to acknowledge the superiority of the real or the fabled basilisk, by flying from its presence, and hiding themselves in the dust. It is also supposed to live longer than any other serpent; the ancient heathens therefore pronounced it immortal, and placed it in the number of their deities; and because it had the dangerous power, in general belief, of killing with its pestiferous breath the strongest animals, it seemed to them invested with the power of life and death. It became, therefore, the favorite symbol of kings.

2. The cerastes, or horned snake. The only allusion to this species of serpent in the sacred volume occurs in the valedictory predictions of Jacob, where he describes the character and actions of Dan and his posterity: "Dan shall be a serpent by the way, an adder, shephaphan, in the path, that biteh the horse's heels, so that his rider shall fall backward." Gen. 49: 17. (See ADDER.)

3. The seraph, or fiery flying serpent, to a biblical student, is one of the most interesting creatures that has yet been mentioned. It bears the name of an order among the hosts of heaven, whom Isaiah beheld in vision, placed above the throne of Jehovah in the temple; the brazen figure of this serpent is supposed to be a type of our blessed Redeemer, who was for our salvation lifted up upon the cross, as the serpent was elevated in the camp of Israel, for the preservation of that people, Num. 21: 5, 6. Isa. 14: 29. 30: 6. It is the only species of serpent which the almighty Creator has provided with a sort of wings, or parachute, by means of which, instead of creeping or leaping, it rises from the ground, and, leaning upon the extremity of its tail, moves with great velocity. It is a native of Egypt, and the deserts of Arabia; and receives its name from the Hebrew verb seraph, which signifies to burn, in allusion to the violent inflammation which its poison produces, or rather to its fiery color, blazing in the sublimities, which the brazen serpent was intended to represent. Ælian says, they come from the deserts of Libya and Arabia, to inhabit the streams of the Nile; and that they have the form of the hydrus, or water snake.

The existence of winged serpents in Europe also, is attested by many writers of modern times. A kind of snakes were discovered among the Pyrenees, from whose sides proceeded cartilages in the form of wings; and Scaliger mentions a peasant who killed a serpent of the same species which attacked him, and presented it to the king of France. Le Blanc, as quoted by Bochart, says, at the head of lake Chiamay are extensive woods and vast marshes, which it is very dangerous to approach, because they are infested with very large serpents, which, raised from the ground on wings resembling those of bats, and leaning on the extremity of their tails, move with great rapidity. They exist, it is reported, about these places in so great numbers, that they have almost laid waste the neighboring province.

But the original term noapheph, flying, used by Isaiah, does not always signify flying with wings; it often expresses vibration, swinging backwards and forwards; and this is precisely the motion of a serpent, when he springs from one tree to another. Niebuhr mentions a sort of serpent at Bassora, which they call hæie thiare. "They commonly keep upon the date-trees; and as it would be laborious for them to come down from a very high tree, in order to ascend another, they twist themselves by the tail to a branch of the former, which, making a spring by the motion they give it, throws them to the branches of the second. Hence it is that the modern Arabs call them flying serpents, hæie thiare. Admiral Anson also speaks of the flying serpents that he met with at the island of Quibo, but which were without wings." From this account, it is possible that the flying serpent mentioned in the prophet was of that species of serpents which, from their swift darting motion, the Greeks call acornithias, and the Romans, jaculus. Yet it is difficult to conceive of this sort of motion in a flat sterile desert; and it is a fact of some interest, therefore, that the plague of these serpents occurred when the Israelites were crossing the mountains eastward of Ezion-geber. See Robinson's Bib. Repas. vol. ii. p. 793.

The serpent has always been admired for its motion; possessing neither hands nor feet, nor other exterior members adapted for making progress, its action is nevertheless agile, speedy, and even rapid; it springs, leaps, and bounds, or climbs and glides, not merely with ease, but with alacrity. Solomon observes this, in Prov. 30: 19; and others have equally remarked it as exciting surprise and wonder. The serpent also sheds its skin yearly, and after this mutation seems, by the splendor of its colors, and the vivacity of its motions, to have acquired new life.

That the serpent tribe, from possessing the most active powers of destruction, has been considered as a source of evil, or as producing calamity, is well known. In India the destroying power, or death, is signified by the serpent. In classic antiquity, the giants who attempted to scale heaven are figured as half serpents; and in the northern mythology, Lok, the genus of evil, is styled "the father of the great serpent; the father of death; the adversary, the accuser; the deceiver of the gods," &c. (Northern Antiq. vol. ii. p. 190.) The coincidence of these titles with those of the Satan of Scripture is very striking. Scripture descriptions of the serpent are notoriously applicable to a producer of evil.—Watson; Calmet.

SERPENTINIANS, or OPHTHITES; heretics in the second century, so called from the veneration they had for the serpent that tempted Eve, and the worship paid to a real serpent: they pretended that the serpent was Jesus Christ, and that he taught men the knowledge of good and evil. They distinguished between Jesus and Christ. Jesus, they said, was born of the Virgin, but Christ came down from heaven to be united with him: Jesus was crucified, but Christ had left him to return to heaven. They distinguished the God of the Jews, whom they termed Jaldabaoth, from the supreme God: to the former they ascribed the body, to the latter the soul of men. It is said they had a live serpent, which they kept in a kind of cage: at certain times they opened the cage door, and called the serpent: the animal came out, and, mounting upon the table, twined itself about some loaves of bread. This bread they broke, and distributed it to the company; and this they called their eucharist.—Hend. Buck.

SERRE, (PETER), a Protestant martyr, was originally a priest, but reflecting on the errors of popery, at length embraced the reformed religion, and learned the trade of a shoemaker. Having a brother at Toulouse, who was a papist, he made a journey to that country in order to dissuade him from his superstition. His brother's wife, not approving his design, lodged a complaint against him. He was accordingly apprehended, and fully avowed his faith. He manifested such abhorrence in speaking of his former occupation, that his judge, exceedingly exasperated, sentenced him to be degraded, his tongue to be cut, and that he should afterwards be burnt, which took place about A. D. 1550.—Fox.

SERVANT. This word, in Scripture, generally signifies a slave; because, among the Hebrews, and the neighboring nations, the greater part of the servants were such, belonging absolutely to their masters, who had a right to dispose of their persons, goods, and, in some cases, even of their lives. (See SLAVE.)

Sometimes, however, the word merely denotes a man who voluntarily dedicates himself to the service of another. The servants of God are those who are devoted to his service, and obey his written word.

The business of servants is to wait upon, minister to, support and defend their masters; but there are three cases, as Dr. Stennett observes, wherein a servant may be justified in refusing obedience: 1. When the master's commands are contrary to the will of God. 2. When they are required to do what is not in their power. 3. When such service is demanded as falls not within the compass of the servant's agreement.

The obligations servants are under to universal obedience, are from these considerations: 1. That it is fit and right. 2. That it is the expressed command of God. 3. That it is for the interest both of body and soul. 4. That it is a credit to our holy religion. The manner in which this service is to be performed is, 1. With humility, Prov. 30: 21, 22. Ecl. 10: 7.—2. Fidelity, Titus 2: 10. Matt. 24: 45.—3. Diligence, Prov. 10: 4. 21: 5. 1 Thess. 4: 11.—4. Cheerfulness. Stennett's Domestic Duties, ser. 7; Fleetwood's Relative Duties, ser. 14, 15; Paley's Moral Philosophy, vol. i. chap. 11.—Calmet; Hend. Buck.

SERVETUS, (MICHAEL), a celebrated Anti-trinitarian, was born, in 1509, at Villanueva, in Aragon; was educated at Toulouse; and took his doctor's degree in medicine at Paris. He published several works against the doctrine of the Trinity, which excited against him the violent hatred of both Catholics and Protestants. From the persecutions of the former he was fortunate enough to escape; but he could not escape the intolerance of the latter. He was seized as he was passing through Geneva, and was condemned to the flames in 1553. Servetus appears to have approached to the discovery of the circulation of the blood.—Davenport.

SERVING TABLES; in Scotland, one of the parts of the Presbyterian sacramental service. The whole of the communicants not partaking at once, as in Congregational churches, it is found necessary to continue the distribution of the elements, with intervals of psalm-singing, during which those who have eaten quit the table, to give place to a fresh set of communicants. The distribution of the bread and wine, and the delivery of an address, are what constitutes serving the table. The number of tables varies from four to eight, and each address occupies ten minutes, or a quarter of an hour. The minister of the place serves the first table: the rest are served by his assisting brethren.—Hend. Buck.

SERVITES; a religious order in the church of Rome, founded, about the year 1233, by seven Florentine merchants, who, with the approbation of the bishop of Florence, renounced the world, and lived together in a religious community on mount Senar, two leagues from that city.—Hend. Buck.

SETH, son of Adam and Eve, was born A. M. 130, Gen. 5: 3, 6, 10, 11. He lived nine hundred and twelve years, and died A. M. 1042. Seth was the chief of "the children of God," as the Scripture calls them; (Gen. 6: 2.) that is, those who before the flood preserved true religion and piety in the world, whilst the descendants of Cain gave themselves up to wickedness. The invention of letters and writing is by the rabbins ascribed to this patriarch.—Watson.

SETHIANS; heretics who paid divine worship to Seth, whom they looked upon to be Jesus Christ, the Son of God, but who was made by a third divinity, and substituted in the room of the two families of Abel and Cain, which had been destroyed by the deluge. They appeared in Egypt in the second century; and, as they were addicted to all sorts of debauchery, they did not want followers. They continued in Egypt above two hundred years.—Hend. Buck.

SEVEN. The number seven is consecrated, in the holy books and in the religion of the Jews, by a great number of events and mysterious circumstances, so that it came to be regarded as the number of perfection. God created the world in the space of seven days, and consecrated the seventh day to repose. This rest of the seventh day, according to St. Paul, (Heb. 4: 4.) intimates eternal rest. And not only the seventh day is honored among the Jews, by the repose of the Sabbath, but every seventh year is also consecrated to the rest of the earth, by the name of a sabbatical year; as also the seven times seventh year, or forty-ninth year, is the year of jubilee.

In certain passages, the number seven is put for a great number. Isaiah (4: 1.) says, that seven women should lay hold on one man, to ask him to marry them. Hannah, the mother of Samuel, says, (1 Sam. 2: 5.) that she who was barren should have seven children. Jeremiah (15: 9.) makes use of the same expression. St. Peter asks our Savior, (Matt. 17: 21, 22.) How many times should he forgive his brother? till seven times? And Christ answers him, I say not only seven times, but seventy and seven times; meaning, as often as he may offend, however frequent it may be.—Watson.

SEVENTY. About the year B. C. 277, the Old Testament was translated into Greek, by the united labors of about seventy learned Jews, and that translation has been since known by the version of the LXX. (See SEPTUAGINT).—Hend. Buck.

SEVERITES. (See ANGELITES.)

SEWALL, (SAMUEL), chief justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts, was born at Bishop-Stoke, England, March 28, 1652: His father established himself in this country in 1661, when his son was nine years old. In his childhood judge Sewall was under the instruction of Mr. Parker, of Newbury. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1671, and afterwards preached for a short time. In 1688 he went to England. In 1692, he was appointed in the new charter one of the council, in which station he continued till 1725. He was made one of the judges in 1692, and chief justice of the superior court in 1718. He died January 1, 1730, aged seventy-seven. By his wife he received a large fortune, thirty thousand pounds, which he employed for the glory of God and the advantage of men. Eminent for piety, wisdom, and learning, in all the relations of life he exhibited the Christian virtues, and secured universal respect. For a long course of years he was a member of the Old South church, and one of its greatest ornaments.—Allen.

SEWALL, (JOSEPH, D. D.), son of the preceding, was born August 26, 1688, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1707. Though a member of one of the first families in the country, he sought no worldly object, it being his supreme desire to serve God in the gospel of his Son. He was ordained the minister of the Old South church in Boston, as colleague with Mr. Pemberton, September 10, 1713. After surviving three colleagues, Pemberton, Prince, and Cumming, he died, June 27, 1769, aged eighty, in the fifty-sixth year of his ministry. Few ministers have ever lived with such uniform reference to the great end of their office. Deeply interested himself in the truths of religion, he reached the hearts of his hearers; and sometimes his voice was so modulated by his feelings, and elevated with zeal, as irresistibly to seize the attention. While he acknowledged himself to be an unprofitable servant, he looked to the atoning sacrifice of Christ for pardon. He spoke of dying with cheerfulness. Sometimes he was heard to say with great pathos, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." He published many sermons. Chauncy's Psa. Serms.; Wisner's Hist., p. 98.—Allen.

SEXAGESIMA; the second Sunday before Lent; so called because about the sixtieth day before Easter.—Hend. Buck.

SHADDAI; (all-sufficient); one of the Hebrew names of God, which the Seventy and Jerome generally translate Almighty. Job more frequently uses it than any other of the sacred writers. It is sometimes joined with El, which is another name of God, El-Shaddai, God-Almighty, Gen. 17: 1.—Calmet.

SHADOW; the privation of light by an object interposed between a luminary and the surface on which the shadow appears. But it is credible that what we call spots in the sun are alluded to in 1 John 1: 5, under the term shadows, or darkness; such defects, says the apostle, may be in the sun; but there are none in God. A shadow, falling on a plane, follows the course of the body which causes it; hence it is often extremely swift, as that of a bird flying, which very rapidly, indeed instantly, appears, and disappears from observation. Human life is compared to this, 1 Cor. 29: 15.

In Heb. 10: 1, the word indicates the outline or adumbration of the grand truths of the gospel, afterwards to be revealed in full perfection.

Shadow is taken for the obscurity of night, for the total absence of light in a night of clouds; and hence "the shadow of death," intense darkness; to which add, the horror which naturally attends the tomb and the unexplored regions of death; the valley of the shadow of death; gloom and dismal terrors, terrors fatal and perpetual.

Shadow is also taken in a sense directly contrary to this, because in countries near the tropics, every spot exposed to the burning heat of the sun is dangerous to health; therefore nothing is more acceptable than shade, nothing more refreshing, or more salutary; hence the shadow of a great rock is desirable in a land of weariness; (Isa. 32: 2.) hence shadow signifies protection; (Isa. 30: 2. Dan. 4: 12. Hos. 4: 13.) hence the shadow of wings in a bird is protection also; and hence the shadow, that is, protection of God, Ps. 17: 8. 63: 7. 91: 1. Isa. 49: 2. Perhaps the word shade, however, might in these places be preferable to shadow, and would preserve a distinction.—Calmet.

SHADRACH; the Chaldean name given to Ananias, a companion of Daniel, at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. 1: 7. (See ABDENAGO).—Calmet.

SHAFTESBURY, (Earl of), a celebrated writer and sceptic, was born, in 1671, in London. His education was partly private, and partly received at Winchester. After having travelled, he became, in 1693, member of parliament for Pool, and, as a senator, he acted on enlightened and liberal principles. Subsequently, however, his delicate health deterred him from taking an active part in public affairs; and he devoted his leisure to literature. He died, in 1713, at Naples. His works, the style of which is polished with too laborious care, and the sentiments advanced with too little, were collected in three volumes, under the title of Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, and Times. His moral theories have been examined by such writers as Leland, Fuller, Magee, Robert Hall, Dwight, and Douglas. No one has exposed their unsoundness with more force than Dr. Dwight. See Dwight's Theology.—Davenport.

SHAKERS, or the Millennium Church. The first who acquired this denomination were Europeans; a part of which came from England to New York in 1774, and being joined by others, they settled at Niskayuna, above Albany; from whence they have spread their doctrines, and increased to a considerable number. (See LEE, ANN.)

Their religious tenets are as follow:—That there is a new dispensation taking place, in which the saints shall reign a thousand years with Christ, and attain to perfection; and that they have entered into this state; are the only church in the world; and have all the apostolic gifts. They assert that all external ordinances, especially baptism and the Lord's supper, ceased in the apostolic age; and that God had never sent one man to preach since that time, until they entered into this new dispensation, and were sent to call in the elect. They attempt to prove this doctrine of a new dispensation by counting the mystical numbers specified in the prophecies of Daniel, as well as by their signs and wonders. That God, through Jesus Christ in the church, is reconciled with man; and that Christ is come a light into human nature to enlighten every man who cometh into the world, without distinction. That no man is born of God, until, by faith, he is assimilated to the character of Jesus Christ in his church. That in obedience to that church a man's faith will increase, until he comes to be one with Christ, in the Millennium church state. That every man is a free agent to walk in the true light, and choose or reject the truth of God within him; and, of consequence, it is in every man's power to be obedient to the faith. That it is the gospel of the first resurrection which is now preached in their church. That all who are born of God, as they explain the new birth, shall never taste of the second death. That those who are said to have been regenerated among Christians, are only regenerated in part; therefore, not assimilated into the character of Christ in his church, while in the present state, and, of consequence, not tasting the happiness of the first resurrection, cannot escape, in part, the second death. That the word everlasting, when applied to the punishment of the wicked, refers only to a limited space of time, excepting in the case of those who fall from their church; but for such there is no forgiveness, neither in this world, nor that which is to come. They quote Matt. 12: 32, to prove this doctrine. That the second death, having power over such as rise not in the character of Christ in the first resurrection, will, in due time, fill up the measure of his sufferings beyond the grave. That the righteousness and sufferings of Christ, in his members, are both one; but that every man suffers personally, with inexpressible wo and misery, for sins not repented of, notwithstanding this union, until final redemption. That Christ will never make any public appearance, as a single person, but only in his saints: that the judgment day is now begun in their church; and the books are opened, the dead now rising and coming to judgment, and they are set to judge the world: for which they quote 1 Cor. 6: 2. That their church is come out of the order of natural generation, (that is, discards marriage,) to be as Christ was; and that those who have wives be as though they had none; that by these means, heaven begins upon earth, and they thereby lose their sensual and earthly relation to Adam the first, and come to be transparent in their ideas in the bright and heavenly visions of God. That there is no salvation out of obedience to the sovereignty of their domination: that all sin which is committed against God is done against them, and must be pardoned for Christ's sake through them, and confession must be made to them for that purpose. They hold to a travel and labor for the redemption of departed spirits.

The discipline of this denomination is founded on the supposed perfection of their leaders: the Mother, it is said, obeys God through Christ, European elders obey her, American laborers and the common people obey them, while confession is made of every secret in nature, from the oldest to the youngest. The people are made to believe they are seen through and through in the gospel glass of perfection by their teachers, who behold the state of the dead, and innumerable worlds of spirits good and bad.

These people are generally instructed to be very industrious, and to bring in according to their ability to keep up the meeting. They vary in their exercises; their heavy dancing, as it is called, is performed by a perpetual springing from the house floor, about four inches up and down, both in the men's and women's apartment, moving about with extraordinary transport, singing sometimes one at a time, sometimes more, making a perfect charm.

This elevation affects the nerves, so that they have intervals of shuddering as if they were in a strong fit of the ague. They sometimes clap hands, and leap so as to strike the joist above their heads. They throw off their outside garments in these exercises, and spend their strength very cheerfully this way. Their chief speaker often calls for their attention; then they all stop, and hear some harangue, and then fall to dancing again. They assert, that their dancing is the token of the great joy and happiness of the new Jerusalem state, and denotes the victory over sin. One of the postures which increase among them, is turning round very swift for an hour or two. This they say is to show the great power of God.

They sometimes fall on their knees and make a sound like the roaring of many waters, in groans and cries to God, as they say, for the wicked world who persecute them. In 1828, the number of societies was sixteen; the number of preachers about forty-five; members gathered into their societies, about four thousand five hundred; those not received, nine hundred; making in all about five thousand four hundred. See their book on the Second Coming of Christ; Rathburn's Account of the Shakers; Taylor's do.; West's do.—Hend. Buck.

SHAKSPEARE, (WILLIAM,) the glory of the British drama, was born April 23, 1564, at Stratford upon Avon, and was the son of a dealer in wool. All the learning which he possessed he acquired at the free-school of his native place. On his first reaching London he is said to have been employed as prompter's call boy at the theatre. Other accounts represent him as holding horses for gentlemen at the door of the playhouse. He was next an actor, but does not appear to have risen high in the profession. His earliest dramatic attempt, the First Part of Henry VI., is supposed to have been made in 1589. He was patronized by the earl of Southampton; enjoyed the friendship of his most eminent literary contemporaries; and was favored by Elizabeth and James I. Having become proprietor and manager of the Globe theatre, he realized a handsome fortune, with which he retired to Stratford, where he purchased an estate, and resided for several years. He died in 1616, on his birthday. His works have had great influence on literature and morals, both for good and evil.—Davenport.

SHAKTUS; a principal Hindoo sect, the worshippers of Bhuguvatee, or the goddess Doorga. They are chiefly Brahmins; but have their peculiar rites, marks on their bodies, formulas, priests, and festivals. They reject animal food; but in offering spirituous liquors to their goddess, often take a drop too much themselves, and become intoxicated. None of them become mendicants. Warā's His. Hindoos, vol. ii. pp. 204-5.—Williams.

SHALMANESER. (See ASSYRIA.)

SHAME; a painful sensation, occasioned by the quick apprehension that reputation and character are in danger, or by the perception that they are lost. It may arise, says Dr. Cogan, from the immediate detection, or the fear of detection, in something ignominious. It may also arise from native diffidence in young and ingenuous minds, when surprised into situations where they attract the peculiar attention of their superiors. The glow of shame indicates, in the first instance, that the mind is not totally abandoned; in the last, it manifests a nice sense of honor and delicate feelings, united with inexperience and ignorance of the world. (See MODESTY.) Watts, and Cogan on the Passions; Ely's Ten Sermons on Faith; Saturday Evening.—Hend. Buck.

SHARON, PLAIN OF; a beautiful and spacious plain extending from Cæsarea to Joppa on the sea-coast, and eastward to the mountains of Judæa; and is celebrated for its wines, its flowers, and its pastures. It still preserves some portion of its natural beauty, and is adorned in the spring with the white and red rose, the narcissus, the white and orange lily, the carnation, and other flowers; but for the rest of the year it appears little better than a desert, with here and there a ruined village, and some clumps of olive-trees and sycamores. This name was almost become a proverb, to express a place of extraordinary beauty and fruitfulness, Isa. 33: 9. 35: 2.

But there are three cantons of Palestine known by the name of Sharon. The first, according to Eusebius and Jerome, is a canton between mount Tabor and the sea of Tiberias. The second, a canton between the city of Cæsarea and Joppa. And the third, a canton beyond Jordan, in the country of Basan, and in the division of the tribe of Gad. Modern travellers give this name also to the plain that lies between Ecdippe and Ptolemais.—Watson.

SHARP, (GRANVILLE), a Christian philanthropist and writer, was born in 1731, at Durham, and was brought up to trade, but soon abandoned it. A place in the ordnance office he resigned, because he disapproved of the American war. The rest of his long life was spent in exertions of active benevolence. He, with infinite difficulty and expense, established the right of Africans to freedom in England; instituted the Society for the Abolition of the Slave-Trade; promoted the distribution of the Bible; and exerted himself in the cause of parliamentary reform. He died July 6, 1813. Among his works are various pamphlets on Slavery; Tracts on the Hebrew Language; and Remarks on the Definitive Article in the Greek Testament.—Davenport.

SHASTER; the name of a book in high estimation among the idolaters of Hindostan, containing all the dogmas of the religion of the Brahmans, and all the ceremonies of their worship.—Hend. Buck.

SHAVING. (See BEARD.)

SHAW, (THOMAS), a divine and traveller, was born about 1692, at Kendal, in Westmoreland; was educated at Queen's college, Oxford; became chaplain to the factory at Algiers; and died, in 1751, principal of St. Edmund's hall, Greek professor, and vicar of Bramley. He wrote Travels in Barbary and the Levant.—Davenport.

SHEAF. (See HARVEST, and WAVE OFFERING.)

SHEAR-JASHUB; (the remnant shall return); an allegorical name given by the prophet Isaiah to one of his sons.—Calmet.

SHEBA. (See SABÆANS.)

SHEBA, QUEEN OF, (1 Kings 10. 2 Chron. 9.) called queen of the south, (Matt. 12: 42. Luke 11: 31.) was, according to some, a queen of Arabia; but according to others, a queen of Ethiopia. Josephus says, that Sheba was the ancient name of the city of Meroë, and that the queen, of whom we are speaking, came thence; which opinion has much prevailed. The Ethiopians still claim this princess as their sovereign, and say that her posterity reigned there for a long time. The eunuch of queen Candace, who was converted and baptized by Philip, (Acts 8: 27.) was an officer belonging to a princess of the same country.

Mr. Bruce has given the history of the queen of Sheba, and her descendants, from the Abyssinian historians; but he thinks the eunuch of Candace (Chandace) was an officer of the queen Hendaqui, whose territories lie beyond the great desert, south of Syene, in Upper Egypt. It is probable, at least, that the Sheba of Solomon's visitor, and the Ethiopia of the Acts, are distinct places; and Sheba the furthest off; which adds to the force of our Lord's comparison, as probably this visitor travelled from the greatest distance of any that ever came to Jerusalem. But what, says Mr. Taylor, if the Ethiopians, that is, Abyssinians, at that time ruled in Arabia also? then she might come from Arabia, yet be queen of Ethiopia, which is only across the Red sea; and this seems to have been the fact.—Calmet.

SHEBÄT, or SHEBET; the fifth month of the civil year of the Hebrews; and the eleventh of the ecclesiastical year. They began in this month to number the years of the trees they planted, the fruits of which were esteemed impure till the fourth year. (See MONETA.)—Calmet.

SHECHEM. (See SECHUM, and SICHAR.)

SHEEP, scab, occurs frequently; and tsan, a general name for both sheep and goats, considered collectively in a flock; Arabic zain. The sheep is a well-known animal. The benefits which mankind owe to it are numerous. Its fleece, its skin, its flesh, its tallow, and even its horns and bowels, are articles of great utility to human life and happiness. Its mildness and inoffensiveness of temper strongly recommend it to human affection and regard; and have designated it the pattern and emblem of meekness, innocence, patience, and submission. It is a social animal. The flock follow the ram as their leader; who frequently displays the most impetuous courage in their defence: dogs, and even men, when attempting to molest them, have often suffered from his sagacious and generous valor.

In a domesticated state, the sheep is a weak and defenceless animal, and is, therefore, altogether dependent upon its keeper for protection as well as support. To this trait in their character, there are several beautiful allusions in the sacred writings. Thus, Micah describes the destitute condition of the Jews as a flock "scattered upon the hills, as sheep that have not a shepherd;" (1 Kings 22: 17; see also Matt. 9: 36.) and Zechariah prophesied, that when the good shepherd should be smitten and removed from his flock, the sheep should be scattered, Zeck. 13: 7. To the disposition of these animals to wander from the fold, and thus abandon themselves to danger and destruction, there are also several allusions made by the inspired writers. David confesses that he had imitated their foolish conduct: "I have gone astray like a lost sheep;" and, conscious that, like them, he was only disposed to wander still further from the fold, he adds, "seek thy servant." Psal. 119: 176. Nor was this disposition to abandon the paternal care of God peculiar to David, for the prophet adopts similar language to depict the dangerous and awful condition of the entire species: "All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way," Isa. 53: 6. It was to seek these "lost sheep," scattered abroad, and having no shepherd, that the blessed Redeemer came into the world. He is "the good shepherd, who gave his life for the sheep;" (John 10: 11.) and his people, though formerly "as sheep going astray," have now "returned to the shepherd and bishop of their souls," 1 Pet. 2: 25. His care over them, and their security under his protection, are most beautifully and affectingly described in the chapter which we just now cited. (See SHEPHERD.)—Calmet; Watson.

SHEIKS; the name of preachers in the Mohammedan mosques.—Williams.

SHEKEL; (to weigh); a Hebrew weight and money, Exod. 30: 23, 24. 2 Sam. 14: 26 The word is used to denote the weight of any thing, as iron, hair, spices, &c. Among the different opinions concerning its weight and value, Calmet adheres to that of M. le Peltiier, who says it weighs half an ounce, or four Roman drachmæ; that is, nine pennyweights, three grains; and that the shekel of silver was worth two shillings three-pence farthing and a half. Moses and Ezekiel say it was worth twenty oboli, or twenty gerah, Num. 18: 16. Ezek. 45: 12. (See MOSEY.)

The shekel of gold was half the weight of the shekel of silver; and was worth eighteen shillings and three-pence, English.

"The shekel of the sanctuary," has been thought to have been double the common shekel; but this wants proof. Calmet thinks it was the same as the common shekel, the words "of the sanctuary" being added to express a just and exact weight, according to the standard kept in the temple or tabernacle.—Calmet.

SHEKINAH. The Shekinah was the most sensible symbol of the presence of God among the Hebrews. It rested over the propitiatory, or over the golden cherubim, which were attached to the propitiatory, the covering of the ark. Here it assumed the appearance of a cloud; and from hence God gave his oracles, as some think, when consulted by the high-priest on account of his people. Hence Scripture often says, God sits on the cherubim, or between the cherubim; that is, he gives the most evident tokens of his divine presence, by answering from hence the inquiries of Israel. The rabbins affirm, that the Shekinah first resided in the tabernacle prepared by Moses, in the wilderness, into which it descended on the day of its consecration, in the figure of a cloud. It passed from thence into the sanctuary of Solomon's temple, on the day of its dedication by this prince, where it continued till the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple by the Chaldeans, and was not afterwards seen there.

The presence of the Holy Spirit, by the appearance of the Shekinah, is frequently referred to in the New Testament. It appeared at the baptism and transfiguration of Jesus; and is called the excellent glory by Peter, 2 Epis. 2: 10. The idea of a radiance, or glory, a mild effulgence, seems to be always annexed to it.—Calmet.

SHELLEY, (PЕRCY BYSSHE,) an eminent poet, the son of Sir Timothy Shelley, was born in 1792, at Field Place, in Sussex; was educated at Eton, and at Oxford; and was drowned, in the Mediterranean, July 8, 1822. Shelley was a man of splendid talent, and a highly poetical mind; but, unfortunately for his reputation and happiness, had adopted the blighting principles of atheism. His Revolt of Islam; Prometheus Unbound; Cenci; and, indeed, the whole of his poems, bear the stamp of genius.—Davenport.

SHEM; the son of Noah, Gen. 6: 10. He was born A. M. 1558. It is the opinion of the generality of commentators, that Shem was younger than Japheth, and the second son of Noah, for reasons given under the article JAPHETH. See also Gen. 9: 23—25. He lived six hundred years, and died A. M. 2158. The posterity of Shem obtained their portion in the best parts of Asia.

The Jews ascribe to Shem the theological tradition of the things that Noah had learned from the first men. Shem communicated them to his children, and by this means the true religion was preserved in the world. Certain it is that from his race the Messiah descended. Some have thought Shem the same as Melchisedek. (See MELCHISEDEK.)—Watson.

SHEOL; the Hebrew word corresponding to HADES; which see.—Hend. Buck.

SHEPARD, (THOMAS,) minister of Cambridge, Massachusetts, was born near Northampton, England, November 5, 1605, and was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge. While in this seminary it pleased God in infinite mercy to awaken him from his natural state of thoughtlessness and sin, and to render him a humble disciple of Jesus Christ. After he left the university, he was eminently useful as a preacher. His Puritan principles exposing him to persecution, he narrowly escaped the pursuivants, and arrived at Boston, in this country, October 3, 1635. After the removal of Mr. Hooker and Mr. Stone to Connecticut, he formed a church at Cambridge, and took the charge of it, February 1, 1636. Here he continued till his death, August 25, 1649, aged forty-four.

As a preacher of evangelical truth, and as a writer on experimental religion, he was one of the most distinguished men of his time. It was on account of the energy of his preaching, and his vigilance in detecting and zeal in opposing the errors of the day, that, when the foundation of a college was to be laid, Cambridge rather than any other place was pitched upon as the seat of the seminary.

He usually wrote his sermons so early for the Sabbath that he could devote a part of Saturday to prepare his heart for the solemn and affectionate discharge of the duties of the following day. Among his works the most distinguished are, the Sincere Convert, the Sound Believer, and the Parable of the Ten Virgins.—Allen.

SHEPHERDS. The patriarchal shepherds, rich in flocks and herds, in silver and gold, and attended by a numerous train of servants purchased with their money, or hired from the neighboring towns and villages, acknowledged no civil superior; they held the rank, and exercised the rights, of sovereign princes; they concluded alliances with the kings in whose territories they tended their flocks; they made peace or war with the surrounding states; and, in fine, they wanted nothing of sovereign authority but the name. Unfettered by the cumbrous ceremonies of regal power, they led a plain and laborious life, in perfect freedom and overflowing abundance. Refusing to confine themselves to any particular spot, (for the pastures were not yet appropriated,) they lived in tents, and removed from one place to another in search of pasture for their cattle. Strangers in the countries where they sojourned, they refused to mingle with the permanent settlers, to occupy their towns, and to form with them one people. They were conscious of their strength, and jealous of their independence; and although patient and forbearing, their conduct proved, on several occasions, that they wanted neither skill nor courage to vindicate their rights and avenge their wrongs.

In the wealth, the power, and the splendor of patriarchal shepherds, we discover the rudiments of regal grandeur and authority; and in their numerous and hardy retainers, the germ of potent empires. Hence the custom so prevalent among the ancients, of distinguishing the office and duties of their kings and princes, by terms borrowed from the pastoral life:—Agamemnon, shepherd of the people, is a phrase frequently used in the strains of Homer. The royal Psalmist, on the other hand, celebrates, under the same allusions, the special care and goodness of God towards himself, and also towards his ancient people. "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want." "Give ear, O shepherd of Israel, thou that leadest Joseph like a flock; thou that dwellest between the cherubim, shine forth." In many other places of Scripture, the church is compared to a fold, the saints to a flock, and the ministers of religion to shepherds, who must render, at last, an account of their administration to the Shepherd and Overseer to whom they owe their authority.

The patriarchs did not commit their flocks and herds solely to the care of menial servants and strangers; they tended them in person, or placed them under the superintendance of their sons and their daughters, who were bred to the same laborious employment, and taught to perform, without reluctance, the meanest services. This primeval simplicity was long retained among the Greeks. This custom has descended to modern times; for in Syria the daughters of the Turcoman and Arabian shepherds, and in India the Brahmin women of distinction, are seen drawing water at the village wells, and tending their cattle to the lakes and rivers.

The flocks and herds of these shepherds were immensely numerous. So great was the stock of Abraham and Lot, that they were obliged to separate, because "the land was not able to bear them. From the present which Jacob made to his brother Esau, consisting of five hundred and eighty head of different sorts, we may form some idea of the countless numbers of great and small cattle which he had acquired in the service of Laban. In modern times, the numbers of cattle in the Turcoman flocks, which feed on the fertile plains of Syria, are almost incredible. They sometimes occupy three or four days in passing from one part of the country to another.

The care of such overgrown flocks, says Faxton, required many shepherds. These were of different kinds; the master of the family and his children, with a number of herdsmen who were hired to assist them, and felt but little interest in the preservation and increase of their charge. To these our Lord alludes, John 10: 12. In such extensive pastoral concerns, the vigilance and activity of the master were often insufficient for directing the opera-time of so many shepherds, who were not unfrequently scattered over a considerable extent of country. An upper servant was therefore appointed to superintend their labors, and take care that his master suffered no injury. In the house of Abraham, this honorable station was held by Eliezer, a native of Damascus, a servant in every respect worthy of so great and good a master. The office of chief shepherd is often mentioned in classic writers; and being in pastoral countries one of great trust, of high responsibility, and of distinguished honor, is with great propriety applied to our Lord by the apostle Peter: "And when the chief shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory which fadeth not away," 1 Pet. 5: 4. The same allusion occurs in these words of Paul: "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus Christ, that great shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will," Heb. 13: 20.—Watson.

SHERLOCK, (WILLIAM, D. D.) an English divine, was born about 1611, in Southwark; was educated at Eton, and at Peterhouse, Cambridge; obtained the mastership of the Temple, and other preferment; was suspended for refusing to take the oaths to William III., but subsequently complied, and was made dean of St. Paul's; and died in 1707. His Discourses on Death and Judgment are his only works which remain popular. The former has passed through more than forty editions.—Jones' Chris. Biog.; Davenport.

SHERLOCK, (THOMAS,) a prelate, son of the foregoing, was born in 1678, in London; and was educated at Eton, and at Catharine hall, Cambridge, of which last he became master. He also succeeded his father in the mastership of the Temple, and was, successively, dean of Chichester, and bishop of Bangor, Salisbury, and London. He died in 1761. Sherlock was an antagonist of Hoadley in the Bangorian controversy, and likewise undertook the refutation of Anthony Collins, in his Discourses on Prophecy, which have been much admired. He is the author of Sermons; of the Trial of the Witnesses; and of the Resurrection of Jesus. The last work has gone through fourteen editions.—Jones' Chris. Biog.; Davenport.

SHERMAN, (ROGER,) a signer of the declaration of American independence, was born at Newton, Massachusetts, in 1721, and, with only a common school education, rose to distinction as a lawyer and statesman. His early life was passed in the occupation of a shoemaker. Removing to Connecticut in 1743, he was admitted to the bar in 1754, and soon became distinguished as a counselor. In 1761, he removed to New Haven, four years after was appointed a judge of the county court, and in 1776, advanced to the bench of the superior court. He was a delegate to the celebrated congress of 1774, and was a member of that body for the space of nineteen years. He was a member of the convention that formed the constitution of the United States. He died in 1793. His talents were solid and useful; his judgment unflinching. Mr. Macon said of him, "Roger Sherman had more common sense than any man I ever knew." Mr. Jefferson characterized him as "a man who never said a foolish thing in his life." He was for many years a deacon of the church. Having made a public profession of religion at the age of twenty-one, he was never ashamed to advocate the peculiar doctrines of the gospel, which are often so unwelcome to men of worldly eminence. His sentiments were derived from the word of God. In the relations of private life he secured esteem and affection.—Goodrich; Allen; Davenport.

SHESHACH. (See BABYLON.)

SHEVI-KARE; a small sect in Sweden, said to have originated as follows:—

In 1734, a little society of Pietists, driven from Denmark and other countries, arrived here, seeking to find refuge from their persecutors in some northern islands. They embarked; but finding themselves exposed to inevitable dangers, they took shelter in the little isle of Wermudoe, near Stockholm. Their contempt for the established worship had drawn them into disagreeable circumstances; but, in 1746, they were permitted to fix themselves in this island, where their descendants still remain; and, having taken the domain of Skevic, are called Skevi-Kare. They are said to be whimsical and dogmatic; but this, of course, is the judgment of their enemies. Grégoire's Hist. tom. 1. pp. 209, 210.—Williams.

SHEW-BREAD. (See BREAD.)

SHIBBOLETH, "an ear of corn," was a word which the Gileadites used as the test of an Ephraimite. For the Ephraimites could not, from disuse, pronounce the Hebrew letter shin; therefore, they said Shibboleth instead of Shibboleth, Judges 12: 6. The Greeks, says Hartley, have not the sound sh in their language; hence they are liable to be detected, like the Ephraimites. I was struck with this circumstance, in learning Turkish from a Greek tutor; pasha, he pronounced pasa; shindi, he called sindi; dervish, dervis, &c. Shibboleth he would, of course, pronounce Sibboleth.—Watson.

SHIELD; a piece of defensive armor. (See ARMS, MILITARY.) God is often called the shield, or defence, of his people, Gen. 15: 1; Psal. 5: 12.—Calmet.

SHILOH; Gen. 49: 10. The Hebrew text is, "until Shiloh come." All Christian commentators agree, that this word ought to be understood of the Messiah, that is, of Jesus Christ. The LXX. read it, "Until the coming of him to whom it is reserved." However, this much is clear, that the ancient Jews are in this matter agreed with the Christians, in acknowledging that the word stands for Messiah, the king. It is thus that the paraphrasts Onkelos and Jonathan, and the ancient Hebrew commentaries upon Genesis, and the talmudists, explain it.

How strikingly the various versions given of these words are accomplished: viz. that the sceptre departed from Judah, (1.) at the birth, (2.) in the death, of Christ: as, (1.) Christ was Judah's son; (2.) he was He who should be sent; (3.) he was the peace-maker; (4.) he was the end, i. e. of David's line; (5.) he was He whose right it was; (6.) he unto whom belonged judgment; (7.) he was born in it, i. e. in Judah; (8.) he was the king, Messiah, &c. So that if we take any one version of those proposed by the learned, it centres in Christ; and, more than this, each is consistent with good sense and reason. (See GENAEOLOGY.)

But how did the sceptre depart from Judah when Shiloh came? First, it actually had departed in the transference of the public government to the Herod family, and by the intrusion of the Romans. This is usually held to be an adequate answer to the prophecy; but Mr. Taylor thinks there is a better:—Our Lord was the only branch of David's family entitled to rule, and he dying without issue, the ruling branch of David's family became extinct; so that, after his death, there was no longer any possibility of the continuance of the kingly office in the direct proper line of David. The person who should have held the sceptre was dead: the direct descent of the family expired with him; and, consequently, the sceptre was bonâ fide departed: since, (1.) it was actually swayed by a stranger and strangers, (Herod and the Romans,) and, (2.) no one who could possibly claim it, though he might have been of a collateral branch of David's house, could have been the direct legal claimant by birthright; for that person was crucified! Such is the language Providence put in the mouth of Pilate; "SHALL I CRUCIFY YOUR KING?" "Yes," say the Jews, "we reject the lineal descendant of David, and prefer Cæsar." Rome triumphs, David expires, in the person of his Son; and with him expires all direct claim of right to the sceptre: the sceptre is departed from David, and if from David, from Judah—JESUS OF NAZARETH, THE KING OF THE JEWS!"

2. SHILON; a celebrated city of the tribe of Ephraim twelve miles from Shechem, Josh. 18. 19, 21.—Watson; Calmet.

SHIMEI; son of Gera, a kinsman of Saul, who, when David was obliged to retire from Jerusalem, began to curse him, and to throw stones, 2 Sam. 16: 5. David forgave him; though his language to Solomon (1 Kings 2: 9.) has been falsely represented as inconsistent with it.

David's charge to Solomon refers to three persons of three different descriptions; (1.) to Joab, who is clearly consigned to punishment; (2.) to the sons of Barzillai, who are clearly recommended to favor; and, (3.) to Shimei, who, as a dangerous man, is neither sentenced to punishment, absolutely, nor to safety, absolutely; but is recommended to be treated according to his eventual demerits. See 1 Kings 3: 36—46.—Calmet.

SHINAR. (See BABYLON.)

SHIP. Vessels of all kinds are so styled in Scripture. In the four gospels we are to understand fishing vessels of a very moderate capacity.

SHISHIAK, king of Egypt, declared war against Rehobam in the fifth year of the reign of that prince, 2 Chron. 12: 2, 3, &c. This Shishak, according to Sir Isaac Newton, was Sesostris, the greatest conqueror, and the most celebrated hero, of all antiquity, being the son of Ammon, or the Egyptian Jupiter, and known to the Greeks by the name of Bacchus, Osiris, and Hercules; was the Belus of the Chaldeans, and the Mars or Mavors of the Thracians, &c. He made great conquests in India, Assyria, Media, Scythia, Phenicia, Syria, Judea, &c. His army was at last routed in Greece by Perseus; which, with other circumstances, compelled him to return home.—Watson.

SHITES; a Mohammedan sect that reject the traditions, and profess themselves to be the partizans or followers of Ali, to whom, and to his descendants, they maintain belongs the immanate or sovereign spiritual and temporal authority over the Mohammedans. This sect is dominant in Persia, as that of the Sunnites or Traditionists is in Turkey. It is divided into a number of minor sects, some of which hold the metempsychosis and other tenets of the Oriental philosophy.—Hend. Buck.

SHITTIM, SITTIM, SITTAH, Exod. 25: 5, 10, 13, 23, 28, 26: 26, 32, 37. 27: 1, 6. 39: 5, 35, 7, 24. 36: 20, 31, 36. 37: 1, 4, 10, 15, 25, 28. 38: 1, 6. Deut. 10: 3. Isa. 41: 19. What particular species of wood this is, interpreters are not agreed. The LXX. render it incorruptible wood. St. Jerome says the shittim wood grows in the deserts of Arabia, and is like white thorn, as to its color and leaves: but the tree is so large as to furnish very long planks. The wood is hard, tough, smooth, and extremely beautiful. It is thought that this wood is the black acacia, because that, it is said, is the most common tree growing in the deserts of Arabia; and agrees with what the Scriptures say of the shittim wood. The acacia vera grows abundantly in Egypt, in places far from the sea; in the mountains of Sinai, near the Red sea, and in the deserts. It is of the size of a large mulberry-tree. The spreading branches and larger limbs are armed with thorns, which grow three together; the bark is rough; the leaves are oblong, and stand opposite each other; the flowers, though sometimes white, are generally of a bright yellow; and the fruit, which resembles a bean, is contained in pods like those of the lupine. "The acacia tree," says Dr. Shaw, "being by much the largest and most common tree in these deserts, Arabia Petrea, we have some reason to conjecture, that the shittim wood was the wood of the acacia; especially as its flowers are of an excellent smell; for the shittah tree is, in Isa. 41: 19, joined with the myrtle and other fragrant shrubs."—Watson.

SHOES. (See SANDAL.)

SHOULDER. To give or lend the shoulder, for bearing a burden, signifies to submit to servitude, Gen. 49: 15. In a contrary sense, Scripture calls that a rebellious shoulder, (Neh. 9: 29) which will not submit to the yoke. See Zeph. 3: 9.—Calmet.

SHOUT; a great noise of alarm; (1 Thess. 4: 16.) or of joy and triumph; (Exod. 32: 18. Ps. 47.) or of lamentation and earnest prayer; (Lam. 3: 8.) of encouragement and excitement; (1 Sam. 17: 20.) of terror given to affright an enemy; (Jer. 1: 15. 51: 14.) or of applause, 1 Sam. 10: 24. Acts 12: 12.—Brown.

SHOWER, (JOHN,) an eminent divine, was born in Exeter, England, in 1657. Having pursued his preliminary studies with great success, he was encouraged to prepare for the ministry. He preached his first sermon in 1677, and the next year, when the kingdom was alarmed with the popish plot, was one of the dissenting ministers who joined with the appointed clergy of the established church in warning the nation against the Romish superstition. In 1685, on account of the warm persecution of dissenting ministers, he left England for Holland, where he continued till two years after the revolution, preaching the gospel at Rotterdam. He then returned to England. In 1669, he commenced preaching to a congregation in Carrier's hall, in London. His labors were attended with such success, that he was soon under the necessity of removing to a larger place, which was found in Jewin street, and thence to a still larger place in Old Jewry. In 1713, he was seized with a paralytic shock, from which he never fully recovered. His constitution had previously become reduced by a malignant fever. In the same year he died. In his disposition he was peculiarly affectionate, which spirit diffused itself through all his ministrations. He was very successful in his labors, and will doubtless shine as a star in the firmament forever and ever.

He published numerous sermons, and other pious writings.—Middleton's Evan. Biog. vol. iv. p. 214.

SHRINES; either small forms of the temple of Ephesus, with Diana's image in them, or medals with the figure of the temple impressed thereon, Acts 19: 24.—Brown.

SHUMATHITES, were the inhabitants of Shema, (Josh. 15: 26.) or sons of Shobal, 1 Chron. 2: 53.—Calmet.

SHUNEM; a city of Issachar, Josh. 19: 18. 1 Sam. 28: 4. Eusebius places it five miles south of Taboi.—Calmet.

SHUR; a city in Arabia Petrea, which gave name to the desert of Shur, Gen. 16: 7. Exod. 15: 22. 1 Sam. 15: 7. 27: 8.—Calmet.

SHUSHAN, or SUSA, on the bank of the river Ulai, and the capital of Susiana, or Shusistan, in Persia; and seems to have had its name from the abundance of lilies growing about it. It is said to have been built by Memnon a little before the Trojan war. It was the winter residence of the Persian kings from the time of Cyrus, as a high ridge of mountains sheltered it from the north-east wind; but the sun so scorched it in the summer that the inhabitants were obliged to cover their houses with earth to about the depth of a yard; and if a lizard or serpent crept out it was likely to be burnt to death. Here Daniel had his vision of the ram and he-goat, Dan. 8. Darius Hystaspes, or Ahasuerus, greatly adorned this place. From hence he issued his decree for finishing the rebuilding of the temple, in gratitude for which the Jews called the eastern gate of their temple the gate of Shushan, and had a resemblance of that city carved thereon. Here also he kept his splendid feast, Esth. 1: 6. When Alexander seized this city, he found in it fifty thousand talents of gold, besides jewels and golden and silver vessels to an immense value. For above eleven hundred years it has lain in ruins, and is called Valdak. Tavernier thinks that the present Shustera is built near to the site of Shushan.

Mr. Kinner says, "About seven or eight miles to the west of Dzeppoul, commence the ruins of Shus, stretching not less, perhaps, than twelve miles, from one extremity to the other. Large blocks of marble, covered with hieroglyphics, are not unfrequently here discovered by the Arabs when digging in search of hidden treasure; and at the foot of the most elevated of the pyramids stands the tomb of Daniel." Of this tomb Sir John Malcolm observes, that "it is a small building, but sufficient to shelter some dervishes who watch the remains of the prophet, and are supported by the alms of pious pilgrims who visit the holy sepulchre. These dervishes are now the only inhabitants of Susa; and every species of wild beast roams at large over that spot on which some of the proudest palaces ever raised by human art once stood." He also observes, respecting the authenticity of this tomb, that "although the building at the tomb of Daniel be comparatively modern, nothing could have led to its being built where it is, but a belief that this was the real site of the prophet's sepulchre."—Watson; Brown.

SHUT; to close up, bar, Judg. 9: 5. The doors are shut in the streets when the aged man's teeth are gone, or he can scarcely open his lips; or when, between his death and interment, business in the house is stopped, Eccl. 12: 4. Men shut up the kingdom of heaven when they misrepresent the true mode of access to everlasting happiness, and hinder and discourage others from the use of the proper means of salvation, Matt. 23: 13. Men are shut up to the faith when God's law, providence, ordinances, and influences, concur to promote their believing in Jesus as the only Savior, Gal. 3: 23.—Brown.

SHROVE TUESDAY; the day before Ash Wednesday or Lent, on which, in former times, persons went to their parish churches to confess their sins.—Hend. Buck.

SIBBES, (RICHARD, D. D.,) an English divine, was born near Sudbury, on the borders of Suffolk, and was educated at Cambridge, where he entered in 1595. Having distinguished himself here as first scholar, he took all the degrees of the university with general approbation and applause. Whilst he was lecturer at St. Andrew's, it pleased God to change his heart; soon after which, he entered the ministry, and was appointed lecturer at Trinity church, in Cambridge. During the two last years of his life, he was vicar of Trinity parish. In 1618, he was elected preacher at Gray's inn, where his preaching was attended by many noble and learned auditors. About the year 1625, he was made master of Catharine hall, in the government of which he continued during the rest of his life. He died in 1635, in the fifty-eighth year of his age.

He is said to have admirably filled every station to which he was called. His erudition was very extensive, and as a preacher it is said, "he sometimes had a little stammering, but then his judicious hearers always expected some rare and excellent notion from him." His discourses turned much upon the incarnation of the Son of God; and as he was a man always disposed to undervalue himself, some one remarked, "I less wonder now at his noted humility, finding how often his thoughts dwelt upon the humiliation of Christ."

He published "The Bruised Reed," and the "Soul's Conflict;" also, "Divine Meditations and Holy Contemplations;" and some Sermons.—Middleton's Evn. Biog. vol. iii. p. 70.

SIBYLLINE ORACLES; prophecies delivered, it is said, by certain women of antiquity, showing the fates and revolutions of kingdoms. We have a collection of them in eight books. Dr. Jortin observes, that they were composed at different times by different persons; first by pagans, and then, perhaps, by Jews, and certainly by Christians. They abound with phrases, words, facts, and passages, taken from the LXX. and the New Testament. They are, says the doctor, a remarkable specimen of astonishing impudence and miserable poetry, and seem to have been, from first to last, and without any one exception, mere impostures.—Hend. Buck.

SICARD, (ROCH AMBROSE CREVIERON,) an eminent teacher of the deaf and dumb, was born, in 1742, at Fousseret, near Toulouse, and was brought up to the church. In 1789, he was chosen to succeed the abbé de l'Épee in the Parisian institution for the deaf and dumb; and he held this situation for many years, with honor to himself and great advantage to his pupils. He died May 10, 1822. He wrote Elements of General Grammar; several valuable works on the tuition of the deaf and dumb; was editor of the Catholic Annals; and assisted in the Encyclopedic Magazine.—Davenport.

SIDON, or ZINOS; a celebrated city and port of Phenicia, and one of the most ancient cities in the world; as it is supposed to have been founded by Sidon, the eldest son of Canaan, which will carry it up to above two thousand years before Christ. But if it was founded by Sidon, his descendants were driven out by a body of Phenician colonists, or Cushim from the east; who are supposed either to have given it its name, or to have retained the old one, in compliment to their god Siton, or Dagon.

Its inhabitants appear to have early acquired a pre-eminence in arts, manufactures, and commerce; and from their superior skill in hewing timber, by which must be understood their cutting it out and preparing it for building, as well as the mere act of felling it, Sidonian workmen were hired by Solomon to prepare the wood for the building of his temple. The Sidonians are said to have been the first manufacturers of glass; and Homer often speaks of them as excelling in many useful and ingenious arts, giving them the title of Polydaioloi. Add to this, they were, if not the first shipwrights and navigators, the first who ventured beyond their own coasts, and in those early ages engrossed the greatest part of the then commerce of the world. The natural result of these exclusive advantages to the inhabitants of Sidon was, a high degree of wealth and prosperity; and, content with the riches which their trade and manufactures brought them, they lived in ease and luxury, trusting the defence of their city and property, like the Tyrians after them, to hired troops; so that to live in ease and security, is said in Scripture to be "after the manner of the Sidonians."

After the subversion of the Grecian empire by the Romans, Sidon fell into the hands of the latter; who, to put an end to the frequent revolt of the inhabitants, deprived it of its freedom. It then fell successively under the power of the Saracens, the Seljukian Turks, and the sultans of Egypt; who, in 1289, that they might never more afford shelter to the Christians, destroyed both it and Tyre. But it again somewhat revived, and has ever since been in the possession of the Ottoman Turks.—Watson.

SIGN; a token, or whatever serves to express, or represent, another thing. Thus, the Lord gave to Noah the rainbow as a sign of his covenant; (Gen. 9: 12, 13.) and for the same purpose he appointed circumcision to Abraham, Gen. 17: 11. See also Exod. 3: 12. Judg. 6: 17. In Isa. 8: 18, the word is used for a prophetic similitude: "Behold, I and the children whom the Lord hath given me, are for signs and for wonders in Israel." See also Ezek. 4: 3. and EYE, ad fin.—Calmet.

SIHOR. (See EGYPT, RIVER OF.)

SILAS; (Acts 15: 22.) one of the chief men among the first disciples, and thought by some to have been of the number of the seventy. On occasion of a dispute at Antioch, on the observance of the legal ceremonies, Paul and Barnabas were chosen to go to Jerusalem, to advise with the apostles; and they returned with Judas and Silas. Silas joined himself to Paul; and after Paul and Barnabas had separated, (Acts 15: 37—41. A. D. 51.) he accompanied Paul to visit the churches of Syria and Cilicia, and the towns and provinces of Lycaonia, Phrygia, Galatia, and Macedonia, &c. (See PAUL.)

Silas was very useful in preaching the gospel; (2 Cor. 1: 19.) and some refer to him what Paul says to the Corinthians: (2 Cor. 8: 18, 19.) "And we have sent with him the brother, whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches; and not that only, but who was also chosen of the churches to travel with us, with this grace which is administered by us to the glory of the same Lord." &c. Peter conveyed his first epistle to the persons to whom he addressed it by the hand of Silas, whom he calls "a faithful brother."—Calmet.

SILK; (meshi, Prov. 31: 22. Ez. 16: 10—13. Rev. 18: 12.) It is certain that silk was imported into Europe, ages before the silk-worm that produces it; and it much resembled the hanks known at present, in form, color, and substance. In this state it was called holoserica, or whole silk; and a method was discovered of separating the threads, and working them up again in a thinner state, so that when woven the web resembled the modern gauze. It appears that Pamphila, a woman of Coa, first practised this art; and that the Coan vests, which were so transparent as to be called by a poet "woven air," were of this manufacture; though it is possible that they might originally be of cotton, or fine muslin. Silk was manufactured and colored at Tyre and Berytus; as well singly, as intermixed with other materials; and hence it was often used as synonymous with purple.

Silk was first brought into Greece after Alexander's conquest of Persia, and came into Italy during the flourishing times of the Roman empire; but was long so dear in all these parts as to be worth its weight in gold.—Calmet; Watson.

SILOA; (the same as Siloam, Neh. 3: 15. Luke 13: 4.) a beautiful fountain under the walls of Jerusalem, towards the east, between the city and the brook Cedron; perhaps the same with Enrogel. It was the nearest to the temple, and associated with it, Isa. 8: 6.—Watson.

SILVER. (See MONEY.)

SIMEON, son of Jacob and Leah, was born A. M. 2247, Gen. 29: 33. 34: 25.

Jacob, on his death-bed, showed his indignation against Simeon and Levi for their cruelty to the Shechemites, Gen. 49: 5: "I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel." And in effect these two tribes were scattered in Israel. As to Levi, he never had any fixed lot or portion; and Simeon received only a canton that was dismembered from the tribe of Judah. (Joshua 19: 1, Ac.) and some other lands they went to conquer in the mountains of Seir, and the desert of Gedor, 1 Chron. 4: 27, 39, 42.

2. SIMEON; Luke 2: 25, 26, &c. Some have conjectured, that Simeon, who received Jesus Christ into his arms, was the same as Simeon the Just, the son of Hillel, and master of Gamaliel, whose disciple St. Paul was. (See HILLEL, and SANHEDRIM.)—Watson.

SIMEON STYLITE, a fanatic monk, was born, about 390, at Sisan, on the Syrian and Cilician frontier, and was the son of a shepherd. After having inflicted upon himself many ascetic severities, he took up his abode on the summit of a pillar. In this singular situation he existed, or rather vegetated, nearly forty years. He died about 459. He had many followers.—Davenport.

SIMON MACCABÆUS, surnamed Thossi, son of Mattathias, and brother of Judas and Jonathan. He was chief prince and pontiff of the Jews from A. M. 3860 to 3869, and was succeeded by John Hyrcanus. For the particulars of his life and transactions, see 1 Mac. 2: 65. 5: 17. 10: 74—82. 12: 33, &c. 13: 1, &c. 14: 4, &c. 15: 1, &c.

2. SIMON, the Canaanite, an apostle of Jesus Christ. It is doubtful whether the name of Canaanite was derived to him from the city Cana in Galilee, or whether it should not be taken according to its signification in the Hebrew, by deriving it from the root cana, "to be zealous;" and this is the opinion of some learned men. See Luke 6: 15. Acts 1: 13. where he is surnamed Zelotes; see also Matt. 10: 4. Mark 3: 18.

3. SIMON, brother of our Lord; (Matt. 13: 55. Mark 6: 3.) that is to say, his cousin-german, being son of Mary, sister to the holy virgin. He is thought to be the same with Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem, and son of Cleopas.

4. SIMON MAGUS. Of this heretic, or rather father of heresy, Dr. Burton gives the following account: Justin Martyr, about A. D. 140, presented a defence of Christianity to the emperor Antoninus Pius, in which he mentions, as a well-known fact, that Simon, a native of Gittum, a village in Samaria, came to Rome in the reign of Claudius, was looked upon there as a god, and had a statue erected to him, with a Latin inscription, in the river Tiber, between the two bridges. Justin adds, that nearly all the Samaritans, and a few also in other nations, acknowledged and worshipped him as the supreme God. There is in this passage such a minute detail, such a confident appeal to the emperor's own knowledge of what the apologist was saying, that we can hardly suppose the story to be false, when not only the emperor, but every person in Rome, would have been able to detect it. I would observe, also, that Justin Martyr was himself a native of Samaria; hence he was able to name the very place where Simon was born; and when he says, in his second defence, which was presented a few years later, "I have despised the impious and false doctrine of Simon which is in my country;" when we see the shame which he felt at the name of Christian being assumed by the followers of that impostor; we can never believe that he would have countenanced the story, if the truth of it had not been notorious; much less would he have given to his own country the disgrace of originating the evil.

From the detailed account which we have of Simon in the Acts of the Apostles, I should be inclined to infer these two things: 1. That St. Luke knew no earlier instance of apostasy from the gospel; and he mentions this because it was the first; and, 2. That when St. Luke wrote the Acts of the Apostles the heresy of Simon was widely spread; and therefore he tells his readers how it had begun. Concerning the remainder of Simon's life we know little, and in that little it is difficult to separate truth from fiction. I should be inclined, for the reasons given above, to believe the account of Justin Martyr, who says that Simon Magus went to Rome in the reign of Claudius, and attracted numerous followers. Eusebius quotes this passage of Justin Martyr; but he adds, upon some other authority, which he does not name, that St. Peter came to Rome at the same time; and that, in consequence of his preaching, the popularity of the impostor was entirely destroyed.

With respect to the doctrines of Simon Magus, we know for certain that Christ held a conspicuous place in the philosophy which he taught: but to define with accuracy the various points of this philosophy, is a difficult, if not impossible, task. He believed that the world was created, not by the supreme God, but by inferior beings: he taught, also, that Christ was one of those successive generations of eons which were derived from God; not the eon which created the world; but he was sent from God to rescue mankind from the tyranny of the demiurgus, or creative eon. Simon was also inventor of the strange notion, that the Jesus who was said to be born and crucified had not a material body, but was only a phantom. His other doctrines were, that the writers of the Old Testament were not inspired by the supreme God, the Fountain of good, but by those inferior beings who created the world, and who were the authors of evil. He denied a general resurrection; and the lives of himself and his followers are said to have been a continued course of impure and vicious conduct. Such was the doctrine and the practice of Simon Magus, from whom all the pseudo-Christian or Gnostic heresies were said to be derived.—Watson.

SIMON, (RICHARD), a learned French Hebraist and theologian, was born, in 1658, at Dieppe; was professor of philosophy for several years at the college of Juilly; and died in 1712. His Critical History of the Old Testament was suppressed, because it denied Moses to be the author of the Pentateuch. He wrote various other theological and critical works.—Davenport.

SIMONIANS, or St. SIMONIANS; an infidel sect recently organized in Paris; whose fundamental principle is, that religion is to perfect the social condition of man; therefore Christianity is no longer suitable for society, because it separates the Christian from other men, and leads him to live for another world. (See SAINT SIMON.) The world requires a religion that shall be of this world, and consequently a God of this world. They reject whatever they suppose to have been derived from the philosophy of the East; they consider the Deity neither as spirit nor matter, but as including the whole universe, and are thus plainly pantheists; and they regard evil as nothing more than an indication of the progress which mankind are doomed to make in order to be freed from it; in itself, they maintain it is nothing. Its members are principally of the higher ranks, and are displaying, not without success, the greatest activity in spreading the venom of their infidel principles. They occupy, in Paris, the largest and most handsomely fitted halls, where they meet in great numbers.

What is very curious in the history of the St. Simonians is, that they were at first merely philosophers, and not at all the founders of a religion. They spoke of science and industry, but not of religious doctrines. All at once, however, it seemed to occur to them to teach a religion. Then their school became a church, and their association a sect. It is evident that with them religion was not originally the end of their institution, but has been employed by them as the means of collecting a greater number of hearers.—Hend. Buck.

SIMONY, is the corrupt presentation of any one to an ecclesiastical benefice, for money, gift, or reward. It is so called from the resemblance it is said to bear to the sin of Simon Magus, though the purchasing of holy orders seems to approach nearer to this offence. It was by the canon law a very grievous crime; and is so much the more odious, because, as Sir Edward Coke observes, it is ever accompanied with perjury; for the presentee is sworn to have committed no simony.—Hend. Buck.

SIMPLE. This term is capable of a good, a bad, or an indifferent meaning. Simplicity of mind is piety, integrity, innocence of intention, &c. Rom. 16: 19. Weak simplicity, on the contrary, is credulity, easily imposed on, easily deluded, Prov. 19: 15. 20: 3. "The simple believe every word," report, rumor: "the simple pass on and are punished;" they do not look before them, or take proper steps to avoid evil. Wisdom invites the simple, the uninformed, the unstudied, to learn of her, to partake of her refreshments, and to be revived by her delicacies, Prov. 9: 4. See also Psal. 19: 7. 116: 6. Ezek. 45: 20. 2 Cor. 1: 12. 11: 3.—Gabnet.

SIMPLICIUS; a Roman senator, who, together with forty-two others, was beheaded on account of his religion. The forty-three heads were all set up on the city gates.

These martyrdoms took place under the emperor Maximian, about A. D. 235.—Fox, p. 25.

SIMPSON, (ROBERT, D. D.,) theological and resident tutor of Hoxton academy, was born at Little Tillyery, near Milnathort, in Kinrosshire, Scotland, February 15, 1746. His ancestors were persons eminent for integrity, and for an ardent attachment to the cause of vital Christianity. At an early age Mr. Simpson afforded proofs of superior genius; and when, in addition to this, he displayed marks of genuine piety, it cannot be a matter of wonder that his ardent desire for the Christian ministry should be encouraged by his father. When he had completed his academic term, he preached in Yorkshire and Lancashire, and was for several years pastor of a church at Bolton-le-Moors, near Manchester.

In 1780, he was married to Miss Sarah Lee, a lady of great piety and information; and in the year 1786, he visited the metropolis. He came then a perfect stranger, but his preaching attracted considerable attention, gained him many friends, and obtained for him an established reputation. On the resignation of Dr. Addington, a more commodious range of building was provided at Hoxton for the reception of dissenting students, of which Mr. Simpson was chosen president; and the institution from this time was designated the Hoxton academy. He now applied the undivided energies of his mind to the discharge of his duties. The number of candidates for admission greatly increased, the tone of instruction was raised still higher, and the labors of the students more appreciated than ever. He impressed upon his pupils the stamp of his own piety, and by uniting decision with candor, he avoided that indifference to fixed theological notions, which, by some persons, has been approved and adopted, but which must ever be the ruin of the best interests of individuals, and of the prosperity of Christian dissenting congregations.

His health failing, in May, 1817, he tendered his resignation to the committee. It was accepted, but with reluctance. A vote was then passed, that, on account of the high sense entertained of his past services, his salary should be continued to him to the end of his life. Though he had resigned, he continued to lecture his classes as often as illness would permit him. He died December 21, 1817.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

SIMPSON, (DAVID,) author of the "Plea," was born in the parish of Ingleby Arncliffe, near Northallerton, in the county of York, October 12th, 1745. His father was a respectable farmer; and, as David was his only son, he intended him for the same occupation. He received his grammar learning at Scorton school, under the tuition of Mr. Noble; but having made up his mind to enter the ministry, he prevailed on his father to send him to Cambridge, where he entered St. John's college, and prosecuted his studies during a period of three years. While here, he formed an intimacy with the celebrated Robert Robinson, pastor of the Baptist church in that place, a man who took pleasure in making himself useful to young men of piety and talents destined to the work of the ministry.

He was successively curate of Ramsden, Buckingham, and Macclesfield, at which last place he was silenced by the bishop of Chester. He had, however, enlisted a number of friends in his favor, and in a little time a new edifice was erected for him, an elegant and beautiful building, which was consecrated, and in which he began to officiate with great zeal and usefulness. In this situation he continued to labor to the close of his life, which terminated, March 24th, 1799, at the age of fifty-four, just as he was on the point of leaving the established church.

His literary productions are, "Seven Sermons on different Subjects," 1771, octavo; "Sacred Literature," four volumes, octavo, 1788; "Essay on the Authenticity of the New Testament," 1793; "A Key to the Prophecies," 1795; "A Plea for the Deity of Jesus Christ, and the Doctrine of the Trinity," octavo, 1798, 1812. But the most popular of his publications is his "Plea for Religion and the Sacred Writings," of which the eleventh edition made its appearance in octavo, 1829. It is addressed to the disciples of Thomas Paine, and wavering Christians of every persuasion, and comprises a mass of important and interesting information.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

SIMULTANEUM; a term used in Germany to express the joint religious service of a congregation made up partly of Protestants and partly of Catholics. At the celebration of a marriage, for example, the Protestant clergyman delivers a sermon, on the duties of the married state, from the pulpit of a Roman Catholic church; the Catholic priest then says mass at the altar, and performs the ceremony; after which the Protestant minister goes to the altar, from which he blesses the new married pair. Such exhibitions are generally regarded as instances of praiseworthy liberality; but they are rather to be viewed as resulting from indifference to religious principle.—Hend. Buck.

SIN, DESERT OF. To this the tenth station the Israelites came exactly a month after they left Egypt. And here again they murmured for "the bread and the flesh-pots of Egypt." So the Lord gave them quails for a day, and manna for forty years, till they came to the borders of Canaan. On this occasion the institution of the Sabbath was revived, as a day of rest, which had been intermitted during their Egyptian bondage. On this day there fell no manna, but on the preceding they were directed to gather two days' provision. To perpetuate the memorial of "this bread from heaven" to future generations, a pot of manna, which was preserved fresh by a standing miracle, was ordered to be laid up beside the ark of the covenant, in the sanctuary, Exod. 16.—Watson.

SIN; the transgression of the law, or want of conformity to the will of God, 1 John 3: 4. 1. Original sin, or inhereditary depravity, is that whereby our whole nature is disordered, and our inclinations rendered contrary to the law of God. This is sometimes called indwelling sin, Rom. 7. (See DEPRAVITY, HUMAN.) The imputation of the sin of Adam to his posterity is also what some divines, not very properly, call original sin. 2. Actual sin is a direct violation of God's law, and generally applied to those who are capable of committing moral evil; as opposed to idiots, or children, who have not the right use of their powers. 3. Sins of omission consist in the leaving those things undone which ought to be done. 4. Sins of commission are those which are committed against affirmative precepts, or doing what should not be done. 5. Sins of infirmity are those which arise from the infirmity of the flesh, ignorance, surprise, snares of the world, &c. (See INFIRMITY.) 6. Secret sins are those committed in secret, or those which we, through blindness or prejudice, do not see the evil of, Psalm 19: 12. 7. Presumptuous sins are those which are done boldly, and against light and conviction. (See PRESUMPTION.) 8. Unpardonable sin seems to consist in the malicious ascription of the dispensations, gifts, and influences of the Spirit to the power of Satan. The reason why this sin is never forgiven, is not because of any want of sufficiency in the blood of Christ, nor in the pardoning mercy of God, but because such as commit it despise and reject the only remedy, i. e. the power of the Holy Spirit, applying the redemption of the gospel to the souls of men.

There is, however, another view of this unpardonable offence, which deserves consideration. It is plain, says bishop Tomline, that this sin against the Holy Ghost could not be committed while our Savior was upon earth, since he always speaks of the Holy Ghost as not being to come till after his ascension into heaven. A few days after that great event, the descent of the Holy Ghost enabled the apostles to work miracles, and communicated to them a variety of other supernatural gifts. Hence it appears that the sin against the Holy Ghost consisted in finally rejecting the gospel as preached by the apostles, who confirmed the truth of the doctrine which they taught "by signs and wonders, and divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost," Heb. 2: 4. It was unpardonable, because this was the consummation of the proofs afforded to the men of that generation of the divine mission of Christ. This sin was manifestly distinct from all other sins; it indicated an invincible obstinacy of mind, an impious and unalterable determination to refuse the offered mercy of God. This view will serve to explain those passages in the epistle to the Hebrews, in which the hopeless case of Jewish apostates is described. (But see BLASPHEMY.)

The sinfulness of man is, 1. Universal as to the subjects of it, Rom. 3: 23. Isa. 53: 6. 2. General, as to all the powers of man, Isa. 1: 6. 3. Awful, filling the mind with constant rebellion against God and his law. 4. Hateful to God, Job 15: 16. And, 5. Punishable by him, with everlasting punishment, 1 Sam. 2: 9, 10. Rom. 2: 9. While we contemplate the nature, the evil, the guilt, the consequences of sin, it is our happiness to reflect, that the same holy and glorious Being against whom it is committed, has in his unspeakable mercy provided a remedy for it; and that he "so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." SINAI; a famous mountain of Arabia Petraea, on which God gave the law to Moses, Exod. 19: 1. 24: 16. 31: 18. 34: 2, 4, &c. Lev. 25: 1. 24: 46. It stands in a kind of peninsula, formed by the two arms of the Red sea; one extending north, called the gulf of Kolsum; the other extending east, called the gulf of Elan. The Arabs call mount Sinai by the name of Tor, that is, the mountain, of excellence; or Gibel Mousa, "the mountain of Moses." It is two hundred and sixty miles from Cairo, which is a journey of ten days.

The wilderness of Sinai, where the Israelites continued encamped almost a year, and where Moses erected the tabernacle of the covenant, is considerably elevated above the rest of the country; the ascent to it is very craggy, the greater part cut out of the rock; then one comes to a large space of ground, which is a plain surrounded on all sides by rocks and eminences, whose length is nearly twelve miles. Towards the extremity of this plain, on the north, two high mountains appear; the highest is called Sinai, the other, Horeb. They are of very steep ascent, and do not stand on much ground in comparison to their extraordinary height. Sinai is at least one third part higher than the other, and its ascent more upright and difficult. The top of the mountain terminates in an uneven and rugged space, which might contain about sixty persons. Mount Horeb stands west of Sinai; so that at sunrise the shadow of Sinai covers Horeb. Besides a little fountain at the top of Sinai, there is another at the foot of Horeb, which supplies the monastery of St. Catharine. Five or six paces from thence they show a stone, whose height is four or five feet, and breadth about three, which they say is the very stone from whence Moses caused the water to gush out. Its color is of a spotted gray; and it is, as it were, set in a kind of earth, where no other rock appears. This stone has twelve holes or channels, which are about a foot wide, from whence they say the water issued which the Israelites drank.—Watson.

SINCERITY; freedom from hypocrisy or dissimulation. The Latin word sincerus, from which our English word sincere is derived, is composed of sine and cera, and signifies without wax, as pure honey, which is not mixed with any wax; thus denoting that sincerity is a pure and upright principle. The Greek word helicrinea, translated sincerity, (2 Cor. 1: 12.) signifies properly a judgment made of things by the light and splendor of the sun; as, in traffic, men hold up goods they are buying to the light of the sun, to see if they can discover any defect in them. Thus, those who are truly sincere can bear the test of light, and are not afraid of having their principles and practices examined by it.

This word, however, like many others, is abused, and often becomes a subterfuge for the ungodly and the indolent, who think that their practice is nothing; but that sincerity, or a good heart, as they call it, is all in all. But such deceive themselves, for a tree is known by its fruits; and true godly sincerity will evidence itself by serious inquiry, impartial examination, desire of instruction, unprejudiced judgment, devotedness of spirit, and uniformity of conduct. The reader will find this subject ably handled in Gurnall's Christian Armor, vol. ii. p. 121—148, and SINGING; an ordinance of divine worship, in which we express our joy in God, and gratitude for his mercies. It has always been a branch both of natural and revealed religion, in all ages and periods of time. It was a part of the worship of the heathens. It was practised by the people of God before the giving of the law of Moses; (Exod. 15.) also under the ceremonial law. Under the gospel dispensation it is particularly enjoined, Col. 3: 16. Eph. 5: 19. It was practised by Christ and his apostles, (Matt. 26: 30.) and in the earliest times of Christianity. The praises of God may be sung privately in the family, but chiefly in the house of God; and should be attended to with reverence, sincerity, joy, gratitude, and with the understanding, 1 Cor. 14: 15.

It is to be lamented, however, that this ordinance has not that attention paid to it which it deserves. That great divine, president Edwards, observes, that "as it is the command of God that all should sing, so all should make conscience of learning to sing, as it is a thing that cannot be decently performed at all without learning. Those, therefore, (where there is no natural inability,) who neglect to learn to sing, live in sin, as they neglect what is necessary in order to their attending one of the ordinances of God's worship." We leave those who are wilfully dumb in God's house to consider this pointed remark. (See MUSIC, and PSALMODY.)

SINIM, (Isa. 49: 12.) is thought by Mr. Taylor, Dr. Morison, and other writers, to be China, which Dr. Hagar, in two very learned tracts, has attempted to prove was well known to the Greeks in early ages; and that the trade in silk was the life and soul of their intercourse with it. (See NOAH.)—Calmet.

SION, or ZION; the name of the loftiest mountain on which the city of Jerusalem was built, and on which the citadel of the Jebusites stood when David took possession of it, and transferred his court thither from Hebron; whence it is frequently called the city of David; and from his having deposited the ark here, it is also frequently called "the holy hill." It is on the south side of the city, rising abruptly from the valley of Hinnom about four hundred feet. (See JERUSALEM.)

When Dr. Richardson visited this spot, one part of it supported a crop of barley, and another was undergoing the labor of the plough; in which circumstance we have another remarkable instance of the fulfilment of prophecy: "Therefore shall Zion for your sakes be ploughed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps," Mic. 3: 12.—Calmet.

SISERA. (See JAEI.)

SISTER, in the style of the Hebrews, has equal latitude as brother. (See BROTHER.) In the law (Lev. 18: 18.) it is forbidden to take to wife the sister of a wife; literally, "Thou shalt not take a wife over her sister to afflict her;" as if meaning to forbid polygamy. In the gospels, the brothers and sisters of Jesus Christ are his cousins, children of the sisters of the holy virgin, Matt. 13: 56. Mark 6: 3.—Watson.

fox, and repelled them with the agility and fierceness of the mountain cat. To his vigilance the inhabitants of German flats, on the Mohawk, were indebted for preservation from massacre. His influence brought his tribe to our assistance in the war of the revolution. Among the Indian tribes he was called "the white man's friend." In his youth he was very savage, and addicted to drunkenness. Through the instructions of Mr. Kirkland, a missionary, he lived a reformed man for more than sixty years. He died in Christian hope, at Oneida, March, 1816, aged one hundred and six or one hundred and ten years. From attachment to Mr. Kirkland, he had often expressed a desire to be buried near his minister, that he might, as he said, "go up with him at the great resurrection." For several years he kept his dress for the grave prepared. He often went to Clinton to die, that his body might lie near his Christian teacher. A short time before his death, he said to a friend by an interpreter, "I am an aged hemlock; the winds of a hundred winters have whistled through my branches; I am dead at the top. The generation to which I belonged, have run away and left me; why I live, the great Good Spirit only knows. Pray to my Jesus, that I may have patience to wait for my appointed time to die." —Allen.

SLANDER, according to Dr. Barrow, is uttering false speeches against our neighbor, to the prejudice of his fame, safety, welfare; and that out of malignity, vanity, rashness, ill-nature, or bad design. The principal kinds of slander are these:—1. Charging others with facts they are not guilty of. 2. Affixing scandalous names and odious characters which they deserve not. 3. Aspersing a man's actions with foul names, imputing that they proceed from evil principles, or tend to bad ends, when it doth not, or cannot appear. 4. Perverting a man's words or acts disadvantageously by affected misconstruction. 5. Partial or lame representation of men's discourse or practice, suppressing some part of the truth, or concealing some circumstances which ought to be explained. 6. Instilling sly suggestions which create prejudice in the hearers. 7. Magnifying and aggravating the faults of others. 8. Imputing to our neighbor's practice, judgment, or profession, evil consequences which have no foundation in truth.

Of all characters in society, a slanderer is the most odious, and the most likely to produce mischief. "His tongue," says the great Massillon, "is a devouring fire, which tarnishes whatever it touches; which exercises its fury on the good grain equally as on the chaff; on the profane as on the sacred; which, wherever it passes, leaves only desolation and ruin; it digs even into the bowels of the earth; turns into vile ashes what only a moment before had appeared to us so precious and brilliant; acts with more violence and danger than ever, in the time when it was apparently smothered, up and almost extinct; which blackens what it cannot consume, and sometimes sparkles and delights before it destroys. It is a world, an assemblage of iniquity, a secret pride, which discovers to us the mote in our brother's eye, but hides the beam which is in our own; a mean envy, which, hurt at the talents or prosperity of others, makes them the subject of its censures, and studies to dim the splendor of whatever outshines itself; a disguised hatred, which sheds in its speeches the hidden venom of the heart; an unworthy duplicity, which praises to the face, and tears in pieces behind the back; a shameful levity, which has no command over itself or words, and often sacrifices both fortune and comfort to the imprudence of an amusing conversation; a deliberate barbarity, which goes to pierce an absent brother; a scandal, where we become a subject of shame and sin to those who listen to us; an injustice, where we ravish from our brother what is dearest to him. It is a restless evil, which disturbs society; spreads dissension through cities and countries; disunites the strictest friendships; is the source of hatred and revenge; fills wherever it enters with disturbances and confusion; and everywhere is an enemy to peace, comfort, and Christian good breeding. Lastly, it is an evil full of deadly poison; whatever flows from it is infected, and poisons whatever it approaches; even its praises are poisoned; its applauses malicious; its silence criminal; its gestures, motions, and looks, have all their venom, and spread it each in their way. Still more dreadful is this evil when it is found amongst those who are the professed disciples of Jesus Christ. Ah! the church formerly held in horror the exhibitions of gladiators, and denied that believers, brought up in the tenderness and benignity of Jesus Christ, could innocently feast their eyes with the blood and death of these unfortunate slaves, or form a harmless recreation of so inhuman a pleasure; but these renew more detestable shows; for they bring upon the stage, not infamous wretches devoted to death, but members of Jesus Christ, their brethren; and there they entertain the spectators with wounds which they inflict on persons who have devoted themselves to God!" Barrow's Works, vol. i. ser. 17, 18; Massillon's Sermons, vol. i. ser. 5; and article EVIL SPEAKING.—Hend. Buck.

SLAVERY; compulsory servitude. To punish the indignity received from his son Ham, Noah foretold the slavery of his descendants, Gen. 9: 25. The descendants of Abraham always valued themselves on their liberty. "We have never been servants to any," said the Jews, John 8: 33. The Hebrews have, however, been subject to several princes; to the Egyptians, the Philistines, the Chaldeans, the Grecians, and the Romans. But this is not slavery in the strict sense of the word.

Moses notices two or three sorts of slaves among the Hebrews; who had foreign slaves, obtained by capture, by purchase, or born in the house. Over these, masters had an entire authority; they might sell them, exchange them, punish them, judge them, and even put them to death, without public process: in which the Hebrews followed the rules common to other nations, except as they were modified by the humane precepts of the Mosaic code.

In Exodus 21. Moses enacts regulations concerning Hebrew slaves. A Hebrew might fall into slavery several ways: 1. If reduced to extreme poverty, he might sell himself, Lev. 25: 39. 2. A father might sell his children as slaves, Exod. 21: 7. 3. Insolvent debtors might be delivered to their creditors as slaves, 2 Kings 4: 1. 4. Thieves not able to make restitution for their thefts, or the value, were sold for the benefit of the sufferers, Exod. 22: 3. 5. They might be taken prisoners in war. 6. They might be stolen, and afterwards sold for slaves, as Joseph was sold by his brethren. 7. A Hebrew slave redeemed from a Gentile by one of his brethren, might be sold by him to another Israelite.—Calmet.

SLEEP, SLEEPING, SLUMBERING, is taken either for the sleep or repose of the body; or for the sleep of the soul, which is supineness, indolence, stupidity; or for the sleep of death. St. Peter says of the wicked, "Their damnation slumbereth not," 2 Pet. 2: 3. God is not asleep, he will not forget to punish them in his own due time.—Watson.

SLEIDAN, (JOHN PHILIPSON,) a historian, whom Protestant Germany considers as its Livy, was born in 1506, at Schleide, in the electorate of Cologne, and completed his studies at the universities of Paris and Orleans. For many years he was confidential secretary to cardinal du Bellay. Having, however, espoused the doctrines of the Reformation, he settled at Strasburg; was employed in various negotiations; and died in 1556. Of his works the most important are, a History of the Reformation; and a History of the Four Ancient Monarchies.—Davenport.

SMITE; to strike. The word is often used for to kill.

To smite with the tongue, is to load with injuries and reproaches, with scandalous reflections. To smite the thigh, denotes indignation, trouble, astonishment, Jer. 31: 19.—Calmet.

SMITH, (ADAM,) a celebrated writer on morals and political economy, was born June 5, 1723, at Kirkcaldy, in Scotland. His education he received at the grammar-school of his native town, the university of Glasgow, and Balliol college, Oxford. On leaving the latter seminary, in 1748, he delivered lectures on rhetoric and polite literature at Edinburgh; in 1757, he was chosen professor of logic at Glasgow; and, in the following year, he was removed to the chair of moral philosophy. His Theory of Moral Sentiments, which appeared in 1759, established his reputation, and led to his being engaged, in 1763, to accompany the duke of Buccleugh in his travels. On his return, after an absence of three years, he lived in retirement during ten years, which period was occupied in the composition of his admirable Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations. It was published in 1776. He died in 1790, one of the commissioners of Scotch customs.—Davenport.

SMITH, (MISS ELIZABETH,) was born in December, 1776, in the county of Durham, where her parents then lived in affluence. She was remarkable, in her early years, for a thirst after knowledge, for regularity, and reflection. During her youth she did not seem to have enjoyed any peculiar advantages, except in the instruction of her mother, who appears, from some of her letters, to have possessed an elegant and cultivated understanding. In 1785, Mr. and Mrs. Smith removed to Piercefield, a celebrated and romantic seat on the Wye, where, in the summer of 1789, Elizabeth became acquainted with the lady who published her life. In 1793, a bank in which Mr. Smith was engaged, failed; and this unexpected stroke at once reduced Elizabeth and her family from affluence to very narrow circumstances.

From that time till the summer of 1801, Miss Smith had no certain home. Some part of that period she passed with Mrs. H. Bowdler, at Bath; several years were spent in Ireland, where Mr. Smith was quartered, amidst the inconveniences and distractions of military cantonments; and the rest, at the houses of friends, or in a hired house on the banks of the Ulster. During these years, and under such disadvantages, Miss Smith acquired that variety and depth of erudition, which justly rendered her an object of admiration to all who knew her. After the year 1801, Miss Smith principally resided at a small farm and mansion seated among the lakes; where, in the summer of 1805, she caught a cold, which, though at first it seemed trifling, terminated her life on the 7th of August, 1805, at the age of twenty-nine.

Her person and manners were extremely pleasing, with a pensive softness of countenance that indicated deep reflection; but her extreme timidity concealed the most extraordinary talents. With scarcely any assistance, she taught herself the French, Italian, Spanish, German, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages. She had no inconsiderable knowledge of Arabic and Persic. She was well acquainted with geometry, algebra, and other branches of the mathematics. She was a very fine musician. She drew landscapes from nature extremely well, and was a mistress of perspective. She showed an early taste for poetry. With all these acquirements she was perfectly feminine in her disposition; elegant, modest, gentle, and affectionate; nothing was neglected which a woman ought to know; nor was any duty omitted which her situation in life required her to perform. The only monuments of her talents which survive her, are a translation of the book of Job from the original, a translation of the Life of Klopstock, and Fragments.

Although Miss Smith shone pre-eminently as a literary character, yet she appeared most brilliant and endearing when viewed through her exalted piety and sincere religion. It was this that raised her above the world, and taught her, at sixteen years of age, to resign its riches and its privileges almost without regret, and to support with dignity a very unexpected change of situation. It taught her seriousness and humility, kindness, resignation, and contentment. It sustained her through the trials of life, and cheered her dying hours. See Life of Miss Elizabeth Smith, by Mrs. Bowdler.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

SMITH, (SAMUEL STANHOPE, D. D.,) president of Princeton college, and the son of Robert Smith, D. D., one of the most able theologians of his age, was born at Pequea, Pennsylvania, March 16, 1750, and graduated in 1769, at Princeton, where he was afterwards two years a tutor. Being an eloquent and popular preacher in Virginia, Hampden Sidney college was instituted with the design that he should become its president. After being at the head of that college a few years, he was appointed in 1779 professor of moral philosophy at Princeton. In the absence of Dr. Witherspoon as a member of congress, much of the care of the college devolved upon him; and after his death, in 1794, he was elected his successor. In consequence of growing infirmities he resigned his office in 1812, and died August 21, 1819, aged sixty-nine. He published an Essay on the causes of the variety of the complexion and figure of the human species, 1788, in which he ascribed all the variety to climate, the state of society, and the manner of living; Sermons, octavo, 1801; Lectures on the Evidences of the Christian Religion, duodecimo, 1809; on the Love of Praise, 1810; a continuation of Ramsay's History of the United States, from 1808 to 1817; Lectures on Moral and Political Philosophy; the Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion.—Allen.

SMOKE. In allusion to the burning of Sodom, the smoke of a land, or people, is said to rise up to heaven, when their judgments are conspicuous and terrible.—Brown.

SMYRNA; a city of Ionia in Asia Minor, and one of the finest in all the Levant. It contended for the honor of giving birth to Homer, and its title is by many thought to be the best founded. The Christian church in Smyrna was one of the seven churches of Asia to which the apostle John was commanded to address an epistle, Rev. 2: 8.—10. Polycarp is supposed at the time to have been its pastor.

The present Smyrna, which the Turks call Esmir, is about four miles in circumference, and contains a population of about a hundred thousand souls. It is less remarkable for the elegance of its buildings than for the beauty of its situation, the extent of its commerce, and the riches of its inhabitants.—Watson.

SO; king of Egypt, 2 Kings 17: 4. Usher and Marsham think So to be Sabacon, king of Ethiopia, who is taken for the first king of the dynasty of Ethiopians in Egypt, and who, according to Usher, began to reign A. M. 3277, having taken and burnt alive Boechoris, king of this country. He reigned eight years, and had for his successor Sevechus, whom Usher thinks to be the Sethon of Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 141.—Calmet.

SOAP; a composition made of ashes and tallow, or of these and lime, and used for washing and whitening of cloth, and sometimes in medicine. Perhaps the Jewish norrit was only the herb soapwort, or alum. Jesus Christ is likened to fuller's soap; as by his word, his Spirit, and blood, he purifies the world and cleanses the souls of men, Mal. 3: 2. Men's endeavors to hide or dissemble their vices, or even their own attempts to forsake them, are called muck soap, Jer. 2: 22.—Brown.

SOBIESKI III., (JOHN,) king of Poland, surnamed the Great, was born, in 1629, of an illustrious family, at the castle of Olesko, in Poland. In the Polish wars, from 1648 to 1674, he distinguished himself on numerous occasions; not only by being one of the bravest where many were brave, but also by superior military genius. During that period he gained several battles, in spite of an enormous disparity of numbers against him. In 1674, he was raised to the throne, and he led his troops to fresh victories. He repeatedly defeated the Turks and Tartars, and overran Moldavia and Wallachia; but the greatest of his exploits was the raising of the siege of Vienna, in 1683, by which he saved Europe from all the calamities consequent upon an irruption of the Ottoman forces. He died in 1696.—Davenport.

SOBRIETY; freedom from any inordinate passion. It is necessary on all occasions: when we read, when we hear, when we pray, when we converse, when we form schemes, when we pursue them, when we prosper, when we fail. Sobriety is necessary for all descriptions of character; it is necessary for the young and for the old; for the rich and the poor, for the wise and for the illiterate; all need to "be sober."

The necessity of sobriety is especially obvious, 1. In our inquiries after truth, as opposed to presumption. 2. In our pursuit of this world, as opposed to covetousness. 3. In the use and estimate of the things of this world, as opposed to excess. 4. In trials and afflictions, as opposed to impatience. 5. In forming our judgment of others, as opposed to censoriousness. 6. In speaking of one's self, as opposed to egotism.

Many motives might be urged to this exercise, as, 1. The general language of Scripture, 1 Pet. 5: 8. Phil. 4: 5. Tit. 2: 12. 1 Pet. 4: 7. 2. Our profession as Christians. 3. The example of Jesus Christ; and, 4. The near approach of death and judgment." (See DRUNKENNESS; MODERATION.)—Hend. Buck.

SOCINIANISM; the doctrine of the Socinians. Faustus Socinus, who died in Poland in 1604, is generally considered as the founder of this denomination; and from him they derive their name. Modern Socinians, however, claim the appellation of Unitarians, as more descriptive of their tenets, since they do not acknowledge all the doctrines of Socinus. But neither do any other denomination of professing Christians hold all the doctrines of their respective founders: it is sufficient for the purpose of just discrimination, if they hold the leading or peculiar sentiments of the party, in order to warrant their being called by his name.

The term Unitarian, as implying a denial of three persons in the Godhead, might be proper to distinguish Socinians from Trinitarians; but when understood in its popular sense, as not only denying the revealed distinction in Deity, but also as exclusively maintaining the divine unity, which all Trinitarians contend for no less than themselves, the appellation ceases to be appropriate, and therefore has been strongly objected to by the Calvinoists, and other Trinitarians. The Jews, the Mohammedans, the Sabellians, the Swedenborgians, and even the deists, allow of only one person in the divine essence; of course the Socinians cannot plead any preferable claim over them to be called Unitarians. Being, nevertheless, zealous advocates for the simple humanity of Christ, and maintaining that the Savior is merely a human being, some of them have taken the name of "Humanitarians," which is certainly more descriptive of their leading sentiment; while others of them choose to call themselves "Rational Christians."

Their sentiments are as follows: that the Father, and he alone, is truly and properly God; that the Son had no existence whatsoever, before he was conceived by the virgin Mary; and that the Holy Spirit is no distinct subsistence from the Father and the Son, but that the title is merely figurative, denoting the power or energy of God. They confess that Christ is called God in the Holy Scriptures; but contend that it is only a deputed title, investing him with great authority; and that while he is nominally God, he is really nothing more than a mere man: yet that he was an extraordinary person, acting under a divine commission as a teacher of truth and righteousness; and that in him the prophecies relating to the Messiah were completely, though not literally, fulfilled. They admit the whole history of his ascension and glorification in its literal acceptance; but, believing him to be a mere man like themselves, though endowed with a large portion of divine wisdom, they assert that the only objects of his mission were, to teach the efficacy of repentance, without any proper atonement for sin, as a means of restoring us to the divine favor; to exhibit in his life and conduct an example for our imitation; to seal his doctrine with his blood; and in his resurrection from the dead, to furnish a proof of the certainty of our resurrection at the last day.

Their doctrine respecting the atonement is, that God requires no consideration or condition of pardon, but the repentance of the offender; and that, consequently, the death of Christ was no real sacrifice for sin; and though it be so called in Scripture, it is merely in a figurative sense, by way of allusion to the Jewish sin-offerings; just as our praises and other good works are called sacrifices, because they are something offered up to God. The mediation of Christ is wholly rejected, and the pardon of sin is said to be dispensed solely on account of men's personal virtue, without any regard to the sufferings or merit of another. They explode the doctrine of original sin, and also that of divine influence upon the mind, contending that the latter was peculiar to the times of the apostles, and was merely subservient to the purpose of working miracles.

The Socinians of the sixteenth century believed that Christ was advanced to the government of the universe, after his resurrection, and that religious worship was to be paid to him; but those of the present day generally consider this notion as unscriptural, and therefore reject it; and, regarding him as a mere man like themselves, they very consistently withhold from him all religious homage. They also have other reasons for deviating from their predecessors: "Jesus is indeed alive, they think; and, without doubt, employed in offices the most honorable and benevolent; but as they are totally ignorant of the place where he resides, and of the occupations in which he is engaged, there can be no proper foundation for religious addresses to him, nor of gratitude for favors now received, nor yet of confidence in his future interposition on our behalf."

Modern Socinians consider the Scriptures to be faithful records of past transactions, but deny that the writers were divinely inspired, except in those cases where they themselves expressly claim it; they allow that they wrote according to the best of their knowledge, and from their circumstances could not be mistaken with respect to the principal facts of which they were proper witnesses; but that, like other men, subject to prejudice, they might be liable to adopt a hasty and ill-grounded opinion concerning things which did not come within the compass of their knowledge.

The partial inspiration of the sacred writers, in general, is extended not only to Moses, but even to our blessed Lord himself; for they can see no reason for believing, that either Moses or Christ were inspired with supernatural knowledge, or endowed with supernatural power, beyond the immediate objects of their mission. They consequently aim at divesting revealed religion of every circumstance not consonant to the dictates of human reason. Hence they do not believe in our Lord's miraculous conception; but are of opinion that he was the legitimate son of Joseph and Mary, and consequently that the two first chapters of Matthew, containing this doctrine, are to be rejected as spurious. One Socinian writer wishes it to be understood that he has discovered three out of the four evangelists to be spurious; another endeavors to prove prayer to be a thing nugatory and vain; a third has attempted to put down public worship altogether, as being little better than hypocrisy; and a fourth opposes the morality of the Sabbath, recommending the revival of the book of sports on that day; while another denies the doctrine of the resurrection and the general judgment, which others of them had pronounced the only discoveries of rational Christianity.

Socinians in general deny the existence of the devil and his agency, considering it as an evanescent prejudice, which it is now a discredit to a man of understanding to believe. Many of them also reject the spirituality and separate existence of the soul; believing that man is wholly material, and that our only prospect of immortality is from the Christian doctrine of a resurrection. Of course the notion of an intermediate state of consciousness between death and the resurrection is rejected; for as the whole man dies, so the whole man is to be called again to life at the appointed period of the resurrection, with the same association that he had when alive; the intermediate portion of time having been passed by him in a state of utter insensibility. In their view, also, future punishment is neither vindictive nor eternal, but disciplinary; intended for the good of the party, and appointed for a limited time, so that all at last are to be recovered and restored to the enjoyment of eternal life. In what relates to worship and discipline, they adopt the independent form of church government, generally use written forms of prayer, and consider the Lord's supper as the only standing ordinance under the gospel.

Socinians were but little known in England until the reign of Charles I., when the famous John Biddle became their leader, and was successfully opposed by the pious and learned Dr. Owen. Since that period they have acquired considerable distinction, from the writings and influence of Dr. Priestley and his associates, and also from the literary labors of the Monthly and Critical Reviewers. They have also gained some accession to their numbers, both from the church and from among Dissenters, particularly of the Presbyterian denomination, whose sentiments would more easily coalesce with theirs than those of some others; but it does not appear that any considerable number of converts have at any time been made to Socinianism from among the profligates and unbelievers. Dr. Priestley, with much honor to himself, attempted to convert the Jews, but it was attended with no success: on the contrary, his Jewish opponent undertook to prove to the world, that the doctor himself did not understand the Christian Scriptures. Mr. Levi entitled his first letter, in answer to Dr. Priestley's second address, "The Divinity of Christ, and his Pre-existent State, proved to be taught in the Gospels; and, consequently, whoever does not believe the same, is not entitled to the appellation of a Christian."

Till within these few years past, it does not appear that there were any congregations of this description in Scotland, nor scarcely any individuals who were avowed Socinians. England is their principal seat; here they have a college, and have had some men of learning; but, excepting some half-dozen chapels in the metropolis and other large towns, which are pretty well filled, their congregations wear every appearance of desolation. Their congregations may be divided into two classes,—the ancient and the modern; but in many of both, the number of hearers does not average thirty. Those recently formed are struggling hard for existence; and notwithstanding all the efforts which have been recently made, both from the pulpit and the press, and the boasted number of conversions to Socinianism which take place, the body is on the wane, rather than the increase. The reason is obvious: the system only suits the cast of a certain order of mind. Those of this cast may remain; but numbers merely avail themselves of the position which it affords, of a convenient and momentary halting-place on the road to total infidelity.

In 1808, the Socinians published, under a very fallacious title, what they termed an Improved Version of the New Testament, but it never took; and no wonder: for, as Mr. Orme justly observes, "it inangles and misrepresents the original text, perverts the meaning of its most important terms, and explains away all that is valuable in the doctrinal system of Christianity." Though professedly critical, there perhaps never appeared a work which more outrages every principle of sound biblical criticism. Its errors and blunders were ably exposed by doctors Nares, Laurence, Magee, and writers in the British and Eclectic Reviews.

Their principal writers are Priestley, Lindsey, Belsham, Carpenter, Yates, and Fox. Those who have taken the most prominent part on the other side of the controversy, as carried on in modern times, are Horsley, Magee, Fuller, Wardlaw, J. P. Smith, and Robert Hall.—Hend. Buck.

SOCINUS, (FAUSTUS,) from whom the Socinians derive their name, was born, in 1539, at Sienna, and was for a considerable period in the service of the grand duke of Tuscany; after which he went to study theology at Basil. The result of his studies was the adoption of those antitrinitarian doctrines, which his uncle Lelio Socinus is believed also to have professed. Faustus settled in Poland; gained many followers, endured much persecution, and died in 1694.—Davenport.

SOCRATES, one of the greatest of ancient philosophers, was born, B. C. 470, at Athens; was the son of a sculptor; and followed the profession of his father for some years before he entered on the study of philosophy. He also distinguished himself at the battles of Tanagra and Delium. His philosophical lessons were highly favorable to virtue; and his disciples were numerous and illustrious. Against the shafts of satire and calumny, however, his noble character afforded no shield. Aristophanes held him up to ridicule, in the comedy of the clouds; and at a later period, and with more deadly effect, the infamous Melitus and Anytus accused him of being a contemner of the gods. Insanely giving credit to the charge, the Athenians condemned him to death by poison; and he met his fate with admirable fortitude, in the seventieth year of his age.—Davenport.

SOCRATIC PHILOSOPHY. While other Greek philosophers were employed in inventing, or investigating, a variety of ingenious theories, Socrates endeavored to apply his great knowledge to some good moral end; esteeming it to be the true end of philosophy, to make men not only wise, but also virtuous and happy. He estimated the value of all knowledge by its utility, and therefore confined the studies of his pupils to those branches of science which might be turned to some good practical account. His peculiar method of teaching was, by proposing questions to his pupils, which led them naturally to the proper answers. This is called the Socratic method of instruction.

Socrates, it must be remembered, was a heathen; and though he believed in one supreme and eternal being, so inconsistent was he, as to recommend obedience to the religious worship of his country, however idolatrous or ridiculous. He acknowledged, however, the immortality of the human soul, the necessity of divine influence to the practice of virtue and communion with the Deity; and seems to have had some anticipation, whether by tradition or otherwise, of a greater Teacher, who was to come. Enfield's Philos., vol. i. book ii. ch. 4.—Williams.

SODOM; the capital city of the Pentapolis; and for some time the dwelling-place of Lot, Gen. 13: 12, 13. Its crimes, however, which are specified, as pride, gluttony, idleness, haughty neglect of the poor, fornication, and unnatural vices, (Exod. 16: 49, 50. 2 Pet. 2: 6—9. Jude 7.) became at length so enormous, that God destroyed it by fire from heaven, with three neighboring cities, Gomorrah, Zeboim, and Admah; which were as wicked as itself, Gen. 19. A. M. 2107. The plain in which they stood was pleasant and fruitful, like an earthly paradise, but it was afterwards overflowed by the waters of the Jordan, which formed the present Dead sea, or lake of Sodom. Throughout Scripture the ruin of Sodom and Gomorrah is represented as an example and warning to the human race. (See DEAD SEA.)—Calmet.

SOLDINS; so called from their leader, one Soldin, a Greek priest. They appeared about the middle of the fifth century in the kingdoms of Saba and Godolia. They altered the manner of the sacrifice of the mass; their priests offered gold, their deacons incense, and their subdeacons myrrh; and this in memory of the like offerings made to the infant Jesus by the wise men. Very few authors mention the Soldins, neither do we know whether they still subsist.—Hend. Buck.

SOLFIDIANS; those who rest on faith alone for salvation, without any connexion with works; or who judge themselves to be Christ's because they believe they are.—Hend. Buck.

SOLOMON, son of David and Bathsheba, was born A. M. 2971, B. C. 1033; 2 Sam. 12: 24, 25. David gave him an education proportionate to the great designs for which God had ordained him; and on Adonijah's assumption of power (see АНОНИАИ) he was appointed king, inaugurated amid the acclamations of the people, and placed on the throne.

Being confirmed in his kingdom, Solomon contracted an alliance with Pharaoh king of Egypt, and, probably on her professing herself a proselyte to the Jewish faith, married his daughter, whom he brought to Jerusalem. Having presented a thousand burnt-offerings to the Lord at Gibeon, God appeared to him in a dream; and said, "Ask of me what you desire." Solomon besought divine wisdom, an understanding heart, and such qualities as were necessary for the government of the people committed to him. This request was agreeable to the Lord; and was fully granted, and more. Besides other splendid works, he built and dedicated the temple of Jehovah, "the noblest pile that ever pressed the earth." He enjoyed a profound peace throughout his dominions; Judah and Israel lived in security; and his neighbors either paid him tribute, or were his allies. He ruled over all the countries and kingdoms from the Euphrates to the Nile, and his dominions extended even beyond the Euphrates. He had abundance of horses and chariots of war. He exceeded the Orientals and the Egyptians in wisdom and prudence; he was the wisest of mankind, and his reputation spread through all nations. He composed, or collected, three thousand proverbs, and one thousand and five canticles. He was the greatest philosopher of antiquity, as well in natural history as in morals, being acquainted with the nature of plants and trees, from the cedar on Lebanon to the hyssop on the wall; also of beasts, of birds, of reptiles, of fishes. There was a concourse of strangers from all countries to hear his wisdom; and ambassadors from the most remote princes. He made gold and silver as common in Jerusalem as stones in the street; and cedars as plentiful as the sycamores in the valley. (See JERUSALEM.)

His court was a scene of unparalleled and gorgeous magnificence. But refinement degenerated into voluptuousness, and some actions of his subsequent life inflicted a deep disgrace on his character. He took wives and concubines, to the number of one thousand, from among the Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, Sidonians, and Hittites, who perverted his heart, so that he worshipped Ashoreth of the Sidonians, Moloch of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of the Moabites, to whom he built temples on the mount of Olives, 1 Kings 11: 1, 2. Neh. 13: 26. These sins of worldly conformity brought on him the judgments of the Lord. Before his death, he saw the commencement of revolt, in the troubles raised by Jeroboam, and Hadad the Idumean. He died, after he had reigned forty years, (A. M. 3029, B. C. 975,) at about fifty-eight years of age. His history was written by the prophets Nathan, Abijah, and Iddo; and he was buried in the city of David.

Of all the literary works composed by Solomon, we have nothing remaining but his Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Canticles. It is remarkable that the admitted corruption of Solomon never taints his admirable writings; a fact which can be accounted for only by supposing, 1. That it was rather a partial concession to his wives, than a change of conviction; or, 2. That his works were written upon a penitent review of his career; or, which is certainly true, 3. That divine inspiration preserved them at all times from the contamination of his passions.—Calmet.

SOLOMON'S SONG. (See CANTICLES.)

SOLON, the illustrious legislator of Athens, and one of the seven sages of Greece, was born, B. C. 592, at Salamis, of an ancient family. He acquired fortune by commerce, and knowledge by his visits to foreign parts. He then directed his attention to state affairs. After having enhanced the glory of his country by recovering Salamis, he refused the sovereignty of Athens, but accepted the archonship. As archon he framed a new code of laws, and, having obtained from the citizens an oath that they would observe them for ten years, he departed from Greece, and visited Egypt and Cyprus, and, perhaps, Lydia. On his return he found the tyranny of Pisistratus established, and he withdrew to Cyprus, where he is said to have died, at the age of eighty.—Davenport.

SON; a word used in several analogical senses, both in the Old and New Testaments. It denotes, (1.) The immediate offspring. (2.) Grandson; so Laban is called son of Nabor, (Gen. 29: 5,) whereas he was his grandson, being the son of Bethuel; (Gen. 24: 29.) Mephibosheth is called son of Saul, though he was the son of Jonathan, son of Saul, 2 Sam. 19: 24. (3.) Remote descendants; so we have the sons of Israel, many ages after the primitive ancestor. (4.) Son-in-law.—There is a son born to Naomi, Ruth 4: 17. (5.) Son by adoption, as Ephraim and Manasseh, to Jacob, Gen. 48. (See ADOPTION.) (6.) Son by nation; sons of the East, 1 Kings 4: 30. Job 1: 3. (7.) Son by education; that is, a disciple; Eli calls Samuel his son, 1 Sam. 3: 6. Solomon calls his disciple his son, in the Proverbs, often; and we read of the sons of the prophets, (1 Kings 20: 35, et al.) that is, those under a course of instruction for ministerial service. In nearly the same sense a convert is called son, 1 Tim. 1: 2. Titus 1: 4. Philem. 10. 1 Cor. 4: 15. 1 Pet. 5: 13. (8.) Son by disposition and conduct, as sons of Belial, (Judg. 19: 22. 1 Sam. 2: 12.) unrestrainable persons; sons of the mighty, (Ps. 29: 1.) heroes; sons of the band, (2 Chron. 25: 13.) soldiers rank and file; sons of the sorceress, who study or practise sorcery, Isa. 57: 3. (9.) Son in reference to age; son of one year, (Exod. 12: 5.) that is, one year old; son of sixty years, &c. The same in reference to a beast, Michah 6: 6. (10.) A production, or offspring, as it were, from any parent; sons of the burning coal, that is, sparks, which issue from burning wood, Job 5: 7. Son of the bow, that is, an arrow, (Job. 4: 19.) because an arrow issues from a bow; but an arrow may also issue from a quiver, therefore, son of the quiver, Lam. 3: 13. Son of the floor, thrashed corn, Isa. 21: 10. Sons of oil, (Zech. 3: 14.) the branches of the olive-tree. (11.) Son of beating; that is, deserving beating, Deut. 25: 3. Son of death; that is, deserving death, 2 Sam. 12: 3. Son of perdition; that is, deserving perdition, John 17: 12. (12.) Son of God, by excellence above all; Jesus, the Son of God, Mark 1: 1. Luke 1: 15. John 1: 34. Rom. 1: 4. Heb. 4: 14. Rev. 2: 18. The only-begotten; and in this he differs from Adam, who was son of God by immediate creation, Luke 3: 18. (13.) Sons of God, the angels; (Job 1: 6. 38: 7.) perhaps so called in respect to their possessing power delegated from God; his deputies, his vicegerents, and in that sense, among others, his offspring. (14.) Genuine Christians, truly pious persons; though these might be classed under the fifth head, since believers are the children of God by adoption; (Gal. 4: 5—7.) perhaps also they are so called in reference to their possession of principles communicated from God by the Holy Spirit, which, correcting every evil bias, and subduing every perverse propensity, gradually assimilates the party to the temper, disposition, and conduct, called the image, likeness, or resemblance of God. (See John 1: 12. Phil. 2: 15. Rom. 8: 14. 1 John 3: 1.)—Calmet.

SON OF GOD; a term applied in the Scriptures not only to magistrates and saints, but more particularly to Jesus Christ. Christ, says bishop Pearson, has a fourfold right to this title. 1. By generation, as begotten of God, Luke 1: 35. 2. By commission, as sent by him, John 10: 34, 36. 3. By resurrection, as the first-born, Acts 13: 32, 33. 4. By actual possession, as heir of all, Heb. 1: 2, 5.

But, besides these four, many think that he is called the Son of God in such a way and manner as never any other was, is, or can be, because of his own divine nature, he being the true, proper, and natural son of God, begotten by him before all worlds, John 3: 16. Rom. 8: 3. 1 John 4: 9. See Maclaurin's Sermons; Abadie on the Divinity of Christ; Fuller's Works; and article GENERATION, ETERNAL.—Hend. Buck.

SONNA, in Mohammedan law, is, according to the Book of Definitions, the observance of religion in matters respecting which there is no positive and necessary command; also the general practice of the prophets, with some few exceptions. The Sonna, therefore, comprises the Mohammedan traditions.—Hend. Buck.

SONNITES; the orthodox Mohammedans, who rigidly adhere to the traditions, and are famous for their opposition to the several heretical sects, especially the Shiites, who reject the traditions. The Turks belong to the former, the Persians to the latter sect.—Hend. Buck.

SOOFEEES, SOOFIES, SOPHIS, or SEFIS; a sect of Persian philosophers, who derive their name from the Arabic word soof, pure, meaning morally so,—wise, pious. (Gr. Sophoi.) They are scattered over the Persian empire.

Their fundamental tenets are said to be: That nothing exists absolutely but God; that the human soul is an emanation from his essence; and, though divided for a time from its heavenly source, will be finally reunited with it;

that the highest possible happiness will arise from its reunion: and that the chief good of mankind consists in as perfect a union with the eternal Spirit as the incumbances of a mortal frame will allow: that, for this purpose, they should break all connexion with extrinsic objects, and pass through life without attachments, as a swimmer in the ocean strikes freely without the impediments of clothes: that, if mere earthly charms have power to influence the soul, the idea of celestial beauty must overwhelm it in ecstatic light.

They maintain also, that for want of apt words to express the divine perfection, and the ardor of our devotion, we must borrow such expressions as approach the nearest to our ideas, and speak of beauty and love in a transcendent and mystical sense: that, like a reed torn from its native bank, like wax separated from its delicious honey, the soul of man bewails its disunion with melancholy music, and sheds burning tears; like the lighted taper, waiting passionately for the moment of its extinction, as a disengagement from earthly trammels, and the means of returning to its only Beloved. This theology prevails also among the learned Mussulmen, who avow it without reserve.

The late lamented missionary to that country, Mr. Martyn, calls them "Mystic Latitudinarians." Their rise was nearly coincident with Mohammedanism. The Soofeism of Persia is evidently the idealism of the eastern and western world. They express contempt for many of the tenets of Mohammedanism, dislike its forms, pretend to communion with the Deity, indifference to all opinions, and philosophical Pyrrhonism. Mr. Martyn asked Mirza Abulcasim (a Sooffee doctor)—"What were his feelings at the prospect of death—hope, fear, or neither?" "Neither, (said he) and that pleasure and pain were both alike." Mills' Mohammedans, pp. 476—482; Mission Register, 1818, p. 25; Christian Observer, 1819, p. 379.—Williams.

SORCERY; magic, conjuration. (See CHARMS; and WITCHCRAFT).—Hend. Buck.

SORROW; uneasiness or grief, arising from the privation of some good we actually possessed. It is the opposite to joy.

Though sorrow may be allowable under a sense of sin, and when involved in troubles, yet we must beware of an extreme. Sorrow, indeed, becomes sinful and excessive when it leads us to slight our mercies; causes us to be insensible to public evils; when it diverts us from duty; so oppresses our bodies as to endanger our lives; sours the spirit with discontent, and makes us inattentive to the precepts of God's word, and advice of our friends. In order to moderate our sorrows, we should consider that we are under the direction of a wise and merciful Being; that he permits no evil to come upon us without a gracious design; that he can make our troubles sources of spiritual advantage; that he might have afflicted us in a far greater degree; that, though he has taken some, yet he has left many other comforts; that he has given many promises of relief; that he has supported thousands in as great troubles as ours; finally, that the time is coming when he will wipe away all tears, and give to them that love him a crown of glory that fadeth not away. (See AFFLICTION; and RESIGNATION).—Hend. Buck.

SOUL; (Heb. nepesh, Greek, psuché;) the HUMAN MIND; that vital, active principle in man, which perceives, remembers, reasons, loves, hopes, fears, compares, desires, resolves, adores, imagines, and aspires after immortality.

Various, indeed, have been the opinions of philosophers concerning its substance. The Epicureans thought it a subtle air, composed of atoms, or primitive corpuscles. The Stoics maintained it was a flame, or portion of heavenly light. The Cartesians make thinking the essence of the soul. The sacred writers themselves use the word with some latitude; sometimes for the vegetative; sometimes for the sensitive; sometimes, and indeed most frequently, for the rational principle, or spirit, originally created in the image of God, and formed to find its happiness in fellowship with him. In this superior principle the human nature properly and distinctively consists; and hence it is, that in Scripture the word soul is so often used to express the whole man. This mode of speaking is never applied to any of the inferior animals; a distinction which interpreters have not properly observed. Hence, also, we see by comparing Matt. 16: 26. with Luke 9: 25. that our Lord uses the phrase, "lose his own soul," as equivalent to a man's losing "himself," or being "cast away." In this general sense the word is used in the New Testament about thirty times, and in the specific sense of mind, distinct from the body, about fifty times.

The rational soul is simple, uncompounded, and immaterial, that is, not composed of organized matter. (See MATERIALISM.) In the fourth volume of the Memoirs of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Manchester, the reader will find a very valuable paper, by Dr. Ferrier, proving, by evidence apparently complete, that every part of the brain has been injured without affecting the act of thought. It will be difficult for any man to persevere this without being convinced that the modern theory of the Materialists is shaken from its very foundation.

The immortality of the soul may be argued from its vast capacities, boundless desires, great improvements, dissatisfaction with the present state, and desire of some kind of religion. It is also argued from the consent of all nations; the consciousness that men have of sinning; the sting of conscience; the justice and providence of God. How far these arguments are conclusive, we will not say; but the safest, and, in fact, the only sure ground to go upon to prove this doctrine, is the word of God, where we at once see it clearly established, Matt. 10: 28. 25: 46. Dan. 12: 2. 2 Tim. 1: 10. 1 Thess. 4: 17, 18. SOUL, CARE OF. (See CARE.)

SOUL-SLEEPERS; a term sometimes applied to Materialists, because they admit no intermediate state between death and the resurrection. (See MATERIALISM.)

On this point, we shall prefer abstracting part of Dr. Campbell's reasoning from his Sixth Preliminary Dissertation. Having shown, that the Greek terms used for sleep, are used metaphorically, and relate simply to the resemblance between a body sleeping and a body dead, he proceeds to remark, 2dly, "That many expressions of Scripture do, in their natural and obvious sense, imply, that an intermediate and separate state of the soul is actually to succeed death. Such are the words of our Lord to the penitent thief upon the cross; (Luke 23: 43.) 'To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise.' Stephen's dying petition, (Acts 7: 59.) 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit.' The comparison which the apostle Paul makes, in different places, (2 Cor. 5: 6, &c. Phil. 1: 21.) between the enjoyment of true Christians can attain by their continuance in this world, and that which they enter on at their departure out of it; and several other passages. Let the words referred to be read by any judicious person, either in the original, or in the common translation, which is sufficiently exact for this purpose; and let him, setting aside all theory or system, say candidly, whether they would not be understood by the gross of mankind as presupposing, that the soul may and will exist separately from the body, and be susceptible of happiness or misery in that state.

"I remark, 3dly," adds Dr. Campbell, "that even the curious equivocation (or perhaps more properly, mental reservation) that has been devised for them, (by the Materialists,) will not, in every case, save the credit of apostolical veracity. The words of Paul to the Corinthians are: 'Knowing that whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord.' Again: 'We are willing rather to be absent from the body, and present with the Lord.' Could such expressions have been used by him, if he had held it impossible to be with the Lord, or to be anywhere without the body; and that, whatever the change was which was made by death, he could not be in the presence of the Lord until he returned to the body? Absence from the body and presence with the Lord, were never, therefore, more unfortunately combined than in this illustration.

Things are combined here as coincident, which, on the hypothesis of those gentlemen, are incompatible. If recourse be had to the original, the expressions in Greek are, if possible, still stronger. They are (οἱ ἐνέμουντες) 'those who dwell in the body,' who are (ἐκθέμουντες) at a distance from the Lord: as, on the contrary, they are (οἱ ἐκθέμουντες ἐκ τοῦ σώματος) those who have travelled out of the body, who are (οἱ ἐνέμουντες) those who reside, or are present, with the Lord. In the passage of Philipians also, the commencement of his (Paul's) presence with the Lord, is represented as coincident, not with his return to the body, but with his leaving it; with the dissolution, not with the restoration of the union."

The parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16: 19—31.) also affords argumentative evidence as well as a pointed illustration of this doctrine of a conscious intermediate state of the soul. No sooner was Lazarus dead, than "he was carried (not his body surely, but his soul) into his rest in Abraham's bosom." So also the rich man no sooner "died and was buried," than "in hell he lift up his eyes, being in torments." Now, it would certainly do violence to the language of our Lord, even supposing it to be pure imagery, to suppose the intervention, not only of years, but of thousands of years, between events so intimately connected in the narrative. SOUND; (1.) Whole; healthy, Luke 15: 27. (2.) True and substantial, Prov. 2: 7. 3: 21. (3.) Free from error, pure, salutary, 2 Tim. 1: 7. Tit. 1: 9. From the sole of the foot even to the crown of the head, there is no soundness; but wounds and bruises and putrefying sores, that have not been closed, nor bound up, nor mollified with ointment. In the whole state, governors and governed, small and great, country and city, there is nothing but sin unrepented of, and miseries unredressed, Isa. 1: 6.—Brown.

SOUND; (1.) To make a noise with a trumpet, or otherwise, Neh. 4: 18. (2.) To examine the depth of a sea or pond, Acts 27: 28. (3.) To search out one's intentions and designs, 1 Sam. 20: 12. The sounding of God's bowels is the discovery of his compassion, mercy, and love, Isa. 63: 15. The gospel is called a joyful sound, in allusion to the proclamations at the Jewish feasts, or of the year of release or jubilee, by the sound of trumpets. It is preached far and wide, reaches men's hearts, and brings them the good tidings of peace, salvation, and happiness, Rom. 10: 18. Ps. 89: 15.—Brown.

SOUTH. Sheba, Egypt, and Arabia, were the south in respect of Canaan, Matt. 12: 42. Dan 8: 9. 11: 5, &c. Num. 13: 29. Obad. 19. The south part of Judea, or Canaan, is called the south, Ezek. 20: 46. Gen. 13: 1, 3.—Brown.

SOUTH, (ROBERT, D. D.) an eminent English divine, was born, in 1638, at Hackney; was educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford; and, between 1660 and 1678, was, successively, public orator at Oxford, chaplain to the earl of Clarendon, prebendary of Westminster, chaplain to the duke of York, canon of Christ church, chaplain to the English ambassador in Poland, and rector of Islip, in Oxfordshire. In 1693, he carried on a controversy with Sherlock on the doctrine of the Trinity. Dr. South was a man of great wit, and did not spare to display it even on serious occasions. He is the author of Sermons, and Latin—and English Miscellaneous Works.—Davenport.

SOUTHCOTTIANS; the followers of Joanna Southcott, a well-known modern fanatic, in England. When a young woman, living in service at Exeter, she persuaded herself that she held converse with the devil, and communion with the Holy Ghost, by whom she pretended to be inspired. A dissenting minister faithfully warned her of the delusion; but some clergymen in the establishment giving credit to her claim, confirmed her in her pretensions.

In 1792, she assumed the character of a prophetess, and of the woman in the wilderness, and began to give sealed papers to her followers, which were called her seals, and which were to protect both from the judgments of the present, and a future life: and, strange as it must appear, thousands fell into the snare, and placed as much confidence in her certificates, as if they had been issued by the pope himself.

Her predictions were delivered both in humble prose and doggerel rhyme; and related, beside some personal threatenings against her opponents, to the denunciation of judgments on the surrounding nations, and a promise of the speedy approach of the millennium.

In the course of her mission, (as she called it,) several agents were employed; particularly a boy, who pretended to see visions, and attempted, instead of writing, to depict them on the walls of her temple, called "The House of God," in miserable daubings, corresponding with the style of her rhyming. A schism, however, took place among her followers; and an illiterate man, of the name of Carpenter, took possession of the place, and wrote against her; not denying her mission, but asserting she had exceeded it, and exposed herself to just censure.

Early in her last year she secluded herself from the society of the male sex, and fancied she was with child: yet, conscious (as since appears) that she had had no connexion with a man, she immediately concluded it must be the Holy Spirit. She now flattered herself that she was to bring forth the Shiloh promised by Jacob, and which she pretended was to be the second appearance of the Messiah. This child was to be born before the end of harvest; and she was certain it would be impossible for her to survive undelivered till Christmas. The harvest, however, was ended, and Christmas came, without the accomplishment of her predictions.

December 27th she died, and the symptoms were so decisive, that her disciples had no hope but in her resurrection. At the end, however, of four days and nights, the body appeared discolored, and began to exhibit signs of approaching putrefaction. She was then opened, in the presence of fifteen medical gentlemen, among whom were Dr. Sims and Dr. Reece. Mr. Want, and Mr. Matthias. It was now demonstrated that she was not pregnant; and that her complaints arose from bile and flatulency; from indulgence, and want of exercise.

In estimating her character since her death, Dr. Reece, who thought favorably of her while living, now charges her with deceit, and with attempting to impose on him; but thinks she would have made some confession of the cheat, but for her credulous attendants. "Finding herself (she said) gradually dying, she could not but consider her inspiration and prophecies as delusion." But one of her disciples replied: "Mother, we know that you are a favored woman of God, and that you will produce the promised child; and whatever you may say to the contrary, will not diminish our faith."

Mr. Matthias, another of her medical attendants, on contrasting her character with the ancient prophets, who were holy, devout, and self-denying characters, remarks, that "Joanna on all occasions sought publicity. I could never learn (says he) that she either watched, fasted, or prayed. On the contrary, she passed much of her time in bed, in downy indolence; ate much and often; and prayed—never. She loved to lodge delicately, and feast luxuriously."

The death of the prophetess, under circumstances that so completely disproved her mission, might very naturally be supposed to terminate the delusion of her followers; but it did no such thing. As if determined to be deceived, they still flattered themselves, that in some way or other she would again appear with the expected Shiloh.

A considerable number of this sect appears to have remained in Devonshire, where (as above stated) Joanna had resided. They separated, not only from the established church, but from all other religious communities, and are said, in one instance, almost to have strangled one woman who opposed them. Hughson's Hist. of Religious Impostors, no. 1—5; Carpenter's Missionary Magazine; Reece's Correct Statement, and Matthias' Case of Joanna Southcott; Evan. Mag. for February, 1815.—Williams.

SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD; is his power and right of dominion over his creatures, especially such as are guilty, to dispose and determine them as seemeth him good, Rom. 9: 14—29. 11: 33—36. 1 Cor. 1: 21—31. 4: 7. Matt. 11: 25—30. John 6: 37—40. This attribute is evidently demonstrated in the systems of creation, providence, and grace; and may be considered as absolute, universal, and everlasting, Dan. 4: 35. Eph. 1: 11. (See DOMINION, GOVERNMENT, POWER, and WILL OF GOD.) Cole on the Sovereignty of God; and Charnock on the Dominion of God in his Works, vol. i. p. 690; Edwards' Sermons, ser. 4.—*Hend. SOWING. Our Lord, in his parable of the sower, says, "Some seeds fell by the wayside, and the fowls came and devoured them." Buckingham, in his Travels in Palestine, remarks, "We ascended to an elevated plain where husbandmen were sowing, and some thousands of starlings covered the ground, as the wild pigeons do in Egypt, laying a heavy contribution on the grain thrown into the furrows, which are not covered by harrowing, as in Europe." The sowing "beside all waters," mentioned by Isaiah, seems to refer to the sowing of rice, which is done on low grounds flooded, and prepared for sowing by being trodden by oxen and asses, mid-leg deep; thus, they send "forth thither the feet of the ox and the ass."—Watson.

SPAN; a measure of three handbreadths, or near eleven inches, Exod. 28: 16. God's spanning, or measuring out the heavens, imports how easily he knows and governs the heavens, and all their contents, Isa. 40: 12. 48: 13.—Brown.

SPARROW; (tsephur, Gen. 7: 14, and afterwards frequently; stronthion, Matt. 10: 29; Luke 12: 6, 7.) a little bird everywhere known. The Hebrew word is used not only for a sparrow, but for all sorts of clean birds, or for those the use of which was not forbidden by the law. That the sparrow is not intended in Psalm 102: 7, is evident from several circumstances; for that is intimated to be a bird of night, one that is both solitary and mournful; none of which characteristics is applicable to the sparrow, which rests by night, is gregarious and cheerful. It seems rather to mean a bird melancholy and drooping, much like one confined in a cage. (See SWALLOW.)—Watson.

SPEECH. (See LANGUAGE.)

SPENCER, (JOHN) an erudite divine, was born, in 1730, at Boughton, in Kent; was educated at Canterbury school, and at Corpus Christi college, Cambridge; became master of his college, archdeacon of Sudbury, and dean of Ely; and died in 1695. His chief works are, a Treatise on the Laws, &c. of the Jews; and a Discourse concerning Prodigies.—Davenport.

SPENCER, (THOMAS) a young dissenting minister of great promise, was born in Deptford, (Eng.) June 3, 1791. From childhood he displayed remarkable powers of mind, and most amiable dispositions; but his seriousness did not ripen into piety until he was about eleven years of age. At thirteen, he was bound apprentice to a glover; but his superior talents attracting the attention of his religious friends, he was placed for a time with the Rev. Mr. Hordle, and afterwards was received into the dissenting academy, at Hoxton, in January, 1807. Here he pursued his studies, and at the same time preached with immense popularity in the towns adjacent, and various parts of the kingdom. On leaving the institution, June 27, 1811, he was ordained pastor of an Independent congregation in Liverpool, and such crowds were attracted to his ministry, that it was found necessary to erect a new chapel on a large scale for their accommodation. He assisted in laying the corner stone, and delivered an interesting address on the occasion; but just as public expectation was at its highest pitch, he was drowned, while in the act of bathing in the river Mersey. The sensation produced by his sudden death was deep and widely spread. It was generally supposed that had he lived, he would have carried the art of preaching to a perfection never before attained in England. His excellence in this department, it is said, did not consist in the remarkable development of any one qualification for the pulpit, but in the exquisite combination and harmony of them all. His death took place August 5, 1811.—See Life of Rev. Thomas Spencer, by Rev. Dr. Raffles.

SPENER, (PHILIP JAMES, D. D.) a celebrated German divine, the Protestant Fenelon, was born in Rappoltsweiler, in the Upper Alsace, in Germany, January 13, 1635. From his birth he was devoted by his parents to God; and from his eminent usefulness in subsequent life, it was manifest that God had received him for his own. In the eighteenth year of his age, he received the degree of master of arts at the university of Strasburg. He subsequently became an excellent oriental scholar. In 1654, he was appointed preceptor to the two princes, duke Christian and duke Ernest John Charles, counts palatine upon the Rhine, and continued with them at Strasburg, a year and an half. He now devoted himself more exclusively to the study of theology. In 1663, he was called to the first place in the ministry of Strasburg, where he read lectures on divinity, history, geography, and politics. In 1666, he accepted a call to Frankfurt, where he founded his celebrated college of piety. (See PIETISTS.) Here he remained till 1681, when he was called to Dresden. The reason of his speedy dismissal from this place is thus represented: after the example of his predecessors, he sent a letter to the elector, in which, with the most profound respect, he laid before him the state of his soul. Some of the nobles represented this faithful dealing as an insult; and their argument, so far prevailed, that the elector resolved never to hear him again. He removed to Berlin, where, in the particular duties of his office, he published sixty-six sermons on regeneration. He published various tracts and sermons. A little before his death, which took place in 1705, he published his last and greatest work, "On the Divinity of Christ." Posterity has honored the memory of Spener.—Middleton, vol. iv. p. 121; Ency. Am.

SPENSER, (EDMUND) one of the greatest of English poets, was born, about 1553, in London, and was admitted a sizer of Pembroke hall, Cambridge, in 1569. In 1576, he published the Shepherd's Calendar, which he dedicated to Sir Philip Sidney, to whom he had been introduced in the preceding year. After having, from 1580 to 1582, been secretary to lord Grey, the lord lieutenant of Ireland, he obtained, in 1586, a grant of lands in the county of Cork. Residence being the condition on which he held the property, he took up his abode at Kilcolman; and it was there that he wrote the Faerie Queen, the peculiar stanza of which still goes by his name. The first three books were published in 1590, and inscribed to queen Elizabeth, who conferred on him a pension of fifty pounds per annum. He was subsequently sheriff of Cork, and clerk of the council of the province of Munster; in which latter capacity he drew up his View of the State of Ireland. The felicity which he had for several years enjoyed was, however, put an end to by the rebellion of Tyrone. His house was burnt, with one of his children, and he was compelled to fly to England, where he died, January 16, 1598-9, and was buried in Westminster abbey. Spenser was a Christian. His writings are full of exalted morality, purity, and devotion.—Davenport; Ency. Amer.

SPICE, SPICERY; any aromatic drug possessed of hot and pungent qualities, as ginger, pepper, nutmeg, cinnamon, cloves, cassia, frankincense, calamus, myrrh, &c. With spices the ancients seasoned their flesh. (Ezek. 24: 10.) gave their wine what flavor they pleased, (Sol. Song 8: 2.) perfumed their women, and their beds and clothes, (Esth. 2: 12. Prov. 7: 17. Ps. 14: 8.) and seasoned and embalmed their dead bodies, Mark 16: 1. 2 Chron. 16: 14. Jer. 34: 5. It seems they also burnt heaps of spices to honor the burial of their kings. The Arabians traded in carrying spices to Egypt, Gen. 37: 25. The graces of saints are compared to spices; they season, preserve, and purify nations and churches, Sol. Song 4: 12—14.—Brown.

SPIDER; (acabish, Job 8: 14. Isa. 49: 5.) an insect well known, remarkable for the thread which it spins, with which it forms a web of curious texture, but so frail that it is exposed to be broken and destroyed by the slightest accident. To the slenderness of this filmy workmanship, Job compares the hope of the wicked. This, says Dr. Good, was "doubtless a proverbial allusion; and so exquisite, that it is impossible to conceive any figure that can more fully describe the utter vanity of the hopes and prosperity of the wicked."

"Deceiving bliss! in bitter shame it ends;
His prop a cobweb, which an insect rears."

So Isaiah says, "They weave the web of the spider; of their webs no garment shall be made; neither shall they cover themselves with their works."—Watson.

SPIKENARD, (nard.) By this was meant a highly aromatic plant growing in the Indies, called "nardostachys," by Dioscorides and Galen; from whence was made the very valuable extract or unguent, or favorite perfume, used at the ancient baths and feasts, unguentum nardinum, unguentum nardi spicatae, which, it appears from a passage in Horace, was so valuable, that as much of it as could be contained in a small box of precious stone, was considered as a sort of equivalent for a large vessel of wine, and a handsome quota for a guest to contribute at an entertainment, according to the custom of antiquity:

*Nardo vina merebere:
Nardi parvus onyx eliciet cadum.*

"Bring you the odors, and a cask is thine.
Thy little box of ointment shall produce
A mighty cask." FRANCIS.

St. Mark (14: 3.) mentions "ointment of spikenard very precious," which is said to be worth more than three hundred denarii; and John (12: 3.) mentions a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly; the house was filled with the odor of the ointment; it was worth three hundred denarii. It is not to be supposed that this was a Syrian production, but the true "atar" of Indian spikenard; an unguent containing the very essence of the plant, and brought at a great expense from a remote country.—Watson.

SPINOSA, or SPINOZA, (BENEDICT, or BARUCH,) the head of the modern pantheists, was the son of a Portuguese Jew, and was born, in 1632, at Amsterdam. He quitted the Hebrew faith, and, after having been an Arminian and a Menonist, became an atheist. In private life, however, his character was unexceptionable. He died in 1677. His principal work, Tractatus Theologico Politicus, appeared in 1670, and roused a host of adversaries. His system is still further unfolded in his Posthumous Pieces. (See PANTHEISM.)—Davenport.

SPINOSISM. (See PANTHEISM.)

SPIRIT; (Heb. ruach, Gr. pneuma;) an incorporeal being or intelligence; in which sense God is said to be a Spirit, as are angels, and the human soul. (See SPIRITUALISTS.)

It is said, (Acts 23: 8.) that the Sadducees denied the existence of angels and spirits. Christ appearing to his disciples, said to them, (Luke 24: 39.) "Handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have." Heb. 1: 14, good angels are called ministering spirits. And in the gospel the devils are often called "unclean spirits, evil spirits, spirits of darkness," &c.

Spirit is sometimes taken for the disposition of the mind, or intellect. So, a spirit of jealousy, a spirit of fornication, a spirit of prayer, a spirit of infirmity, a spirit of wisdom and understanding, a spirit of fear of the Lord, &c. Num. 5: 14. Hos. 4: 12. Zech. 12: 10. Luke 13: 11. Eccles. 15: 5. Isa. 11: 2.

The Spirit of Christ, which animates true Christians, the children of God, and distinguishes them from the children of darkness, who are animated by the spirit of the world, is the gift of grace, of adoption, the Holy Spirit poured into our hearts, which imboldens us to call God, "My Father, my Father," Rom. 8: 5. Those who are influenced by this Spirit, "have crucified the flesh with its affections and lusts. If we live in the Spirit let us also walk in the Spirit," Gal. 5: 25. Rom. 8: 9, "Ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his."

Hence the Spirit, in the moral sense, is opposed to the flesh: (Rom. 7: 25.) "With the mind, or spirit, I myself serve the law of God: but with the flesh the law of sin." And chap. 8: 13. "If ye live after the flesh ye shall die; but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." Also, Gal. 5: 19, 22. "Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these; adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness," &c. "But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance."

DISTINGUISHING, or DISCERNING, OF SPIRITS, was a gift of God, which consisted in discerning whether a man were really inspired by the Spirit of God, or was a false prophet, an impostor, who only followed the impulse of his own spirit, or of Satan, 1 Cor. 12: 10. John exhorts believers not to believe every spirit, but to try the spirits, whether they were of God; because many false prophets had gone out into the world, 1 Epis. 4: 1.

TO QUENCH THE SPIRIT, (1 Thess. 5: 19.) is a metaphorical expression easily understood. The Spirit may be quenched, i. e. his divine illuminations and fervors suppressed, by sin, irregularity of manners, vanity, avarice, negligence, or other crimes contrary to purity, charity, truth, peace, and his other gifts and graces. In a contrary sense, (2 Tim. 1: 6.) we stir up the Spirit of God which is in us, by the practice of virtue, by our compliance with his inspirations, by fervor in his service, by renewing our gratitude, &c.

TO GRIEVE THE SPIRIT, Eph. 4: 30. We grieve the Spirit of God, by withstanding his holy inspirations, the motions of his grace; or by living in a lukewarm and in-cautions manner; by despising his gifts, or neglecting them; by abusing his favors, either out of vanity, curiosity, or indifference.—Hend. Buck; Calmet.

SPIRIT, HOLY. (See HOLY GHOST.)

SPIRITUALITY OF GOD, is his immateriality, or being without body. It expresses an idea (says Dr. Paley) made up of a negative part and of a positive part. The negative part consists in the exclusion of some of the known properties of matter, especially of solidity, of the vis inertiae, and of gravitation. The positive part comprises perception, thought, will, power, action, by which last term is meant the origination of motion. (See next article; and INCORPOREALITY OF GOD.)—Hend. Buck.

SPIRITUALISTS; those who, in opposition to the Materialists, believe that the soul is not the result of material organization, but is a spiritual principle capable of subsisting and exercising its faculties, independent of the bodily organs.

The spirituality of God is demonstrable from the contradictions necessarily resulting from the contrary supposition. No two particles of matter can exist in the same point of space; wherever, therefore, we admit of a material creature, we exclude the possibility of a material Deity, if such an expression may be at all allowed. Indeed, it seems absurd, if not impossible, to attribute any of the proper attributes of Deity, whether self-existence, eternity, or immensity, (to name no more,) to a material being, however pure or refined such material existence may be supposed. Indeed, Dr. Priestley himself, zealous as he is for the doctrine of Materialism, does not contend for the materiality of God, but only of the human soul or mind. All Christian Materialists admit a resurrection and future judgment. Those who maintain (with Spinoza just cited) the materiality of God, are atheists. The question may, therefore, be here confined to the spirituality of mind, or to the existence of created spirits.

That God is capable of creating spirits inferior to himself will hardly be denied, since that would be setting bounds to infinite power and wisdom; nor is their exist-tence denied on the ground of their impossibility, but on the supposed deficiency of evidence.

It is hardly possible, however, to admit the truth of the Scriptures, either of the Old Testament or the New, and deny the existence of angels, or spirits, of an order superior to mankind; and if we once admit their existence, we can set no limit to their number or variety. They may, for aught we know, be far more numerous than human beings.

Equally impossible is it to say, that similar spirits may not be united to the human frame; or even spirits of a lower order, to the corporeal forms of meaner animals. The latter, however, is merely conjectural: the point here argued is the immateriality of the human mind. The essential quality of mind is consciousness, which is not pretended to be an essential quality of matter. The only question is,—Whether consciousness may not result from some mechanism, or modification of matter? But under whatever form it can exist, it is but matter still; and whatever accidents of form, or color, &c., be added thereto, whether round or square, long or short, white or black, &c., none of these can have the least tendency to thought or consciousness. Again, if consciousness result from matter, it must exist in it; it cannot communicate what it does not possess. Farther, if consciousness reside in matter, it must be subject to the same law of divisibility, and so one conscious particle may be divided indefinitely, if not infinitely; and one man possessing a thousand conscious particles (in the brain, suppose) would possess a thousand consciousnesses.

But cannot God add to matter such a quality of consciousness? It is hard to say what God cannot do; but one thing we know, he cannot contradict himself. If, therefore, such addition imply a contradiction, as above suggested, it can be no degradation to him to deny it.

The great objection to the doctrine of a soul, or immaterial spirit, arises from certain anatomists who cannot discover any spiritual principle lodged in the human brain after death! as one gravely said, "he had dissected thousands of bodies, but never found a soul!" On the other hand, some anatomists attempt to prove, that mind cannot arise from any mechanism in the brain, because there is no part of it but, in some instance or other, has been destroyed, without any material injury to the mind.

The safest way for Christians, however, is to inquire of the Word of God. What does he say? (See SOUL, and SOUL-SLEEPERS.) Drew on the Soul, part i. chap. i.; Doddridge's Lect., lec. 47; Dwight's Syst. of Theol., vol. i. ser. 23; Dr. Ferriar's paper in the Memoirs of the Liter. and Philo. Society of Manchester; Mr. Grainger's Orat. before the Medical Society of Lond., 1823; Lacon, vol. ii.—Williams.

SPIRITUALIZE, to interpret and apply historical, or other parts of the Bible, in what is called a spiritual manner; more properly, to allegorize. The sense thus brought out is termed the spiritual sense; and those preachers or expositors who are most ready and most extravagant in eliciting it, are the most highly esteemed by the unlearned and persons of an uncultivated taste.

It is impossible adequately to describe the excesses and absurdities which have been committed by such teachers. From the time of Origen, who allegorized the account of the creation of the world, the creation and fall of man, and numerous other simple facts related in the Bible, down to the Jesuit who made the greater light to mean the pope, and the lesser light and the stars to mean the subjection of kings and princes to the pope, there have been multitudes in and out of the Catholic church who have pursued the same path.

In the present day it is repudiated by all enlightened and sober-minded teachers, and is only to be met with in places of worship served by persons of coarse and illiterate habits, or an unbridled imagination; or who, for the sake of advantage, aim at the causing of their persons to be held in admiration by the great swelling words of vanity to which they give utterance. It happened only lately (1831) that a noted preacher in London, when expounding the history of Joseph, made out Pharaoh to mean God the Father, and Joseph the Son. As Joseph interpreted Pharaoh's dreams, so Christ interpreted the will of the Father. Potiphar's wife signified the sinful humanity, which, according to the preacher, our Lord assumed. The prison signified the prison of hell, to which Christ went after his death. The chief butler, who was restored, typified a number of damned spirits whom Christ then liberated; and the chief baker was a type of the rest who were left—cut off from their head, Christ! Such a mode of interpretation may astound persons of weak minds, but it is most irreverent and dangerous. For, what can sooner lead the unconverted, who may possess a sound and discriminating natural judgment, to reject the Scriptures altogether, than to hear of important doctrines drawn equally from the first chapter of First Chronicles, and from any other part of the Bible? It is one thing to explain a passage literally, and then deduce from it spiritual and practical reflections; and another, to represent it as directly and positively teaching certain spiritual truths, or apply it to subjects with which it has no manner of connexion whatever. See Stuart's Ernesti, p. 37; Horne's Introduction; Bib. Repos., 1831.—Hend. Buck.

SPIRITUAL-MINDEDNESS; that disposition implanted in the mind by the Holy Spirit, by which it is inclined to love, delight in, and attend to spiritual things. The spiritual-minded highly appreciate spiritual blessings, are engaged in spiritual exercises, pursue spiritual objects, are influenced by spiritual motives, and experience spiritual joys. To be spiritually-minded, says St. Paul, is life and peace, Rom. 8: 6. See Dr. Owen's excellent Treatise on this subject.—Hend. Buck.

SPONSORS, are those persons who, in the office of baptism, answer, or are surties, for the persons baptized. (See GODFATHERS.)—Hend. Buck.

SPORTS, BOOK OF; a book or declaration, drawn up by bishop Morton, in the reign of king James I., to encourage recreations and sports on the Lord's day. It was to this effect: "That for his good people's recreation, his majesty's pleasure was, that, after the end of divine service, they should not be disturbed, letted, or discouraged, from any lawful recreations; such as dancing, either of men or women; archery for men; leaping, vaulting, or any such harmless recreations; nor having of may-games, whitsunales, or morrice-dances; or setting up of may-poles, or other sports therewith used, so as the same may be had in due and convenient time, without impediment or let of divine service; and that women should have leave to carry rushes to the church for the decorating of it, according to their old customs; withal prohibiting all unlawful games to be used on Sundays only; as bear-baiting, bull-baiting, interduels, and at all times (in the meaner sort of people prohibited) bowling." Two or three restraints were annexed to the declaration, which deserve the reader's notice: 1. "No recusant (i. e. papist) was to have the benefit of this declaration. 2. Nor such as were not present at the whole of divine service. Nor, 3. Such as did not keep to their own parish churches, that is, Puritans."

This declaration was ordered to be read in all the parish churches of Lancashire, which abounded with papists; and Wilson adds, that it was to have been read in all the churches of England; but that archbishop Abbot, being at Croydon, flatly forbade its being read there. In the reign of king Charles I., archbishop Laud put the king upon republishing this declaration, which was accordingly done. The court had their balls, masquerades, and plays, on the Sunday evenings; while the youth of the country were at their morrice-dances, may-games, church and clerk ales, and all such kind of revelling. The severe pressing of this declaration made sad havoc among the Puritans, as it was to be read in the churches. Many poor clergymen strained their consciences in submission to their superiors. Some, after publishing it, immediately read the fourth commandment to the people: "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy;" adding, "This is the law of God, the other, the injunction of man." Some put it upon their curates, whilst great numbers absolutely refused to comply: the consequence of which was, that several clergymen were actually suspended for not reading it.—Hend. Buck.

SPRING, (SAMUEL, D. D.), minister of Newburyport, Massachusetts, was born in Uxbridge, February 27, 1746, and graduated at Princeton college, in 1771. He was the only chaplain in Arnold's detachment, which penetrated through the wilderness of Maine to Quebec, in 1775. On his return, in 1776, he left the army. He was ordained August 6, 1777, and died March 4, 1819, aged seventy-three. His wife was a daughter of Dr. Hopkins, minister of Hadley; his two sons, ministers in New York and in Hartford, Connecticut. Besides his labors as minister, Dr. Spring performed various other important public services; he was one of the founders of the Massachusetts Missionary society in 1799, and its president; he assisted also in founding the theological seminary at Andover, and the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, of which he was one of the prudential committee. In his theological views he accorded with Drs. Hopkins, Bellamy, and West, who were his teachers. He was distinguished for metaphysical acuteness. He published Friendly Dialogue on the nature of Duty, 1784; Disquisitions and Strictures on Rev. D. Tappan's Letters to Philalethes, 1789; and various sermons.—Allen.

STACKHOUSE, (THOMAS,) a divine, was born in 1680, but the place of his birth is not known; became, in 1733, after many vicissitudes, vicar of Benham, in Berkshire; and died there in 1752. He wrote several works, of which the most important is, a History of the Bible. It has been often reprinted.—Davenport.

STACTE; a drug, which was one of the four ingredients composing the sacred perfume, Exod. 30: 34, 35. It is understood to be the prime kind of myrrh; myrrh distilling, dropping, from the tree, of its own accord, without incision. So Pliny, speaking of the trees whence myrrh is produced, says, "Before any incision is made, they exude of their own accord what is called stacte, to which no kind of myrrh is preferable." (Nat. Hist. lib. xii. cap. 15.)—Calmet.

STADIUM. (See GAMES.)

STANCARISTS; those who held with Stancar, a Lutheran divine, in opposition to Osiander, that we are justified by the righteousness inherent in, and wrought out by the human nature of Christ alone, irrespective of his divine nature.—Hend. Buck.

STANISLAUS, bishop of Cracow, in the eleventh century, lived in a most pious and exemplary manner, and performed the duties of his functions with assiduity and devotion. He was murdered by Bolislaus, the second king of Poland, whose crimes and debaucheries he had rebuked. The tyrant first despatched his soldiers to perform the bloody task; but when they came into the presence of Stanislaus, awed by his venerable aspect, they were unable to fulfil their promise. The king, finding they had not obeyed his orders, stormed at them violently, snatched a dagger from one of them, ran furiously to the chapel, where, finding Stanislaus at the altar, he plunged the weapon to his heart.—Fox.

STAR. Under the name of stars, the Hebrews comprehended all constellations, planets, and heavenly bodies; all luminaries, except the sun and moon. The Psalmist, to exalt the power and omniscience of God, says, "he numbers the stars and calls them by their names." He is described as a king taking a review of his army, and knowing the name of every one of his soldiers. To express a very extraordinary increase and multiplication, Scripture uses the similitude of the stars of heaven, or of the sands of the sea, Gen. 15: 5. 22: 17. 26: 4. Exod. 32: 13, &c. In times of disgrace and public calamity, it is said, the stars withhold their light; that they are covered with darkness; that they fall from heaven, and disappear. These figurative and emphatic expressions, which are borrowed from the last revolution of nature, refer to the governing powers of nations, and are only weakened and enervated by being explained.

The star foretold by Balaam, (Num. 24: 17.), was, according to the modern Jews, king David, who conquered the Moabites, and reduced them under his obedience. But the paraphrasts Onkelos and Jonathan explain it of the Messiah, as the natural sense of the passage. The Jews were so well convinced of this, at the time of Christ, and afterwards, that the famous impostor Bar-chaliba caused himself to be called Bar-cocheba, "son of the star," pretending to be the Messiah; which involved the Jews of Palestine in a revolt, that completed the ruin of their unfortunate nation.—Calmet.

STAROBRADSI, or OLD CEREMONIALISTS; Russian dissenters, who broke off from the dominant church in the latter half of the seventeenth century, in consequence of the numerous corrections which were introduced into the printed copies of the church service, and which they considered to be corruptions foisted in with a view to undermine the faith. They would have nothing to do with the revised copies, with those who used them, or with any church into the service of which they were admitted; but collected all the old images, and copies of the Scriptures and church books; worshipped by themselves; rebaptized such as had been baptized after the schism; and strictly enforced non-communication, even in eating and drinking, with the innovators, or such as approved of, and conformed to the use of the corrected books. In a short time the members of this separation amounted to nearly one hundred thousand; and though they have been subject to some severe persecutions, especially one in 1764, when twenty thousand of them were banished to people the wilds of Siberia, their number has continued to increase, and is supposed now to amount to several hundred thousands. They have a great number of churches, besides monasteries and nunneries.—Hend. Buck.

STATER; a piece of money of the value of one shekel, Matt. 17: 37. (See MONEY.)—Calmet.

STATUTE, BLOODY, or the law of the six articles; a law enacted in the reign of Henry VIII., which denounced death against all those who should deny the doctrine of transubstantiation; or maintain the necessity of receiving the sacrament in both kinds, or affirm that it was lawful for priests to marry, that vows of celibacy might be broken, that private masses were of no avail, and that auricular confession to a priest was not necessary to salvation.—Hend. Buck.

STAUGHTON, (WILLIAM, D. D.,) one of the most accomplished pulpit orators ever seen in this country, was born in Coventry, England, 1770. He prosecuted his studies preparatory to the ministry in Bristol institution. In the year 1793, he came to America and preached with the Baptist church in Georgetown, South Carolina, for about seventeen months. He then removed to New Jersey, and spent several years in the instruction of youth and in preaching. In 1805, he became pastor of the First Baptist church in Philadelphia. After a successful ministry of several years, he became the pastor of a new Baptist church which was formed in Sansom street, in the same city. Here he labored with great popularity and usefulness as a preacher, as an instructor, a professor of theology and pulpit eloquence, and as the Corresponding Secretary of the Baptist Board of Foreign Missions, till 1823, when he removed to Washington city, and assumed the office of president of Columbian college. In 1827, he resigned his office and returned to Philadelphia, where he remained as a preacher till the summer of 1829, when he was elected president of the Georgetown college, Kentucky. On his way to Kentucky, he was attacked, at Washington city, by a disease which terminated his life, December 12, 1829.

The name of Dr. Staughton will long awake in many minds the most delightful recollections. He is described as one of the most amiable, talented, noble-hearted, useful, and pious of men. As a teacher, he was eminently successful not only in imparting instruction, but in securing, by the most lasting ties, the affection and respect of his pupils; as a preacher, his popularity has been equalled by few. "After all, the pulpit was his appropriate place. It was there he won his great reputation. No preacher made us feel as he did what a powerful and glorious instrument the pulpit is. Preaching Christ was his delight and his glory. At whatever point in the great circle of truth he took his position, he always directed the eye of the hearer to Christ the glorious centre." His mind was one of the most active ever known, and he had acquired that habit, without which no man ever excelled as a preacher, of associating all his mental acquisitions, by relations connected with the pulpit. There he stood the unrivalled preacher. His voice was the finest ever heard. It is said to have united the clearness and strength of Webster, the rich deep volume of Clay, and the subduing sweetness of Sumnerfield, with a variety and flexibility of intonation all his own. His mode of preparing his sermons also was adapted to give effect to his oratory. He combined the benefits of careful preparation with the freedom of extemporaneous thoughts and language. His diction was pure, flowing, rich and melodious. By treating his subjects in the textual mode he secured inexhaustible variety, and each discourse was a complete exposition and illustration of his text. His selection too was exquisite. His texts were as apples of gold in pictures of silver. No unprofitable disquisitions were heard in his pulpit. He proclaimed the gospel as the primitive preachers proclaimed it; and with all the arguments which the word of God supplies, he urged and besought men to repent and believe. And not in vain. Many hundreds were the seals of his ministry in the Lord. His memory is precious. The churches of Christ at home, and the distant heathen, have been glad for him; and the history of the American Baptists must ever bear on one of its brightest pages the name of STAUGHTON.

He was benevolent, both from feeling and principle. Not only was he the untiring, powerful, and disinterested advocate of the religious charities of the age, but he attended personally to the wants of the poor, and never seemed more happy than when ministering to their comfort and soothing their sorrows. Besides his professional efforts as a preacher, he composed and delivered lectures on botany and sacred and profane history. He was well acquainted with the different branches of physical science, and a copious contributor to several periodical works, from which a very interesting volume, containing the productions of his pen, might be compiled. It would be a treasure of able essays, ingenious criticisms, striking anecdotes, and beautiful poetry.—Memoir of Dr. Staughton, by Rev. Mr. Lynd: Am. Bapt. Mag., no. 211.

STEADFASTNESS. (See CONSTANCY.)

STENNETT, (JOSEPH,) son of the Rev. Edward Stennett, was born at Abingdon, in the year 1663. Having an example of exalted piety in his father, it is not to be wondered at that he very early evinced a serious and pious disposition. He commenced his education at Wallingford, at the grammar-school; besides what he was taught there he made himself master of the French, Italian, and Hebrew, and other Oriental languages, and made great proficiency in the liberal sciences and philosophy. He came to London in the year 1685, and, for five years, employed himself in the education of youth. He had been impressed with a deep sense of the value of English liberty, and had early felt the effects of persecution, having attended his father while in prison in the preceding reign. He was said to be the author of some of the poems on state affairs, which were printed privately at the time, but collected together and published just after the revolution.

About the year 1688 he was prevailed upon to appear in the pulpit, and preached at different places. The congregation who met, first at Devonshire square, and afterwards at Pinner's hall, having, for some time, been deprived of their pastor, Mr. Francis Bampton (who, after various sufferings, and many years' confinement, died at last in prison, on account of his religion) fixed upon Mr. Stennett as his successor; he might have taken stations which would have been more to his temporal advantage, but, as this church agreed with him in sentiments, particularly on the observance of the Sabbath on the seventh day, he preferred their invitation. He was ordained on the 4th of March, 1690, after which he continued their faithful and affectionate pastor till his death, though he had many temptations to leave them, as preferments were offered to him in the established church, which would have introduced him to high and lucrative stations. One eminent prelate of that time observed to a friend of Mr. Stennett, that "if Mr. Stennett could be reconciled to the church, he believed that few preferments in it would be thought above his merit."

In 1696 he drew up the address of the Baptists to king William, on his deliverance from the assassination plot, and presented it to the king on the 9th of April.

Though he was naturally averse to disputation, he was several times engaged in disputes, amongst others with Mr. Penn, the Quaker, captain Hedworth, &c. In the year 1702, a work, written by Mr. D. Russen, against the Baptists, made its appearance. Mr. Stennett was requested to answer it, which he immediately did, with so much skill and judgment that his antagonist did not venture a reply.

He was one of the committee appointed by the dissenters to draw up their address to the queen, which was presented in June, 1706.

Mr. Stennett died at Knaphill, in Buckinghamshire, in July, 1713. His works, that have been published, consist of three volumes of sermons, one of poetry, his Answer to Mr. Russen, &c.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

STENNETT, (DR. JOSEPH,) son of the preceding, was born in London, the 6th of November, 1692. He was baptized at the age of fifteen, and received into the church. His tutors were the well known Mr. Ainsworth, author of the Latin Dictionary, and Dr. Ward, professor of rhetoric in Gresham college. At the age of twenty-two he went to Abergavenny, where he was some time minister of a Baptist church. From this place he removed to Leominster, and from thence to Exeter, in 1719, where he continued till 1737. He then received an invitation from the church in Wild street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, on which he came to London, and remained with this church during his life; being highly esteemed, not only by his own charge and other dissenters of the time, but also by some of the cabinet ministers of George the Second, amongst whom Arthur Oastlow, Esq., speaker of the house of commons, was his particular friend. He died at Watford, of a mortification in the foot, occasioned by the extraction of a corn.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

STENNETT, (SAMUEL, D. D.,) son of the last mentioned, was born at Exeter, in 1727. Being designed for the ministry, his earlier studies were pursued under the direction of the Rev. Mr. Hubbard, theological tutor at Stepney, and Dr. John Walker, the celebrated linguist, of the academy at Mile End. Under these tutors he attained to a great proficiency in the classic and the Oriental tongues. He was baptized when very young by his father, and from that time he became a member of the church. His elder brother, Mr. Joseph Stennett, was called upon to assist his father in April, 1740, in which capacity he remained about two years and a half, after which he removed to Coate, in Oxfordshire. About four years after this, Mr. Samuel Stennett was requested to take the station which his brother had vacated; he accordingly did so, and assisted in the ministry about ten years.

In the year 1758 he was ordained to the pastoral office of that church, as successor to his father. The duties of this office he discharged in a faithful and affectionate manner, for thirty-seven years. In the earlier part of his ministry, he educated some young persons at his own house, whose acquirements redounded greatly to his credit. He was afterwards obliged to give up this occupation, in consequence of the number of other engagements that required his attention. In his private life, Dr. Stennett displayed a very amiable and exemplary disposition, the good effects of which were particularly observable in his family: and he had the happiness of seeing his son, Mr. Joseph Stennett, enter upon the ministry of the gospel.

In the year 1795, the death of Mrs. Stennett took place, an affliction which preyed much upon his mind, although he bore it with great patience and submission. For the last few years of his life he resided at Muswell Hill, near Highgate, at which place he died, August the 25th, 1795, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, deeply regretted, not only by his own friends and denomination, but by all who had known him or heard of his character.

He was the author of "Sermons on Personal Religion;" "Discourses on Domestic Duties;" "Discourses on the Parable of the Sower;" and on the "Divine Authority and various Uses of the Holy Scriptures." His sermons are deservedly admired for elegance of language, and solidity and clearness of argument; he likewise wrote two volumes in reply to Dr. Addington, on the Baptistal Controversy; besides a number of hymns and other short pieces. A uniform edition of his works (excepting his pieces on baptism) was published in three volumes octavo, London, 1824, with a memoir of his life and writings.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

STEPHANAS; a Christian of Corinth, whose pious family Paul baptized; (probably about A. D. 52, 1 Cor. 1: 16.) and they "addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints." He also was forward to the service of the church, and came to Paul at Ephesus, 1 Cor. 16: 15, 17.—Calmet.

STEPHEN, the first Christian martyr, was probably a Hellenistic Jew, and Epiphanius thinks he was among the seventy disciples; but this is not probable. He is always put first among the deacons in the church at Jerusalem; and it is believed he had studied at the feet of Gamaliel. He was full of the Holy Spirit, of faith, and of zeal, and performed many miracles, Acts 6: 5—8. His success in diffusing Christianity led to his arrest by the sanhedrim. Stephen appeared in the midst of this assembly with a countenance like that of an angel, and upon the high-priest asking him what he had to answer, he calmly denied that he had said any thing against Moses or the temple; but by a striking appeal to all the leading facts in their past history, he showed that the Jews had always at first opposed the deliverers God had sent; upbraided them with the like hardness of their hearts, and with slaying the MESSIAH himself. His boldness enraged them to madness, and they stoned him to death. His last words were, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge," and "receive my spirit." And when he had said this, he fell asleep, an example of the majesty and meekness of true Christian heroism; and as the first, so also the pattern, of all subsequent martyrs. His Christian brethren forsook not the remains of this holy man; but took care to bury him, and accompanied his funeral with great mourning, Acts 8: 2.—Watson; Calmet.

STEWART; one who manages the affairs, or superintends the household of another. Thus Eliezer was the steward of Abraham's house; (Gen. 15: 2.) Christian ministers are the stewards of God over his church or family (Tit. 1: 7. 1 Cor. 4: 1, 2.) and believers are stewards of his gifts and graces, to dispense the benefits of them to the world, 1 Pet. 4: 10. "Now it is required of stewards (says St. Paul) that a man be found FAITHFUL."

On reading the parable of the unjust steward, who defrauds his principal by collusion with his debtors, (Luke 16) we ought to observe the point to which our Saviour confines his illustration—the policy of the conduct pursued. Now what would be an unjust policy in that case, is permitted of God to the stewards of his earthly bounty; and by freely using this privilege in showing mercy to the poor, they may secure friends for eternity. Christian generosity is therefore true policy.

May not our Lord's inference he thus fully understood? "This steward could only expect that his friends would receive and maintain him, so long as what he could claim of this value, or stock, of oil or of wheat lasted: when that was exhausted they would desire his absence; but, contrary to this, I advise you, by your management of worldly riches, to make friends; friends who may receive you into, not temporary, but lasting residence; who may welcome your arrival, not into a mere transitory shelter, but into an ever-abiding felicity. I press this upon you because riches are so slippery, so perverting, so delusive, that they may well be called DECEITFUL; and they but too often are allurements to unrighteousness; to unrighteous modes of acquiring them, and to unrighteous modes of disposing of them; but if they be used with a disposition of mind contrary to that of this unjust steward, if, instead of being wickedly withheld, they be justly and liberally circulated, and, as it were, brought to account, the benevolence of true piety will direct them to such salutary purposes, as may lay many worthy but necessitous persons under great obligations: and these, should you be involved in distress here below, will do their utmost to soothe and relieve you; or they will hereafter congratulate your happy reception into never-ending beatitude and glory."—Calmet.

STEWART, (DUGALD, Esq.,) an eminent philosopher and writer, was born in 1753, at Edinburgh, and was the son of the professor of mathematics; was educated at the high school and university of his native city; and attended the lectures of Dr. Reid at Glasgow. From Glasgow he was recalled, in his nineteenth year, to assist his father; on whose decease, in 1785, he succeeded to the professorship. He, however, exchanged it for the chair of moral philosophy, which he had filled in 1778, during the absence of Dr. Ferguson in America. In 1780, he began to receive pupils into his house; and many young noblemen and gentlemen, who afterwards became celebrated, imbibed their knowledge under his roof. It was not till 1792, that he came forward as an author; he then published the first volume of the Philosophy of the Human Mind. He died June 11, 1828; after having long enjoyed the reputation of being one of the most amiable of men, and one of the ablest of modern philosophical writers.

As a writer of the English language,—as a public speaker,—as an original, a profound, and a cautious thinker,—as an expounder of truth,—as an instructor of youth,—as an elegant scholar,—as an accomplished gentleman;—in the exemplary discharge of the social duties,—in uncompromising consistency and rectitude of principle,—in unbending independence,—in the warmth and tenderness of his domestic affections,—in sincere and unostentatious piety,—in the purity and innocence of his life, few have excelled him: and, take him for all in all, it will be difficult to find a man, who, to so many of the perfections, has added so few of the imperfections, of human nature. Among his works are, Outlines of Moral Philosophy; Philosophical Essays; Memoirs of Adam Smith, and Drs. Robertson and Reid; and Prefatory Dissertations in the Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica.—Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.

STILES, (EZRA, D. D.,) president of Yale college, the son of Isaac Stiles, minister of North Haven, Connecticut, was born December 15, 1727. He was graduated in 1746, and in 1749 was chosen tutor, in which station he remained six years. After having preached occasionally, his impaired health and some temporary doubt respecting the truth of Christianity induced him to pursue the study of the law. In 1753, he took the attorney's oath at New Haven, and practised at the bar till 1755. But, having resumed preaching, he was ordained, October 22, 1755, minister of the second Congregational church in Newport, Rhode Island. In March, 1776, the events of the war dispersed his congregation, and induced him to remove to Dighton. He afterwards preached at Portsmouth. In 1777, he was chosen president of Yale college, as successor of Mr. Clap, and continued in this station till his death, May 12, 1795, aged sixty-seven.

President Stiles was one of the most learned men of whom this country can boast. He had a thorough knowledge of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages, the former of which he learned when he was about forty years of age; he had made considerable progress in the Samaritan, Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic; on the Persian and Coptic he had bestowed some attention; and the French he read with great facility. He was a most impressive and eloquent preacher, for he spoke with that zeal and energy, which the deepest interest in the most important subjects cannot fail to inspire. The doctrines of the trinity in unity, of the divinity and atonement of Christ, with the capital principles of the great theological system of the doctrines of grace, he believed to have been the uninterrupted faith of eight-tenths of Christendom from the ascension of Jesus Christ to the present day. In the cause of civil and religious liberty he was an enthusiast. He contended, that the right of conscience and private judgment was unalienable; and that no exigencies of the Christian church could render it lawful to erect any body of men into a standing judicatory over the churches. He engaged also with zeal in the cause of his country. He published many discourses on public occasions, and a History of the three judges of king Charles I.—Whalley, Goffe, and Dixwell, 12mo, 1795; in which he discloses very fully his sentiments on civil liberty, and predicts a "republican renovation" in England. He left an unfinished ecclesiastical history of New England, and more than forty volumes of manuscripts. An interesting account of his life was published by his son-in-law, Dr. Holmes, in 1798.—Allen.

STILLINGFLEET, (EDWARD, D. D.,) bishop of Worcester, a learned English prelate, was born in 1635, at Cranbourne, in Dorsetshire; was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge; obtained various preferments, among which were, in 1677 and 1678, the archdeaconry of London and the deanery of St. Paul's; was promoted to the see of Worcester at the revolution; and died in 1699. His works form six volumes folio; among them are Origines Sacrae, and Origines Britannicae. In 1659, he printed his "Irenicum, a Weapon Salve for the Church's Wounds; or, the Divine Right of particular Forms of Church Government, discussed and examined according to the Principles of the Law of Nature, the positive Laws of God, the Practice of the Apostles and the Primitive Church, and the Judgment of Reformed Divines; where by a Foundation is laid for the Church's Peace, and the Accommodation of our present Differences." Bishop Burnet remarks of this work, that it was esteemed a masterpiece. He adds, that it took with many, but was cried out upon by others, as an attempt against the church. Yet the argument was managed with so much learning and skill, that none of either side ever undertook to answer it. The writing of it was a great snare to the author: for, to avoid the imputations which it brought upon him, he not only retracted the book, but he went into the humors of a high sort of people, beyond what became him, perhaps beyond his own sense of things. Among his latest literary efforts was a controversy with Locke, on some points in the Essay on Human Understanding. See Life of Stillingfleet; Burnet's History of his own Times; Life of Tillotson.—Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.

STILLMAN, (SAMUEL, D. D.) a distinguished minister of Boston, was born in Philadelphia, February 27, 1737. When he was eleven years of age his parents removed to Charleston, South Carolina, and in an academy in that city he received the rudiments of his education. The preaching of Mr. Hart was the means of his conversion to God. Being ordained at Charleston, February 26, 1759, he immediately afterwards settled at James' island; but his impaired health induced him, in 1760, to remove to Bordentown, New Jersey, where he preached two years, and then went to Boston. After being an assistant about a year in the second Baptist church, he was installed the minister of the first church, as successor of Mr. Condy, January 9, 1765. Here he continued his benevolent labors, universally respected and beloved, till his death by a paralytic shock, March 13, 1807, aged sixty-nine.

As an eloquent preacher of the gospel Dr. Stillman held the first rank. Embracing the peculiar doctrines of the Christian religion, he explained and enforced them with clearness, and with apostolic intrepidity and zeal. He possessed a pleasant and most commanding voice, and, as he felt what he spoke, he was enabled to transfuse his own feelings into the hearts of his auditors. The deity and atonement of the Lord Jesus Christ, and their relation to the wants of perishing sinners, were his frequent themes. The total moral depravity of man was a principle on which in his preaching he much insisted; and he believed that the Christian was dependent on God's immediate agency for the origin and continuance of every gracious exercise. From his clear apprehension of eternal personal election, he was led to believe the perseverance unto eternal glory of all those who are regenerated by the Spirit of God. In the chamber of sickness and affliction, he was always welcome among different denominations. His uncommon vivacity and energy of feeling were united with a perfect sense of propriety, and with affability, ease, and politeness. His high Christian excellence made his name proverbial as the "good Dr. Stillman." Besides "Apostolic Preaching," in three discourses, and many occasional sermons, published during his life, an octavo volume of twenty sermons was published in 1808.—Allen.

STOCK, (RICHARD, M. A.) a laborious and successful divine of the English church, was born at York, England. At eighteen, he was admitted at St. John's college, Cambridge, and soon became chosen scholar of that college. On leaving the university, having refused a fellowship, he was soon settled in London, where he was most indefatigable in his labors, and where his preaching was most signally blessed; more people professing themselves to have been effectually converted under him, than almost any other minister of his day.—Middleton, vol. ii. p. 445.

STODDARD, (SOLOMON,) minister of Northampton, Massachusetts, was born in Boston, in 1643, and was graduated at Harvard college, in 1662. He was afterwards appointed a fellow. His health being impaired, he went to Barbadoes as chaplain to governor Serle, and preached to the Dissenters on that island near two years. After his return, being ordained September 11, 1672, as successor to Mr. Mather, at Northampton, he continued in that place till his death, February 11, 1729, aged eighty-five. His colleague, Mr. Edwards, succeeded him.

Mr. Stoddard was a learned man, well versed in religious controversies, and himself an acute disputant. He engaged in a controversy with Increase Mather respecting the Lord's supper, unfortunately maintaining, that the sacrament was a converting ordinance, and that all baptized persons, not scandalous in life, may lawfully approach the table, though they know themselves to be unconverted, or destitute of true religion. As a preacher, his discourses were plain, experimental, searching, and argumentative. He was blessed with great success. He used to say, that he had five harvests; and in these revivals there was a general cry, "What must I do to be saved? He was so diligent in his studies, that he left a considerable number of written sermons, which he had never preached. He published, besides several sermons, the Doctrine of Instituted Churches, London, quarto, 1700; a Guide to Christ, or the way of directing souls in the way to conversion, compiled for young ministers, 1714; a Treatise concerning Conversion; the Way to know Sincerity and Hypocrisy, 1719; Answer to Cases of Conscience, 1722; Whether God is not angry with the country for doing so little towards the conversion of the Indians, 1723; Safety of appearing at the Judgment in the righteousness of Christ. This last work was republished at Edinburgh, octavo, 1792. Colman's Ser. on his Death; Life prefixed to his Guide.—Allen.

STOICS; a sect of heathen philosophers, Acts 17: 18. They were the disciples of Zeno, and derived their name from stoa, a porch. Their distinguishing tenets were, that God is underived, incorruptible, and eternal; possessed of infinite wisdom and goodness; the efficient cause of all the qualities and forms of things; and the constant preserver and governor of the world: that matter, in its original elements, is also underived and eternal; and is by the powerful energy of the Deity impressed with motion and form: that though God and matter subsisted from eternity, the present regular frame of nature had a beginning originating in the gross and dark chaos, and will terminate in a universal conflagration, that will reduce the world to its pristine state: that at this period all material forms will be lost in one chaotic mass; and all animated nature be reunited to the Deity: that from this chaotic state, however, the world will again emerge by the energy of the efficient principle; and gods, and men, and all forms of regulated nature, be renewed and dissolved, in endless succession: and that after the revolution of the great year all things will be restored, and the race of men will return to life. Some imagined, that each individual would return to its former body; while others supposed, that similar souls would be placed in similar bodies. Those among the Stoics who maintained the existence of the soul after death, supposed it to be removed into the celestial regions of the gods, where it remains until, at the general conflagration, all souls, both human and divine, shall be absorbed in the Deity. But many imagined that, before they were admitted among the divinities, they must purge away their inherent vices and imperfections, by a temporary residence in some aerial regions between the earth and the planets.

According to the general doctrine of the Stoics, all things are subject to a stern, irresistible fatality, even the gods themselves. Some of them explained this fate as an eternal chain of causes and effects; while others, more approaching the Christian system, describe it as resulting from the divine decrees—the fiat of an eternal providence. Considering the system practically, it was the object of this philosophy to divest men of their passions and affections. They taught, therefore, that a wise man might be happy in the midst of torture; and that all external things were to him indifferent. Their virtues all arose from, and centered in, themselves; and self-approbation was their great reward.—Watson; Hend. Buck; Jones.

STONES. In early ages, these were used instead of inscriptions, pyramids, medals, or histories. Jacob and Laban raised such a monument on mount Gilead, in memory of their covenant, Gen. 31: 46. Joshua erected one at Gilgal, of stones taken out of the Jordan, to preserve the memorial of his miraculous passage; (Josh. 4: 5-7.) and the Israelites beyond Jordan raised one on the banks of that river, as a testimony that they constituted but one nation with their brethren on the other side, Josh. 22: 10.

"A heart of stone," may be understood several ways. Job, (41: 24.) speaking of the behemoth, says his heart is as hard as stone, as impenetrable as an anvil; q. d. he is insensible to fear or affection. Ezekiel says, (11: 19. 36: 26.) the Lord will take away from his people the heart of stone, and give them a heart of flesh; i. e. he will convert them, and inspire them with spiritual affections. "I will give him a white stone;" (Rev. 2: 17.) that is, I will give him full and public pardon and absolution. It is spoken in allusion to an ancient custom of delivering a white stone to such as they acquitted in judgment. They used likewise to give a white stone to such as conquered in the Grecian games. Nearly in the same sense, John the Baptist said, (Matt. 3: 9.) God was able to raise up to Abraham children from the stones of the desert.

Daniel, speaking of the kingdom of the Messiah, compares it to a small stone loosened from the mountain, by no mortal power, that struck upon the feet of the colossus which Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream, and afterwards filled the whole earth, Dan. 2: 34.

CORNER-STONE, or head stone of the corner, is that put at the angle of a building, whether at the foundation or on the top of the wall. Our Savior, though rejected by the Jews, was the corner-stone of the church, (Ps. 118: 22.) and the stone that binds and unites the believing Jews and Gentiles in the union of one faith, Acts 4: 11. Isa. 28: 16. Eph. 2: 20. 1 Pet. 2: 6. Matt. 21: 42. Mark 12: 10. Luke 20: 17. The Hebrews sometimes gave the name of stone, or rock, to kings or princes, and also to God himself. (See STUMBLING.)—Calmet; Watson.

STORK; (chasedah, Lev. 11: 19. Deut. 14: 18. Job 39: 13. Ps. 104: 17. Jer. 8: 7. Zech. 5: 9.) a bird similar to the crane in size, has the same formation as to the bill, neck, legs, and body, but is rather more corpulent. The long red legs. It feeds upon serpents, frogs, and insects, and on this account might be reckoned by Moses among unclean birds. As it seeks for these in watery places, nature has provided it with long legs; and as it flies away, as well as the crane and heron, to its nest with its plunder, therefore its bill is strong and jagged, the sharp hooks of which enable it to retain its slippery prey.

It has long been remarkable for its love to its parents, whom it never forsakes, but tenderly feeds and cherishes when they have become old, and unable to provide for themselves. The very learned and judicious Bochart has collected a variety of passages from the ancients, in which they testify this curious particular. Its very name in the Hebrew language, chasedah, signifies mercy or piety; and its English name is taken, if not directly, yet secondarily, through the Saxon, from the Greek word storgē, which is often used for natural affection.

It is a bird of passage, and is spoken of as such in Scripture: "The stork knoweth her appointed time," Jer. 8: 7

Who hid the stork, Columbus-like, explore
Heavens not its own, and worlds unknown before?
Who calls the council, states the certain day,
Who forms the phalanx, and who points the way?—POPE.

Bochart has collected several testimonies of the migration of storks. Elian says, that in summer time they remain stationary, but at the close of autumn they repair to Egypt, Libya, and Ethiopia. "For about the space of a fortnight before they pass from one country to another," says Dr. Shaw, "they constantly resort together, from all the adjacent parts, in a certain plain; and there forming themselves, once every day, into a 'douwanne,' or council, (according to the phrase of these Eastern nations,) are said to determine the exact time of their departure, and the place of their future abodes." (See SWALLOW.)—Watson.

STONING, was a punishment much in use among the Hebrews; and the rabbins reckon all crimes as being subject to it, which the law condemns to death, without expressing the particular mode. They say; that when a man was condemned to death, he was led out of the city to the place of execution, and there exhorted to acknowledge and confess his fault. He was then stoned in one of two ways; either stones were thrown upon him till he died; or he was thrown headlong down a steep place, and a large stone rolled upon his body. To the latter mode it is supposed there is a reference in Matt. 21: 44.—Calmet.

STRANGER. Moses inculcated and enforced by numerous and by powerful considerations, as well as by various examples of benevolent hospitality, mentioned in the book of Genesis, the exhibition of kindness and humanity to strangers. There were two classes of persons who, in reference to this subject, were denominated strangers. One class were those who, whether Hebrews or foreigners, were destitute of a home, in Hebrew, tushbin. The others were persons who, though not natives, had a home in Palestine; the latter were gerim, strangers or foreigners, in the strict sense of the word. Both of these classes, according to the civil code of Moses, were to be treated with kindness, and were to enjoy the same rights with other citizens, Lev. 19: 33, 34. 24: 16, 22. Num. 9: 14. 15: 14. Deut. 10: 18. 23: 7. 24: 17. 27: 19.—Watson.

STRANGLE. Animals strangled had not the blood properly separated from the flesh, and were not eaten by the primitive Christians, among other reasons, to prevent offence to the Jewish converts, Acts 15: 20. (See BLOOD.)

STREETS, CORNERS OF. Our Lord reproves the Pharisees for praying in the corners of the streets, that is, choosing public places for what ought to have been private devotion. The Hindoos, Mohammedans, and others still have this practice. "Both Hindoos and Mussulmans offer their devotions in the most public places; as, at the landing places of rivers, in the public streets, and on the roofs of boats, without the least modesty or attempt at concealment." "An aged Turk," observes Richardson, "is particularly proud of a long flowing white beard, a well shaved cheek and head, and a clean turban. It is a common thing to see such characters, far past the bloom of life, mounded on stone seats, with a bit of Persian carpet, at the corner of the streets, or in front of their bazars, combing their beards, smoking their pipes, or drink-color of the crane is ash and black; that of the stork is white and brown. The nails of its toes are also very peculiar; not being clawed like those of other birds, but flat like the nails of a man. It has a very long beak, and ing their coffee, with a pitcher of water standing beside them, or saying their prayers, or reading the Koran."—Watson.

STRIGOLNIKS; a sect of judaizing Russian Christians, which sprang up in the fourteenth century, and increased with great rapidity, owing to the zeal of the founders, and the analogy which was found to exist between the Greek ceremonies and the temple service of the Jews. They were joined by priests and deacons of the Russian church; and several even of the bishops favored their doctrines. The flames of persecution were repeatedly kindled against them; but they continued to exist either more publicly or in private; and, at this day, are concentrated in the Seleznutchini, who are Jews in principle, observe circumcision, the seventh-day Sabbath, and part of the ceremonial law.—Hend. Buck.

STRIVE; 1. To contend in desires, in words, or with the hands. Gen. 26: 20. 2. To endeavor earnestly, Rom. 15: 20. 3. To be given to strife and debate, 2 Tim. 2: 24.

God strives with men when, by the revelation of his will, the convictions of his Spirit, and the dispensations of his providence, he checks their progress in sin, Gen. 6: 3. Men strive with God when they resist the motions of his Spirit, contemn the offers of his grace, rebel against his laws, and oppose his providence by going on in their wickedness, Isa. 45: 9. Job 33: 13. They strive to enter in at the strait gate when, in the careful and earnest use of God's ordinances, they study to receive Christ, and be created anew in him, Luke 13: 24. Saints strive together in prayer when, with the utmost earnestness, they jointly ask and plead for the bestowal of good things on ministers and others, Rom. 15: 30. They strive for the faith, and against sin, when they do or suffer to the uttermost to maintain and promote the honor of gospel-truth, and to shun and oppose sin in themselves and others, Phil. 1: 27. Heb. 12: 4.—Brown.

STRONG, (NATHAN, D. D.), minister of Hartford, Connecticut, the son of Nathan Strong, minister of Coventry, was born in 1748; graduated at Yale college, in 1769; and was ordained January 5, 1774. In the war he was a patriot and a chaplain in the army. He died December 25, 1816, aged sixty-eight. He was a learned and very useful minister, distinguished for his discernment and knowledge of men. Of the Missionary society of Connecticut he was the principal founder, in 1798. For some years he was the editor of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine. He published the Doctrine of Eternal Misery reconciled with the Benevolence of God, in answer to Dr. Huntington, octavo; a Sermon on the Death of Dr. Cogswell, 1807; Sermons, two vols. octavo.—Allen.

STUMBLING, STONE OF. "We set out from Argos very early in the morning," says Hartley, "and were almost eleven hours in reaching Tripolizza. The road is, for the most part, dreary; leading over lofty and barren hills, the principal of which is mount Parthenius. In England, where the roads are so excellent, we do not readily perceive the force and just application of the scriptural figures, derived from a 'stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence,' (Isaiah 8: 14.) and similar passages; but in the East, where the roads are, for the most part, nothing more than an accustomed track, the constant danger and impediment arising to travellers from stones and rocks fully explain the allusion."

In the grand description which Isaiah gives (63: 13.) of God "with his glorious arm" leading his people through the Red sea, it is said, "That led them through the deep, as a horse in the wilderness, that they should not stumble;" that is, who preserved them from falling amidst the numerous inequalities in the bed of the sea, caused in some instances by deep cavities, and in others by abrupt intervening rocks. The figure is a very natural one, especially in the deserts of the East, where the Arabs and Tartars are famed for their dexterity in the management of even bad horses.—Watson.

STYLITES, PILLAR SAINTS; an appellation given to a kind of solitaries, who stood motionless upon the tops of pillars, raised for this exercise of their patience, and remained there for several years, amidst the admiration and applause of the stupid populace. Of these, we find several mentioned in ancient writers, and even as low as the twelfth century, when they were totally suppressed. (See SIMEON STYLITES.)

The Faquirs, or devout people of the East, imitate this extraordinary kind of life to this day.—Hend. Buck.

SUB-DEACON; an inferior minister, who anciently attended at the altar, prepared the sacred vessels, delivered them to the deacons in time of divine service, attended the doors of the church during communion service, went on the bishop's embassies with his letters, or messages to foreign churches, and was invested with the first of the holy orders. They were so subordinate to the superior rulers of the church, that, by a canon of the council of Laodicea, they were forbidden to sit in the presence of a deacon without his leave.—Hend. Buck.

SUBLAPSARIANS, also sometimes called INFRA-LAPSARIANS; those who hold that God suffered the first man to fall into transgression without absolutely predetermining his fall; or that the decree of predestination regards man as fallen, by an abuse of that freedom which Adam had, into a state in which all were to be left to necessary and unavoidable ruin, who were not exempted from it by predestination. (See SUPRALAPSARIANS).—Hend. Buck.

SUBMISSION TO GOD, implies an entire giving up of our understanding, will, and affections to him; or, as Dr. Owen observes, it consists in, 1. An acquiescence in his right and sovereignty. 2. An acknowledgment of his righteousness and wisdom. 3. A sense of his love and care. 4. A diligent application of ourselves to his mind and will. 5. Keeping our souls by faith and patience from weariness and despondency. 6. A full resignation to his will. (See SORROW; RESIGNATION).—Hend. Buck.

SUBSCRIPTION, CLERICAL. Subscription to articles of religion is required of the clergy of every established church, and of some churches not established. But it has been a matter of dispute whether it answers any valuable purpose as to religion, however necessary as a test to loyalty. All language is more or less ambiguous, so that it is difficult always to understand the exact sense, or the animus imponentis, especially when creeds have been long established. It is said that the clergy of the churches of England and Scotland seldom consider themselves as fettered by the Thirty-nine Articles, or the Confession of Faith, when composing instructions for their parishes, or the public at large.

It is to be feared, indeed, that many subscribe merely for the sake of emolument; and though it be professedly ex animo, it is well known that it is not so in reality; for when any one appears to entertain conscientious scruples on the subject, he is told, it is a thing of no consequence, but only a matter of form. How such will answer to the Great Head of the church, we must leave them to judge. They who think subscription to be proper, should remember that it approaches very near the solemnity of an oath, and it is not to be trifled with. "Great care," says Doddridge, "ought to be taken that we subscribe nothing that we do not firmly believe. If the signification of the words be dubious, and we believe either sense, and that sense in which we do believe them is as natural as the other, we may, consistently with integrity, subscribe them; or if the sense in which we do believe them be less natural, and we explain that sense, and that explication be admitted by the person requiring the subscription in his own right, there can be no just foundation for a scruple. Some have added, that, if we have reason to believe (though it is not expressly declared) that he who imposes the subscription does not intend that we should hereby declare our assent to those articles, but only that we should pay a compliment to his authority, and engage ourselves not openly to contradict them, we may, in this case, subscribe what is most directly contrary to our belief; or that, if we declare our belief in any book, as, for instance, the Bible, it is to be supposed that we subscribe other articles only so far as they are consistent with that; because we cannot imagine that the law would require us to profess our belief of contrary propositions at the same time. But subscription upon these principles seems a very dangerous attack upon sincerity and public virtue, especially in those designed for public offices. If the reader be de-siours of investigating the subject, he may consult Paley's Mor. Phil., vol. i. p. 218; Dyer on Subscription; Doddridge's Lect., lect. 70; Conybeare's Sermon on Subscription; Free and Candid Disquisitions relating to the Church of England; The Confessional; Duncan and Miller on Creeds; Works of Robert Hall.—Hend. Buck.

SUBSTITUTION, the doctrine of Christ's dying in the stead of his redeemed. (See REDEMPTION.) Works of Andrew Fuller, and Robert Hall.—Jones's Bib. Cyc.

SUCCESSION, UNINTERRUPTED; a term made use of by the Romanists and others in reference to those bishops who are supposed to have derived their authority from the apostles, and so communicated that authority to others, in a line or succession.

It is a very precarious and uncomfortable foundation for Christian hope (says Dr. Doddridge) which is laid in the doctrine of an uninterrupted succession of bishops, and which makes the validity of the administration of Christian ministers depend upon such a succession, since there is so great a darkness upon many periods of ecclesiastical history, inasmuch that it is not agreed who were the seven first bishops of the church of Rome, though that church was so celebrated; and Eusebius himself, from whom the greatest patrons of this doctrine have made their catalogues, expressly owns that it is no easy matter to tell who succeeded the apostles in the government of the churches, excepting such as may be collected from St. Paul's own words. (See EPISCOPACY.) Contested elections in almost all considerable cities, make it very dubious which were the true bishops; and decrees of councils, rendering all those ordinations null where any simoniacal contract was the foundation of them, makes it impossible to prove that there is now upon earth any one person who is a legal successor of the apostles; at least, according to the principles of the Romish church. Consequently, whatever system is built on this doctrine must be very precarious.

"I am fully satisfied," says bishop Hoadley, "that till a consummate stupidity can be happily established, and universally spread over the land, there is nothing that tends so much to destroy all due respect to the clergy, as the demand of more than can be due to them; and nothing has so effectually thrown contempt upon a regular succession of the ministry, as the calling no succession regular but what was uninterrupted; and the making the eternal salvation of Christians to depend upon that uninterrupted succession, of which the most learned must have the least assurance, and the unlearned can have no notion, but through ignorance and credulity." Hove's Episcopacy, pp. 170, 183; Doddridge's Lectures, lect. 197; Chandler's Sermons against Popery, p. 34—37; Pierce's Sermons, pref.; and article ORDINATION.—Hend. Buck.

SUCCOOTH BENOTH. Calmet speaks of Succoth Benoth as an idol set up in Samaria, by the men brought from Assyria; (2 Kings 17:30.) but Mr. Taylor, and other writers, have shown it more probably to denote tabernacles or booths consecrated to one of the forms of Venus. —Calmet.

SUENES; a Christian nobleman in Persia, who, refusing to deny Christ, had his wife taken from him, and given to one of the emperor's meanest slaves; and what added to his mortification was, that he was ordered to wait upon his wife and the slave, which at length broke his heart.—Fox.

SUFFERINGS OF CHRIST. To form an idea of Christ's sufferings, we should consider the poverty of his birth; the reproach of his character; the pains of his body; the power of his enemies; the desertion of his friends; the weight of his people's sins; the slow, ignominious, and painful nature of his death; and the hidings of his Father's face. All these rendered his sufferings extremely severe; yet some heretics said, that the sufferings of Christ were only in appearance, and not real! But, as bishop Pearson observes, "If hunger and thirst; if revilings and contempt; if sorrows and agonies; if stripes and buffeting; if condemnation and crucifixion, be sufferings, Jesus suffered." If the infirmities of our nature; if the weight of our sins; if the malice of men; if the machinations of Satan; if the hand of God, could make him suffer, our Savior suffered. If the annals of time; if the writings of the apostles; if the death of his martyrs; if the confession of Gentiles; if the scoffs of the Jews, be testimonies, Jesus suffered. See Pearson on the Creed; Dr. Rambach's Meditations on the Sufferings of Christ. For the end of Christ's sufferings, see DEATH OF CHRIST; ATONEMENT; REDEMPTION.—Hend. Buck.

SUIDAS; a Greek lexicographer. When and where he was born and died are unknown, but he is supposed to have lived in the latter end of the ninth and the beginning of the tenth century. His Lexicon, faulty as it is in many respects, is valuable for the fragments it contains of lost works, and the information which it affords respecting ancient writers.—Davenport.

SUMMERFIELD, (JOHN,) an interesting young minister, was born in Lancashire, England, January 31, 1798. After early dissipation he became pious, and preached in the Methodist connexion in Ireland. He came to New York in 1821, with almost the popularity of Whitfield. His ill health induced him in 1823 to visit France, as a delegate from the American Bible society. He died at New York, June 13, 1825, aged twenty-seven. Few ministers have exhibited such meekness, humility, disinterestedness, and benevolence in life; few have been so eloquent in the pulpit. His Memoirs, by J. Holland, were published octavo, 2d ed. 1830.—Allen.

SUMMISTS; a name given to those scholastic divines who propounded their dogmas in works called Summa Theologia. This name was first adopted as a compliment to Thomas Aquinas, who published his famous work on divinity under the title of Summa totius Theologie, and thereby greatly lowered the estimation in which the "Book of Sentences," written by Peter Lombard, was held.—Hend. Buck.

SUN; the great luminary which God created at the beginning, to govern the day. Calmet thinks it was the sun which the Phenicians worshipped under the name of Baal, the Moabites under that of Chemosh, the Ammonites under that of Moloch, the Israelites under that of Baal, and king of the host of heaven. Moses cautioned the Israelites against this species of idolatry, Deut. 4: 19. (See BAAL.)

The sun furnishes a great part of the noble similitudes used by the sacred authors, who, to represent great public calamity, speak of the sun as being obscured, &c. See Isa. 13: 10. 24: 23. Jer. 15: 9. Ezek. 32: 7. Joel 2: 31. Amos 8: 9. To express a long continuance of anything glorious and illustrious, it is said, it shall continue as long as the sun. So the reign of the Messiah, (Ps. 72. 17. 89: 36.) under whose happy dominion the light of the moon shall equal that of the sun, and that of the sun be seven times more than ordinary, Isa. 30: 26. Christ is called the Sun of righteousness, Mal. 4: 2.

The compass of the whole earth is described by the expression, from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same; or rather, from east to west, Ps. 50: 1. 107: 3 113: 3, &c.—Calmet.

SUNDAY, or the LORD'S DAY; a solemn festival observed by Christians on the first day of every week, in memory of our Savior's resurrection. (See SABBATH.)

It has been contended, whether Sunday is a name that ought to be used by Christians. The words Sabbath and Lord's Day, say some, are the only names mentioned in Scripture respecting this day. To call it Sunday, is to set our wisdom before the wisdom of God, and to give that glory to a pagan idol which is due to him alone. The ancient Saxons called it by this name, because upon it they worshipped the sun; and shall Christians keep up the memory of that which was highly displeasing to God, by calling the Sabbath by that name rather than by either of those he hath appointed? It is, indeed, called Sunday only because it is customary; but this, say they, will not justify men in doing that which is contrary to the example and command of God in his word.

Others observe, that although it was originally called Sunday by the heathens, yet it may very properly retain that name among Christians, because it is dedicated to the honor of the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world; of Him who is styled by the prophet "the Sun of righteousness;" and who on this day arose from the dead. But although it was in the primitive times indifferently called the Lord's day, or Sunday, yet it was never denominated the Sabbath—a name constantly appropriated to Saturday, or the seventh day, both by sacred and ecclesiastical writers. (See SABBATH.)—Hend. Buck.

SUPEREROGATION; what a man is supposed to do beyond his duty, or more than he is commanded to do. The Romanists stand up strenuously for works of supererogation, and maintain that the observance of evangelical counsels is such. By means hereof a stock of merit is laid up, which the church has the disposal of, and which she distributes in indulgences to such as need.

This absurd doctrine was first invented towards the close of the twelfth century, and modified and embellished by St. Thomas in the thirteenth: according to which, it was pretended that there actually existed an immense treasure of merit, composed of the pious deeds and virtuous actions which the saints had performed beyond what was necessary for their own salvation, and which were, therefore, applicable to the benefit of others; that the guardian and dispenser of this precious treasure was the Roman pontiff; and that, of consequence, he was empowered to assign to such as he thought proper a portion of this inexhaustible source of merit, suitable to their respective guilt, and sufficient to deliver them from the punishment due to their crimes.—Hend. Buck.

SUPERINTENDENT; an ecclesiastical superior in several reformed churches where episcopacy is not admitted, particularly among the Lutherans in Germany, and the Calvinists in some other places. The superintendent is similar to a bishop, only his power is somewhat more restrained than that of our diocesan bishops. He is the chief pastor, and has the direction of all the inferior pastors within his district or diocese.—Hend. Buck.

SUPERSTITION, (deisidaimonia, demon-worship, Acts 25: 19. Col. 2: 23.) may be described to be either the careful and anxious observation of numerous and unauthorized ceremonies in religion, under the idea that they possess some virtue to propitiate God and obtain his favor; or, as among pagans and others, the worship of imaginary deities, and the various means of averting evil by religious ceremonies, which a heart oppressed with fears, and a perverted fancy, may dictate to those ignorant of the true God, and the doctrines of salvation.

Dr. Neander observes, "The consideration of human nature and history shows us that the transition from unbelief to superstition is always easy. Both these conditions of the human heart proceed from the self-same ground, the want of that which may be properly called faith, the want of a life in God, of a lively communion with divine things by means of the inward life; that is, by means of the feelings. Man, whose inward feelings are estranged from the divine nature, is inclined, sometimes, to deny the reality of that of which he has nothing within him, and for the conception and application of which to himself he has no organ. Or else, the irresistible force of his inward nature impels him to recognise that higher power from which he would fain free himself entirely, and to seek that connexion with it which he cannot but feel needful to his comfort; but, inasmuch as he is without any real inward sympathy of disposition with the Divinity, and wants a true sense of boldness, the Divinity appears to his darkened religious conscience only under the form of power and arbitrary rule. His conscience points to him this power as an angry and avenging power. But, as he has no idea of that which the Divinity really is, he cannot duly understand this feeling of estrangement from God, this consciousness of divine wrath; and, instead of seeking in moral things the source of this unquiet feeling, which leaves him no rest by day or night, and from which there is no escape, he fancies that by this or that action, which of itself is perfectly indifferent, he may have offended this higher power, and he seeks by outward observances again to reconcile the offended power.

"Religion here becomes the source, not of life, but of death; the source, not of consolation and blessing, but of the most unspeakable anxiety, which torments man day and night with the spectres of his own imagination. Religion here is no source of sanctification, but may unite in man's heart with every kind of untruth, and serve to promote it. There is one kind of superstition in which, while man torments himself to the utmost, he still remains estranged from the true nature of inward holiness; and, while he is restrained from many good works of charity by his constant attendance on mischievous, arbitrary, and outward observances, he is still actuated by a horror of any great sin, a superstition in which man avoids pleasure so completely that he falls into the opposite extreme; and even the most innocent enjoyments, which a childlike simplicity would receive with thankfulness from the hand of a heavenly Father, he dares not indulge in. But there is also another kind of superstition, which makes it easy for man, by certain outward observances, to silence his conscience under all kinds of sin, and which therefore serves as a welcome support to it."

Superstition, says Claude, usually springs either, 1. From servile fear, which makes people believe that God is always wrathful, and invents means to appease him. 2. Or from a natural inclination we all have to idolatry, which makes men think they see some ray of the Divinity in extraordinary creatures, and on this account worship them. Or, 3. From hypocrisy, which makes men willing to discharge their obligations to God by grimace, and by zeal for external services. Or, 4. From presumption, which makes men serve God after their own fancies. Claude's Essay on the Composition of a Sermon, vol. ii. pp. 49 and 299; Saurin's Sermons; Scott on Demonology; Gregory's Essays, essay 3.—Watson; *Hend. SUPPER, LORD'S, derives its name from having been instituted by Jesus, after he had supped with his apostles, immediately before he went out to be delivered into the hands of his enemies.

In Egypt, for every house of the children of Israel, a lamb was slain upon that night, when the Almighty punished the cruelty and obstinacy of the Egyptians by killing their first born, but charged the destroying angel to pass over the houses upon which the blood of the lamb was sprinkled. This was the original sacrifice of the passover. In commemoration of it, the Jews observed the annual festival of the passover, when all the males of Judea assembled before the Lord in Jerusalem. A lamb was slain for every house, the representative of that whose blood had been sprinkled in the night of the escape from Egypt. After the blood was poured under the altar by the priests, the lambs were carried home to be eaten by the people in their tents or houses at a domestic feast, where every master of a family took the cup of thanksgiving, and gave thanks with his family to the God of Israel. (See PASSOVER.)

Jesus, having fulfilled the law of Moses, to which in all things he submitted, by eating the paschal supper with his disciples, proceeded after supper to institute a rite, which, to any person that reads the words of the institution without having formed a previous opinion upon the subject, will appear to have been intended by him as a memorial of that event which was to happen not many hours after, (Luke 22: 19.) and was meant to be observed by all Christians till the end of the world. "As often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till he come," 1 Cor. 11: 23—26. Whether we consider these words as part of the revelation made to St. Paul, or as his own commentary upon the nature of the ordinance which was revealed to him, they mark, with equal significance and propriety, the extent and the perpetuity of the obligation to observe that rite which was first instituted in presence of the apostles.

The Lord's supper exhibits, by a significant action, the characteristic doctrine of the Christian faith, that the death of its author (which seemed to be the completion of the rage of his enemies) was in fact a voluntary sacrifice, so efficacious as to supersede the necessity of every other; and that his blood was shed for the remission of sins. By partaking of this rite, his disciples publish an event most interesting to all the kindreds of the earth; they declare that, far from being ashamed of the suffering of their Master, they glory in his cross; and, while they thus perform the office implied in that expression of the apostle, "Ye do show forth the Lord's death," they at the same time cherish the sentiments by which their religion ministers to their own consolation and improvement. They cannot remember the death of Christ, the circumstances which rendered that event necessary, the disinterested love and the exalted virtues of their deliverer, without feeling their obligations to him. Unless the vilest hypocrisy accompany an action, which, by its very nature, professes to flow from warm affection, the love of Christ will constrain them to fulfil the purposes of his death, by "living unto him who died for them;" and we have reason to hope, that, in the places where he causes his name to be remembered, he will come and bless his people. As the object of faith is thus explicitly set before them in every commemoration, so the renewed exercise of that faith, which the ordinance is designed to excite, must bring renewed life, and a deeper experience of the "great salvation." (See SACRAMENT, and LORD'S SUPPER.)—Watson.

SUPRALAPSARIANS; persons who hold that God, without any regard to the good or evil works of men, has resolved, by an eternal decree, (supra lapsam), antecedently to any knowledge of the fall of Adam, and independent of it, to save some and reject others; or, in other words, that God intended to glorify his justice in the condemnation of some, as well as his mercy in the salvation of others; and, for that purpose, decreed that Adam should fall.

Dr. Gill gives us the following account of Supralapsarianism. The question which he proposes to discuss, is, "Whether men were considered in the mind of God in the decree of election as fallen or unfallen,—as in the corrupt mass through the fall, or in the pure mass of creaturehood, previous to it, and as to be created?" There are some who think that the latter, so considered, were the objects of election in the divine mind. These are called Supralapsarians, though of these, some are of opinion that man was considered as to be created or creatable, and others as created but not fallen. The former seems best, that, of the vast number of individuals which came up in the divine mind whom his power could create, those whom he meant to bring into being he designed to glorify himself by them in some way or other. The decree of election respecting any part of them may be distinguished into the decree of the end and the decree of the means. The decree of the end respecting some is either subordinate to their eternal happiness, or ultimate, which is more properly the end, the glory of God; and if both are put together, it is a state of everlasting communion with God, for the glorifying of the riches of his grace. The decree of the means includes the decree to create men, to permit them to fall, to recover them out of it through redemption by Christ, to sanctify them by the grace of the Spirit, and completely save them; and which are not to be reckoned as materially many decrees, but as making one formal decree; or they are not to be considered as subordinate, but as co-ordinate means, and as making up one entire complete medium; for it is not to be supposed that God decreed to create man, that he might permit him to fall, in order to redeem, sanctify, and save him; but he decreed all this that he might glorify his grace, mercy, and justice. And in this way of considering the decrees of God, they think that they sufficiently obviate and remove the slanderous calumny cast upon them with respect to the other branch of predestination, which leaves men in the same state when others are chosen, and that for the glory of God. Which calumny is, that, according to them, God made man to damn him; whereas, according to their real sentiments, God decreed to make man, and made man neither to damn him nor save him, but for his own glory, which end is answered in them some way or other. Again: they argue that the end is first in view before the means, and the decree of the end is, in order of nature, before the decree of the means; and what is first in intention, is last in execution. Now, as the glory of God is last in execution, it must be first in intention, wherefore men must be considered in the decree of the end as not yet created and fallen; since the creation and permission of sin belong to the decree of the means, which in order of nature is after the decree of the end. And they add to this, that if God first decreed to create man, and suffered him to fall, and then out of the fall chose some to grace and glory, he must decree to create man without an end, which is to make God to do what no wise man would; for when a man is about to do any thing, he proposes an end, and then contrives and fixes on ways and means to bring about that end. They think also that this way of conceiving and speaking of these things best expresses the sovereignty of God in them, as declared in the 9th of Romans, where he is said to will such and such things, for no other reason but because he wills them.

The opponents of this doctrine consider, however, that it is attended with insuperable difficulties. We demand, say they, an explanation of what they mean by this principle, "God hath made all things for his own glory." If they mean that justice requires a creature to devote himself to the worship and glorifying of his Creator, we grant it; if they mean that the attributes of God are displayed in all his works, we grant this too; but if the proposition be intended to affirm that God had no other view in creating men, so to speak, than his own interest, we deny the proposition, and affirm that God created men for their own happiness, and in order to have subjects upon whom he might bestow favors.

We desire to be informed, in the next place, say they, how it can be conceived that a determination to damn millions of men can contribute to the glory of God? We easily conceive, that it is for the glory of divine justice to punish guilty men; but to resolve to damn men without the consideration of sin, to create them that they might sin, to determine that they should sin in order to their destruction, is what seems to us more likely to tarnish the glory of God than to display it.

Again: we demand how, according to this hypothesis, it can be conceived that God is not the author of sin? In the general scheme of our churches, God only permits men to sin, and it is the abuse of liberty that plunges man into misery; even this principle, all lenified as it seems, is yet subject to a great number of difficulties; but in this scheme, God wills sin to produce the end he proposed in creating the world, and it was necessary that men should sin: God created them for that. If this be not to make God the author of sin, we must renounce the most distinct and clear ideas.

Again: we require them to reconcile this system with many express declarations of Scripture, which inform us that God would have all men to be saved. How doth it agree with such pressing entreaties, such cutting reproofs, such tender expostulations, as God discovers in regard to the unconverted? Matt. 23: 37.

Lastly, we desire to know how it is possible to conceive a God, who, being in the actual enjoyment of perfect happiness, incomprehensible, and supreme, could determine to add this decree, though useless to his felicity, to create men without number for the purpose of confining them forever in the chains of darkness, and burning them forever in unquenchable flames. Gill's Body of Div. vol. i. p. 299; Brine's Works; Saurin's Sermons; Edwards' Works; Fuller's Works.—Hend. Buck.

SUPREMACY OF THE POPE; a doctrine held by the Roman Catholics, who believe that the bishop of Rome is, under Christ, supreme pastor of the whole church; and, as such, is not only the first bishop in order and dignity, but has also a power and jurisdiction over all Christians. This doctrine is chiefly built upon the supposed primacy of St. Peter, of whom the bishop of Rome is the pretended successor; a primacy we nowhere find commanded or countenanced, but absolutely prohibited, in the word of God, Luke 22: 14, 24. Mark 9: 35. (See INFALLIBILITY; PRIMACY; POPE; and POPERY.) Dr. Barrow's Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy; Chillingworth's Religion of the Protestants; and Smith's Errors of the Church of Rome.—Hend. Buck.

SUREMACY, OATH OF. (See OATH.)

SURETY, in common speech, is one who gives security for another; and hence it has become prevalent among theological writers to confound it with the terms substitute and representative, when applied to Christ, Heb. 7: 22. "By so much was Jesus made the surety of a better covenant." It is certainly true that the Son of God, in all that he has done or is still doing as Mediator, may be justly viewed as the surety of the new and everlasting covenant, and as affording the utmost security to believers that, as the Father hath given all things into his hands, they will be conducted with effect, and all the exceeding great and precious promises of that covenant assuredly be accomplished. But this does not appear to be the precise idea which the apostle has in view in the above passage. This has been sufficiently evinced by many critics and commentators, particularly by Pierce, Macknight, and M'Lean, in their notes on the place, who show that the word "surety" in this place is equivalent with that of mediator or high-priest.—Watson; Jones.

SUSPICION, consists in imagining evil of others without proof. It is sometimes opposed to charity, which thinketh no evil. "A suspicious temper checks in the bud every kind affection: it hardens the heart, and estranges man from man. What friendship can we expect from him who views all our conduct with distrustful eyes, and ascribes every benefit we confer to artifice and stratagem? A candid man is accustomed to view the characters of his neighbors in the most favorable light, and is like one who dwells amidst those beautiful scenes of nature on which the eye rests with pleasure. Whereas the suspicious man, having his imagination filled with all the shocking forms of human falsehood, deceit, and treachery, resembles the traveller in the wilderness, who discerns no objects around him but what are either dreary or terrible; caverns that open, serpents that hiss, and beasts of prey that howl." Barrow's Sermons; Gisborne's do.; Dwight's Theology; James on Charity.—Hend. Buck.

SWALLOW, (sis.) There is considerable diversity of opinion among critics on the Hebrew designation of this well-known bird. Our translators have taken both durur and agur to signify the swallow, in different passages of Scripture, but in each they seem to have been wrong. The former of the words (Ps. 84: 3.) is better understood by Bochart, and other able critics, to be applied to a species of dove; (see ALTAR;) and there is little doubt that the latter word (Prov. 26: 2.) imports the crane, which is so called from its remarkable cry. The real designation of the swallow appears to be sis, either from its sprightliness, or swift motion, or, as Bochart thinks, from its note. It is worthy of remark, that the goddess Isis is said to have been changed into this bird; which circumstance, from the resemblance of the name, furnishes an additional confirmation of the interpretation here adopted.

The only mention of the swallow in Scripture is in Isa. 38: 14. and Jer. 8: 7. In the former passage, Hezekiah, referring to the severity of his recent affliction, says, "Like a swallow, or a crane, so did I chatter." The note of the swallow being quick and mournful, the allusion of the king has been supposed to be to his prayers, which were so interrupted by groans as to be like the quick twitterings of the swallow. This seems to have occasioned the pious monarch to regard with suspicion the sincerity and fervor of his supplications, thus delivered, but in broken accents; and in bitterness of spirit! he casts himself upon the unbounded mercy of his God, exclaiming, "Oh Lord, I am oppressed, undertake for me."

The passage in Jeremiah refers to the well-known migration of this bird; a circumstance from which the faithful prophet takes occasion to reprove the ingratitude and infidelity of the favored tribes: "The turtle, and the crane, and the swallow, observe the time of their coming; but my people know not the judgment of the Lord."—Calmet.

SWEARING. (See OMNIBUS.)

SWEDENBORGIANISM, or NEW JERUSALEM CHURCH; that particular denomination of Christians who admit the testimony of baron Swedenborg, and receive the doctrines taught in the theological writings of that author.

Emanuel Swedenborg was the son of a bishop of West Gothnia, in the kingdom of Sweden, whose name was Swedberg, a man of considerable learning and celebrity in his time. The son was born at Stockholm, January 29, 1688. He enjoyed early the advantages of a liberal education, and being naturally endowed with uncommon talents for the acquirement of learning, his progress in the sciences was rapid and extensive; and he soon distinguished himself by several publications in the Latin language, which gave proof of equal genius and erudition. It may reasonably be supposed that under the care of his pious and reverend father our author's religious instruction was not neglected. This, indeed, appears plain from the general tenor of his life and writings, which are marked with strong and lively characters of a mind deeply impressed with a sense of the divine Being, and of all the relative duties thence resulting. He was ennobled in the year 1719, by queen Ulrica Eleonora, and named Swedenborg, from which time he took his seat with the nobles of the equestrian order, in the triennial assembly of the states.

Baron Swedenborg had many eccentricities; but perhaps the most remarkable circumstance respecting him was his asserting, that, during the uninterrupted period of twenty-seven years, he enjoyed open intercourse with the world of departed spirits, and during that time was instructed in the internal sense of the sacred Scriptures, hitherto undiscovered! This is a correspondence with the invisible world, to which few or no writers, before or since his time, ever pretended, if we except the Arabian prophet. The philosophical works, published in Latin, by baron Swedenborg, are numerous; but his theological works are said to be still more so.

1. The first and principal distinguishing doctrine contained in the writings of baron Swedenborg, and maintained by his followers, relates to the person and character of Jesus Christ, and to the redemption wrought by him. On this subject it is insisted that Jesus Christ is Jehovah, manifested in the flesh; and that he came into the world to glorify his human nature, by making it one with the divine. It is therefore insisted further that the humanity of Jesus Christ is itself divine, by virtue of its indissoluble union with the indwelling Father, agreeably to the testimony of St. Paul, that "in Jesus Christ dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily;" (Col. 2: 9.) and that thus, as to his humanity, he is the mediator between God and man, since there is now no other medium of God's access to man, or of man's access to God, but this divine humanity, which was assumed for this purpose. Thus it is taught, that in the person of Jesus Christ dwells the whole Trinity of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; the Father constituting the soul of the above humanity, whilst the humanity itself is the Son, and the divine virtue or operation proceeding from it is the Holy Spirit; forming altogether one God, just as the soul, the body, and operation of man, form one man. On the subject of the redemption wrought by this incarnate God, it is lastly taught that it consisted not in the vicarious sacrifice of Christ, but in the real subjugation of the powers of darkness and their removal from man, by continual combats and victories over them, during his abode in the world; and in the consequent descent to man of divine power and life, which was brought near to him in the thus glorified humanity of this victorious God. They who receive this testimony concerning Jesus Christ therefore acknowledge no other God but him; and believe that in approaching his divine humanity, they approach, at the same time, and have communication with, all the fulness of the Godhead, seeing and worshipping the invisible in the visible, agreeably to the tenor of those words of Jesus Christ: "He that believeth on me believeth not on me, but on him that sent me; and he that seeth me seeth him that sent me," John 12: 44, 45.

2. A second doctrine taught by the same author relates to the sacred Scripture, or word of God, which is maintained to be divinely inspired throughout, and, consequently, to be the repository of the whole will and wisdom of the most high God. It is, however, insisted, that this will and wisdom are not in all places discoverable from the letter or history of the sacred pages, but lie deeply concealed under the letter. For it is taught by baron Swedenborg, that the sense of the letter of the holy word is the basis, the continent and the firmament, of its spiritual and celestial senses, being written according to the doctrine of correspondencies between things spiritual and things natural, and thus designed by the Most High as the vehicle of communication of the eternal spiritual truths of his kingdom to the minds of men. It is further endeavored to be shown that Jesus Christ spake continually according to this same doctrine, veiling divine and spiritual truths under natural images, especially in his parables, and thus communicating to man the most important mysteries relative to himself and his kingdom, under the most beautiful and edifying figures taken from the natural things of this world. Thus, according to baron Swedenborg, even the historical parts both of the Old and New Testament contain vast stores of important and spiritual wisdom under the outward letter; and this consideration, as he farther asserts, justifies the pages of divine revelation, even in those parts which to a common observer appear trifling, nugatory, and contradictory. It is, lastly, maintained, on this subject, that the sacred Scripture, or word of God, is the only medium of communication and conjunction between God and man, and is likewise the only source of all genuine truth and knowledge respecting God, his kingdom, and operation, and the only sure guide for man's understanding, in whatever relates to his spiritual or eternal concerns.

3. The next branch of the system is practical, and relates to the life, or to that rule of conduct on the part of man which is truly acceptable to the Deity, and at the same time conducive to man's eternal happiness and salvation, by conjoining him with his God. This rule is taught to be simply this: to shun all known evils as sins against God, and at the same time to love, to cherish, and to practice whatsoever is wise, virtuous, and holy, as being most agreeable to the will of God, and to the spirit of his precepts. On this subject it is strongly and repeatedly insisted that evil must of necessity remain with man, and prove his eternal destruction, unless it be removed by sincere repentance, leading him to note what is disorderly in his own mind and life; and, when he has discovered it, to fight resolutely against it; its influence, in dependence on the aid and grace of Jesus Christ. It is insisted further, that this opposition to evil ought to be grounded on the consideration that all evil is against God, since, if evil be combated from any inferior motive, it is not radically removed, but only concealed, and on that account is even more dangerous and destructive than before. It is added, that when man has done the work of repentance, by shunning his hereditary evils as sins against God, he ought to set himself to the practice of what is wise and good by a faithful, diligent, and conscientious discharge of all the duties of his station; by which means his mind is preserved from a return of the power of disorder, and kept in the order of heaven, and the fulfilment of the great law of charity.

4. A fourth doctrine inculcated in the same writings, is the co-operation on the part of man with the divine grace or agency of Jesus Christ. On this subject it is insisted that man ought not indolently to hang down his hands, under the idle expectation that God will do every thing for him in the way of purification and regeneration, without any exertion of his own; but that he is bound by the above law of co-operation to exert himself, as if the whole progress of his purification and regeneration depended entirely on his own exertions; yet, in exerting himself, he is continually to recollect, and humbly to acknowledge, that all his power to do so is from above, agreeably to the declaration of Jesus Christ, "Without me ye can do nothing," John 15: 5.

5. A fifth and last distinguishing doctrine taught in the theological writings of our author, relates to man's connexion with the other world, and its various inhabitants. On this subject, it is insisted, not only from his view of the sacred Scriptures, but also from the experience of the author himself, that every man is in continual association with angels and spirits, and that without such association he could not possibly think or exert any living faculty. It is insisted further, that man, according to his life in the world, takes up his eternal abode, either with angels of light, or with the spirits of darkness; with the former, if he is wise to live according to the precepts of God's holy word; or with the latter, if, through folly and transgression, he rejects the counsel and guidance of the Most High.

Some other peculiar doctrines of minor importance might be enlarged on in this place if it was deemed necessary; such as the doctrine concerning the human soul, as being in a human form; concerning the marriage of the good and the true, as existing in the holy word, and in all things in nature. But it may be observed generally, that the fundamental error of the system is a denial of the divinity of Christ, whilst it appears to be acknowledged, and of the doctrine of the atonement. Many true things are said also of the figurative and typical character of the word of God; but the interpretation of it in this view runs into the wildest extravagance for want of principles; whilst the whole is clothed with mysticism on the one hand, and gross and carnal conceptions of spiritual things on the other. There is, indeed, much in which this sect agrees with other Christians, and much, therefore, that is true in their strange system; but it is unconnected with other great and vital truths of the gospel; and is joined also with great errors. It is a dreamy delusion, which defies all rational defence: it rests upon the assumed experience of a man of genius, it is true, but one who was not always in his wits.

Swedenborgians are found chiefly in Sweden, England, and the United States of America. Their number in Britain amounts to between two thousand five hundred and three thousand; and not fewer than fifty clergymen of the church of England, with several thousands of other ranks, who are not actual members of their society, advocate or favor the doctrine. They hold an annual meeting at Hawkstone, in Shropshire; and they have a general conference, composed of ministers and delegates from their different congregations. In Sweden, its abettors have greatly increased of late; but they are found to be few in other countries on the continent.

In the United States, they have a general convention at Baltimore, in connexion with which are six ordaining and eight teaching ministers, with ten licentiates. They have in all twenty-two regular societies, and in all seventy-nine places where their doctrines are received.

The sect, as will be seen from the preceding account of the leading principles of their founder, is an amalgamation of Sabellianism, the error of the Patristians, many of the anti-scriptural notions of the Socinians, and some of the most extravagant vagaries of Mysticism. Their mode of interpreting Scripture is totally at variance with every principle of sound philology and exegesis, and necessarily tends to unsettle the mind, and leave it a prey to the wildest whimsies that it is possible for the human imagination to create or entertain.

They practise baptism and the Lord's supper, and use confirmation, the solemnization of matrimony, after the ordinary ceremony at church, and a burial service. They approximate to an independent form of church government, but their discipline is not yet definitely settled. No candidate for ordination can be admitted till after he has been baptized into the faith of the new church: the formula of which is: "I baptize thee into the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, who is Father, Son, and Holy Spirit."

Swedenborg's works, which are voluminous, have all been translated into English; and societies have been formed in Manchester and elsewhere, for the purpose of republishing and circulating them. He died, in an obscure lodging in London, in 1772, and was buried in the Swedish church, Prince's square. *Summary View of Swedenborg's Doctrines; Swedenborg's Works; Dialogues on Swedenborg's Theological Writings; Adams' Relig. SWINE; a well-known animal, forbidden as food to the Hebrews, (Lev. 11: 7. Deut. 14: 8.) who held its flesh in such detestation, that they would not so much as pronounce its name.

Among the gross abominations and idolatrous practices of which the Israelites were guilty in the time of Isaiah, however, the eating of swine's flesh is mentioned, ch. 65: 4. 66: 17.

It was an established custom among the Greeks and Romans to offer a hog in sacrifice to Ceres, at the beginning of harvest, and another to Bacchus, before the beginning of vintage; because that animal is equally hostile to the growing corn and the loaded vineyard. To this practice there is probably an allusion in Isa. 66: 3: "He that killeth an ox, is as if he slew a man; he that sacrificeth a lamb, as if he cut off a dog's neck; he that sacrificeth an oblation, as if he offered swine's blood; he that burneth incense, as if he blessed an idol; yea, they have chosen their own ways, and their soul delighteth in their abomination."<sup>1</sup>

It was avarice, a contempt of the law of Moses, and a design to supply the neighboring idolaters with victims, that caused whole herds of swine to be fed on the borders of Galilee. Whence the reason is plain of Christ's permitting the devils to throw the swine headlong into the lake of Genesareth, Matt. 8: 32.

There is an injunction in Matt. 7: 6. which demands notice here. This passage, as it stands, is somewhat obscure, since it refers both the malignant acts specified to the last-mentioned animal. Dr. A. Clarke, however, has restored it to its true meaning, by transposing the lines; and bishop Jebb, availing himself of the hint, has shown it to be one of those inverted parallelisms which so frequently present themselves in the sacred writings, and which he has generally so beautifully illustrated. The sense of the passage becomes perfectly clear, on thus adjusting the parallelism:—

Give not that which is holy to the dogs;
Lest they turn about and read you:
Neither cast your pearls before the swine;
Lest they trample them under their feet.

The more dangerous act of imprudence, with its fatal result, is placed first and last, by our Lord, so as to make, and to leave, the deepest practical impression. They were not to suffer sin in their brother, but were bound to reprove his faults, and endeavor his reformation; their counsels and reproofs, however, were to be managed with wisdom and prudence, and were not to be unseasonably lavished on hardened and profligate sinners, who, instead of receiving them in a becoming manner, would be exasperated by them, and turn with fury upon their indiscreet advisers. "Give not wisdom," says the Hebrew adage, "to him who knows not its value, for it is more precious than pearls, and he who seeks it not, is worse than a swine that defiles and rolls himself in the mud; so he who knows not the value of wisdom, profanes its glory."

The hog delights more in the fetid mire than in the clear and running stream. The mud is the chosen place of his repose, and to wallow in it seems to constitute one of its greatest pleasures. To wash him is vain; for he is no sooner at liberty, than he hastens to the puddle, and besmears himself anew. Such is the temper of corrupt and wicked men, who had escaped the pollutions of the world, through the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, but are again entangled and overcome. It is happened unto them according to the true proverb, "The dog is turned to his vomit again; and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire," 2 Pet. 2: 22. Alured by the promises of the gospel, or alarmed by the terrors of the law, they abandoned some of their evil courses, and performed many laudable actions; but their nature and inclinations remaining unrenewed by divine grace, they quickly shook off the feeble restraints of external reformation, and returned with greater eagerness than ever to their former courses. Paxton's Illustrations, vol. i. p. 500, &c.—Watson; Calmet.

SWINTON, (John,) a divine and antiquary, was born in 1703, at Bexton, in Cheshire; was educated at Wadham college, Oxford; was chaplain to the factory at Leghorn; and died in 1777, keeper of the university records at Oxford. He contributed largely to the Universal History; and wrote many learned dissertations on Phœnician and other antiquities.—Davenport.

SWORD, in the style of the Hebrews, is often used for war. "The Lord shall send the sword into the land," that is, war. "The sword of the mouth," (Job 5: 15. Ps. 57: 4.) is, pernicious discourse, accusations, slander, calumny.

"They that take the sword shall perish with the sword;" (Matt. 26: 52.) they that employ the sword by their own authority, and would do themselves justice, deserve to be put to death by the sword of authority. Or, this is a kind of proverb: those who take the sword to smite another, generally suffer by it themselves. "The word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword;" (Heb. 4: 12.) it is the word of a Being whose eye and whose anger penetrates even to the bottom of the soul, into the heart and mind.—Calmet.

SYCAMINE, (sikaminos, in Arabic, sokam, Luke 17: 6.) This is a different tree from the sycamore, mentioned

Luke 19: 4. Dioscorides says that this tree is the mulberry, though he allows that some apprehend that it is the same with the sycamore.—Watson.

SYCAMORE; (sephmut, sephimim, 1 Kings 10: 17. 1 Chron. 27: 28. 2 Chron. 1: 15. Ps. 78: 47. Isa. 9: 9. Amos 8: 14; sukomorea, Luke 19: 4.) a large tree, according to the description of Theophrastus, Dioscorides, and Galen, resembling the mulberry-tree in the leaf, and the fig in its fruit; hence its name, compounded of sukeē, fig, and moros, mulberry; and some have fancied that it was originally produced by grafting the one tree upon the other. Its fruit is palatable. When ripe it is soft, watery, somewhat sweet, with a little of an aromatic taste. The trees are very common in Palestine, Arabia, and Egypt; grow large, and to a great height; and, though their grain is coarse, are much used in building.

"The sycamore," says Mr. Norden, "is of the height of a beech, and bears its fruit in a manner quite different from other trees; it has them on its trunk itself, which shoots out little sprigs, in form of grape stalks, at the end of which grow the fruit close to one another almost like clusters of grapes."

To change sycamores into cedars, (Isaiah 9: 10.) means, to render the buildings of cities, and the state of the nation, much more magnificent than before. Dr. Shaw remarks, that as the grain and texture of the sycamore is remarkably coarse and spongy, it could therefore stand in no competition at all with the cedar for beauty and ornament.

The wood of this tree, however, is very durable. "The mummy chests," says Dr. Shaw, "and whatever figures and instruments of wood are found in the catacombs, are all of them of sycamore, which, though spongy and porous to appearance, has, notwithstanding, continued entire and uncorrupted for at least three thousand years. From its value in furnishing wood for various uses, from the grateful shade which its wide-spreading branches afforded, and on account of the fruit, which Mallet says the Egyptians live upon and hold in the highest estimation, we perceive the loss which the ancient inhabitants of Egypt must have felt when their vines were destroyed with hail, and their sycamore trees with frost," Ps. 78: 47.

One curious particular in the cultivation of the fruit must not be passed over. Hasselquist, describing the ficus sycamorus, or Scripture sycamore, says, "It buds the latter end of March, and the fruit ripens in the beginning of June. At the time when the fruit has arrived to the size of an inch diameter, the inhabitants pare off a part at the centre point. They say that without this paring it would not come to maturity."

The sycamore strikes its large diverging roots deep into the soil; and on this account, says Paxton, "our Lord alludes to it as the most difficult to be rooted up, and transferred to another situation. "If ye had faith as a grain of mustard-seed ye might say unto this sycamore tree, Be thou plucked up by the root, and be thou planted in the sea; and it should obey you," Luke 17: 5. The stronger and more diverging the root of a tree, the more difficult it must be to pluck it up, and insert it again so as to make it strike root and grow; but far more difficult still to plant it in the sea, where the soil is so far below the surface, and where the restless billows are continually tossing it from one side to the other; yet, says our Lord, a task no less difficult than this to be accomplished, can the man of genuine faith perform with a word, for with God nothing is impossible, nothing difficult, or laborious. In the parallel passage (Matt. 17: 20.) the hyperbole is varied, a mountain being substituted for the sycamore tree. The passage is thus paraphrased by Rosenmueller: "So long as you trust in God and me, and are not sufficient in self-reliance, you may accomplish the most arduous labors undertaken for the furthering my religion."—Watson; Calmet.

SYCHAR. (See SCHEN.)

SYENE; a city on the southern frontiers of Egypt towards Ethiopia, between Thebes and the cataracts of the Nile, (Ezek. 29: 10. 30: 6.) and now called Assonan. Pliny says it stands in a peninsula on the eastern shore of the Nile; that it is a mile in circumference, and had a Roman garrison. It is five hundred miles from Alexandria to Syene, being nearly the whole length of Egypt.—Calmet.

SYDENHAM, (THOMAS), an eminent and pious physician, was born in 1624, at Winford Eagle, Dorsetshire; was educated at Wadham college, Oxford; studied medicine at Montpellier; and settled in Westminster, where he deservedly attained a high reputation. He died in 1689. Sydenham was an acute observer of symptoms, and introduced very important improvements into the treatment of small pox and other diseases. His works have been frequently reprinted.—Davenport.

SYMBOL, an abstract or compendium, a sign or representation, of something moral, by the figures or properties of natural things. Hence symbols are of various kinds; as hieroglyphics, types, enigmas, parables, fables, &c. See Dr. Lancaster's Dictionary of Scripture Symbols; and Bicheno's Symbolical Vocabulary in his Signs of the Times; Faber on the Prophecies; W. Jones's Works, vol. iv. let. 11; Horne's Introduction.—Hend. Buck.

SYMBOLICAL BOOKS, the standard or normal works which contain the doctrines professedly believed in the several churches of Christendom. For an account of these, see the article CONFESSIO OF FAITH.—Hend. Buck.

SYMPHORORA, a widow, and her seven sons, were commanded by Nerva, the Roman emperor, to sacrifice to heathen deities. Unanimously refusing, she was scourged, and hung up for some time by the hair of her head; then being taken down, a large stone was fastened to her neck, and she was thrown into the river, where she expired. Her sons were afterwards put to death in the most shocking manner.—Fox.

SYNAGOGUE, (sunagōgē, "an assembly," Rev. 2. 9. 3. 9.) The word often occurs in the gospels and in the Acts, because Jesus Christ and his apostles generally went to worship or teach in those places.

Although the sacrifices could not be offered except in the tabernacle or the temple, the other exercises of religion were restricted to no particular place. Accordingly we find that the praises of God were sung, at a very ancient period, in the schools of the prophets; and those who felt any particular interest in religion, were assembled by the seers on the Sabbath, and the new moons, for prayers and religious instruction, 1 Sam. 10: 5—11. 19: 18—24. 2 Kings 4: 23. During the Babylonish captivity, the Jews, who were then deprived of their customary religious privileges, were wont to collect around some prophet or other pious man, who taught them and their children in religion, exhorted to good conduct, and read out of the sacred books, Ezek. 14: 1. 20: 1. Dan. 6: 11. Neh. 8: 18. These assemblies, or meetings, became, in progress of time, fixed to certain places, and a regular order was observed in them. Such appears to have been the origin of synagogues.

In speaking of synagogues, it is worthy to be noticed, that there is nothing said in respect to the existence of such buildings in Palestine, during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. They are, therefore, by some supposed to have been first erected under the Maccabean princes, but that, in foreign countries, they were much more ancient. Whether this statement be correct or not, it is nevertheless certain, that, in the time of the apostles, there were synagogues wherever there were Jews.

They were built, in imitation of the temple of Jerusalem, with a court and porches, as is the case with the synagogues in the East at the present day. In the centre of the court is a chapel, supported by four columns, in which, on an elevation prepared for it, is placed the book of the law, rolled up. This, on the appointed days, is publicly read. In addition to the chapel, there is erected within the court a large covered hall or vestry, into which the people retire, when the weather happens to be cold and stormy, and each family has its particular seat. The uppermost seats in the synagogue, that is, those which were nearest the chapel where the sacred books were kept, were esteemed peculiarly honorable, Matt. 23: 6. James 2: 3. (See ΠΡΩΤΟΧΕΙΡ.)

Sunagōgē means literally a convention or assembly, but, by metonymy, was eventually used for the place of assembling; in the same way that ekklesia, church, which means literally a calling together, or convocation, signifies also at the present time the place of convocation. Synagogues were sometimes called by the Jews schools; but they were careful to make an accurate distinction between such and the schools, properly so called, the madreshim, or "sublimar schools," in which the Talmud was read, while the law merely was read in the synagogues, which they placed far behind the Talmud.

The "synagogue preacher," dershen, whose business it is, in consequence of his office, to address the people, is an official personage that has been introduced in later times; at least, we find no mention of such a one in the New Testament. On the contrary, in the time of Christ, the person who read the section for the Sabbath, or any other person who was respectable for learning and had a readiness of speech, addressed the people, Luke 4: 16—21. Acts 13: 5, 15. 15: 21. Matt. 4: 23.

The other persons who were employed in the services and government of the synagogue, in addition to the one who read the Scriptures, and the person who rendered them into the vernacular tongue, were as follows: 1. "The ruler of the synagogue," resh heeneset, archisynagogos, who presided over the assembly, and invited readers and speakers, unless some persons who were acceptable voluntarily offered themselves, Mark 5: 22, 35—38. Luke 8: 41. 13: 14, 15. Acts 13: 15. 2. "The elders of the synagogue," aphentim, presbuteroi. They appear to have been the counsellors of the head or ruler of the synagogue, and were chosen from among the most powerful and learned of the people, and are hence called archisynagogoi, Acts 13: 15. The council of elders not only took a part in the management of the internal concerns of the synagogue, but also punished transgressors of the public laws, either by turning them out of the synagogue, or decreeing the punishment of thirty-nine stripes, John 12: 42. 16: 2. 2 Cor. 11: 24. 3. "The collectors of alms," tsediphē gebai, diakonoi, "deacons." Although every thing which is said of them by the Jews was not true concerning them in the time of the apostles, there can be no doubt that there were such officers in the synagogues at that time, Acts 6. 4. "The servants of the synagogue," hau, hyperetes, (Luke 4: 20.) whose business it was to reach the book of the law to the person who was to read it, and to receive it back again, and to perform other services. The ceremonies which prevail in the synagogues at the present day in presenting the law were not observed in the time of our Savior. 5. "The messenger or legate of the synagogue," shelih tsehur. This was a person who was sent from synagogues abroad, to carry alms to Jerusalem. The name, messenger of the synagogue, was applied likewise to any person who was commissioned by a synagogue, and sent forth to propagate religious knowledge. A person likewise was denominated the messenger, or angel, aggellos, &c., who was selected by the assembly to recite for them the prayers; the same that is called by the Jews of modern times the synagogue-singer, or cantillator, Rev. 2: 1, 8, 12, 18. 3: 1, 7, 14. We have given the names above both in Hebrew and Greek.

The Jews anciently called those persons who, from their superior culture, were capable of teaching in the synagogue, phernesim, "shepherds," or "pastors." They applied the same term, at least in more recent times, to the elders of the synagogue, and also to the collectors of alms, or deacons.

We do not find mention made of public worship in the synagogues, except on the Sabbath, Matt. 12: 9. Mark 1: 21. 3: 1. 6: 2. Luke 4: 16, 32, 33. 6: 6. 13: 10. Acts 13: 14. 15: 21. 16: 13—25. 17: 2. 18: 4. What is said of St. Paul's hiring the school of one Tyrannus at Ephesus, and teaching in it daily, is a peculiar instance, Acts 19: 9, 10. Yet there can be no doubt that those Jews who were unable to go to Jerusalem attended worship on their festival days, as well as on the Sabbath, in their own synagogues. Individuals sometimes offered their private prayers in the synagogue.

When an assembly was collected together for worship, the services began, after the customary greeting, with the doxology. A section was then read from the Mosaic law. Then followed, after the singing of a second doxology, the reading of a portion from the prophets, Acts 15: 31. Luke 4: 16. The person whose duty it was to perform the reading, placed upon his head, as is done at the present day, a covering called tallith, to which St. Paul alludes, 2 Cor. 3: 15. The sections which had been read in the Hebrew were rendered by an interpreter into the vernacular tongue, and the reader or some other man then addressed the people, Luke 4: 16. Acts 13: 15. It was on such occasions as these, that Jesus, and afterwards the apostles, taught the gospel. The meeting, as far as the religious exercises were concerned, was ended with a prayer, to which the people responded Amen, when a collection was taken for the poor.

The customs which prevail at the present day, and which Vitringa has treated of, were not all of them practised in ancient times. The readers, for instance, were not then, as they are at the present day, called upon to perform, but presented themselves voluntarily; (Luke 4: 16.) the persons also who addressed the people were not rabbins expressly appointed for that purpose, but were either invited from those present, or offered themselves, Acts 13: 15. Luke 4: 17. The parts to be publicly read, likewise, do not appear to have been previously pointed out, although the book was selected by the ruler of the synagogue, Luke 4: 16. Furthermore, the forms of prayer that are used by the Jews at the present time do not appear to have been in existence in the time of Christ; unless this may perhaps have been the case in respect to the substance of some of them, especially the one called shenists pheri, concerning which the talmudists, at a very early period, gave many precepts.

It is affirmed that in the city of Jerusalem alone there were no less than four hundred and sixty or four hundred and eighty synagogues. Every trading company had one of its own, and even strangers built some for those of their own nation. Hence we find synagogues of the Cyrenians, Alexandrians, Cilicians, and Asiatics, appointed for such as came up to Jerusalem from those countries, Acts 6: 9.—Watson.

SYNCELLUS, or SINCELLUS; an ancient officer in the family of the patriarchs, and other prelates of the Greek church. The name, in the corrupt Greek, sunkellas, signifies a person who lies in the same chamber with another; and the ecclesiastic who bore it lived in the same room with the prelate, to be a witness of his conduct, and was, on this account, called the bishop's eye. The office afterwards degenerated into a mere dignity, or title of honor, and was conferred by the emperor on the prelates themselves, who were addressed as Pontifical Syncelli, and Syncelli Augustales.—Hend. Buck.

SYNCRETISM; a system of union and harmony which was attempted to be introduced into the Lutheran church in the seventeenth century. It originated with Calixtus, professor of divinity at Helmstadt, who, in examining the doctrines professed by the different bodies of Christians, discovered that, notwithstanding there were many things to be reprobated, there was so much important truth held by them in common that they ought to banish their animosities, and live together as disciples of one common master. His object was to heal the divisions and terminate the contests which prevailed. Like most men of a pacific spirit, he became the butt of all parties. He was accused of Calvinism, Roman Catholicism, Arianism, Socinianism, Judaism, and even atheism. His bitterest opponent was Buscher, a Hanoverian clergyman, who published a book against him, entitled Crypto-Papismus novæ Theologiæ Helmstadiensis. The subject was taken up by the conference held at Thorn, in the year 1645, to which Calixtus had been sent by the elector of Brandenburg; and the whole force of the Saxon clergy was turned against him, as an apostate from the strict and pure principles of Lutheranism. This great man continued, however, with consummate ability, to defend his views, and repel the attacks of his enemies, till his death, in 1656. But this event did not put a stop to the controversy. It continued to rage with greater or less violence till near the close of the century, by which time most of those who took part in it had died. To such a length was the opposition to Calixtus at one time carried, that in a dramatic piece at Wittenberg, he was represented as a fiend with horns and claws. Those who sided with him were called Calixtines or Syncretists; which latter term is derived from the Greek sugkhrētizō, signifying to join two or more parties together.—Hend. Buck.

SYNERGISTS; those, in Luther's time, who held that there were three co-operating causes in man's conversion: God, the word, and free-will; maintaining, according to Pffeffinger, that though the human will could not awaken or rouse itself to good works, but must be awakened by the Holy Spirit, yet that man was not altogether excluded from such works of the Holy Spirit, but that he also, in a certain degree, did his share.—Hend. Buck.

SYNOD; a meeting or assembly of ecclesiastical persons to consult on matters of religion. Of these there are four kinds viz: 1. General, where bishops, &c. meet from all nations. These were first called by the emperors; afterwards by Christian princes; till, in later ages, the pope usurped to himself the greatest share in this business, and by his legates presided in them when called. 2. National, where those of one nation only come together to determine any point of doctrine or discipline. The first of this sort which we read of in England was that of Herulford, or Hertford, in 673; and the last was that held by cardinal Pole, in 1555. 3. Provincial, where those only of one province meet, now called the convocation. 4. Diocesan, where those of but one diocese meet to enforce canons made by general councils, or national and provincial synods, and to consult and agree upon rules of discipline for themselves. These were not wholly laid aside till, by the act of submission, 25 Hen. VIII. c. 19, it was made unlawful for any synod to meet but by royal authority. (See COUNCIL, and CONVOCATION).—Hend. Buck.

SYNOD, is also used to signify a Presbyterian church court, composed of ministers and elders from the different presbyteries within its bounds, and is only subordinate to the general assembly.—Hend. Buck.

SYNOD OF DORT. (See DORT, SYNOD OF.)

SYNOD, ASSOCIATE; the highest ecclesiastical court among the united Presbyterian Dissenters in Scotland, the powers of which are, in a great measure, analogous to those of the general assembly in the established kirk.—Hend. Buck.

SYNOD, REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN; otherwise known by the names, Cameronians, from Richard Cameron, one of their preachers, who fell in an action with the king's troops in 1680; Mountain-men, because they originally worshipped on the mountains and moors of Scotland, during the persecution under Charles II.; M'Millanites, from the name of the first minister that espoused their cause after the revolution; and Covenanters, because they immovably adhere to the Scottish covenant. They profess to hold no new opinions, but only contend for the very same things which were generally received by all ranks of men in the purest time of Reformation, between 1638 and 1649.

From this period till the revolution in 1688, there was a gradual and most alarming defection from the Reformation attainments. In this trespass all ranks, in general, through the nation, were deeply involved. Nevertheless, even in those days of trouble, rebuke, and blasphemy, there were some faithful witnesses for Christ and his cause. They were valiant for the truth upon the earth; they resisted the prevailing defections even unto blood, striving against sin; and they generally held their meetings in the open air, a practice which they transmitted to their descendants, and which, though no longer the effect of necessity, is not wholly disused to this day in some districts, as often as the sacrament of the Lord's supper is dispensed. They steadfastly adhered to the very same principles which were openly espoused, and solemnly ratified by the covenanted church of Scotland, in the times of her purest reformation.

Thus they remained till, in 1706, the Rev. John M'Millan acceded to them and espoused their cause. Some time afterwards they received the accession of the Rev. Thomas Nairn, who had been in connexion with the Secession church. Mr. M'Millan and he, with some ruling elders, who had been regularly ordained before, and held the same principles, "constituted a presbytery, in the name of Christ, the alone Head of his Church," in 1743, under the title of the Reformed Presbytery. This title it still bears; "not that they consider themselves as any better than other men, or as having, in their own persons, arrived at any higher degrees of perfection; but purely for this, that it is at least their honest intention faithfully to adhere to the whole of our Reformation-attainments, in both church and state, without knowingly dropping any part of them. On this account, it is presumed, they may justly enough be called the Reformed or Reformation Presbytery; while, in another point of view, they might, with equal propriety, be denominated the Old Dissenting Presbytery.

"So far are the Old Dissenters from being unfriendly, as some have supposed, to civil government amongst men, that they have uniformly and strenuously contended, that it is a precious ordinance, instituted by the great Creator of heaven and earth, and made known in the revelations of his will, for his own glory, the external protection of his church, where the true religion is known and professed, and the good of mankind at large.

"They never entertained the idea of propagating their principles by violence; nor had they ever the remotest thought of injuring either the person or property of any man, high or low, rich or poor, however much he may differ from them in sentiment with respect to either civil or religious matters. On the contrary, they sincerely wish, by every consistent means in their power, to promote the peace and happiness of human society, wherever Providence orders their lot.

"The Old Dissenters are strenuous advocates for the binding obligation of the National Covenant of Scotland, and of the Solemn League and Covenant of the three kingdoms,—Scotland, England, and Ireland, which, as well as the Westminster Confession, they look upon as the confession of their faith. Fully convinced that the Holy Scriptures warrant public vowing, or covenanting unto the Lord; and, consequently, that either the church, as such, a nation at large, or any other organized body of professing Christians, may, as well as the individual, bind their own souls by solemn covenant to serve God, and keep his commandments; they justly conclude that such deeds, when both matter and manner, as in the above transactions was the case, are regulated by the revealed will of God, must be of perpetual obligation; inasmuch as the society, taking burden upon them for themselves and their posterity, is a permanent society which never dies, though the individuals composing it at any given time soon may."

In 1810, the Reformed Presbytery in Scotland constituted itself into a synod of three presbyteries, which is denominated the Reformed Presbyterian Synod of Scotland. The synod has under its charge twenty-six congregations, of which sixteen have fixed pastors. The other ten are vacant.

Much about the same time the Reformed Presbytery in Ireland constituted itself into the Reformed Presbyterian Synod of Ireland. It includes four presbyteries, in which are twenty-one congregations. Of these, fifteen have fixed pastors; the rest are vacant. There is now also in America a Reformed Presbyterian Synod, which, in 1819, included four presbyteries. There were then twenty congregations in America with fixed pastors, and many vacancies.

In Scotland the number of ministers is increasing, while their members are nearly stationary in regard to numbers. They have now a professor of theology, under whose charge the students are placed for four years, after they have gone through the regular course of academical studies in one of the universities in Scotland. Their "Judicial Testimony," together with the several defences thereof; their "Terms of Communion," accompanied with an explanation and defence; and their different warnings against prevailing errors and immoralities, are before the public, and may be consulted by those who desire to know further particulars respecting them.

They are reported to be rapidly improving in their liberality towards other bodies of professing Christians; and not long ago there was something like a movement among them to join the United Secession church. Their steadiness and piety of character, and their general intelligence, endear them to those who have an opportunity of knowing them personally. Adams's Relig. World, and Edin. Theol. Rev., Nov. 1830.—Hend. Burk.

SYNOD, RELIEF. (See RELIEF.)

SYRACUSE; the celebrated capital of Sicily, on the eastern coast, (Acts 28: 12.) where Paul spent three days, on his voyage to Rome.—Calmet.

SYRIA, called Aram, from the patriarch who peopled its chief provinces, comprehended the country lying between the Euphrates east, the Mediterranean west, Cilicia north, and Phenicia, Judea, and Arabia Deserta south. Syria of the two rivers, is Mesopotamia of Syria, which see.

Syria of Damascus extended eastward along mount Libanus; but its limits varied according to the power of the princes that reigned at Damascus. Syria of Zobah, or Sobal, was probably Cœle-Syria, or hollow Syria.

Syria, however, without any other appellation, denotes the kingdom of Syria, of which Antioch became the capital, after the reign of the Seleucidae. This country was originally governed by its own kings, each in his own city and territories. David subdued them, about B. C. 1044; (2 Sam. 8: 16. 10: 6, 8.) but after the reign of Solomon they shook off the yoke, and were not reduced again till the time of Jeroboam II. A. M. 3179. Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, having declared war against Ahab, king of Judah, he found himself under the necessity of soliciting aid from Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, who put Rezin to death, took Damascus, and transported the Syrians beyond the Euphrates. Syria afterwards came under the Chaldeans, then under the Persians, and was ultimately reduced by Alexander the Great.

After his death (A. M. 3681) the empire was divided between his principal officers, Seleucus Nicanor, head of the family of kings called Seleucidae, taking the diadem, and name of king of Syria. He reigned forty-two years, and was succeeded by Antiochus Soter; Antiochus Theos; Selencus Callinicus; Selencus Keraunus; Antiochus Magnus; Selencus Philopator; Antiochus Epiphanes; Antiochus Eupator; Demetrius Soter; Demetrius Nicator; Antiochus Theos; Tryphon; Antiochus Soter, or Sidetes; 3878, Seleucus V. son of Demetrius Nicanor; Antiochus Gryphus, or Philometer, and Antiochus Cyzicenus, his brother, (3892,) divided the kingdom; Seleucus VI. son of Gryphus; and Antiochus Eusebes.

In the year 3912, Syria was divided between Philip and Demetrius Eucerus. The Syrians finding their country almost ruined by the civil wars which ensued, they called in Tigranes, king of Armenia, A. M. 3921. The two sons of Antiochus Eusebes, however, still held possession of a part of Syria, till Pompey reduced it into a Roman province, A. M. 3939, after it had subsisted two hundred and fifty-seven years. See further under the respective articles relative to the persons mentioned in this historical sketch.—Calmet.

SYRIAN CHRISTIANS. The number of Syrian churches is greater than has been supposed. There are, at this time, fifty-five churches in Malaya, acknowledging the patriarch of Antioch. The church was erected by the present bishop in 1793. See Evang. Mag. for 1807, p. 480.

The Syrian Christians are not Nestorians. Formerly, indeed, they had bishops of that communion; but the liturgy of the present church is derived from that of the early church of Antioch, called Liturgia Jacobi Apostoli. They are usually denominated Jacobite; but they differ in ceremonial from the church of that name in Syria, and indeed from any existing church in the world. Their proper designation, and that which is sanctioned by their own use, is, Syrian Christians, or the Syrian Church of Malaya. Their number is about two hundred thousand.

The doctrines of the Syrian church are contained in a very few articles; and are not at variance, in essentials, with the doctrines of the church of England.—Hend. Burk.

SYRO-PHENICIA, is Phenicia properly so called, but which, having by conquest been united to the kingdom of Syria, added its old name Phenicia to that of Syria. The Canaanitish woman is called a Syro-phenician, (Mark 7: 26.) because she was of Phenicia, then considered as part of Syria. Matthew, who wrote in Hebrew or Syriac, calls her a Canaanitish woman, (Matt. 15: 22, 24.) because that country was really peopled by Canaanites; Sidon being the eldest son of Canaan, Gen. 10: 15. (See PHENICIA).—Calmet.

T.

TABERAH, or TABEERA; (burning;) an encampment of Israel in the desert, (Num. 11: 3. Deut. 9: 22.) and so called, because here a fire from the tabernacle of the Lord burned a great part of the camp.—Calmet.

TABERNACLE; that magnificent, divine pavilion, the emblem of heaven itself, (Heb. 9: 24.) which Moses built for God, by his express command, partly to be the place of his visible residence as King of Israel, (Exod. 40: 34, 35.) and partly to be the centre and medium of that solemn worship which the people were to render to him, ver. 26—29.

Moses, having been solemnly instructed by God to rear the tabernacle, according to the pattern which had been shown to him in the mount, (Heb. 8: 5.) called the people together and informed them of his proceedings, for the purpose of affording them an opportunity of contributing towards so noble and honorable a work, Exod. 25: 2. 35: 5. And so liberally did the people bring their offerings, that he was obliged to restrain them in so doing, ver. 21—36: 7. The structure which we are now about to describe, was built with extraordinary magnificence, and at a prodigious expense, that it might be in some measure suitable to the dignity of the Great King, for whose palace it was designed, and to the value of those spiritual and eternal blessings, of which it was also designed as a type or emblem.

The value of the gold and silver, only, used for the work, and of which we have an account in Exod. 38: 24, 25, amounted, according to bishop Cumberland's reduction of the Jewish talent and shekel to English coin, to upwards of one hundred and eighty-two thousand five hundred and sixty-eight pounds, or eight hundred thousand dollars. If we add to this the vast quantity of brass that was also used; the shittim wood, of which the boards of the tabernacle, as well as the pillars which surrounded the court, and sacred utensils, were made; as also the rich embroidered curtains and canopies that covered the tabernacle, divided the parts of it, and surrounded the court; and if we further add, the jewels that were set in the high-priest's ephod and breastplate, which are to be considered as part of the furniture of the tabernacle; the value of the whole materials, exclusive of workmanship, must amount to an immense sum.

The learned Spencer imagined that Moses borrowed his design of this tabernacle from Egypt. But this notion, as Jennings has shown, is directly at variance with matter of fact; the structure of Moses differing from those used in the heathen worship most essentially, both in situation and form; and also with its typical design and use, as pointed out by the apostle in the ninth chapter of the Hebrews.

The tabernacle made a splendid appearance. It was of an oblong rectangular form, thirty cubits long, ten long, eighteen broad, and eighteen high. The two sides, and the western end, were of shittim wood, overlaid with gold, and fixed in solid sockets, or vases of silver. Above, they were secured by bars overlaid with gold, passing through rings of gold, which were fixed to the boards. On the east end, which was the entrance, there were only five pillars, whose chapters and fillets were overlaid with gold, standing on five sockets of brass. The tabernacle was covered with four layers, or coverings of different kinds. The first and inner one was composed of fine linen, magnificently embroidered with figures of cherubim, in shades of blue, purple, and scarlet: this formed the beautiful ceiling. The next was made of goats' hair; the third of rams' skins, dyed red; and the fourth and outward covering was made of skins of some description, dyed of a particular color. The entrance at the east end of this splendid structure was inclosed with a richly embroidered curtain, suspended from the golden pillars, Exod. 27: 16.

Such was the external appearance of the sacred pavilion, which was divided into two apartments, by means of four pillars, overlaid with gold, like the pillars before described, two cubits and a half distant from each other; only they stood on sockets of silver, instead of sockets of brass; (Exod. 26: 32. 36: 36.) and on these pillars was hung a veil, formed of the same materials as the one placed at the east end, Exod. 26: 31—33. 36: 35. We are not informed in what proportions the interior of the tabernacle was thus divided; but it is generally conceived that it was divided in the same proportion as the temple afterwards built according to its model; that is, two-thirds of the whole length being allotted to the first room, or the holy place, and one-third to the second, or most holy place. Thus the former would be twenty cubits long, ten wide, and ten high, and the latter ten cubits every way. It is observable, that neither the holy, nor most holy places, had any window. Hence the need of the candlestick in the one, for the service that was performed therein: the profound darkness of the other, illumined only by the supernatural cloud of glory, would create reverence and awe of the Divine Presence. (See SHEKINAH.)

The tabernacle thus described stood in an open court, of an oblong form, one hundred cubits in length, and fifty in breadth, situated due east and west, Exod. 27: 18.

This court was surrounded with pillars of brass, filleted with silver, and placed at the distance of five cubits from each other. Their sockets were of brass, and were fastened to the earth with pins of the same metal, Exod. 38: 10, 17, 20. Their height is not stated, but it was probably five cubits, that being the length of the curtains that were suspended on them, Exod. 38: 18. These curtains, which formed an inclosure round the court, were of fine twined white linen, (Exod. 27: 9. 38: 8, 16.) except that at the entrance on the east end, which was of blue, and purple, broad, and ten in height; (Exod. 26: 18—29. 36: 23—34.) which, according to bishop Cumberland, was fifty-five feet and scarlet, and fine white twined linen, with cords to draw it either up or aside, when the priests entered the court, Exod. 39: 40. Within this area stood the altar of burnt-offerings, and the laver and its foot. The former was placed in a line between the door of the court and the door of the tabernacle, but nearer the former; (Exod. 40: 6, 29.) the latter stood between the altar of burnt-offering and the door of the tabernacle, Exod. 38: 8. (See ALTAR.)

But although the tabernacle was surrounded by the court, there is no reason to think that it stood in the centre of it; for there was no occasion for so large an area at the west end as at the east, where the altar and other utensils of the sacred service were placed. It is more probable that the area at this end was fifty cubits square; and indeed a less space than that could hardly suffice for the work that was to be done there, and for the persons who were immediately to attend the service. We now proceed to notice the furniture which the tabernacle contained.

In the holy place were three objects worthy of notice, viz. the altar of incense, the table for the shew-bread, and the candlestick for the lights, each of which have been described in their respective places. The altar of incense was placed in the middle of the sanctuary, before the veil, (Exod. 30: 6—10. 40: 26, 27.) and on it the incense was burnt morning and evening, Exod. 30: 34—38. On the north side of the altar of incense, that is, on the right hand of the priest as he entered, stood the table for the shew-bread, (Exod. 26: 35. 40: 22, 23.) and on the south side of the holy place, the golden candlestick, Exod. 25: 23—30. In the most holy place were the ark, the mercy-seat, and the cherubim, for a description of which their articles may be consulted.

The remarkable and costly structure thus described was erected in the wilderness of Sinai, on the first day of the first month of the second year, after the Israelites left Egypt; (Exod. 40: 17.) and when erected was anointed, together with its furniture, with holy oil, (ver. 9—11.) and sanctified by blood, Exod. 24: 6—8. Heb. 9: 21. The altar of burnt-offering, especially, was sanctified by sacrifices during seven days, (Exod. 29: 37.) while rich donations were given by the princes of the tribes, for the service of the sanctuary, Num. 7.

We should not omit to observe, that the tabernacle was so constructed as to be taken to pieces and put together again as occasion required. This was indispensable; it being designed to accompany the Israelites during their travels in the wilderness. As often as they removed, the tabernacle was taken to pieces, and borne in regular order by the Levites, Num. 4. Wherever they encamped it was pitched in the midst of their tents, which were set up in a quadrangular form, under their respective standards, at a distance from the tabernacle of two thousand cubits; while Moses and Aaron, with the priests and Levites, occupied a place between them.

"Tabernacle" is sometimes put for heaven, for the dwelling-place of the blessed, Ps. 15: 1. 61: 4: "I will abide in thy tabernacle forever." Ps. 84: 1: "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts!" Paul says to the Hebrews, (chap. 8: 2.) that "Jesus Christ was a minister of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man;" and that, "being come a high-priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building," &c. ch. 9: 11. See also Rev. 13: 6. 21: 3. The tabernacle of David that God was to raise (Amos 9: 11. Acts 15: 16.) is the church of Christ, the offspring of David, and heir of the promises made to that patriarch.—Calmet.

TABERNACLES, FEAST OF; a solemn festival of the Hebrews, observed after harvest, on the fifteenth day of the month Tisri, Lev. 23: 34—41. It was one of the three great solemnities, wherein all the males of the Israelites were obliged to present themselves before the Lord; and it was instituted to commemorate the goodness of God, who protected them in the wilderness, and made them dwell in tents or booths after they came out of Egypt. (See FEASTS.) This feast continued eight days, of which the first and last days were the most solemn, Lev. 23: 31, &c. It was not allowed to do any labor on this feast, and particular sacrifices were offered, which, together with the other ceremonies used in celebrating this festival, were as follows: The first day of the feast they cut down branches of the handsomest trees, with their fruit, branches of palm-trees, and such as were full of leaves, and boughs of the willow trees that grew upon the sides of the brooks, Neh. 8: 16. These they brought together, and waved them towards the four quarters of the world, singing certain songs. These branches were also called hosanna, because, when they carried them and waved them, they cried, Hosanna; not unlike what the Jews did at our Savior's entry into Jerusalem, Matt. 21: 8, 9. On the eighth day they performed this ceremony oftener, and with greater solemnity, than upon the other days of the feast. They called this day hosanna rabbah, or "the great hosanna."—Watson.

TABITHA; a Christian widow, who lived at Joppa, and who, having fallen sick and died, was restored to life through the intercession of the apostle Peter, Acts 4: 36. She was celebrated for her charity to the poor.—Calmet.

TABLE-TALK, (LUTHER'S); an apocryphal work ascribed to the great reformer, and pretending to give a collection of his favorite sayings, aphorisms, &c. It contains no small quantity of excellent matter, and much that is amusing; but retails many absurd stories and extravagancies, which tend in no small degree to lower the character of Luther. If any part of it really came from his pen, it was never designed for publication.—Hend. Buck.

TABLES OF THE LAW. Those that were given to Moses upon mount Sinai were written by the finger of God, and contained the decalogue or ten commandments of the law, as they are rehearsed in Exod. 20.

Many idle questions have been started about these tables; about their matter, their form, their number, be that wrote them, and what they contained. The words which intimate that the tables were written by the finger of God, some understand simply and literally; others, of the ministry of an angel; and others explain them merely to signify an order of God to Moses to write them. The expression, however, in Scripture always signifies immediate divine agency. (See DECALOGUE; and LAW.)—Watson.

TABOR; a mountain not far from Kadesh, in the tribe of Zebulun, and in the confines of Issachar and Naphtali, 1 Sam. 10: 3. It has its name from its eminence, because it rises up in the midst of a wide champaign country, called the valley of Jezreel, or the great plain. The road from Nazareth lies for two hours between low hills; it then opens into the plain of Esdraelon. At about two or three furlongs within the plain, and six miles from Nazareth, rises this singular mount, which is almost entirely insulated, its figure representing a half sphere. Antiochus, king of Syria, took the fortress on the top of this hill. Vespasian, also, got possession of it; and, after that, Josephus fortified it with strong walls. But what has made it more famous than any thing else is the common opinion, from the time of St. Jerome, that the transfiguration of our Savior was on this mountain.

Van Egmont and Heyman give the following account: "This mountain, though somewhat rugged and difficult, we ascended on horseback, making several circuits round it, which took up about three quarters of an hour. It is one of the highest in the whole country, being thirty stadia, or about four English miles, a circumstance that rendered it more famous. And it is the most beautiful I ever saw, with regard to verdure, being everywhere decorated with small oak trees, and the ground universally enamelled with a variety of plants and flowers, except on the south side, where it is not so fully covered with verdure. On this mountain are great numbers of red partridges, and some wild boars; and we were so fortunate as to see the Arabs hunting them. We left, but not without reluctance, this delightful place, and found at the bottom of it a mean village, called Deboura, or Tabour, a name said to be derived from the celebrated Deborah mentioned in Judges."

"From the top of Tabor," says Mandrell, "you have a prospect which, if nothing else, will reward the labor of ascending it. It is impossible for man's eyes to behold a higher gratification of this nature. On the north-west you discern at a distance the Mediterranean, and all round you have the spacious and beautiful plains of Esdraelon and Galilee. Turning a little southward, you have in view the high mountains of Gilboa, fatal to Saul and his sons. Due east you discover the sea of Tiberias, distant about one day's journey. A few points to the north appears that which they call the mount of Beatitudes. Not far from this little hill is the city Saphet: it stands upon a very eminent and conspicuous mountain, and is seen far and near." Beyond this is seen a much higher mountain, capped with snow, a part of the chain of Antilibanus. To the south-west is Carmel, and on the south the hills of Samaria.—Watson.

TABORITES; the followers of John Huss, so called from the fortified city of Tabor, erected on a mountain, in the circle of Eechin, in Bohemia, which had been consecrated by the field preaching of Huss. The gentle and pious mind of that martyr never could have anticipated, far less approved of, the terrible revenge which this branch of Bohemian adherents took upon the emperor, the empire, and the clergy, in one of the most dreadful and bloody wars ever known. The Hussites commenced their vengeance by the destruction of the convents and churches, on which occasions many of the priests and monks were murdered.

John Ziska, a Bohemian knight, formed a numerous, well-mounted, and disciplined army, which built Tabor, as above described, and rendered it an impregnable depôt and place of defence. He was called Ziska of the Cup, because one great point for which the Hussites contended was the use of the cup by the laity in the sacrament. At his death, in 1424, the immense mass of people whom he had collected fell to pieces; but, under Procopius, who succeeded Ziska as general, the Hussites again rallied, and gained decisive victories over the imperial armies in 1427 and 1431. After this, as all parties were desirous of coming to terms of peace, the council of Basle interposed, and a compromise was made; but hostilities again broke out in 1434, when the Taborites gained a complete victory. Owing, however, to the treachery of Sigismund, whom they had aided in ascending the throne, they were much weakened; and from this time they abstained from warfare, and maintained their disputes with the Catholics only in the deliberations of the diet, and in theological controversial writings, by means of which their creed acquired a purity and completeness which made it similar, in many respects, to the Protestant confessions of the sixteenth century. Encroachments were gradually made on their religious freedom, and they continued to suffer until they gradually merged into the BOHEMIAN BROTHERS, which see.—Hend. Buck.

TABRET; a kind of musical drum much used at feasts and dancing, and in religious worship, Exod. 15: 20, 29. To be as a tabret is to be greatly loved and delighted in, Job 17: 6. To be adorned with tabrets is to be filled with gladness on account of prosperity and happiness, Jer. 31: 4. To labor on the breasts is to beat them as if a drum, for vexation and grief, Nah. 2: 7.—Brown.

TACHES; books, clasps, or lachets of gold and brass, for fastening together the curtains of the tabernacle, Ex. 26: 6, 11.—Brown.

TACITUS, (CAIUS CORNELIUS), a Latin historian, was born about A. D. 56, and was of an equestrian family. The place of his birth is not known. He early cultivated poetry; he became an advocate; and he is supposed also to have borne arms. He was successively quaestor, edile, and prætor, and, in 97, attained the rank of consul. Pliny the younger was his bosom friend, and Agricola was his father-in-law. He is believed to have died about A. D. 135. Of his admirable History and Annals, a large portion is unfortunately lost. Tacitus also wrote the Life of Agricola; the Manners of the Germans; and a Dialogue on Eloquence: the last of these, however, is by some attributed to Quintilian.—Davenport.

TACKANASH, (JOHN), Indian minister on Martha's Vineyard, was ordained colleague with Hiacomoes, August 22, 1670, the day of the formation of the first Indian church on the island. He possessed considerable talents, and was exemplary in his life. Allowing himself in few diversions, he studied much, and seemed to advance in piety as he became more acquainted with the truths of the gospel. Of Indian preachers he was the most distinguished. In prayer he was devout and fervent; faithful in his instructions and reproofs; strict in the discipline of his church, excluding the immoral from the ordinances till they repented. So much was he respected, that the English, when deprived of their own minister, attended his meeting and received the Lord's supper from his hands. He died in the peace and hope of the Christian, January 22, 1684. His place of residence was at Numpaug, at the east end of Martha's Vineyard. Mayhew's Ind. Conc., 15, 16.—Allen.

TADMOR, subsequently called Palmyra by the Greeks, was a city founded by Solomon in the desert of Syria, on the borders of Arabia Deserta, near the Euphrates. It is situated under a ridge of barren hills to the west, and its other sides are open to the desert. The city was originally about ten miles in circumference; but such have been the destructions effected by time, that the boundaries are with difficulty traced and determined. Its situation was remote from human habitations, in a delightful spot, an oasis in the midst of a dreary wilderness; and it is probable that Solomon built it to facilitate his commerce with the East, as it afforded a supply of water, a thing of the utmost importance in an Arabian desert. It is one day's journey, or twenty miles, west from the Euphrates, two from Upper Syria, and six from Babylon.

There was nothing more magnificent in the whole East. There are still found a great number of inscriptions, the most of which are Greek, and the other in the Palmyrenian character. Nothing relating to the Jews is seen in the Greek inscriptions; and the Palmyrenian inscriptions are entirely unknown, as well as the language and the character of that country. The city of Tadmor preserved this name to the time of the conquest by Alexander the Great: then it had the name of Palmyra given to it, which it preserved for several ages. About the middle of the third century, it became famous, because Odenatus and Zenobia, his queen, made it the seat of their empire. Longinus, the famous critic, was her secretary. When the Saracens became masters of the East, they restored its ancient name of Tadmor to it again, which it has always preserved since.

It is not known when, nor by whom, it was reduced to the ruinous condition in which it is now found. It may be said to consist at present of a forest of Corinthian pillars, erect and fallen. So numerous are these, consisting of many thousands, that the spectator is at a loss to connect or arrange them in any order or symmetry, or to conceive what purpose or design they could have answered. "In the space covered by these ruins," says Volney, "we sometimes find a palace of which nothing remains but the court and walls; sometimes a temple, whose peristyle is half thrown down; and now a portico, a gallery, or triumphal arch. Here stand groups of columns, whose symmetry is destroyed by the fall of many of them; there we see them ranged in rows of such length, that, similar to rows of trees, they deceive the sight, and assume the appearance of continued walls. If from this striking scene we cast our eyes upon the ground, another almost as varied presents itself. On all sides we behold nothing but subverted shafts, some whole, others shattered to pieces or dislocated in their joints; and on which side soever we look, the earth is strewn with vast stones half buried, with broken entablatures, mutilated friezes, disfigured reliefs, effaced sculptures, violated tombs, and altars defiled by dust."—Calmet; Watson.

TALAPOINS; priests or friars of the Siamese, and other Indian nations. They reside in convents, which are square inclosures, in the centre of which stands a temple, and round it the cells of the talapoins, like so many tents in a camp. There are likewise female talapoins, who live under the same regulations as the men, and in the same convents. They have likewise nuns, or young talapoins, who wait upon the old ones, and receive their education from them. Each convent of talapoins is under the directions of a superior, whom they call a sanerata.

These priests subsist wholly upon the sins and the liberality of the people; for they undergo a course of penance for the iniquities of such as bestow upon them their charitable benevolence. They are extremely indulgent and hospitable to strangers; and there are two lodges on each side of the entrance to their cells, which are wholly reserved for the accommodation of their guests. They are under an indispensable obligation to live single; and those who offend against chastity, are subject to be burnt at a stake. Broughton's Dict.—Williams.

TALENT; a weight among the Jews containing three thousand shekels; which, if a shekel of silver be reckoned at three shillings, a talent of it will amount to four hundred and fifty pounds sterling, and one of gold to sixteen times as much, viz. seven thousand two hundred pounds. But we, supposing a shekel of silver to be considerably less, viz. two shillings three pence and three-eighths, compute the talent of silver at three hundred and forty-two pounds three shillings and nine pence, and a talent of gold at five thousand four hundred ninety-five pounds sterling, Exod. 38: 24, 27. The weight of a Jewish talent for weighing silver was one hundred and thirteen pounds ten ounces one penny-weight ten grains and two-sevenths; but their talent used in weighing other things was perhaps a fifth part heavier. The Egyptian talent was eighty-six pounds and almost nine ounces. They had a talent at Antioch that weighed three hundred and ninety pounds and about three ounces and a half. (See MOSEY.) Whatever means of grace and usefulness God gives to men are called talents; and to some he gives these in greater, and to others in less proportion; but all ought to improve what they receive, and must give account of their use thereof, Matt. 25: 15—29. Luke 19. To mark the infinite disproportion between the injuries done by us to God and those done by men to us, the former are called ten thousand talents, and the latter one hundred pence, Matt. 28: 24, 28. Zech. 5: 7. Rev. 16: 21.—Brown.

TALENT, figuratively signifies any gift or opportunity God gives to men for the promotion of his glory. "Every thing almost," says Mr. Scott, "that we are, or possess, or meet with, may be considered as a talent; for a good or a bad use may be made of every natural endowment, or providential appointment, or they may remain unoccupied through inactivity and selfishness. Time, health, vigor of body, and the power of exertion and enduring fatigue—the natural and acquired abilities of the mind, skill in any lawful art or science, and the capacity for close mental application—the gift of speech, and that of speaking with fluency and propriety, and in a convincing, attractive, or persuasive manner—wealth, influence, or authority—a man's situation in the church, the community, or relative life—and the various occurrences which make way for him to attempt any thing of a beneficial tendency: these, and many others that can scarcely be enumerated, are talents which the consistent Christian will improve to the glory of God, and the benefit of mankind. Nay, this improvement procures an increase of talents, and gives a man an accession of influence, and an accumulating power of doing good; because it tends to establish his reputation for prudence, piety, integrity, sincerity, and disinterested benevolence: it gradually forms him to an habitual readiness to engage in beneficent designs, and to conduct them in a gentle, unobtrusive, and unassuming manner: it disposes others to regard him with increasing confidence and affection, and to approach him with satisfaction; and it procures for him the countenance of many persons, whose assistance he can employ in accomplishing his own salutary purposes." Scott's Essays; Works of H. More.—Hend. Buck.

TALLENTS, (FRANCIS, M. A.,) was born at Pelsley, near Chesterfield, in Derbyshire, in November, 1619. He was ordained at London, in 1648, by the third classical presbytery in that province. He was eminent as a divine, and an author. His View of Universal History, or Chronological Tables, was one of the greatest works of the age. Another of his works was entitled Sure and Large Foundations, designed to promote Catholic Christianity; and another, a Short History of Schism, for the promoting of Christian Moderation. He published several smaller works.—Middleton.

TALMUD; (from the Hebrew, lamad, to teach;) the great depository of the doctrines and opinions of the Jews. There are two works which bear this name, the Talmud of Jerusalem and the Talmud of Babylon. Each of these is composed of two parts—the Mishna, which is the text, and is common to both; and the Gemara, or commentary.

The Mishna, which comprehends all the laws, institutions, and rules of life, (which, besides the ancient Hebrew Scripture, the Jews thought themselves bound to observe,) was composed, according to the unanimous testimony of the Jews, about the close of the second century. It was the work of rabbi Jehuda (or Juda) Hakkadosh, who was the ornament of the school of Tiberias, and is said to have occupied him forty years. The commentaries and additions which succeeding rabbies made, were collected by rabbi Johanan Beo Eliezer, some say in the fifth, others say in the sixth, and others in the seventh century, under the name of Gemara; that is, completion, because it completed the Talmud. A similar addition was made to the Mishna by the Babylonish doctors in the beginning of the sixth century, according to Enfield; and in the seventh according to others.

The Mishna is divided into six parts, of which every one which is entitled order is formed of treatises: every treatise is divided into chapters, and every chapter into mishnas, or aphorisms. In the first part is discussed whatever relates to seeds, fruits, and trees; in the second, feasts; in the third, women, their duties, their disorders, marriages, divorces, contracts, and nuptials; in the fourth, are treated the damages or losses sustained by beasts or men, of things found, deposits, usuries, rents, farms, partnership in commerce, inheritance, sales and purchases, oaths, witnesses, arrests, idolatry; and here are named those by whom the oral law was received and preserved; in the fifth part are noticed what regards sacrifices and holy things; and the sixth treats on purifications, vessels, furniture, clothes, houses, leprosy, baths, and numerous other articles: all this forms the Mishna.

As the unlearned reader may wish to obtain some notion of rabbinical composition and judgment, we shall gratify his curiosity sufficiently by the following specimen: "Adam's body was made of the earth of Babylon, his head of the land of Israel, his other members of other parts of the world. R. Meir thought he was compact of the earth gathered out of the whole earth: as it is written, 'thine eyes did see my substance.' Now it is elsewhere written, 'The eyes of the Lord are over all the earth.' R. Aha expressly marks the twelve hours in which his various parts were formed. His stature was from one end of the world to the other; and it was for his transgression that the Creator, laying his hand in anger on him, lessened him; 'for before,' says R. Eleazer, 'with his hand he reached the firmament.' R. Jehuda thinks his sin was heresy; but R. Isaac thinks that it was nourishing his foreskin."

The Talmud of Babylon is most valued by the Jews; and this is the book which they mean to express when they talk of the Talmud in general. An abridgment of it was made by Maimonides in the twelfth century, in which he rejected some of its greatest absurdities. The Gemara is stuffed with dreams and chimeras, with many ignorant and impertinent questions, and the style very coarse. The Mishna is written in a style comparatively pure, and may be very useful in explaining passages of the New Testament, where the phraseology is similar. This is, indeed, the only use to which Christians can apply it: but this renders it valuable. Lightfoot has judiciously availed himself of such information as he could derive from it. Some of the popes, with a barbarous zeal, and a timidity of spirit for the success of the Christian religion, which the belief of its divinity can never excuse, ordered great numbers of the Talmud to be burned. Gregory IX. burned about twenty cart-loads; and Paul IV. ordered twelve thousand copies of the Talmud to be destroyed. (See MISHNA.) The last edition of the Talmud of Babylon was printed at Amsterdam, in twelve vols. folio; the Talmud of Jerusalem is in one large volume folio.—Hend. Buck.

TAMAR. (See JUDAH.)

TAMMUS; the tenth month of the Hebrew civil year, and the fourth of the sacred year. (See MONTH, and YEAR.)—Calmet.

TAMMUZ; a pagan idol, mentioned in Ezek. 8: 14, where the women are represented as weeping for it. It is generally thought that Tammuz was the same deity as Adonis, to which article the reader is referred, as also to the article IDOLATRY.—Calmet.

TANQUELINIANS; the followers of Tanquelinus, (or Tankelin,) a lay preacher, and founder of a sect in the twelfth century. Dr. Mosheim considers him as a mystic. He is charged with slighting the external worship of God, and the holy sacraments; with holding clandestine assemblies to propagate his opinions; and, above all, with abusing the clergy; but it must be remarked, that the worship and the clergy which he censured, were those of the Roman church. Mosheim's E. H. vol. iii. pp. 118, 119.—Williams.

TAO-SE, or TAOU-TSZE; the name of a famous sect among the Chinese, who owe their rise to Laou-tsze Lao-Kian, or Laokium, a philosopher, who lived, if we may credit his disciples, about five hundred years before Christ. He professed to restore the religion of Tao (Taou) or Reason. Some of his writings are still extant, and are full of maxims and sentiments of virtue and morality. Among others this sentence is often repeated in them: "Tao hath produced one, one hath produced two, two have produced three, and three have produced all things."

The morality of this philosopher and his disciples is not unlike that of the Epicureans, consisting in a tranquillity of mind, free from all vehement desires and passions. But as this tranquillity would be disturbed by thoughts of death, they boast of a liquor, that has the power of rendering them immortal. They are addicted to chemistry, alchemy, and magic; and are persuaded that by the assistance of demons whom they invoke, they can obtain all that they desire. The hope of avoiding death prevailed upon a great number of Mandarins to study this diabolical art, and certain credulous and superstitious emperors regard it greatly into vogue.

The doctrine of this sect concerning the formation of the world, according to Dr. Milne, much resembles that of the Epicureans. If they do not maintain the eternity of matter, on the other hand they do not deny it; but, in analogy with the favorite science of alchemy, they represent the first pair as drawn out of the boiling mouth of "an immense crucible," by a celestial being. The Platonic notion of an anima mundi, or soul of the world, is very common; and hence it is that the heavens are considered the body of this imaginary being, the mind its breath, the lights of heaven as proceeding from its eyes, the watery fluids as its spittle and tears." Broughton's Dict.; Milne's First Ten Years of the Protestant Chinese Mission, p. 32.—Williams.

TAPESTRY; cloth beautifully figured in the loom, or with the needle. It was used in the East as early as the age of Solomon. The crusaders seem to have introduced the art of making it into Europe about five or six hundred years ago. The English and Flemish first distinguished themselves in making it, but the French knew little of it till within one hundred and fifty years back. It is used to cover beds, and to hang fine rooms. Its figures are frequently formed with threads of gold, Prov. 6: 16.—Brown.

TAPPAN, (DAVID, D. D.,) professor of divinity in Harvard college, was the son of Benjamin Tappan, minister of Manchester, and was born April 21, 1753. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1771. After pursuing the study of divinity for two or three years, he commenced preaching, and was ordained minister of the third church in Newbury, in April, 1774. In this place he continued about eighteen years. His successor was Leonard Woods. In June, 1792, he was elected professor of divinity in Harvard college, in the place of Dr. Wigglesworth, who had resigned, and after anxious deliberation and the advice of an ecclesiastical council, he accepted, and was inaugurated, December 26, 1792.

When he was introduced into this office, the students of the university were uncommonly dissolute. For some time they had received no regular instruction in theology, and the tide of opinion began to run in the channel of infidelity. But the lectures of Dr. Tappan, which combined entertainment with information, which were profound and yet pathetic, elegant in style and conclusive in argument, and which came warm from a pious heart, soon checked the progress of profaneness and dissipation, and put open irreligion to shame. After a short sickness, he died, August 27, 1803, aged fifty-one, and was succeeded by Dr. Ware.

The doctrine of redemption by a crucified Savior constituted in his view the basis of the gospel. In such a light did he regard the proper divinity of Jesus Christ, that he declared it to be "the rock of his eternal hopes." When arrested by his last sickness, and warned of his approaching dissolution, he was not discomposed. His wife expressing the feelings which were excited by the thought of parting with him, he said, "If God is glorified, I am made forever. Can't you lay hold of that?" To his sons he said, "I charge you to love God supremely, and to love your neighbor as yourselves; for without these there is no true religion." He published several occasional discourses and addresses. Since his death there have been published Sermons on Important Subjects, octavo, and Lectures on Jewish Antiquities, octavo, 1807. Panoplist, i.—Allen.

TARES, (zizania, Matt. 13: 25.) "Among the hurtful weeds," says Johnson, "darnel (Lolium album) is the first. It bringeth forth leaves like those of wheat or barley, yet rougher, with a long ear, made up of many little ones, every particular whereof containeth two or three grains lesser than those of wheat; scarcely any chaffy husk to cover them with; by reason whereof they are easily shaken about, and scattered abroad. They grow in fields among wheat and barley. They spring and flourish with the grain; and in August the seed is ripe. Darnel is called, in the Arabian tongue, zizania." Parkhurst, on the authority of Castell, disputes the accuracy of this last assertion, but thinks darnel would be a better translation of the Greek word than tares; though in the north of England they still call darnel by the name of tares.

Forskal, cited by Mr. Taylor, says, the darnel is well known to the people of Aleppo. It grows among grain. If the seeds remain mixed with the meal, they render a man drunk by eating the bread. The reapers do not separate the plant; but, after the thrashing, they reject the seeds by means of a fan or sieve. Nothing, says Mr. Taylor, can more clearly elucidate the plant intended by our Lord, than this extract. It grows among grain; so in the parable. The reapers do not separate the plants; so in the parable: both grow together till harvest. After the thrashing they separate them; in the parable they are gathered from among the wheat, and separated by the hand, then gathered into bundles. Their seeds, if any remain by accident, are finally separated by winnowing; which is, of course, a process preparatory to being gathered—the grain into the garner, or storehouse; the injurious plant into heaps for consumption by fire, as weeds are consumed.—Calmet.

TARGUM; a name given to the Chaldee paraphrases of the books of the Old Testament. They are called paraphrases or expositions, because they are rather comments and explications, than literal translations of the text. They are written in the Chaldee tongue, which became familiar to the Jews after the time of their captivity in Babylon, and was more known to them than the Hebrew itself; so that when the Hebrew text was read in the synagogue, or in the temple, they generally added to it an explication in the Chaldee tongue for the service of the people, who had but a very imperfect knowledge of the Hebrew tongue. It is probable, that even from the time of Ezra this custom began: since this learned scribe, reading the law to the people in the temple, explained it, with the other priests that were with him, to make it understood by the people, Neh. 8: 7, 9.

But though the custom of making these sorts of explications in the Chaldee language be very ancient among the Hebrews, yet they have no written paraphrases or Targums before the era of Onkelos and Jonathan, who lived about the time of our Savior. Jonathan is placed about thirty years before Christ, under the reign of Herod the Great. Onkelos is something more modern. The Targum of Onkelos is the most of all esteemed, and copies are to be found in which it is inserted verse for verse with the Hebrew. It is so short, and so simple, that it cannot be suspected of being corrupted. This paraphrast wrote only upon the books of Moses; and his style approaches nearly to the purity of the Chaldee, as it is found in Daniel and Ezra. This Targum is quoted in the Mishna, but was not known either to Eusebius, Jerome, or Origen.

The Targum of Jonathan, son of Uziel, is upon the greater and lesser prophets. He is much more diffuse than Onkelos, and especially upon the lesser prophets, where he takes greater liberties, and runs on in allegories. His style is pure enough, and approaches pretty near the Chaldee of Onkelos. It is thought that the Jewish doctors, who lived above seven hundred years after him, made some additions to him.

The Targum of Joseph the Blind is upon the Hagiographia. This author is much more modern, and less esteemed, than those we have now mentioned. He has written upon the Psalms, Job, the Proverbs, the Canticles, Ecclesiastes, Ruth, and Esther. His style is a very corrupt Chaldee, with a great mixture of words from foreign languages.

The Targum of Jerusalem is only upon the Pentateuch; nor is that entire or perfect. There are whole verses wanting, others transposed, others mutilated; which has made many of opinion that this is only a fragment of some ancient paraphrase that is now lost. There is no Targum upon Daniel, or upon the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

These Targums are of great use for the better understanding not only of the Old Testament, on which they are written, but also of the New. As to the Old Testament, they serve to vindicate the genuineness of the present Hebrew text, by proving it to be the same that was in use when these Targums were made; contrary to the opinion of those who think the Jews corrupted it after the time of our Savior. They help to explain many words and phrases in the Hebrew original, and they hand down to us many of the ancient customs of the Jews. And some of them, with the phraseology, idioms, and peculiar forms of speech which are found in them, do, in many instances, help as much for the illustration and better understanding of the New Testament as of the Old, the Jerusalem Chaldee dialect, in which they are written, being the vulgar language of the Jews in our Savior's time. They also very much serve the Christian cause against the modern Jews, by interpreting many of the prophecies of the Old Testament respecting the Messiah, in the same manner as the Christians do. The best edition of these Targums is that in Buxtorf's great Hebrew Bible, Basle, 1610. Horne's Introduction.—Head. Buck.

TARSHISH, or TARSUS, is the son of Javan, and who probably founded Tarshish or Tarsus in Cilicia, and gave his name to the country. He was perhaps the father of the Etrusci in Italy. Perhaps different places are called TARSHISH. Sometimes Tarshish seemed to denote the sea in general, so called from its greenish color; as Isa. 60: 9. Ps. 68: 7. Sometimes it seems to mean Carthage in Africa, or Tartessus in Spain, (Isa. 23: 6.) for in vain would the Tyrians have fled from Nebuchadnezzar, or Alexander, to Tarsus in Cilicia. Hiller will have Tarshish to signify the country of the Celtæ in Gaul, Spain, &c., Ps. 72: 10. But there must still be another Tarshish, to which Solomon traded from the Red sea, and for which Jehoshaphat fitted out his fleet.—Brown.

TARSUS, in Cilicia, was the capital city of the country, and built on the river Cydnus, about six miles from the sea; and which, Strabo says, was built by Sardanapalus, the king of Assyria. It is said once to have equalled Athens and Alexandria in polite learning. Julius Cæsar bestowed on it the same privileges as Rome had; and hence Paul, from being born here, was free-born. To show their gratitude, the inhabitants changed the name of the city into Juliopolis, or the city of Julius. During the wars of the Greek emperors with the Persians and Saracens this city suffered much, and it is at present of no importance. Christianity was planted here by Paul, and has never since been wholly extinct. Perhaps this is the Tarshish for which Jonah set out, Jon. 1: 3.—Brown.

TASCODRUGITÆ; an ancient sect, supposed to be a subdivision of the Montanists, and so called from the absurd custom of putting the forefinger on the nose in the act of prayer: taskos in the Phrygian language signifying a stake, and druggos a nose or beak.—Head. Buck.

TAYLOR, (JEREMY, D. D.), a prelate and eloquent writer, was the son of a barber; was born, in 1613, at Cambridge; and was educated at the grammar-school of his native place, and at Caius college. He became chaplain to archbishop Laud, and subsequently to Charles I., and obtained the rectory of Uppingham. During the civil war he gained a subsistence by keeping a school, till he was interdicted from teaching. Lord Carberry then appointed him his chaplain, and it was while he resided with that nobleman that he wrote most of his pieces. He was twice imprisoned by the republican government. At the restoration he was made bishop of Down and Connor; along with which see he held that of Dromore, and the vice-chancellorship of Trinity college, Dublin. He died in 1677.

He was a man of great humility and piety. As a moral writer he was eminent, and his English style of composition was superior to any that had preceded him. His works, which stand high among those of British theologians, have been repeatedly reprinted. The most valuable are his Liberty of Prophecy; Life of Christ; the Great Exemplar; Holy Living; Holy Dying; and Ductor Dubitantium; together with his Sermons. His Holy Living, and Dying, are elaborated with peculiar care; if they were his favorite works; and the latter, being occasioned by the sickness of his patroness, the countess of Carberry, came more from the heart. See his Life prefixed to his Works; Chalmers' Biog. Dict.; Bp. Heber's Life of Jeremy Taylor; Jones' Chris. Biog.—Davenport.

TAYLOR, (RICHARD;) a Congregational divine of the seventeenth century; a man of abilities and cruidition; evangelical in doctrine, and in conversation and professional labor eminent and exemplary. He was author of the History of the Union between the Presbyterian and Congregational Dissenting Ministers in and about London, quarto, 1698. He published also other works of value.—Middleton.

TAYLOR, (ISAAC,) of Ongar, the author of various works of uncommon excellence, designed for the benefit of youth, was born in 1759, and died in 1829, aged seventy years. Through life he practised to some extent the business of a designer and engraver. He was first settled as the pastor of an Independent church at Colchester, but in 1797 removed to Ongar, where for thirty-two years he continued to labor with a most attached people, who in losing him felt that they had lost their "guide, philosopher, and friend." Mr. Taylor was indeed one of the most amiable of men, and few writers in the sphere he occupied have been less ambitious or more useful. He was, on Christian principles, a great economist of time, and quite an enthusiast in his love of order and punctuality. No man was better qualified to write on "Character essential to Success in Life;" a work of which no young man should be ignorant. Among his other writings, are, Self-Cultivation; Advice to the Teens; the Balance of Criminality; Scenes of Wealth, &c.; which have gone through numerous editions. His wife, and all his children, were associated with him in literary pursuits; presenting the singular and beautiful spectacle of a whole family of elegant, useful, evangelically pious, and successful authors.—British Magazine, 1830; Museum, 1830.

TAYLOR, (JANE,) daughter of the Rev. Isaac Taylor of Ongar, and as a writer for youth the worthy rival of Mrs. Barbauld, (see appendix,) was born September 23, 1783, in London, where her father then resided in the practice of his profession as an artist. About two years after Mr. Taylor removed to Lavenham, where the delicate infancy of Jane was nourished by the pure air of the country, and her mind early unfolded its creative powers. Even from her third and fourth year, in connexion with her sister Anne, who was two years older, she is said to have composed little tales and songs, which they would sing together; and Jane especially seemed to live in a fairy land of her own imagination. It was the choice of her excellent parents to give their children a home education. Her father removed to Colchester, in 1796. There Jane, in her fifteenth year, gave decided indications of personal piety. She was also one of a select society of young friends, for the reading of original essays, and the promotion of intellectual improvement. At the same time she was enjoying at home every means of cultivation, furnished by the general knowledge, practical good sense, and liberal taste of her father and mother, shared and sweetened by the society of her brothers and sisters; all being united in the same employment and pursuits. Here too she imbibed her habitual dread of literary affectation, and her love of all that is practical and important in common life.

A visit to London, in 1802, first brought her before the public. The new circle of friendship there formed, stimulated her powers to new action, and, diffident as she was, gradually drew her forth to write for the press. She was no aspirant after literary distinction. Unconscious of her real talents, she first wrote to gratify her friends, and afterwards with the conscientious desire of doing good to the utmost of her power. Her first contribution, "The Beggar's Boy," appeared in the "Minor's Pocket Book" for 1801. It was followed not long after by the two volumes of "Original Poems for Infant Minds," "Rhymes for the Nursery," &c. the joint production of Jane and her sisters, which quickly gained the favor of the public, were reprinted in America, and translated into German. Few books have been found more agreeable to children, or more useful in the business of early education. In 1809 she contributed to "The Associate Minstrels," and soon after engaged with her sisters in the more difficult task of composing "Hymns for Children." This volume must be pronounced equal, if not superior, both in merit and popularity, to Dr. Watts' "Divine Songs." Its success called for a second volume adapted for Sunday schools, which have been incorporated with almost every subsequent collection for that purpose, and are now continually sung by millions of infant voices, in different parts of the world. In 1814 she published "Display," and in 1816 her "Essays in Rhyme on Morals and Manners," which gained her a large increase of well merited reputation. Her "Contributions of Q. Q." to the Youth's Magazine, were among her last and best literary efforts. They have since been republished in two vols. duodecimo. She died at Ongar, April 13, 1824, confiding, calm, and happy in the Lord.—See Memoirs and Remains, by her brother.

TEA SECT. This sect is called in Chinese, Tsing-channu Keau; that is, "the pure Tea Sect;" probably from the circumstance of their making offerings to the gods of fine tea.—Williams.

TEACHERS. (See MINISTER OF THE GOSPEL, and PASTOR.)

TEACHING, is an important branch of the commission which Christ gave to his apostles, before he left the earth. "Go," said he, "teach all nations;" or, as we have it recorded by another of the evangelists, "Preach the gospel to every creature." In this way they were to make disciples, as the word mathetēsante imports.

It is one of the precious promises of the new covenant, that all its subjects shall be "taught of the Lord," Isa. 54: 13. The Lord Jesus quoted these words, in the days of his public ministry, (John 6: 45.) and describes the effect of this teaching thus: "Every man, therefore, that hath heard and learned of the Father, cometh unto me;" which he afterwards explains to mean neither more nor less than believing on him.—Jones.

TEARS. The prayer of David, "Put my tears into thy bottle," is unintelligible without an acquaintance with ancient customs. "This passage," says Burder, "seems to intimate that the custom of putting tears into the ampulle, or urnal lachrymales, so well known amongst the Romans, was more anciently in use among the Eastern nations, and particularly the Hebrews. These urns were of different materials, some of glass, some of earth; as may be seen in the work of Montfaucou, where also may be seen the various forms or shapes of them. These urns were placed on the sepulchres of the deceased, as a memorial of the distress and affection of their surviving relations and friends. It will be difficult to account for this expression of the Psalmist, but upon this supposition. If this be allowed, the meaning will be, 'Let my distress, and the tears I shed in consequence of it, be ever before thee, excite thy kind remembrance of me, and plead with thee to grant the relief I stand in need of.'"—Watson.

TEBET; the Babylonish name of the tenth ecclesiastical month of the Hebrews. (See MONTHS.)—Calmet.

TE DEUM; the title of a celebrated hymn, long used in the Christian church, and so called because it begins with these words: Te Deum laudamus; i. e. "We praise thee, O God." The origin and author of this hymn have been disputed. It has commonly been ascribed to Jerome and Augustine jointly; but it has, with greater probability, been attributed to Nicetus, bishop of Triers, who lived about the year 535, and who is said to have composed it for the use of the Gallican church.—Hend. Buck.

TEKEL; (he was weighed;) one of the words that appeared written on the wall at the sacrilegious feast of Belshazzar: indicating that this wretched prince had been weighed in the balance of heaven, and was found wanting, Dan. 5: 25. (See BELSHAZZAR, and DANIEL.)—Calmet.

TEKOÄ; a city of Judah, (2 Chron. 11: 6.) which Eusebius and Jerome place twelve miles from Jerusalem, south. The wilderness of Tekoa, mentioned 2 Chron. 20: 20, is not far from the Red sea.—Calmet.

TELEOLOGY; that science which develops the ends or final causes of the constitution of things in the natural world, and thus deduces proofs of the existence and attributes of God. The word is compounded of the Greek telos, end, and logos, doctrine. (See PHYSIOLOGY; CREATION; and EXISTENCE OF GOD.)—Hend. Buck.

TEMA, or THEMÄ, son of Ishmael, (Gen. 25: 15.) is thought to have peopled the city of Thema, in Arabia Deserta. Job speaks of the caravans of Tema and Sheba, (chap. 6: 19.) and Ptolemy places a city called Thema, or Thamma, in Arabia Deserta, towards the mountains of the Chaldeans.—Calmet.

TEMAN, or TREMAN; son of Elizphaz, and grandson of Esau, (Gen. 36: 15.) king of Idumea, called Itusham, of the country of the Temani, Jeremiah, 49: 7—20. Eusebius places Teman or Theman in Arabia Petræa, five miles from Petra, and says there was a Roman garrison there.—Calmet.

TEMPER; the disposition of the mind, whether natural or acquired. The word is seldom used by good writers without an epithet, as, a good or a bad temper. Temper must be distinguished from passion. The passions are quick and strong emotions, which by degrees subside. Temper is the disposition which remains after these emotions are past, and which forms the habitual propensity of the soul. See Dr. Evans' Practical Discourses on the Christian Temper, and the various articles, LOVE, PATIENCE, HUMILITY, FORTITUDE, &c.—Hend. Buck.

TEMPERANCE; that virtue which a man is said to possess who moderates and restrains his sensual appetite. It is often, however, used in a much more general sense, as synonymous with moderation, and is then applied indiscriminately to all the passions.

"Temperance," says Addison, "has those particular advantages above all other means of health, that it may be practised by all ranks and conditions at any season or in any place. It is a kind of regimen into which every man may put himself without interruption to business, expense of money, or loss of time. Physic, for the most part, is nothing else but the substitute of exercise or temperance."

In order to obtain and practise this virtue, we should consider it, 1. As a divine command, Phil. 4: 5. Luke 21: 34. Prov. 23: 1—3. 2. As conducive to health. 3. As advantageous to the powers of the mind. 4. As a defence against injustice, lust, imprudence, detraction, poverty, &c. And, lastly, the example of Christ should be a most powerful stimulus to it. (See INTEMPERANCE; SOBRIETY.)

Since the attention of the community has been turned to the effects produced on the human frame by distilled and fermented drinks, temperance has been admirably defined. "The moderate use of things useful, and total abstinence from those which are pernicious." On this principle a wonderful and happy reformation commenced in this country in 1826, and is now progressing throughout the world.

But, in view of the general proscription of all distilled and fermented liquors, on the above principle, some ask, "What shall we drink?" To this inquiry, without hesitation, we answer: water, pure water, and nothing but water. And to a palate not vitiated with alcoholic and narcotic stimulants, it is a most delicious beverage. The most eminent medical writers agree that pure water is of all others the most healthy drink. It is the only natural liquid which God has prepared for man and beast, and for the use of the whole vegetable kingdom. People who drink nothing but water, generally feel better and live longer than those who make use of other drinks. In the antediluvian age we have no account of any drink but water; yet the period of human life was hundreds of years. Water drinkers have more strength, and are more capable of enduring fatigue, and cold and heat, than those who use stimulating drinks. A number of British officers were taken prisoners by the Mohammedans, in India, and thrown into prison, where they were allowed nothing but rice and water. Many of them went into the dungeons with diseased livers, and other complaints; when released, after several years' confinement, they were in perfect health; and on returning to the army, they found themselves high in rank, by the death of their superiors, who had lived freely, and drank wine and spirits. During the four years which Alexander Selkirk spent upon the dreary island of Juan Fernandez, he drank nothing but water; he had been there but a short time, when he increased in strength amazingly, being three times as strong as he ever had been before. But, when taken on board a vessel sailing for England, he began to drink beer and other fermented liquors. After this, his strength gradually declined, and in one month he was no stronger than any other man.

Water drinkers have better teeth, better stomachs, and better appetites, than those who make use of stimulating drinks. Their minds are more clear and capable of greater efforts. While Sir Isaac Newton was writing his celebrated treatise on optics, he drank nothing but water. John Locke, that mighty giant in intellect, made water his common drink. He had a very feeble constitution, and was afflicted with the asthma; yet he lived seventy-three years. Cold water cools, thins, and clears the blood; it keeps the stomach, head, and nerves in order; it produces an equilibrium of animal spirits, and promotes tranquillity, serenity, and cheerfulness.—Hend. Buck; H. Newcome.

TEMPLARS, TEMPLERS, OR KNIGHTS OF THE TEMPLE; a religious order instituted at Jerusalem in the beginning of the twelfth century, for the defence of the holy sepulchre, and the protection of Christian pilgrims. They were first called The Poor of the Holy City, and afterwards assumed the appellation of Templars, because their house was near the temple. The order was founded by Baldwin II., then king of Jerusalem, with the concurrence of the pope; and the principal articles of their rule were, that they should hear the holy office throughout every day; or that, when their military duties should prevent this, they should supply it by a certain number of paternosters; and that they should abstain from flesh four days in the week, and on Fridays from eggs and milk meats; that each knight might have three horses and one squire, and that they should neither hunt nor fowl. After the ruin of Jerusalem, about 1186, they spread themselves through Germany and other countries of Europe, to which they were invited by the liberality of the Christians. In the year 1228, this order acquired stability by being confirmed in the council of Troyes, and subjected to a rule of discipline drawn up by St. Bernard. In every nation they had a particular governor, called master of the temple, or of the militia of the temple. Their grand master had his residence at Paris. The order of templars flourished for some time, and acquired, by the valor of its knights, immense riches, and an eminent degree of military renown; but, as their prosperity increased, their vices were multiplied, and their arrogance, luxury, and cruelty rose at last to such a great height, that their privileges were revoked, and their order suppressed with the most terrible circumstances of infamy and severity.—Hend. Buck.

TEMPLE; a public building erected for religious worship; more especially, the temple at Jerusalem.

According to the opinion of some writers, there were among the Jews three temples, namely, the first, erected by Solomon; the second, by Zerubbabel, and Joshua the high-priest; and the third, by Herod, a few years before the birth of Christ. But this opinion is, very properly, rejected by the Jews; who do not allow the third to be a new temple, but only the second temple repaired and beautified: and this opinion corresponds with the prophecy of Haggai, (2: 9.) that "the glory of this latter house," the temple built by Zerubbabel, "should be greater than that of the former;" which prediction was uttered with reference to the Messiah's honoring it with his presence and ministry.

The first temple is that which usually bears the name of Solomon; the materials for which were provided by David before his death, though the edifice was raised by his son. It stood on mount Moriah, an eminence of the mountainous ridge in the Scriptures termed mount Zion, (Ps. 132: 13, 14.) which had been purchased by Araunah, or Ornan, the Jebusite, 2 Sam. 24: 23, 24. 1 Chron. 21: 25. The plan and the whole model of this superb structure were formed after that of the tabernacle, but of much larger dimensions. (See TABERNAACLE.) It was surrounded, except at the front or east end, by three stories of chambers, each five cubits square, which reached to half the height of the temple; and the front was ornamented with a magnificent portico, which rose to the height of one hundred and twenty cubits: so that the form of the whole edifice was not unlike that of some ancient churches, which have a lofty tower in the front, and a low aisle running along each side of the building. The utensils for the sacred service were the same; excepting that several of them, as the altar, candlestick, &c., were larger, in proportion to the more spacious edifice to which they belonged. Seven years and six months were occupied in the erection of the superb and magnificent temple of Solomon, by whom it was dedicated, A. M. 3001, B. C. 909; with peculiar solemnity, to the worship of the Most High; who on this occasion vouchsafed to honor it with the Shekinah, or visible manifestation of His presence. It retained its pristine splendor only thirty-three or thirty-four years, when Shishak, king of Egypt, took Jerusalem, and carried away the treasures of the temple; and after undergoing subsequent profanations and pillages, this stupendous building was finally plundered and burnt by the Chaldeans under Nebuchadnezzar, A. M. 3416, or B. C. 584, 2 Kings 25: 13—15. 2 Chron. 36: 17—20.

After the captivity, the temple emerged from its ruins, being rebuilt by Zerubbabel, on a larger scale, but with vastly inferior and diminished glory, Ezra 3: 12. The second temple was profaned by order of Antiochus Epiphanes, A. M. 3837, B. C. 163, who caused the daily sacrifices to be discontinued, and erected the image of Jupiter Olympus on the altar of burnt-offering. In this condition it continued three years, (1 Mac. 4: 42.) when Judas Maccabeus purified and repaired it, and restored the sacrifices and true worship of Jehovah. Some years before the birth of our Savior, the repairing and beautifying of this second temple, which had become decayed in the lapse of five centuries, was undertaken by Herod the Great, who for nine years employed eighty thousand workmen upon it, and spared no expense to render it equal, if not superior, in magnitude, splendor, and beauty, to any thing among mankind. Josephus calls it a work the most admirable of any that had ever been seen or heard of, both for its curious structure and its magnitude, and also for the vast wealth expended upon it, as well as for the universal reputation of its sanctity. But though Herod accomplished his original design in the time above specified, yet the Jews continued to ornament and enlarge it, expending the sacred treasure in annexing additional buildings to it; so that they might with great propriety assert, that their temple had been forty and six years in building, John 2: 20.

Before we proceed to describe this venerable edifice, it may be proper to remark, that by the temple is to be understood not only the fabric or house itself, which by way of eminence is called the temple, namely, the holy of holies, the sanctuary, and the several courts both of the priests and Israelites, but also all the numerous chambers and rooms which this prodigious edifice comprehended; and each of which had its respective degree of holiness, increasing in proportion to its contiguity to the holy of holies. This remark it will be necessary to bear in mind, lest the reader of Scripture should be led to suppose, that whatever is there said to be transacted in the temple was actually done in the interior of that sacred edifice. To this infinite number of apartments, into which the temple was disposed, our Lord refers; (John 14: 2.) and by a very striking and magnificent simile, borrowed from them, he represents those numerous seats and mansions of heavenly bliss which his Father's house contained, and which were prepared for the everlasting abode of the righteous. The imagery is singularly beautiful and happy, when considered as an allusion to the temple, which our Lord not unfrequently called his Father's house.

The second temple, originally built by Zerubbabel after the captivity, and repaired by Herod, differed in several respects from that erected by Solomon, although they agreed in others.

The temple erected by Solomon was more splendid and magnificent than the second temple, which was deficient in five remarkable things that constituted the chief glory of the first: these were, the ark and the mercy-seat; the Shekinah, or manifestation of the divine presence, in the holy of holies; the sacred fire on the altar, which had been first kindled from heaven; the urim and thummim; and the spirit of prophecy. But the second temple surpassed the first in glory; being honored by the frequent presence of our divine Savior, agreeably to the prediction of Haggai, 2: 9. Both, however, were erected upon the same site, a very hard rock, encompassed by a very frightful precipice; and the foundation was laid with incredible expense and labor. The superstructure was not inferior to this great work: the height of the temple wall, especially on the south side, was stupendous. In the lowest places it was three hundred cubits, or four hundred and fifty feet, and in some places even greater. This most magnificent pile was constructed with white marble stones of prodigious magnitude, and exquisitely wrought.

The temple itself, strictly so called, which comprised the portico, the sanctuary, and the holy of holies, formed only a small part of the sacred edifice on mount Moriah, being surrounded by spacious courts, making a square of half a mile in circumference. It was entered through nine gates, which were on every side thickly coated with gold and silver; but there was one gate without the holy house, "called Beautiful," (Acts 3: 2.) which was of Corinthian brass, the most precious metal in ancient times, and which far surpassed the others in beauty. For while these were of equal magnitude, the gate composed of Corinthian brass was much larger; its height being fifty cubits, and its doors forty cubits, and its ornaments both of gold and silver being far more costly and massive.

The first or outer court, which encompassed the holy house and the other courts, was named the court of the Gentiles; because the latter were allowed to enter into it, but were prohibited from advancing further. It was surrounded by a range of porticoes, or cloisters, above which were galleries, or apartments, supported by pillars of white marble, each consisting of a single piece, and twenty-five cubits in height. One of these, fronting the mount of Olives on the east, was called Solomon's porch, or piazza, because it stood on a vast terrace, which he had originally raised from a valley beneath, four hundred cubits high, in order to enlarge the area on the top of the mountain, and make it equal to the plan of his intended building; and as this terrace was the only work of Solomon that remained in the second temple, the piazza which stood upon it retained the name of that prince. This superb portico is termed the royal portico by Josephus, who represents it as the noblest work beneath the sun, being elevated to such a prodigious height, that no one could look down from its flat roof to the valley below without being seized with dizziness; the sight not reaching to such an immeasurable depth. This outer court being assigned to the Gentile proselytes, the Jews, who did not worship in it themselves, conceived that it might lawfully be put to profane uses: for here we find that the buyers and sellers of animals for sacrifices, and also the money changers, had stationed themselves; until Jesus Christ, awing them into submission by the grandeur and dignity of his person and behavior, expelled them; telling them that it was the house of prayer for all nations, and was not to be profaned, Matt. 21: 12, 13. Mark 11: 15—17.

Within the court of the Gentiles stood the court of the Israelites, divided into two parts, or courts; the outer one being appropriated to the women, and the inner one to the men. The court of the women was separated from that of the Gentiles by a low stone wall, or partition, of elegant construction, on which stood pillars at equal distances, with inscriptions in Greek and Latin, importing that no alien should enter into the holy place. To this wall St. Paul most evidently alludes in Eph. 2: 13, 14. In this court was the treasury, over against which Christ sat, and beheld how the people threw their voluntary offerings into it, for furnishing the victims and other things necessary for the sacrifices, Mark 12: 41. John 8: 20. From the court of the women, which was on higher ground than that of the Gentiles; there was an ascent of fifteen steps, through the gate called Nicanor, into the inner or men's court: and so called because it was appropriated to the worship of the male Israelites. In these two courts, collectively termed the court of the Israelites, were the people praying, each apart by himself, for the pardon of his sins, while Zacharias was offering incense within the sanctuary, Luke 1: 10.

Within the court of the Israelites was that of the priests, which was separated from it by a low wall, one cubit in height. This inclosure surrounded the altar of burnt-offerings, and to it the people brought their oblations and sacrifices; but the priests alone were permitted to enter it.

From this court twelve steps ascended to the temple, strictly so called; which was divided into three parts, the portico, the outer sanctuary, and the most holy place. In the portico was suspended the splendid votive offerings made by the piety of various individuals. Amongst other treasures, there was a golden table given by Pompey, and several golden vases of exquisite workmanship, as well as of immense size; for Josephus relates, that there were clusters as tall as a man. And he adds, that all around were fixed up and displayed the spoils and trophies taken by Herod from the barbarians and Arabians. These votive offerings, it should seem, were visible at a distance, Luke 21: 5. This porch had a very large portal or gate, which, instead of folding-doors, was furnished with a costly Babylonian veil, of many colors, that mystically denoted the universe. From this you entered the sanctuary, or holy place, which was separated from the holy of holies by a double veil, which is supposed to have been the veil that was rent in twain at our Savior's crucifixion; thus emblematically pointing out that the separation between Jews and Gentiles was abolished; and that the privilege of the high-priest was communicated to all mankind, who might henceforth have access to the throne of grace through the one great Mediator, Jesus Christ, Heb. 10: 19—22. The holy of holies was twenty cubits square: into it no person was admitted but the high-priest, who entered it once a year on the great day of atonement, Exod. 30: 10. Lev. 16: 2, 15, 34. Heb. 9: 2—7. (See TABERNACLE.)

A few remarks on the daily service of the temple will be necessary to a clear conception of it. The first thing we notice is the morning service. After having enjoyed their repose, the priests bathed themselves in the rooms provided for that purpose, and waited the arrival of the president of the lots. This officer having arrived, they divided themselves into two companies, each of which was provided with lamps or torches, and made a circuit of the temple, going in different directions, and meeting at the pastryman's chamber, on the south side of the gate Nicanor. Having summoned him to prepare the cakes for the high-priest's meat-offering, they retired with the president to the south-east corner of the court, and cast lots for the duties connected with the altar. The priest being chosen to remove the ashes from the altar, he again washed his feet at the laver, and then with the silver shovel proceeded to his work. As soon as he had removed one shovel-full of the ashes, the other priests retired to wash their hands and feet, and then joined him in cleansing the altar and renewing the fires. The next duty was to cast lots for the thirteen particular duties connected with offering the sacrifice, which being settled, the president ordered one of them to fetch the lamb for the morning sacrifice. the priests on this duty were engaged in fetching and examining the victim, those who carried the keys were opening the seven gates of the court of Israel, and the two doors that separated between the porch and the holy place. When the last of the seven gates was opened, the silver trumpets gave a flourish, to call the Levites to their desks for the music, and the stationary men to their places, as the representatives of the people. The opening of the folding-doors of the temple was the established signal for killing the sacrifice, which was cut in pieces and carried to the top of the altar, where it was salted, and left while the priests once more retired to the room Gazith to join in prayer. While the sacrifice was being slain in the court of the priests, the two priests appointed to trim the lamps and cleanse the altar of incense were attending to their duties in the holy place. After the conclusion of their prayer, and a rehearsal of the ten commandments and their phylacteries, the priests again cast lots, to choose two to offer incense on the golden altar, and another to lay the pieces of the sacrifice on the fire of the brazen altar. The lot being determined, the two who were to offer the incense proceeded to discharge their duty, the time for which was, between the sprinkling of the blood and the laying the pieces upon the altar, in the morning; and in the evening, between the laying the pieces upon the altar and the drink-offering. As they proceeded to the temple they rang the megemphita, or great bell, to warn the absent priests to come to worship; the absent Levites to come to sing; and the stationary men to bring to the gate Nicanor those whose purification was not perfected. The priest who carried the censer of coals, which had been taken from one of the three fires on the great altar, after kindling the fire on the incense altar, worshipped and came out into the porch, leaving the priest who had the incense alone in the holy place. As soon as the signal was given by the president, the incense was kindled, the holy place was filled with perfume, and the congregation without joined in the prayers, Luke 1: 9. These being ended, the priest whose lot it was to lay the pieces of the sacrifice upon the altar, threw them into the fire, and then, taking the tongs, disposed them in somewhat of their natural order. The four priests who had been in the holy place now appeared upon the steps that led to the porch, and extending their arms, so as to raise their hands higher than their heads, one of them pronounced the solemn blessing, Num. 6: 24—26. After this benediction, the daily meat-offering was offered; then the meat-offering of the high-priest; and last of all the drink-offering; at the conclusion of which the Levites began the song of praise; and, at every pause in the music, the trumpets sounded and the people worshipped. This was the termination of the morning service. It should be stated that the morning service of the priests began with the dawn of day, except in the great festivals, when it began much earlier: the sacrifice was offered immediately after sunrise.

During the middle of the day the priests held themselves in readiness to offer the sacrifices which might be presented by any of the Israelites, either of a voluntary or an expiatory nature. Their duties would therefore vary according to the number and nature of the offerings they might have to present.

The evening service varied in a very trifling measure from that of the morning, and the same priests ministered, except when there was one in the house of their Father who had never burned incense, in which case that office was assigned to him; or if there were more than one, they cast lots who should be employed.

fice was, it was infinitely surpassed in splendor by that of the inner temple, or sanctuary. Its appearance, according to Josephus, had every thing that could strike the mind, or astonish the sight: for it was covered on every side with plates of gold; so that when the sun rose upon it, it reflected so strong and dazzling an effulgence, that the eye of the spectator was obliged to turn away, being no more able to sustain its radiance than the splendor of the sun. To strangers who were approaching, it appeared at a distance like a mountain covered with snow; for where it was not decorated with plates of gold, it was extremely white and glistening. On the top it had sharp pointed spikes of gold, to prevent any bird from resting upon it, and polluting it. There were, continues the Jewish historian, in that building, several stones which were forty-five cubits in length, five in height, and six in breadth. "When all these things are considered," says Harwood, "how natural is the exclamation of the disciples, when viewing this immense building at a distance: 'Master, see what manner of stones, (potapot lithoi, what very large ones,) and what buildings are here?' (Mark 13: 1.) and how wonderful is the declaration of our Lord upon this, how unlikely to be accomplished before the race of men who were then living should cease to exist! 'Seest thou these great buildings? There shall not be left one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down.' Improbable as this prediction must have appeared to the disciples at that time, in the short space of thirty-six years after, it was exactly accomplished; and this most magnificent temple, which the Jews had literally turned into a den of thieves, was, through the righteous judgment of God upon that wicked and abandoned nation, utterly destroyed by the Romans, A. D. 70, or 73 of the vulgar era, on the same month, and on the same day of the month when Solomon's temple had been razed to the ground by the Babylonians!"

Both the first and second temples were contemplated by the Jews with the highest reverence. Of their affectionate regard for the first temple, and for Jerusalem, within whose walls it was built, we have several instances in those psalms which were composed during the Babylonian captivity; and of their profound veneration for the second temple we have repeated examples in the New Testament. They could not bear any disrespectful or dishonorable thing to be said of it, John 2: 19. Matt. 26: 61. 27: 40. Acts 6: 13. 21: 28.

It only remains to add, that it appears, from several passages of Scripture, that the Jews had a body of soldiers who guarded the temple, to prevent any disturbances during the ministrations of such an immense number of priests and Levites. To this guard Pilate referred, when he said to the chief priests and Pharisees who waited upon him to desire he would make the sepulchre secure, "Ye have a watch, go your way, and make it as sure as ye can," Matt. 27: 65. Over these guards one person had the supreme command, who in several places is called the captain of the temple, or officer of the temple-guard, Acts 4: 1. 5: 25, 26. John 18: 12. Josephus mentions such an officer.

The word temple denotes, sometimes, the church of Christ: Paul says, (2 Thess. 2: 4.) that Antichrist "as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." Sometimes it imports heaven; (Ps. 11: 4.) "The Lord is in his holy temple: the Lord's throne is in heaven." Rev. 3: 12. "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God." The martyrs in heaven are said to be "before the throne of God, and to serve him day and night in his temple." Rev. 7: 15. The soul of a righteous man is the temple of God, because it is consecrated to his service, and inhabited by the Holy Spirit, 1 Cor. 3: 16, 17. 6: 19. 2 Cor. 6: 16.—Watson; Calnet; Brown; Jones; Horne's Introduction.

TEMPORAL; a term often used for secular, as a distinction from spiritual or ecclesiastical; likewise for any thing belonging to time in contrast with eternity, 2 Cor. 4: 18.—Hend. Buck. †

TEMPORALITIES OF BISHOPS, are the revenues, lands, tenements, and lay fees, belonging to bishops, as they are barons and lords of parliament.—Hend. Buck.

TEMPTATION; trial; proof. It is used in both a good and a bad sense, according to the design of the agent. God tempted Abraham, by commanding him to offer up his son Isaac; (Gen. 22: 1.) intending to prove his obedience and faith, to confirm and strengthen him by this trial, and to furnish in his person an example and pattern of perfect obedience to all succeeding ages. In a different sense it said, (James 1: 13.) "Let no man say when he is tempted, 'I am tempted of God,' for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man. But every man is tempted when he is drawn away by his own lust, and enticed." In this sense Satan is called the tempter, Matt. 4: 3.

Paul says, "God will not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able to bear," 1 Cor. 10: 13. See Heb. 2: 18.

Men are said to tempt the Lord, when they unseasonably require proofs of the divine presence, power, or goodness. Without doubt, we are allowed to seek the Lord for his assistance, and to pray him to give us what we need; but it is not allowed us to tempt him, nor to expose ourselves to dangers from which we cannot escape, unless by miraculous interposition of his omnipotence, Exod. 16: 2, 7, 17. Num. 20: 12. Ps. 78: 18, 41, &c.

Men tempt or try one another, when they would know whether things are really what they seem to be; whether men are such as they are thought or desired to be. The queen of Sheba came to prove the wisdom of Solomon, by proposing riddles for him to explain, 1 Kings 11: 1. 2 Chron. 9: 1.

By temptation is most usually understood the enticement of a person to commit sin by offering some seeming advantage. There are four things, says one, in temptation: 1. Deception; 2. Infection; 3. Seduction; 4. Perdition.

The sources of temptation are, Satan, the world, and the flesh. We are exposed to them in every state, in every place, and in every time of life. They may be wisely permitted to show us our weakness, to try our faith, to promote our humility, and to teach us to place our dependence on a superior Power: yet we must not run into them, but watch and pray; avoid sinful company; consider the love, sufferings, and constancy of Christ, and the awful consequences of falling a victim to them.

The following rules have been laid down, by which we may in some measure know when a temptation comes from Satan.—1. When the temptation is unnatural, or contrary to the general bias or temper of our minds.—2. When it is opposite to the present frame of the mind.—3. When the temptation itself is irrational; being contrary to whatever we could imagine our own minds would suggest to us.—4. When a temptation is detested in its first rising and appearance.—5. Lastly, when it is violent. See SATAN; Brooks, Owen, Gilpin, Capel, and Gillespie on Temptation; South's Seven Sermons on Temptation, in the 6th vol. of his Sermons; Pike and Hayward's Cases of Conscience; and Bishop Porteus' Sermons, vol. 1, ser. 3 and 4; Newton's Works; Works of Robert Hall; Fuller's Works.—Calmet; Hensl. TEMPTATION OF CHRIST. The temptation of Christ, of which we read in the fourth chapter of Matthew, has been much the subject of infidel ridicule; and some ingenious writers, to avoid the difficulties of a literal interpretation, have reduced the whole to vision and allegory. But perhaps this has increased rather than removed those difficulties. Is it not best always to adhere as closely as possible to the language of inspiration, without glossing it with fancies of our own? And, after all, what is there so inconsistent with reason in this account? That, when our Lord retired to the interior part of the wilderness, the enemy of mankind should assume a disguise, (whether human or angelic is not important,) and present the most plausible temptation to our Redeemer, under these trying circumstances, is perfectly consistent with the malevolence of his character; but how far he was permitted to exert his power in forming them, is not necessary to be inquired. The grand objection is, why was Satan suffered thus to insult the Son of God? Wherefore did the Redeemer suffer his state of retirement to be thus disturbed with the malicious suggestions of the fiend? May it not be answered that herein, 1. He gave an instance of his own condescension and humiliation.—2. He hereby proved his power over the tempter.—3. He set an example of firmness and virtue to his followers.—And, 4. He here affords consolation to his suffering people, by showing not only that he himself was tempted, but is able to succor those who are tempted, Heb. 2: 13. 4: 15. TEMPTER; an appellation applied by the inspired writers to Satan, the grand adversary of the human race, Matt. 4: 3. 1 Thess. 3: 5. (See the articles DEVIL; SATAN; and TEMPTATION.) We have a striking exemplification of the manner in which he carries on his work of tempting the human race, or enticing them to sin, in his conduct towards our first parents; (Gen. 3: 1—6.) and also in his manner of tempting the Son of God, Matt. 4: 1—11. In both instances we see him laboring to induce others to call in question the divine goodness and veracity.—Jones.

TENNENT, (GILBERT,) minister of Philadelphia, was born in Ireland, February 5, 1703. He early experienced religion, and, diffident of his Christian character, pursued the study of physic for a year, but afterwards devoted himself to theology. In the autumn of 1726, he was ordained minister of New Brunswick, in New Jersey. For some time he was the delight of the pious, and was honored by those who were destitute of religion. But, when God began to bless his faithful labors to the awakening of secure sinners and to their conversion from darkness unto light, he presently lost the good opinion of false professors; his name was loaded with reproaches, and the grossest immoralities were attributed to him. But he bore all with patience. Though he had sensibility to character as well as other men, yet he was willing to encounter disgrace rather than neglect preaching the truth, however offensive to the sinful, whom he wished to reclaim.

Towards the close of the year 1740, and in the beginning of the year 1741, he made a tour in New England at the request of Mr. Whitfield. An astonishing efficacy accompanied his labors. Visiting various towns, he was everywhere remarkably useful. In this tour, the dress in which he commonly entered the pulpit was a great coat, girt about him with a leathern girdle, while his natural hair was left undressed. His large stature and grave aspect added a dignity to the simplicity, or rather rusticity, of his appearance.

In 1743, he established a new church in Philadelphia, consisting of the followers of Mr. Whitfield. In 1753, at the request of the trustees of New Jersey college, he went to England to solicit benefactions for that seminary. After a life of great usefulness, he died in much peace, about the year 1765.

For more than forty years he had enjoyed a habitual, unshaken assurance of his interest in redeeming love. As a preacher, he was in his vigorous days equalled by but few. His reasoning powers were strong; his language forcible and often sublime; and his manner of address warm and earnest. His eloquence however was rather bold and awful, than soft and persuasive. When he wished to alarm the sinner, he could represent in the most awful manner the terrors of the Lord. He published one or two volumes of sermons. Assembly's Miss. Mag., i. 238—248; ii. 46.—Allen.

TENNENT, (WILLIAM,) minister of Freehold, New Jersey, the brother of the preceding, was born in Ireland, June 3, 1705. He arrived in America when in the fourteenth year of his age. Having resolved to devote himself to the ministry of the gospel, his intense application to the study of theology, under the care of his brother at New Brunswick, so impaired his health as to bring on a decline. He became more and more emaciated, till little hope of life was left. At length he fainted and expired. In this remarkable trance he remained, apparently lifeless, for three days; and would have been buried but for the exertions of a young physician, who was his friend. His recovery was very slow; all former ideas were for some time blotted out of his mind; and it was a year before he was perfectly restored. To his friends he repeatedly stated, that, after he had apparently expired, he found himself in heaven, where he beheld a glory which he could not describe, and heard songs of praise before this glory which were unutterable. He was about to join the throng, when one of the heavenly messengers said to him, "You must return to the earth." At this instant he groaned, and opened his eyes upon this world. For three years afterwards the sounds which he had heard were not out of his ears, and earthly things were in his sight as vanity and nothing.

In October, 1733, he was ordained at Freehold. After a life of great usefulness he died at Freehold, March 8, 1777, aged seventy-one. He was the friend of the poor. The public lost in him a firm assertor of the civil and religious rights of his country. Few men have ever been more holy in life, more submissive to the will of God under heavy afflictions, or more peaceful in death.

He was well skilled in theology, and professed himself a moderate Calvinist. The doctrines of man's depravity, the atonement of Christ, the necessity of the all-powerful influence of the Holy Spirit to renew the heart, in consistency with the free agency of the sinner, were among the leading articles of his faith. With his friends he was at all times cheerful and pleasant. He once dined in company with governor Livingston and Mr. Whitfield, when the latter expressed the consolation he found in believing, amidst the fatigues of the day, that his work would soon be done, and that he should depart and be with Christ. He appealed to Mr. Tennent whether this was not his comfort. Mr. Tennent replied, "What do you think I should say, if I was to send my man, Tom, into the field to plough, and at noon should find him lounging under a tree, complaining of the heat, and of his difficult work, and begging to be discharged of his hard service? What should I say? Why, that he was an idle, lazy fellow, and that it was his business to do the work that I had appointed him?" His account of the revival of religion in Freehold and other places is published in Prince's Christian History. Assembly's Miss. Mag., ii. 97—103, 146, 202, 333.—Allen.

TENTS. Among the artificial conveniences for the habitations of men, tents were of very early invention.

Jabal, before the flood, is called the father of all such as dwell in tents. But the people most remarkable for this unsettled and wandering mode of life are the Arabs, who from the time of Ishmael to the present day have continued the custom of dwelling in tents. Amidst the revolutions which have transferred kingdoms from one possessor to another, these wandering tribes still dwell, unsubdued and wild as was their progenitor. This kind of dwelling is not, however, confined to the Arabs, but is used throughout the continent of Asia.—The word tent is formed from the Latin, "to stretch;" tents being usually made of canvass stretched out, and sustained by poles with cords and pegs. The same may be understood of a tabernacle, a pavilion, or a portable lodge, under which to shelter in the open air, from the injuries of the weather.

Mr. Taylor remarks, that erections answering the purpose of tents, however slight they may be, must have (1.) a supporting pole or poles, placed towards the centre; (2.) hangings and curtains of some kind; (3.) cords attached to—(4.) pins, which are driven into the ground, in order to take sure hold of it.

Of the various kinds of tents, some were made of slight materials, and others were erected for greater permanency; others, again, were mere shades or hovels, and not made of canvass. Tents were also appropriated to different sexes; Sarah had her tent; Laban went into Jacob's tent; Leah's tent, Rachel's tent, and the maid servants' tent, are also particularized.

Besides succoth, two other terms are used in the sacred Scriptures to denote tents; namely, sheken, which Mr. Taylor says may be taken for an inferior kind of tent or tabernacle; similar to the huts of the natives of New Holland, which are formed of a few branches crossing each other, covered with brushwood and clay, six feet in depth, and four or five in breadth: the other, called abel, may denote a tent whose accommodation may be varied so as to suit a few persons, a family; or great men, as generals and kings, enriched and ornamented. Of this kind of tent, a description is given by Sir John Chardin, in his Travels, who relates that the deceased king of Persia caused a tent to be made that cost one hundred and fifty thousand pounds. It was called the house of gold, because there was nothing but gold that glistened in every part of it. Its cornice was embellished with verses, which concluded in this manner: "If thou still demandest at what time the throne of this second Solomon was built, I will tell thee—Behold the throne of the second Solomon:—" here the last words, being taken for numerals, make 1057, the date of the year.

The Turks spare for nothing in rendering their tents convenient and magnificent; those of the grandes are said to be exceedingly splendid, and entirely covered with silk, besides being lined with a stuff of the same material. Van Egmont and Heyman mention one which cost twenty-five thousand piastres, and was not finished in less than three years; it was lined with a single piece made of camels' hair, and beautifully decorated with festoons, and sentences in the Turkish language. Nadir Shah had a very superb tent, covered on the outside with scarlet broadcloth, and lined within with violet-colored satin, ornamented with a great variety of animals, flowers, &c., formed entirely of pearls and precious stones.

The tents of princes are frequently illuminated as a mark of honor and dignity. Norden tells us, that the tent of the bey of Girge was distinguished from those of others by forty lamps suspended before it, in the form of chequer work.

Tents are also of various colors; black, as the tents of Kedar; red, as of scarlet cloth; yellow, as of gold shining brilliantly; white, as of canvass. They are also of various shapes; some circular, others of an oblong figure, not unlike the bottom of a ship turned upside down. In Syria, the tents are generally made of cloth of goats' hair, woven by women. Those of the Arabs are of black goats' hair. Some other nations adopt the same kind, but it is not common. Thevenot says the Curds of Mesopotamia do. The modern royal tents of the Arabs have generally no other covering than black haircloth. The Tarcomans, who are a nation living in the Holy Land, dwell in tents of white linen-cloth: they are very neat in their camps, and lie in good beds. The Egyptian and Moorish inhabitants of Askalon are said to use white tents; and D'Arvieux mentions, that the tent of an Arab emir he visited, was distinguished from the rest by its being of white cloth.

It was customary to pitch tents near water-springs or fountains. The army of Ishobeth sat down by the pool of Gibeon, 2 Sam. 20: 12, 13. Chardin informs us that Tahmasp, the Persian monarch, used to retire, in the summer, three or four leagues into the country, where he lived in tents, at the foot of mount Olouvent, in a place abounding in cool springs and pleasant shrubs. The following stanza from the Bedavi, a Persian poet, translated by Fox, will further illustrate this. Speaking of the shepherd, he says,

"Or haply, when the summer sunbeams pour
Intensely o'er th' unshaded wide extent,
He leads instinctive where the grove embowers,
And rears beside the brook his sheltering tent."

The words succoth and masac are variously rendered in our translation, curtain, tabernacle, covert, pavilion, college, booth, tent, a hanging, and a covering.—Calma.

TENT-MAKER. St. Paul, according to the practice of the Jews, who, however opulent, always taught their children some trade, appears to have been a tent-maker. This, however, is understood by some moderns to mean a maker of tent-cloth, St. Paul being a Cilician, a country which produced a species of rough-haired goats, from which the Cilicians manufactured a thick and coarse cloth, much used for tents. The fathers, however, say that he made military tents, the material of which was skins.—Watsan.

TEPHILIM. (See FRONTLETS.)

TERAH; the father of Abraham, Gen. 11: 24. (See ABRAHAM.)

TERAPHIM; idols, or superstitious figures, to which extraordinary effects were ascribed. The Eastern people are still much addicted to this superstition of talismans. The Persians call them telefa, a name nearly approaching to teraphim. Those of Rachel must have been gross images, made of some precious metal. See Gen. 31: 19. 1 Sam. 15: 23. Judg. 17: 5. Ez. 21: 21. Zech. 10: 2, where the word teraphim is used for an idol, or superstitious figure.

The prophet Hosea, (3: 4, 5.) threatening Israel, says, "The children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an ephod, and without teraphim:" that is, during their captivity they shall be deprived of the public exercise of their religion, and even weaned from their private superstition. The passage is highly descriptive of the depth of their suffering. See Fragment, 738.—Calmet.

TERMINISTIC CONTROVERSY; a controversy carried on between professors Ittig and Rechenberg, at Leipsic, towards the end of the seventeenth century, respecting the question—Whether God has fixed a terminus gratiæ, or determinate period in the life of an individual within which he may repent, and find favor with his Maker; but after the expiration of which neither of the two is possible. Rechenberg adopted the affirmative, and those who coincided in his opinion were called Terminists. Ittig, on the contrary, maintained that access was to be had to the grace of God at all times, and that the day of grace extended through the whole of life.—Head. Buck.

TERTIUS; Paul's amanuensis in writing his epistle to the Romans, Rom. 16: 22. Lightfoot conjectures that he was the same as Silas, this Hebrew name signifying the same as the Latin Tertius.—Calmet.

TEST ACT. (See ACT, TEST.)

TESTAMENT, is commonly taken in Scripture for the covenant, the law, the promises. (See COVENANT.)—Calmet.

TESTAMENT, New. The religious institution of Jesus Christ, says Dr. Campbell, is frequently denominated kainē diathēkē, which is almost always rendered the New Testament; yet the word diathēkē by itself, is generally translated covenant. It is the Greek word whereby the Seventy have uniformly translated the Hebrew word Berith, which our translators have invariably translated covenant. That the Hebrew term corresponds much better to the English word covenant than to testament, there can be no question; yet the word diathēkē in classical use is more frequently rendered Testament. The proper Greek word for covenant is synthēkē, which is not found in the New Testament, and occurs only thrice in the Septuagint, where it is never employed for rendering the word Berith.

The term New is added to distinguish it from the Old Covenant, that is, the dispensation of Moses. The two covenants are always in Scripture the two dispensations: that under Moses is the old, that under the Messiah is the new. In the latitude wherein the term is used in holy writ, the command, under the sanction of death, which God gave to Adam, may, with sufficient propriety, be termed a covenant; but it is never so called in Scripture; and when mention is made of the two covenants, the old and the new, or the first and the second, there appears to be no reference to any thing that related to Adam. In all such places, Moses and Jesus are contrasted,—the Jewish economy and the Christian; mount Sinai, in Arabia, where the law was promulgated, and mount Sion, in Jerusalem, where the gospel was first published.

These terms, from signifying the two dispensations, came soon to denote the books wherein they were written, the sacred writings of the Jews being called the Old Testament, and the writings superadded by the apostles and evangelists, the New Testament. An example of the use of the former application we have in 2 Cor. 3: 14: "Until this day remaineth the veil untaken away in the reading of the Old Testament." See Dr. Campbell's Dissert., part 3.—Head. Buck.

TESTAMENT, Old. (See BIBLE; SCRIPTURE.)

TESTIMONY, and TESTIMONIES, are terms often used by the scriptural writers to denote the whole revelation which God hath graciously given to the children of men, as the rule of their faith and practice, Ps. 19: 7. In this extensive sense the Psalmist uses the latter term throughout the whole of the hundred and nineteenth Psalm. See ver. 2, 14, 22, 24, 31, 36, 46, 59, 79, 99, 111, 119, 125, 129, 138, 144, 157, 167, 168, &c. The two tables of stone, on which the law or ten commandments were written, are also called the testimony, (Exod. 25: 16, 21. 31: 18.) because they were a witness of the covenant between God and his people; and hence the ark in which they were deposited is termed "the ark of the testimony;" Exod. 25: 22. And in the New Testament, the gospel is frequently termed "the testimony." It is the testimony of God, for it contains that which he hath testified of his Son, namely, that in him he is well pleased, as the substitute and representative of all his guilty people, and as delivered for their offences, and raised again for their justification, Matt. 3: 17. 17: 5. John 3: 32. It is the testimony of Christ also, and of his apostles, 1 Cor. 1: 6. 2 Thess. 1: 10. 2 Tim. 1: 8. (See the articles EVIDENCE; INSPIRATION; FAITH; GOSPEL; TRUTH, &c.)—Jones.

TETRARCH; a sovereign of the fourth part of a state, province, or kingdom, Matt. 14: 1. Luke 3: 1, 19. 9: 7. Acts 13: 1. It was a title frequently among the descendants of Herod the Great, to whom the Roman emperors distributed his dominions at their pleasure. But the word tetrarch ought not to be understood rigorously, as it was occasionally given to a prince who possessed, perhaps, a half, or a third part, of a state.—Calmet.

THACHER, (THOMAS,) first minister of the Old South church in Boston, was born in England, May 1, 1620, and arrived in this country June 4, 1635. He pursued his studies under the direction of president Chauncy. January 2, 1644, he was ordained minister of Weymouth; but after the death of his wife, in 1664, he was induced to remove to Boston. When a new church was formed out of the first by persons displeased with the settlement of Mr. Davenport, Mr. Thacher was installed its pastor, February 16, 1670. He died October 15, 1678, aged fifty-eight.

Being well skilled in the Hebrew, he composed a lexicon of the principal words in that language. President Stiles speaks of him as the best Arabic scholar in the country. As a preacher he was very popular, being remarkably fervent and copious in prayer. He was also a physician. He published a Fast Sermon, 1674; a Brief Rule to Guide the Common People in the Small Pox and Measles, 1677; second ed. 1702. Magnalia, iii. 148—153.—Allen.

THACHER, (PETER, D. D.,) minister in Boston, was born in Milton, March 21, 1752, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1769. September 19, 1770, he was ordained the minister of Malden. Being a strict Calvinist in his sentiments, he contended zealously for the faith of his fathers. As a preacher he was admired. His oratorical powers, his fluency in prayer, and the pathos of his expression, were applauded by the serious and intelligent, and rendered him uncommonly acceptable to the multitude. No young man preached to such crowded assemblies. Mr. Whitfield in his prayers called him the young Elijab. He was installed minister of the church in Brattle street, Boston, as successor of Dr. Cooper, January 12, 1785; and in this vineyard of the Lord he continued till his death. Being afflicted with a pulmonary complaint, his physicians recommended the milder air of a more southern climate. He accordingly sailed for Savannah, where he died, December 16, 1802, aged fifty. Just before he set sail from Boston he was visited by Dr. Stillman, to whom he expressed his belief that he should not recover, and said, with peculiar energy, "The doctrines I have preached are now my only comfort. My hopes are built on the atonement and righteousness of Christ." His publications were chiefly occasional sermons.—Allen.

THADDEUS; the surname of Jude the apostle. (See the article JUDE.)—Jones.

THANKFULNESS. (See GRATITUDE, and THANKSGIVING.)

THANKSGIVING; that part of divine worship wherein we acknowledge benefits received.

"It implies," says Dr. Barrow, (vol. i. ser. 8 and 9,) "1. A right apprehension of the benefits conferred. 2. A faithful retention of benefits in the memory, and frequent reflections upon them. 3. A due esteem and valuation of benefits. 4. A reception of those benefits with a willing mind, a vehement affection. 5. Due acknowledgment of our obligations. 6. Endeavors of real compensation; or, as it respects the Divine Being, a willingness to serve and exalt him. 7. Esteem, veneration, and love of the benefactor."

The blessings for which we should be thankful are, 1. Temporal; such as health, food, raiment, rest, &c. 2. Spiritual; such as the Bible, ordinances, the gospel and its blessings; as free grace, adoption, pardon, justification, calling, &c. 3. Eternal, or the enjoyment of God in a future state. Also for all that is past, what we now enjoy, and what is promised; for private and public, for ordinary and extraordinary blessings; for prosperity, and even adversity, so far as rendered subservient to our good.

The excellency of this duty appears, if we consider, 1. Its antiquity; it existed in Paradise before Adam fell, and therefore prior to the graces of faith, repentance, &c. 2. Its sphere of operation; being far beyond many other graces which are confined to time and place. 3. Its felicity; some duties are painful; as repentance, conflict with sin, &c.; but this is a source of sublime pleasure. 4. Its reasonableness. And, 5. Its perpetuity. This will be in exercise forever, when other graces will not be necessary, as faith, repentance, &c.

The obligation to this duty arises, 1. From the relation we stand in to God. 2. The divine command. 3. The promises God hath made. 4. The example of all good men. 5. Our unworthiness of the blessings we receive. And, 6. The prospect of eternal glory. Barrow's Works; Chalmers's do.; Hall's do.; Dwight's Theology.—Hend. Buck.

THARSHISH. (See TARSHISH.)

THAUMATURGIST; a worker of wonders, or miracles, from the Greek, thauma, a wonder, and ergon, a work.—Hend. Buck.

THEBAN LEGION. (See LEGION, THEBAN.)

THEBET; the tenth month of the Hebrew holy year; the fourth of the civil year. (See YEAR, and MONTH.)—Calmet.

THEFT; the taking away the property of another without his knowledge or consent. This is not only a sin against our neighbor, but a direct violation of that part of the decalogue which says, "Thou shalt not steal."

This law requires justice, truth, and faithfulness in all our dealings with men; to owe no man any thing, but to give to all their dues; to be true to all engagements, promises, and contracts; and to be faithful in whatever is committed to our care and trust. It forbids all unjust ways of increasing our own and hurting our neighbor's substance, by using false balances and measures; by overreaching and circumventing in trade and commerce; by taking away by force or fraud the goods, persons, and properties of men; by borrowing and not paying again; by oppression, extortion, and unlawful usury. It may include in it, also, what is very seldom called by this name, i. e. the robbing of ourselves and families, by neglecting our callings, or imprudent management thereof; lending larger sums of money than our circumstances will bear, when there is no prospect of payment; by being profuse and excessive in our expenses; indulging unlawful pleasures, and thereby reducing our families to poverty; or even, on the other hand, by laying up a great deal for the time to come, while our families are left to starve, or reduced to the greatest inconvenience and distress. (See FRAUD, and THEFT.) Dwight's Theology.—Hend. Buck.

THEODORE, a Syrian by birth, a soldier by profession, and a Christian by faith, set fire to the temple of Cybele, in Amasia, through an honest indignation at the idolatrous worship practised therein: for which, being apprehended, he was severely scourged and then burned, A. D. 306.—For.

THEODICY; (Gr. theodikaia;) a word used to denote the justification of the divine character and ways. It is principally concerned with the existence of physical and moral evil, especially the latter, the origin of which has furnished a problem which has never been, and, in all likelihood, never will be, solved in the present state of things. Leibnitz wrote an essay, entitled "De Theodicee," in which he enters at considerable length into the subject of optimism, which has, since his day, occupied the attention both of German, English, and American metaphysicians. See SIN; Dwight's Theology.—Hend. Buck.

THEODOSIANS; a numerous sect of Russian dissenters, who were very zealous in their opposition to the established church, calling it the receptacle of all the heresies that ever troubled the peace of true believers, and loudly affirming that the priests only preach up Antichrist under the name of Jesus, and that genuine Christianity is no longer to be found in the national church. They are strict observers of the Sabbath, particularly attentive to justice in their dealings, especially as it regards weights and measures, observant of unity, and careful never to appeal to unbelievers for a decision of their differences. They differ but little from the Pomorians, which see; only they purify by prayer whatever they purchase in the markets of unbelievers, and omit to write the superscription over the image of the cross.—Hend. Buck.

THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION. (See MINISTERIAL EDUCATION, and ANALYSIS OF THEOLOGY.)

THEOLOGY, (from theos, God, and logos, doctrine, the doctrine or science of God and divine things.) signifies that science which treats of the being and attributes of God, his relations to us, the dispensations of his providence, his will with respect to our actions, and his purposes with respect to our end. The word was first used to denote the systems, or rather the heterogeneous fables, of those poets and philosophers who wrote of the genealogy and exploits of the gods of Greece. Hence Orpheus, Musæus, Hesiod, &c. were called theologians; and the same epithet was given to Plato, on account of his sublime speculations on the same subject. It was afterwards adopted by the earliest writers of the Christian church, who styled the author of the Apocalypse, by way of eminence, ho theologos, the divine. As the various subjects of theology are considered in their places in this work, they need not be insisted on here. (See ANALYSIS OF THEOLOGY.)—Hend. Buck.

THEOLOGY, DOGMATIC; that part of divinity which treats of its doctrines or principles; and is thus to be viewed as distinct from, if not in opposition to, practical or moral theology. It is also used in the sense of a relation of the opinions of the theologians respecting certain doctrines.—Hend. Buck.

THEOLOGY, ELENCTIC; (from elenchos, refutation. 2 Tim. 3: 18.) the same as theology polemic, which see. It is also called by some theologia antithetica.—Hend. Buck.

THEOLOGY, GERMAN. (See NEOLOGY.)

THEOLOGY, NATURAL; the science which treats of the being, attributes, and will of God, as evincible from the various phenomena of created objects. It is a science of great simplicity, and a vast multiplicity of obvious and decisive evidences are everywhere found for its illustration. The great book of the universe lies open to all mankind; and he who cannot read in it the existence, and, to a certain extent, the character of its Author, will probably derive but little benefit from the labor of any commentator: their instructions may elucidate a few dark passages, and exalt our admiration of many that we already perceive to be beautiful; but the bulk of the volume is legible without assistance; and much as we may find out by study and meditation, it will still be as nothing in comparison with what is forced upon our apprehension. No thinking man can doubt that there are marks of design in the universe; and any enumeration of the instances in which this design is manifest, appears, at first sight, to be both unnecessary and impossible. A single example seems altogether as conclusive as a thousand; and he that cannot discover any traces of contrivance in the formation of an eye, will probably retain his atheism at the end of a whole system of physiology.

The ancient sceptics seem to have had nothing to set up against a designing Deity but the obscure omnipotency of chance, and the experimental combinations of a chaos of restless atoms. The task of the theistic philosophers was, therefore, abundantly easy in those days; and though their physical science was by no means very correct or extensive, they seem to have performed it in a bold and satisfactory manner. They appealed at once to the order and symmetry of nature, and to the regularity and magnificence of the grand structure of the universe. The great phenomena of the heavens, in particular, appear to have arrested their attention; and the magnitude and uniformity of the planetary movements seem to have afforded a sufficient proof of divine power and intelligence. In this broad and general way did the theists of antiquity propose their evidence of the divine mind, finding it easier, and probably thinking it more magnificent, and better suited to the dignity of the Deity, that the proofs of his existence should be derived from the great and sublime parts of his creation, than from the petty contrivances of animal or vegetable organization.

In the mean time physical science was making slow but continual advances; and curious inquirers were able to penetrate into the more immediate causes of many of the appearances of nature. Elated with these discoveries, which ought to have increased their veneration for the supreme Contriver of the whole, they immediately fancied they had found out the great secret of nature; and ascribing imaginary qualities and energies to different classes of bodies, they dethroned the Deity by the agency of secondary causes, and erected a system of materialism in his stead. It was in those circumstances that certain false opinions as to the opposition of religion and philosophy originated. Those whose dispositions inclined them to devout contemplation, were accustomed to look upon the wonders of nature in the gross, to consider them as enveloped with a certain awful mystery, and to discountenance every attempt to pry into their origin, as a presumptuous and profane interference with the councils of omnipotence. Inquisitive naturalists, on the other hand, were apt to forget the lawgiver in their zealous admiration of the law; and mocking at the pious horror of the ignorant, considered the mighty fabric of the universe as little better than a piece of mechanical juggling, that could only command our admiration while the cause of its movements was concealed.

This, however, was an error that was soon rectified by the progress of those very speculations by which it had apparently been produced. When men began to reason more correctly upon the appearances of nature, they soon learned to perceive that the minute texture of animal and vegetable bodies contained more wonderful indications of contrivance and design than the great masses of astronomy; and that, from the greater complication of their parts, and our more intimate experience of their uses, they were infinitely better fitted to attest the adaptation of means to ends than the remoter wonders of the heavens. Boyle and Newton carried this principle of philosophical piety along with them into all their speculations. The microscopical observers caught the same spirit. Ray and Derham successively digested all the physics of their day into a system of natural theology. A late editor of Derham has inserted most of the modern discoveries; and in the recent popular works of Paley and Chalmers, the science has been presented in the most interesting and instructive forms. (See RELIGION, and PHYSIOLOGY.)—Hend. Buck.

THEOLOGY, POLEMIC; that branch of the science which treats of the disputed points in a critical manner, taking up the different or erroneous views that have been advanced respecting them, and refuting these views, either by logical arguments, or by an exposure of them by a true critical exposition of such texts of Scripture as bear upon the controverted subjects. The phrase was first used by Friedman Beckmann, a Jena theologian of the seventeenth century, who wrote a book under the title of Theologia Polemica.—Hend. Buck.

THEOLOGY, POSITIVE; that mode of treating divinity which consists in an exclusive appeal to the testimonies of the fathers, the decrees or canons of councils, &c. which, being considered as determining the sense of the church on any disputed points, render the doctrines thus determined fixed and certain.—Hend. Buck.

THEOLOGY, SCHOLASTIC, is that species of divinity which clears and discusses questions by reason and argument; in which sense it stands, in some measure, opposed to positive divinity, which is founded on the authority of fathers, councils, &c. The school divinity is now fallen into contempt, and is scarcely regarded anywhere but in some of the universities, where they are still, by their charters, obliged to teach it.—Hend. Buck.

THEOLOGY, SYSTEMATIC; such a methodically arranged form of the great truths and precepts of religion, as enables the student to contemplate them in their natural connexion, and thus to perceive both the mutual dependence of the parts, and the symmetry of the whole. Arrangement, every one acknowledges, is a very considerable help both to the understanding and the memory; and the more simple and natural the arrangement is, the greater is the assistance which we derive from it. There are, indeed, few arts or sciences which may not be digested into different methods; and each method may have advantages peculiar to itself; yet, in general, it may be affirmed that that arrangement will answer best, upon the whole, in which the order of nature is most strictly adhered to, and wherein nothing is taught previously which presupposes the knowledge of what is to be explained afterwards.

It is no objection either against holy writ on the one hand, or against the systematic study of it on the other, that there is no such digest of the doctrines and precepts of our religion exhibited in the Bible. It is no objection against holy writ, because, to one who considers attentively the whole plan of providence regarding the redemption and final restoration of man, it will be evident that, in order to the perfecting of the whole, the parts must have been unveiled successively and by degrees, as the scheme advanced towards its completion. And if the doctrines to be believed, and the duties to be practised, are delivered there with sufficient clearness, we have no reason to complain: nor is it for us to prescribe rules to infinite wisdom. On the other hand, it is no objection against this study, or the attempt to reduce the articles of our religion into a systematic form, that they are not thus methodically digested in the Bible. Holy writ is given us that it may be used by us for our spiritual instruction and improvement; reason is given us to enable us to make the proper use of both the temporal and the spiritual benefits which God hath seen meet to bestow. The conduct of the beneficent Father of the universe is entirely analogous in both. He confers liberally the material, or means of enjoyment; he gives the capacity of using them; at the same time he requires the exertion of that capacity, that so the advantages he has bestowed may be turned by us to the best account. We are then at liberty, nay, it is our duty to arrange the doctrine of holy writ in such a way, as may prove most useful in assisting us both to understand and to retain it.

It would be vain to look for much of systematic theology in the fathers or earlier writers of the Christian church. They lived too near the times of the apostles to feel the necessity or importance of this kind of writing: nor were their circumstances at all favorable to it. Most of them were incapable of any thing profound; the body of the people were of the same description ; and both teachers and taught were so much conversant with a state of suffering, as to have scarcely either time or inclination for any thing but what bore immediately on the practice or the consolations of the gospel. Origen and Cyril, of Jerusalem, were the first among the Greeks who did any thing in this way. The former, in his work, peri archōn, or Four Books concerning Principles, while he gives some information, as-tounds with allegories and absurdities ; the latter, in his "Catechetical Discourses," which were written in his youth, conveys some useful instruction in a less objectionable manner. Augustine, in his Enchiridion, or Treatise on Faith, Hope, and Charity, presents a kind of system, while, in some of his other writings, he discusses many of those questions which at a future period were reduced into more regular form, and occasioned interminable disputes.

It was in the middle ages that scholastic theology combined into regular system the principles and duties of religion ; but unfortunately it presented the subject in a shape, not only opposed to sound philosophy, and repugnant to all correct taste, but calculated to do the most serious injury to religion. The works of Abelard, Lombard, Aquinas, and other angelic or seraphic doctors of the dark ages, afford proofs of no inconsiderable talent, especially in dialectics ; but unhappily it was employed rather to bewilder the mind than to aid the discovery of truth. The metaphysics of Plato, the logic of Aristotle, and the corrupt theology of the church of Rome, were amalgamated into one crude, incoherent mass of unintelligible dogmas, which was honored with the title of the orthodox faith, and the slightest departure from which was deemed a pernicious heresy.

To these succeeded the Roman casuists, who occupied themselves not so much with the metaphysics of doctrine as with metaphysics of practice. (See CASUIST.) Their works are storehouses of logical subtleties, and magazines of moral combustibles, sufficient to distract and destroy the universe. This style of writing in the department of systematic and casuistic theology among the Romanists, gave place to a simpler and more practical mode of treating such subjects, under the denomination of "Common-places," among the reformers. Disgusted with the metaphysical absurdities and logomachies of the schoolmen, Melancthon, Luther, and others, produced compendiums, or brief systems of religion, in which, arranged under various heads, the principal articles of Christian faith and duty were plainly stated. The confessions of the reformed churches necessarily assumed a systematic form, and expositions or commentaries on them brought the doctrines and duties of religion in regular digests before the people of every country in which they were adopted. In most of these productions, while both occupy one book, the credenda and the agenda are always treated distinctly.

In systematic theology the Institutions of Calvin, though not the first in order of time, carried off the palm from all its predecessors, and has not yet been surpassed by any competitor. Diversity of opinion may exist respecting some of the positions of the Genevese reformer, and even among those who hold his general views of Christian doctrine there may not be an entire concurrence in every sentiment or expression ; but while profound piety, masculine energy of mind, acuteness and strength of argument, perspicuity of statement, and purity of language, continue to be respected among men, the Christian Institutes of John Calvin will secure for their author immortal honor.

The following are some of the principal writers in this department of theology : Polanus, Altingius, Turretin, Pictet, Marcius, Mastrecht, Stopfer, Witsius, Brannius, Ames, Budaus, Perkins, Downham, Baxter, Bates, Leigh, Limborch, Ridley, Stackhouse, Doddridge, Brown, Boston, Gill, Hopkins, Dwight, Watson, Storr and Platt, and Knapp ; and Works of Andrew Fuller.—Hend. Buck.

THEOPASCITES ; a denomination, in the fifth century, who held that Christ had but one nature, which was the divine, and, consequently, that this divine nature suffered.—Hend. Buck.

THEOPHILANTHROPISTS ; a sect of deists, who, in September, 1796, published at Paris a sort of catechism or directory for social worship, under the title of Manuel des Théanthrophiles. This religious breviary found favor ; the congregation became numerous ; and in the second edition of their Manual they assumed the less harsh denomination of Theophilanthropists, i. e. lovers of God and man. According to them, the temple the most worthy of the Divinity is the universe. Abandoned sometimes under the vault of heaven to the contemplation of the beauties of nature, they render its Author the homage of adoration and gratitude. They, nevertheless, have temples erected by the hands of men, in which it is more commodious for them to assemble, to hear lessons concerning his wisdom. Certain moral inscriptions ; a simple altar, on which they deposit, as a sign of gratitude for the benefits of the Creator, such flowers or fruits as the seasons afford ; a tribune for the lecturers and discourses, form the whole of the ornaments of their temples.

The first inscription, placed above the altar, recalls to remembrance the two religious dogmas which are the foundation of their moral.

First inscription.—We believe in the existence of God, in the immortality of the soul. Second inscription.—Worship God, cherish your kind, render yourselves useful to your country. Third inscription.—Good is every thing which tends to the preservation or the perfection of man. Evil is every thing which tends to destroy or deteriorate him. Fourth inscription.—Children, honor your fathers and mothers ; obey them with affection ; comfort their old age. Fathers and mothers, instruct your children. Fifth inscription.—Wives, regard your husbands, the chiefs of your houses. Husbands, love your wives, and render yourselves reciprocally happy.

From the concluding part of the Manual of the Theophilanthropists, we may learn something more of their sentiments. "If any one ask you," say they, "what is the origin of your religion and of your worship, you can answer him thus : Open the most ancient books which are known ; seek there what was the religion, what the worship of the first human beings of which history has preserved the remembrance. There you will see that their religion was what we now call natural religion, because it has for its principle even the Author of nature. It is he that has engraven it in the heart of the first human beings, in ours, in that of all the inhabitants of the earth ; this religion, which consists in worshipping God and cherishing our kind, is what we express by one single word, that of Theophilanthropy. Thus our religion is that of our first parents ; it is yours ; it is ours ; it is the universal religion. As to our worship, it is also that of our first fathers. See, even in the most ancient writings, that the exterior signs by which they rendered their homage to the Creator were of great simplicity. They dressed for him an altar of earth ; they offered him, in sign of their gratitude and of their submission, some of the productions which they held of his liberal hand. The fathers exhorted their children to virtue ; they all encouraged one another, under the auspices of the Divinity, to the accomplishment of their duties. This simple worship the sages of all nations have not ceased to profess, and they have transmitted it down to us without interruption.

"If they yet ask you of whom you hold your mission, answer, We hold it of God himself, who, in giving us two arms to aid our kind, has also given us intelligence to mutually enlighten us, and the love of good to bring us together to virtue ; of God, who has given experience and wisdom to the aged to guide the young, and authority to fathers to conduct their children.

"If they are not struck with the force of these reasons, do not further discuss the subject ; and do not engage your self in controversies, which tend to diminish the love of our neighbors. Our principles are the eternal truth : they will subsist, whatever individuals may support or attack them, and the efforts of the wicked will not even prevail against them. Rest firmly attached to them, without attacking or defending any religious system ; and remember, that similar discussions have never produced good, and that they have often tinged the earth with the blood of men. Let us lay aside systems, and apply ourselves to doing good : it is the only road to happiness." So much for the divinity of the Theophilanthropists; a system entirely defective, because it wants the true foundation,—the word of God; the grand rule of all our actions, and the only basis on which our hopes and prospects of success can be built.—Hend. Buck.

THEOPHILUS; an honorable person, to whom the evangelist Luke addressed his gospel, and the Acts of the Apostles, Luke 1: 3. Acts 1: 3. He was probably a Christian of quality, and most likely governor or intendant of some province; such having generally the title of most excellent. It is right to observe, however, that it does not of necessity imply a Roman appellation of honor: nor does the name Theophilus occur in Roman history, as a governor. It is found among the Jewish high-priests, in a son of Annas, who was high-priest in the year when our Savior was crucified. Theophilus was nominated to that office instead of his brother Jonathan, who had been deposed by Vitellius; (Joseph. Ant. xviii. xix. xx.) and Michaëlis countenances the notion that this was Luke's Theophilus.—Cabnet.

THEOSOPHISTS; (from theos, God, and sophia, wisdom;) professors of divine wisdom; another name for the Rosicrucians, which see.—Williams.

THERAPEUTE. One particular phenomenon which resulted from the theosophico-ascetic spirit among the Alexandrian Jews, was the sect of the Therapeute. Their head-quarters were at no great distance from Alexandria, in a quiet pleasant spot on the shores of the lake Mæris, where they lived, like the anchorites in later periods, shut up in separate cells, and employed themselves in nothing but prayer, and the contemplation of divine things. An allegorical interpretation of Scripture was the foundation of their speculations; and they had old theosophical writings which gave them this turn. They lived only on bread and water, and accustomed themselves to fasting. They only ate in the evening, and many fasted for several days together. They met together every Sabbath day, and every seven weeks they held a still more solemn assembly, because the number seven was peculiarly holy in their estimation. They then celebrated a simple love-feast, consisting of bread with salt and hyssop; theosophical discussions were held, and the hymns which they had from their old traditions were sung; and mystical dances, bearing reference to the wonderful works of God with the fathers of their people, were continued, amidst choral songs, to a late hour in the night. Many men of distinguished learning have considered this sect as nothing but a scion of the Essenes, trained up under the peculiar influence of the Egyptian spirit.—Watson.

THESSALONIANS; the Christians of Thessalonica, to whom St. Paul sent two epistles. (See THESSALONICA.) It is recorded in the Acts, that St. Paul, in his first journey upon the continent of Europe, preached the gospel at Thessalonica, at that time the capital of Macedonia, with considerable success; but that after a short stay he was driven thence by the malice and violence of the unbelieving Jews. From Thessalonica St. Paul went to Berea, and thence to Athens, at both which places he remained but a short time. From Athens he sent Timothy to Thessalonica, to confirm the new converts in their faith, and to inquire into their conduct. Timothy, upon his return, found St. Paul at Corinth. Thence, probably in A. D. 52, St. Paul wrote the first epistle to the Thessalonians; and it is to be supposed that the subjects of which it treats, were suggested by the account which he received from Timothy. It is now generally believed that this was written the first of all St. Paul's epistles, but it is not known by whom it was sent to Thessalonica. The church there consisted chiefly of Gentile converts, 1 Thess. 1: 9. This epistle is written in terms of high commendation, earnestness, and affection.

It is generally believed that the messenger who carried the former epistle into Macedonia, upon his return to Corinth, informed St. Paul that the Thessalonians had inferred, from some expressions in it, that the coming of Christ and the final judgment were near at hand, and would happen in the time of many who were then alive, 1 Thess. 4: 15, 17. 5: 5. The principal design of the second epistle to the Thessalonians was to correct that error, and prevent the mischief which it would naturally occasion. It was written from Corinth, probably at the end of A. D. 52.—Watson.

THESSALONICA; a celebrated city in Macedonia, and capital of that kingdom, standing upon the Thesmaic sea. Stephen of Byzantium says that it was improved and beautified by Philip, king of Macedon, and called Thessalonica in memory of the victory that he obtained over the Thessalians. Its old name was Thesma. The Jews had a synagogue here, and their number was considerable, Acts 17. It is now called Salonica, and a few years since contained sixty thousand inhabitants.—Watson.

THEUDAS; the name of two impostors who appeared among the Jews, in A. D. 33, and A. D. 45, and who occasioned the death of many who were led away by them, Acts 5: 36. (Joseph. Ant. b. xx. c. 2.)—Cabnet.

TIBETIANS, or TIBETIANS; the inhabitants of Thibet, or Tibet, in Asia. There is something singular in the superstition of these people. The Delai Lama (GRAND LAMA) is at once the high-priest, and the visible object of adoration, to this nation, to the hordes of wandering Tartars, and to the prodigious population of China. (See LAMA, GRAND.)—Williams.

THIEF. Among the Hebrews theft was not punished with death: "Men do not despise a thief if he steal to satisfy his soul when he is hungry. But if he be found, he shall restore sevenfold; he shall give all the substance of his house," Prov. 6: 30, 31. The law allowed the killing of a night-robber, because it was supposed his intention was to murder, as well as to rob, Exod. 22: 2. It condemned a common thief to make double restitution, Exod. 22: 4. If he stole an ox he was to restore it fivefold; if a sheep, only fourfold, Exod. 22: 1. 2 Sam. 12: 6. But if the animal that was stolen was found alive in his house he only rendered the double of it. If he did not make restitution, they seized what was in his house, put it up to sale, and even sold the person himself if he had not wherewithal to make satisfaction, Exod. 22: 3. (See FRAND, and THEFT.)—Watson.

THIRST, is a painful, natural sensation, occasioned by the absence of moisture from the stomach. As this sensation is accompanied by vehement desire, the term is sometimes used in Scripture in a moral sense, for a vehement mental desire.—Cabnet.

THOMAS, the apostle, otherwise called Didymus, which in Greek signifies a twin, Matt. 10: 3. Luke 6: 15. We know no particulars of his life till A. D. 33, John 11: 16, 14: 5, 6. 20: 24—29. 21: 1—13. Ancient tradition says, that in the distribution which the apostles made of the several parts of the world wherein they were to preach the gospel, the country of the Parthians fell to the share of St. Thomas. It is added, that he preached to the Medes, Persians, Carmanians, Hircanians, Bactrians, &c. Several of the fathers inform us that he also preached in the East Indies, &c.—Watson.

THOMPSON, (CHARLES,) secretary of congress, a patriot of the revolution, was born in Ireland, in 1730, and came to this country, with his three elder brothers, about 1741. He landed at Newcastle, with slender means of subsistence. Having been educated by Dr. Allison, he kept the Friends' academy. He afterwards went into Philadelphia, where he obtained the advice and friendship of Dr. Franklin. At the first congress, in 1774, he was called upon to take minutes of their measures; from that time, he was sole secretary of the revolutionary congress. He resigned his office in July, 1789, having held it fifteen years.

He was strictly moral, and his mind was deeply imbued with religious principles. His mind was enriched with various learning, and his character was marked by regularity, probity, firmness, and patriotism. An Indian tribe, which adopted him, gave him the name of "The man of truth." In his last years he was principally employed in preparing for his removal into the eternal world. He died in Lower Merion, Montgomery county, near Philadelphia, August 16, 1824, aged ninety-four. He translated the Septuagint, which was published, entitled, Holy Bible translated from the Greek, four vols. 8vo, 1808.—Allen.

THOMPSON, (ANDREW, D. D.,) a distinguished minister of Edinburgh, Scotland, was born in that city, July 11, 1779. His father was John Thompson, D. D. While at college he first came under the power of decided religious principles. Six years he preached at Sprouton, and two at Perth; from 1810 to 1814, at Greyfriars church, Edinburgh; and the remainder of his life at St. George's, a new church. For many years he conducted the Edinburgh Christian Instructor. He also contributed many articles to Dr. Brewster's New Edinburgh Encyclopedia. For a number of years he was a leader of the orthodox party in the general assembly, in opposition to that "power that would thrust upon a people, hungering for the bread of life, a heartless and unqualified pastor." He took a decided part also against the circulation of the Apocrypha by the British and Foreign Bible Society. His last great public effort was in behalf of the immediate emancipation of the slaves in the West India colonies. He died of an affection of the heart, February 9, 1831, greatly beloved and lamented.

"His peculiarity," says Dr. Chalmers, "lay in this, that, present him with a subject, he, of all other men, saw the principle which was embodied in it. In him were concentrated all the powers necessary to maintain and carry questions of the greatest difficulty and magnitude." Yet the style of his sermons is simple, plain, direct, and convincing, and his addresses to the unconverted are full of tenderness and solemnity. His Sermons and Sacramental Exhortations have been reprinted in Boston, in one volume duodecimo, 1832.—Am. Quar. Register.

THOU, (JAMES AUGUSTUS DE,) eminent as a Christian, a magistrate, and a historian, was born in 1553, at Paris. After having studied the law at Orleans and Valence, and travelled in Italy, he entered into public life, and was successively clerk of the parliament, master of requests, and president à mortier. Henry IV. he served with zeal, and was much esteemed by him. He died in 1617. His History of his own Times, in Latin, has been often reprinted.—Davenport.

THOUGHT; an image of any thing formed in the mind; sentiment, reflection, opinion, design. As the thoughts are the prime movers of the conduct; as in the sight of the divine Being they bear the character of good or evil; and as they are, therefore, cognizable at his tribunal, the moral regulation of them is of the greatest importance. It is of consequence to inquire what thoughts ought to be rejected, and what to be indulged. Those of an evil nature, which ought to be banished, are, 1. Fretful and discontented thoughts. 2. Anxious and apprehensive thoughts. 3. Angry and wrathful thoughts. 4. Malignant and revengeful thoughts. 5. Such as are foolish, trifling, and unreasonable. 6. Wild and extravagant, vain and fantastical. 7. Romantic and chimerical. 8. Impure and lascivious. 9. Gloomy and melancholy. 10. Hasty and volatile. 11. Profane and blasphemous.

The thoughts we ought to indulge, are those which give the mind a rational or religious pleasure; tend to improve the understanding; raise the affections to divine objects; to promote the welfare of our fellow-creatures, and withal the divine glory. To bring the mind into a habit of thinking as we ought to think, there should be a constant dependence on, and imploring of, divine grace; an increasing acquaintance with the sacred Scriptures; an improvement of every opportunity of serious conversation; a constant observance of the works of God in creation, providence, and grace; and, lastly, a deep sense of the realities of an eternal world as revealed in the word of God. *Upham's Intellectual Philosophy; Mason on Self-knowledge; Watts on the Mind; Goodwin's Vanity of the Thoughts; Owen on Spiritual Mindfulness.—Head. THORN; a general name for several kinds of prickly plants. In the curse denounced against the earth, (Gen. 3: 18.) its produce is threatened to be "thorns and thistles." Heb. kutz urradar, or in the Septuagint, akanthos kai tribolous. St Paul uses the same words, (Heb. 6: 8.) where the last is rendered "briers;" they are also found Hosea 10: 8. The word kutz is put for "thorns;" in other places, as Exod. 22: 6. Judg. 8: 7. Ezek. 2: 6. 28: 24; but we are uncertain whether it means a specific kind of thorn, or may be a generic name for all plants of a thorny kind. In the present instance it seems to be general for all those obnoxious plants, shrubs, &c., by which the labors of the husbandman are impeded, and which are only fit for burning. If the word denotes a particular plant, it may be the "rest-harrow," a pernicious prickly weed, which grows promiscuously with the large thistles in the uncultivated grounds, and covers entire fields and plains, in Egypt and Palestine. Judges 8: 16, borkanim. There is no doubt but this word means a sharp, jagged kind of plant: the difficulty is to fix on one, where so many offer themselves. The Septuagint preserves the original word. There is a plant mentioned by Hasselquist, whose name and properties somewhat resemble those which are required in the barbanin of this passage: "Nabka palurus Athenæi, is the nabka of the Arabs. There is every appearance that this is the tree which furnished the crown of thorns which was put on the head of our Lord. It is common in the East. A plant more proper for this purpose could not be selected; for it is armed with thorns, its branches are plant, and its leaf a deep green, like that of ivy. Perhaps the enemies of Christ chose this plant, in order to add insult to injury, by employing a wreath approaching in appearance that which was used to crown emperors and generals." In the New Testament, the Greek word translated "thorns," is akantha, Matt. 7: 16. 13: 7. 27: 29. John 19: 2. (See GARDEN.)—Watson.

THRESHING. (See HARVEST, and FLOOR.)

THRONE; that magnificent seat on which princes usually sit to receive the homage of their subjects, or to give audience to ambassadors; where they appear in pomp and ceremony; whence they dispense justice, &c. The throne, the sceptre, the crown, are ordinary symbols of royalty, and royal authority. Scripture often represents the Lord as sitting on a throne. The Psalmist says, that God had confirmed his throne in heaven from all eternity, Psal. 103: 19. 93: 2. 45: 6. This throne was supported by justice and equity, 97: 2. The throne of the Lord which was shown to Ezekiel, (chap. 1.) was at the same time the most terrible, and yet the most magnificent object that can be imagined. It was an animated chariot, borne by four cherubim of an extraordinary figure. The wheels were of inexplicable beauty and magnitude, also animated and conducted by a spirit. The throne of the Lord, which was over the wheels and the cherubim, was like glittering crystal, with a seat of sapphire. He who sat on the throne was surrounded with splendor like that of fire, or of metal in fusion; and round him glowed the colors of the rainbow. See also Isa. 6: 2—4.

The cherubim on the ark of the covenant were also considered as a kind of throne of the Deity: whence it is said in many places, that God sits between the cherubim; (1 Sam. 4: 4. 2 Sam. 6: 2. 2 Kings 19: 15. Psal. 18: 10. 80: 1. 99: 1. Isa. 37: 16.) whether we consider the cherubim of the ark, or the cherubim which Isaiah and Ezekiel describe as being under, and about, the throne of the Almighty; and possibly to the same cherubim Paul refers by the term thrones, Col. 1: 16.

The throne of Solomon is described in Scripture as the finest and richest in the world, 1 Kings 10: 20. It was of ivory, inlaid with gold. The ascent was by seven steps; the back was round, and two arms supported the seat: twelve golden lions, one at each end of every step, made a principal part of its ornaments.

The Jews sometimes swore by the throne of God, or by heaven, but our Savior forbids such oaths; (Matt. 5: 34. 23: 22.) for "Whoever swears by heaven, swears by the throne of God, and by him who sitteth upon it." There is a passage (Exod. 17: 16.) that might be understood in the sense of an oath, sworn by the throne of God: "The Lord has lifted up his hand from his throne, (he has sworn by his throne,) that he would make war against Amalek." (See OATH.) Thus in Judith, (1: 2.) Nebuchadnezzar swears by his throne, that he would make war against all who had rejected his ambassadors.

In Scripture, the Son of God is represented as sitting on a throne at the right hand of his Father, Ps. 110: 1. Heb. 1: 8. Rev. 3: 21. And he himself assures his apostles, that they should sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, Luke 22: 30. In the Revelation, we find the twenty-four elders seen in vision, sitting on thrones before the Lord, Rev. 4: 4. And (Dan. 7: 9.) when God is about to enter into judgment with men, thrones are prepared for judges. The Ancient of Days is seated, his throne is as a flame of fire, his wheels are as consuming fire; streams of fire radiate from his face; millions of millions of angels attend upon him, and thousands of thousands are round about him.

Thrones, in the sense of an order of the celestial hierarchy, (Col. 1: 16.) may signify, as above hinted, the cherubim, which were considered as the throne of God. Paul does not mention thrones among the celestial spirits that compose the angelic hierarchy; (Eph. 3: 10. 6: 12.) and hence some suppose, that by thrones, principalities, powers, and dominions, the apostle means no more than temporal powers, subordinate one to another. Thus, thrones denote kingly power; principalities, governors or princes; and powers, judges, magistrates of cities, &c. But the connexion favors the higher sense.—Calmet.

THUMMIM. (See URIM.)

THUNDER, is a repercussion of the air violently agitated, among dense clouds, by the lightning or electric flash; and as this is the loudest natural noise with which mankind are acquainted, hence thunder is called "the voice of God," that is, the sound most characteristic of his majesty. "Voices of God," (Hcb. Exod. 9: 28.) are mighty thunderings; (Psal. 29: 3, 4.) the voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars; divideth the flames of fire, &c.; the Psalmist tells us, (verse 3.) he means thunder.—Calmet.

THYATIRA; a city of Lydia, in Asia Minor, and the seat of one of the seven churches in Asia. It was situated nearly midway between Pergamos and Sardis, and is still a tolerable town, considering that it is in the hands of the Turks. It enjoys some trade, chiefly in cottons. It is called by that people Ak-hisar, or White Castle.—Watson.

TIARA; the name of the pope's triple crown. The tiara and keys are the badges of the papal dignity, the tiara of his civil rank, and the keys of his jurisdiction; for as soon as the pope is dead, his arms are represented with the tiara alone, without the keys. The ancient tiara was a round high cap. John XIII. first encompassed it with a crown. Boniface VIII. added a second crown; and Benedict XII. a third.—Hend. Buck.

TIBERIAS; the metropolis of Galilee, a city situated in a small plain, surrounded by mountains, on the western coast of the sea of Galilee, which, from this city, was also called the sea of Tiberias. Tiberias was erected by Herod Antipas, and so called in honor of Tiberius Cæsar. He is supposed to have chosen, for the erection of his new city, a spot where before stood a more obscure place, called Chenereth or Cinnereth, which also gave its name to the adjoining lake or sea.—Watson.

TIBERIAS, SEA OF. (See GALILEE, SEA OF.)

TIBERIUS, (CLAUDIUS DRUSUS NERO,) a Roman emperor, was born, B. C. 34, at Rome. During the reign of Augustus, he was successful at the head of the armies in Spain, Armenia, Germany, and other provinces, but, falling into disgrace, he resided for some years, as an exile, at Rhodes. He was, however, restored to favor, and he was again victorious as the leader of the legions in Germany. On his accession to the throne, his acts gave promise of a beneficent sovereign; but he soon became licentious and sanguinary, and, after a reign of nearly twenty-three years, he died, universally hated, at Misenum, A. D. 37.—Davenport.

TIDAL; king of nations, or of Gentiles, (goin.) Gen. 14: 1. Some think he was king of Galilee of the Gentiles beyond Jordan; (Matt. 4: 15.) and Joshua speaks of a king of the nations of Gilgal, or of Galilee, according to the Septuagint, Josh. 12: 23.—Calmet.

TIGLATH-PILESER. (See ASSYRIA.)

TILLEMONT, (SEBASTIAN LE NAIN DE,) a French ecclesiastical writer, was born, in 1637, at Paris; was educated at the seminary of Port Royal, where Nicole was his preceptor in logic; took orders, on which occasion he assumed the name of Tillemont, his family name being Le Nain; and died, generally respected, in 1698. He wrote a History of the Emperors; and Memoirs for the Ecclesiastical History for the first six centuries.—Davenport.

TILLOTSON, (JOHN, D. D.) an eminent prelate, was born, in 1630, at Sowerby, in Yorkshire, and was educated at Clare hall, Cambridge. He was of a Puritan family, and was brought up in their religious principles, but he conformed to the church in 1662. Between that period and 1669, he was, successively, curate of Cheshunt, rector of Kedington, preacher in Lincoln's inn, lecturer at St. Lawrence Jewry, and gained reputation both as a preacher and a controversialist. In 1670 he was made a prebendary, and, two years afterwards, dean of Canterbury. In 1683 he attended lord Russel on the scaffold, and labored, but, of course, in vain, to draw from him a declaration in favor of passive obedience. This blot in his character is to be regretted. At the revolution, he was appointed clerk of the closet to his majesty, and in the following year he exchanged his deanery for that of St. Paul's. In 1691, after fruitless attempts to avoid the honor, he accepted, with unfeigned reluctance, the see of Canterbury, which was become vacant by the deprivation of Sancroft. This promotion, however, he did not long survive, as his decease took place in 1694.

In his domestic relations, friendships, and the whole commerce of business, he was easy and humble, frank and open, tender-hearted and bountiful, to such an extent, that, while he was in a private station, he laid aside two-tenths of his income for charitable uses. He despised wealth but as it furnished him for charity, in which he was judicious as well as liberal. His affability and candor, as well as abilities in his profession, made him frequently consulted in points relating both to practice and opinion. His love for the real philosophy of nature, and his conviction that the study of it is the most solid support of religion, induced him, not many years after the establishment of the Royal society, to desire to be admitted into that assembly of the greatest men of the age; into which he was accordingly elected on the 25th of January, 1672. His kindness towards the dissenters was attended with the consequence intended by him, of reconciling many of them to the communion of the established church, and almost all of them to a greater esteem of it than they had before entertained.

He died poor, the copy-right of his Posthumous Sermons (which however sold for two thousand five hundred guineas) being all that his family inherited. His works form three folio volumes. See Birch's Life of Tillotson.—Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.

TIMBRELS. (See MUSIC.)

TIME; mode of duration marked by certain periods, chiefly by the motion and revolution of the sun. The general idea which time gives in every thing to which it is applied, is that of limited duration. Thus we cannot say of the Deity that he exists in time, because eternity, which he inhabits, is absolutely uniform, neither admitting limitation nor succession.

Time is said to be redeemed or improved when it is properly filled up, or employed in the conscientious discharge of all the duties which devolve upon us, as it respects the Divine Being, ourselves, and our fellow-creatures. Time may be said to be lost when it is not devoted to some good, useful, or at least some innocent purpose; or when opportunities of improvement, business, or devotion, are neglected. Time is wasted by excessive sleep, unnecessary recreations, indolent habits, useless visits, idle reading, vain conversation, and all those actions which have no good end in them. We ought to improve the time, when we consider, 1. That it is short. 2. Swift. 3. Irrecoverable. 4. Uncertain. 5. That it is a talent committed to our trust. And, 6. That the improvement of it is advantageous and interesting in every respect. See TIMOTHEUS, commonly called Timothy; a disciple of St. Paul. He was a native of Lystra in Lycaonia. His father was a Gentile; but his mother, whose name was Eunice, was a Jewess, (Acts 16: 1.) and educated her son with great care in her own religion, 2 Tim. 1: 5. 3: 15. To this young disciple St. Paul addressed two epistles; in the first of which he calls him his "own son in the faith;" (1 Tim. 1: 2.) from which expression it is inferred that St. Paul was the person who converted him to the belief of the gospel; and as, upon St. Paul's second arrival at Lystra, Timothy is mentioned as being then a disciple, and as having distinguished himself among the Christians of that neighborhood, his conversion, as well as that of Eunice his mother, and Lois his grandmother, must have taken place when St. Paul first preached at Lystra, A. D. 46. Upon St. Paul's leaving Lystra, in the course of his second apostolical journey, he was induced to take Timothy with him, on account of his excellent character, and the zeal which, young as he was, he had already, shown in the cause of Christianity; but before they set out, St. Paul caused him to be circumcised, not as a thing necessary to his salvation, but to avoid giving offence to the Jews, as he was a Jew by the mother's side, and it was an established rule among the Jews that partus sequitur ventrem. Timothy was regularly appointed to the ministerial office by the laying on of hands, not only by St. Paul himself, but also by the presbytery, 1 Tim. 4: 14. 2 Tim. 1: 6. From this time Timothy acted as a minister of the gospel; he generally attended St. Paul, but was sometimes employed by him in other places; he was very diligent and useful, and is always mentioned with great esteem and affection by St. Paul, who joins his name with his own in the inscription of six of his epistles. He is sometimes called bishop of Ephesus, and it has been said that he suffered martyrdom in that city, some years after the death of St. Paul.

The principal design of St. Paul's first epistle to Timothy was to give him instructions concerning the management of the church of Ephesus; and it was probably intended that it should be read publicly to the Ephesians, that they might know upon what authority Timothy acted. After saluting him in an affectionate manner, and reminding him of the reason for which he was left at Ephesus, the apostle takes occasion, from the frivolous disputes which some Judaizing teachers had introduced among the Ephesians, to assert the practical nature of the gospel, and to show its superiority over the law; he returns thanks to God for his own appointment to the apostleship, and recommends to Timothy fidelity in the discharge of his sacred office; he exhorts that prayers should be made for all men, and especially for magistrates; he gives directions for the conduct of women, and forbids their teaching in public; he describes the qualifications necessary for bishops and deacons, and speaks of the mysterious grandeur of the gospel dispensation; he foretells that there will be apostates from the truth, and false teachers in the latter times, and recommends to Timothy purity of manners and improvement of his spiritual gifts; he gives him particular directions for his behavior towards persons in different situations in life, and instructs him in several points of Christian discipline; he cautions him against false teachers, gives him several precepts, and solemnly charges him to be faithful to his trust.

That the second epistle to Timothy was written while St. Paul was under confinement at Rome, appears from the two following passages: "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner," 2 Timothy 1: 8. "The Lord give mercy unto the house of Onesiphorus; for he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain; but when he was at Rome, he sought me out very diligently, and found me," 2 Tim. 1: 16, 17. The epistle itself will furnish us with several arguments to prove that it could not have been written during St. Paul's first imprisonment. 1. It is universally agreed that St. Paul wrote his epistles to the Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, and to Philemon, while he was confined the first time at Rome. In no one of these epistles does he express any apprehension for his life; and in the two last mentioned we have seen that, on the contrary, he expresses a confident hope of being soon liberated; but in this epistle he holds a very different language: "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day," 2 Tim. 4: 6, &c. 2. From the inscriptions of the epistles to the Colossians, Philippians, and Philemon, it is certain that Timothy was with St. Paul in his first imprisonment at Rome; but this epistle implies that Timothy was absent. 3. St. Paul tells the Colossians that Mark salutes them, and therefore he was at Rome with St. Paul in his first imprisonment; but he was not at Rome when this epistle was written, for Timothy is directed to bring him with him, 2 Tim. 4: 11. 4. Demas, also, was with St. Paul when he wrote to the Colossians: "Luke, the beloved physician, and Demas, greet you," Col. 4: 14. In this epistle he says, "Demas has forsaken me, having loved this present world, and is departed into Thessalonica," 2 Tim. 4: 10. It may be said that this epistle might have been written before the others, and that in the intermediate time Timothy and Mark might have come to Rome, more especially as St. Paul desires Timothy to come shortly, and bring Mark with him. But this hypothesis is not consistent with what is said of Demas, who was with St. Paul when he wrote to the Colossians, and had left him when he wrote this second epistle to Timothy; consequently, the epistle to Timothy must be posterior to that addressed to the Colossians. 5. St. Paul tells Timothy, "Erastus abode at Corinth, but Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick," 2 Tim. 4: 20. These were plainly two circumstances which had happened in some journey, which St. Paul had taken not long before he wrote this epistle, and since he and Timothy had seen each other; but the last time St. Paul was at Corinth and Miletum, prior to his first imprisonment at Rome, Timothy was with him at both places; and Trophimus could not have been then left at Miletum, for we find him at Jerusalem immediately after St. Paul's arrival in that city; "for they had seen before with him in the city Trophimus, an Ephesian, whom they supposed that Paul had brought into the temple," Acts 21: 29. These two facts must therefore refer to some journey subsequent to the first imprisonment; and, consequently, this epistle was written during St. Paul's second imprisonment at Rome, and probably in A. D. 65, not long before his death.

It is by no means certain where Timothy was when this epistle was written to him. It seems most probable that he was somewhere in Asia Minor, since St. Paul desires him to bring the cloak with him which he had left at Troas; (2 Tim. 4: 13.) and also at the end of the first chapter, he speaks of several persons whose residence was in Asia. Many have thought that he was at Ephesus; but others have rejected that opinion, because Troas does not lie in the way from Ephesus to Rome, whither he was directed to go as quickly as he could.

St. Paul, after his usual salutation, assures Timothy of his most affectionate remembrance; he speaks of his own apostleship and of his sufferings; exhorts Timothy to be steadfast in the true faith, to be constant and diligent in the discharge of his ministerial office, to avoid foolish and unlearned questions, and to practise and inculcate the great duties of the gospel; he describes the apostasy and general wickedness of the last days, and highly commends the Holy Scriptures; he again solemnly exhorts Timothy to diligence; speaks of his own danger, and of his hope of future reward; and concludes with several private directions, and with salutations.—Watson.

TIN; (bedil, Num. 31: 22. Isaiah 1: 25. Ezek. 22: 18, 20. 27: 12.) a well-known coarse metal, harder than lead. Mr. Parkhurst observes, that Moses, in Num. 31: 22, enumerates all the six species of metals. The Lord, by the prophet Isaiah, having compared the Jewish people to silver, declares, "I will turn my hand upon thee, and purge away the dross, and remove all bedelin, thy particles of tin;" where Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion have kassiteron sou, and the Vulgate stannum tuum, "thy tin;" but the LXX. anomalous, "nicked ones." This denunciation, by a comparison of the preceding and following context, appears to signify that God would, by a process of judgment, purify those among the Jews who were capable of purification, as well as destroy the reprobate and incorrigible, Jer. 6: 29, 30. 9: 7. Mal. 3: 3. Ezek. 12: 18, 20.

In Ezek. 27: 12, Tarshish is mentioned as furnishing bedil; and Bochart proves from the testimonies of Diodorus, Phiny, and Stephanus, that Tartessus in Spain, which he supposes the ancient Tarshish, anciently furnished tin. As Cornwall in very ancient times was resorted to for this metal, and probably first by the Phenicians, some have thought that peninsula to be the Tarshish of the Scriptures; a subject which, however, from the vague use of the word, is involved in much uncertainty. (See TARSHISH.—Watson.)

TINDAL, or TYNDALE, (WILLIAM;) a great English reformer of the sixteenth century. He went young to Oxford, and had part of his education there, and part at Cambridge. After leaving the university, he settled for a time in Gloucestershire, but was obliged to leave his country on account of persecution. On the continent he translated the New Testament into English, and printed it in 1526. This edition was bought up by Sir Thomas More and bishop Tonstall. With the money procured from this source, it was republished in 1530; but as this also contained some reflections on the English bishops and clergy, they commanded that it should be purchased and burnt. In 1532, Tindal and his associates translated and printed the whole Bible; but while he was preparing a second edition, he was apprehended and burnt for heresy in Flanders. His last words were, "Lord, open the eyes of the king of England!"

It is generally supposed that Tindal was born on the borders of Wales; and it is probable that he might have derived his superior light from some of the Wickliffites about Hereford and the adjoining counties, where much scripture truth was for ages deposited. To this great man we are under great obligations for our emancipation from the fetters of popery. In Ivimey's History, Tindal is claimed as a Baptist in sentiment.—Middleton, vol. i. p. 128.

TINDAL, (MATTHEW,) a deistical writer, was born, about 1657, at Beer Ferrers, in Devonshire; was educated at Lincoln college, Oxford, and obtained a fellowship in All Souls; and died in 1733. Among his works are, the Rights of the Christian Church asserted; and Christianity as old as the Creation.—Davenport.

TIRHAKAH. (See CUSH, ETHIOPIA, and SENNACHERIB.)

TIRZAH; (pleasant;) a city of Ephraim, and the royal seat of the kings of Israel, from the time of Jeroboam to the reign of Omri, who built the city of Samaria, which then became the capital of this kingdom, 2 Kings 15: 14, 16.—Calmet.

TISHBE; a city of Gilead, east of the Jordan, and the country of the prophet Elijah, who from hence was called the Tishbite, 1 Kings 17: 1.—Calmet.

TISRI; the first Hebrew month of the civil year, and the seventh of the ecclesiastical year. (See MONTH.)—Calmet.

TITHES; the tenth part of any acquired possession, or of the increase annually arising and renewing from the profits of land, stock upon lands, personal industry, &c., and appropriated to religious or ecclesiastical purposes. They are very ancient, and were exacted, in the earliest times, among almost all nations. Abraham voluntarily offered the tithes of his spoil to Melchizedek, as priest of the Most High God, and Jacob vowed that he would devote a tenth of all his income to Jehovah; but they specially claim attention as exacted in the Jewish and Christian churches.

1. In the Jewish Church. These were of two kinds: the first, a tenth of all the fields and herds given for the support of the Levites, who, having no landed property, yet performing important services in the Israelitish state, were entitled to a liberal remuneration. Of these, however, the Levites had to pay one-tenth to the priests, who thus received a hundredth part of the produce above specified, Lev. 27: 30—33. Num. 18: 21, 22. The second tithes were appropriated to the maintenance of the feasts and sacrifices; (Deut. 12: 11—17—19. 14: 22, 23.) with the exception, that every third year the people might make a feast of them at their own houses, for the servants, widows, orphans, the poor, and the Levites, Deut. 14: 28, 29. 26: 12—15.

2. In the Christian Church. The Levitical law having been entirely superseded by the introduction of the Christian dispensation, in which nothing is ordained respecting tithes, the divine right by which they were raised necessarily ceased. Nothing whatever is said in reference to them in the New Testament, though the principle is there distinctly recognised and enforced, that the ministers of the gospel should be liberally maintained by those among whom they labor. Nor do we find any mention made of them in the earliest and purest ages of the church. It was not till the fourth and fifth centuries, after Christianity had been desecrated by its being forced into a state alliance, that we find the tithe system introduced and carried into effect. The tithes, however, as then levied, were divided into three portions:—1. One-third went to the bishop, who had to sustain the onus hospitalitatis, which was often very great, in consequence of the number of travellers, both clergy and laity, who repaired to the episcopal residence for entertainment. 2. Another third was distributed among the clergy, in proportion to their different circumstances and claims. 3. And the last third went to defray the expenses of repairing the churches, &c., and to the support of the poor.

Much has been said by the clergy in England relative to the jure divino of tithes; but the more prudent have generally insisted on their right to them as a matter of human institution. And on no other ground can they, with any degree of consistency, exact them from those who reside in their parishes, whether they attend their ministry or not. They were first introduced into England by Athelwolf, and devoted by him to God, to the blessed Virgin, and to all the saints, for the averting of temporal calamities, for the health of his royal soul, and the pardon of his sins, and for the saying of masses for himself and his nobles when deceased. At first, though every man was obliged to pay tithes in general, yet he might give them to what priests he pleased, which was called the "arbitrary consecration of tithes;" or he might pay them into the hands of the bishop, who distributed among his diocesan clergy the revenues of the church, which were then common. But when dioceses were divided into parishes, the tithes of each parish were allotted to its own particular minister; first by common consent, or the appointment of the lords of manors, and afterwards by the written law of the land.

Tithes are of three kinds: first, predial, as of corn, grass, hops, and wood. Secondly, mixed, as wool, milk, pigs, &c., consisting of natural produce, but nurtured and preserved in part by the care of man; and of these the tithe must be paid in gross. Thirdly, personal, as of occupations, trades, fisheries, and the like; and of these, only the tenth part of the clear gains and profits is due.

Lands and their occupiers, however, in England may be exempted, or discharged, from the payment of tithes, either in part or totally: First, by a real compromise, when an agreement is made between the owner of the lands and the parson or vicar, with the consent of the ordinary and the patron, that such lands shall, for the future, be discharged from payment of tithes, by reason of some land, or other real recompense, given to the parson in lieu of them. Secondly, a discharge, by custom or prescription, which is either de modo decimandi, or de non decimandi. The former is any means by which the general law of tithing is altered, and a new method of taking them introduced, as a couple of fowls instead of the tithe eggs, two-pence an acre for the tithe of land, &c. The latter appertains to the king by prerogative, to spiritual persons, or corporations, as bishops, monasteries, &c. See Blackstone's Comm.; Rees' Cyclop.; and Stratton's English and Jewish Tithe Systems compared.—Hend. Euck.

TITLE; a presentation to some vacant ecclesiastical preferment, or a certificate of such presentation, required by bishops from those who apply to them for ordination. Should any ordain without a sufficient title, he must keep and maintain the person whom he so ordains with all things necessary, till he can prefer him to some ecclesiastical living, upon pain of suspension from giving orders for the space of one year.—Hend. Buck.

TITUS. It is remarkable that Titus is not mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. The few particulars which are known of him are collected from the epistles of St. Paul. We learn from them that he was a Greek, (Gal. 2: 3.) but it is not recorded to what city or country he belonged. From St. Paul's calling him "his own son according to the common faith," (Titus 1: 4.) it is concluded that he was converted by him; but we have no account of the time or place of his conversion. He is first mentioned as going from Antioch to the council at Jerusalem, A. D. 49; (Gal. 2: 1, &c.) and upon that occasion St. Paul says that he would not allow him to be circumcised, because he was born of Gentile parents. He probably accompanied St. Paul in his second apostolical journey, and from that time he seems to have been constantly employed by him in the propagation of the gospel; he calls him his partner and fellow-helper, 2 Cor. 8: 23. St. Paul sent him from Ephesus with his first epistle to the Corinthians, and with a commission to inquire into the state of the church at Corinth; and he sent him thither again from Macedonia with his second epistle, and to forward the collections for the saints in Judea. From this time we hear nothing of Titus till he was left by St. Paul in Crete, after his first imprisonment at Rome, to "set in order the things that were wanting, and to ordain elders in every city," Titus 1: 5. It is probable that he went thence to join St. Paul at Nicopolis; (Titus 3: 12.) that they went together to Crete to visit the churches there, and thence to Rome. During St. Paul's second imprisonment at Rome Titus went into Dalmatia; (2 Tim. 4: 10.) and after the apostle's death, he is said to have returned into Crete, and to have died there in the ninety-fourth year of his age; he is often called bishop of Crete by ecclesiastical writers. St. Paul always speaks of Titus in terms of high regard, and intrusted him, as we have seen, with commissions of great importance.

As it appears that St. Paul, not long before he wrote his epistle, had left Titus in Crete for the purpose of regulating the affairs of the church, and at the time he wrote it had determined to pass the approaching winter at Nicopolis, and as the Acts of the Apostles do not give any account of St. Paul's preaching in that island, or of visiting that city, it is concluded that this epistle was written after his first imprisonment at Rome, and probably in A. D. 61. (See CRETE, and NICOPOLIS.)—Watson.

TITUS SABINUS VESPASIANUS, (FLAVIUS,) a Roman emperor, the son of Vespasian, was born A. D. 40. After having distinguished himself in arms, particularly at the siege of Jerusalem, he ascended the throne A. D. 79. His early licentiousness inspired fears as to his future conduct, but he discarded his vices, and acted in such a manner as to be denominated the delight of the human race. He was the father of his people. On one occasion, having within the twenty-four hours performed no act of kindness, he exclaimed, "My friends, I have lost a day!" He reigned little more than two years.—Davenport.

TOB; a country of Palestine, lying beyond Jordan, in the northern part of the portion of Manasseh, Judges 11: 3, 5. 2 Sam. 10. It is also called Tobie, or Tubin; (1 Mac. 5: 13.) and the inhabitants of this canton were called Tobiens. It is supposed to be the same as Ishtob, one of the small principalities of Syria, which appears, like the other little kingdoms in its neighborhood, to have been swallowed up in the kingdom of Damascus, 2 Sam. 10.—Watson.

TOBIAH; an Ammonite, and enemy to the Jews. He was one of those who strenuously opposed the rebuilding of the temple, after the return from the captivity of Babylon, Neh. 2: 10. 4: 3. 5: 1, 12, 14. This Tobiah is called "the servant," or "slave," in some parts of Nehemiah; probably because he was of a servile condition. However, he was of great consideration in the land of the Samaritans, of which he was governor with Sanballat. This Tobiah married the daughter of Shechaniah, one of the principal Jews of Jerusalem, (Neh. 6: 18.) and had a Jewish party in Jerusalem itself, who were opposed to that of Nehemiah.—Watson.

TOGARMAH; the third son of Gomer, Gen. 10: 4. The learned are divided as to what country he peopled. Josephus and St. Jerome were of opinion that Togarmah was the father of the Phrygians; Eusebius, Theodorot, and Isidorus of Seville, that he peopled Armenia: the Chaldee and the talmudists are for Germany. Several moderns believe that the children of Togarmah peopled Turcomania in Tartary and Scythia. Bochari is for Cappadocia: he builds upon what is said in Ezekiel 27: 14: "They of the house of Togarmah traded in thy fairs," that is, at Tyre, "with horses and horsemen and mules." He proves that Cappadocia was famous for its excellent horses and its asses. He observes, also, that certain Gauls, under the conduct of Trocmus, made a settlement at Cappadocia, and were called Tzemri, or Trogmi. The opinion, says Calmet, which places Togarmah in Scythia and Turcomania, seems to stand upon the best foundation.—Watson.

TOKENS, TESSERÆ, or TICKETS, were written testimonials to character, much in use in the primitive church. By means of letters, and of brethren who travelled about, even the most remote churches of the Roman empire were connected together. When a Christian arrived in a strange town, he first inquired for the church; and he was here received as a brother, and provided with every thing needful for his spiritual or corporeal sustenance. But since deceivers, spies with evil intentions, and false teachers, abused the confidence and the kindness of Christians, some measure of precaution became necessary, in order to avert the many injuries which might result from this conduct. An arrangement was therefore introduced, that only such travelling Christians should be received as brethren into churches where they were strangers, as could produce a testimonial from the bishop of the church from which they came.—Watson.

TOLAND, (JOHN,) a deistical writer, was born in 1664, near Londonderry; was originally a Roman Catholic, but became a dissenter, and, lastly, a sceptic; was educated at Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Leyden; was employed in secret missions to the German courts; and died in 1722. Among his works are, Christianity not mysterious; Nazarenus; Pantheisticum; Tetradymus; Amyutor; and a Life of Milton.—Davenport.

TOLERATION, in matters of religion, is either civil or ecclesiastical. Civil toleration is an impunity, and safely granted by the state to every sect that does not maintain doctrines inconsistent with the public peace. (See RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.) Ecclesiastical toleration is the allowance which the church grants to its members to differ in certain opinions not reputed essential. See *Roger Williams, Dr. Owen, Locke, and Dr. Furneaux, on Toleration; Milton's Civil Power in Ecclesiastical Causes; Hints on Toleration, by Philagatharches; Réflexions Philosophiques et Politiques sur la Tolérance Religieuse, par J. P. De N***.*—Hend. Buck.

TOLERATION ACT. (See ACT OF TOLERATION.)

TOMB. (See SEVULCHRE.)

TOMLINE, (GEORGE, D. D.,) whose family name was PRETTYMAN, a prelate and writer, was born about 1750, at Bury St. Edmund, where his father was a tradesman. He was educated at Bury school, and at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, and was senior wrangler in 1772. Mr. Pitt, to whom he had been academical tutor, made him his private secretary, gave him the living of Sudbury, and a prebend of Westminster, and, in 1787, raised him to the see of Lincoln, whence, in 1820, Dr. Tomline was translated to that of Winchester. He died November 8, 1827. His principal works are, Elements of Christian Theology; Refutation of the Charge of Calvinism against the Church of England, to which a Reply was written by Dr. Thomas Scott, the commentator; and a Life of Mr. Pitt.—Davenport.

TONGUE. This word is taken in three different senses:—1. For the material tongue, or organ of speech, James 3: 5. 2. For the tongue or language that is spoken in any country, Deut. 28: 49. (See LANGUAGE.) 3. For good or bad discourses, Prov. 12: 18. 17: 20. Tongue of the sea signifies a gulf. To gnaw the tongue, (Rev. 16: 10.) is a token of fury, despair, and torment. The tongue of angels, a kind of hyperbole made use of by St. Paul, 1 Cor. 13: 1.—Watson.

TONGUE, DUTIES OF THE; "1. To glorify God by magnifying his name. 2. To sing his praises. 3. To declare to others God's goodness. 4. To pray to him for what we want. 5. To make open profession of our subjection to him. 6. To preach his word. 7. To defend the truth. 8. To exhort men to particular duties. 9. To confess our sins to God. 10. To crave the advice of others. 11. To praise that which is good in others. 12. To bear witness of the truth. 13. To defend the cause of the innocent and just. 14. To communicate to others the same good impressions we have received."—Hend. Buck.

TONGUES, GIFT OF. (See GIFT OF TONGUES.)

TOPAZ. The Heb. pitdath, (Exod. 28: 17. 39: 10. Job 28: 19. Ezek. 28: 13.) translated topaz, is now generally thought to be the same as our chrysolite.—Calmet.

TOPHET. (See GERENNA; MORG; and HELL.)

TOPLADY, (AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE, A. B.,) was the son of Richard Toplady, Esq., who died at the siege of Carthage. He was born at Farnham, in Surry, November 4, 1710. He received the rudiments of his education at Westminster school; but it becoming necessary for his mother to make a journey to Ireland, to pursue some claims to an estate in that kingdom, he accompanied her thither; and was entered at Trinity college, in Dublin, at which seminary he took his degree of bachelor of arts. Being awakened to the knowledge of God and of his own heart, he prosecuted his studies for the ministry of the gospel with the most indefatigable ardor. He thought, and thought justly, that men in the most important of all professions, should be qualified in all respects for their sacred function. He, therefore, received orders on Trinity Sunday, the 6th of June, 1762; and after some time, was inducted first into the living of Bladon, in Somersetshire, and afterwards into that of Broad Heabury, in Devonshire. In both these retirements he pursued his labors with unremitting assiduity, and composed most of his writings.

He had, for some years, occasionally visited and spent some time in London; but in the year 1775, finding his constitution much impaired by the moist atmosphere of Devonshire, he removed to London entirely. Here, at the request of his friends, he engaged the chapel belonging to the French reformed, near Leicester Fields, where he preached twice in the week. His health now began rapidly to decline; a consumption was daily removing him to the country "from whose bourne no traveller returns." He met death disarmed of his terrors; and found him an angel of mercy. Writing to a friend he had long esteemed, he used these words respecting his own conversion: "I well remember, that when I first began to discern something of the absurdities and impieties of Arminianism, my mind was in a state of suspense for many succeeding months. Dr. Manton's sermons on the 17th of John were the means through which my Arminian prejudices received their primary shock; a blessing for which an eternity of praise will be a poor mite of acknowledgment to that God, whose spirit turned me from darkness to light." All his conversations, as he approached nearer to his decease, seemed more and more happy and heavenly. He frequently called himself the happiest man in the world. His works, many of which are on the Arminian controversy, have been published in six volumes octavo, and are in high repute with the hyper-Calvinists. Life of Toplady.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

TORQUEMADA, (THOMAS DE,) the first inquisitor general of Spain, a man infamous for his barbarity, was born in 1420; was a monk of the order of St. Dominic; became inquisitor general in 1483; and died in 1498. In the course of sixteen years he gave to the flames no less than eight thousand eight hundred victims, besides executing nearly as many in effigy, condemning ninety thousand to perpetual imprisonment and other severe punishments, and expelling from Spain above eight hundred thousand Jews.—Davenport.

TORTOISE, (Lev. 11: 29.) or land turtle; a class of animals strongly allied to the reptile kinds. The Hebrew word, however, does not signify a tortoise, but a lizard, called in Arabic tzal.—Calmet.

TOWER. The towers of the watchmen, or of the shepherds, stood alone in the midst of the plain, in which the shepherds and herdsmen who looked after the flocks, or watchmen, might lodge. King Uzziah caused several towers to be built for the shepherds in the desert, and made many cisterns there, because he had a great number of flocks, 2 Chron. 26: 10. The tower of the flock, (Micah 4: 8.) and that which Isaiah (5: 2.) notices, which was built in the midst of a vineyard, were of the same kind. (See ADAR.)

TOWER OF BABEL. (See BABEL.)

TOWER OF SHECHEM, was a citadel, or fortress, standing upon a higher ground than the rest of the city, and capacious enough to contain above a thousand persons.—Watson.

TOWNSEND, (JOSEPH,) a divine and writer, was born about 1740; was educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge; studied physic under Dr. Cullen, at Edinburgh, but became chaplain to lady Huntingdon, and was satirized by Graves in the Spiritual Quixote; obtained the living of Pewsey, in Wiltshire; and died in 1816. He was eminent as a scholar, mineralogist, and conchologist. Of his works the chief are, Travels in Spain; the Physician's Vade Mecum; Sermons; and the Character of Moses as an Historian established.—Davenport.

TOWNSEND, (JOHN,) a much respected minister among the English dissenters, was born on the 24th of March, 1757, in the parish of White-chapel, county of Middlesex. His parents were in humble circumstances, and he was indebted for his education to a wealthy uncle, who introduced him into Christ's hospital, in which excellent institution he continued five years. On leaving school he returned to his father's home, and was apprenticed to him. Having received some religious impressions from the preaching of the Rev. Henry Peckwell, under a discourse preached at Tottenham Court chapel, he offered himself as a member at the Tabernacle, and was accepted. He first commenced public teaching in some of the villages around London, where he met with so much acceptance, that he received an invitation to supply on a Sabbath at the Independent meeting at Kingston, where, after a time, he settled as stated pastor, with a salary of sixty pounds a year, and was ordained on the 1st of June, 1781. Not meeting with that success in his labors which was necessary to encourage his perseverance, after a trial of three years Mr. Townsend quitted Kingston, and settled at Bermondsey, where he commenced his official duties at midsummer, 1784, and in which situation he continued to labor in his Master's vineyard till the period of his death, the 7th of February, 1826.

He had the honor of being one of the original founders of the London Missionary society, the interests of which he ably advocated through life. But that was only one among the many benevolent institutions which Mr. Townsend was instrumental in raising. He aided at the formation of the Tract society, the British and Foreign Bible society, the London Female Penitentiary, the Irish Evangelical, the Society for the Conversion of the Jews, the Congregational school, raised entirely by his influence, the Fund for the Relief of Aged Ministers, and especially the Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb, which, if we are not mistaken, owed its establishment chiefly to his exertions. In fact, in promoting benevolent institutions, he was unwearied in his exertions; and as a member of a committee he was exceeded by few in usefulness. His sober, solid, judicious hints and observations were always listened to with profound attention, and his advice, which was never officiously obtruded, was always acceptable. As a preacher, he was distinguished by good sense and sound doctrine, commending himself to the conscience and the heart, by a clear and judicious exhibition of divine truth; so that his sermons produced very powerful effects upon his auditories, which were generally considerable. He was truly "a workman that needed not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." His writings are not numerous, but they are valuable. The principal of them are, "Nine Discourses on Prayer," London, 1799, octavo;

"Three Sermons, addressed to the Old, Middle-aged, and Young People," octavo, second edition, 1800; "Remarks on the Charge of the Bishop of St. David's," (Dr. Horsley,) octavo, 1791; "Hints on Sunday Schools and Itinerant Preaching, in a Letter to the Bishop of Rochester," &c., 1801. See Life of John Townsend, 1828.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

TRACHONITIS; (rocky, or rugged;) a province of Arabia, having Arabia Deserta east, Batanea west, Iturea south, and the country of Damascus north. Josephus (Antiq. lib. i. cap. 7.) says it is situate between Palestine and Cælo-Syria, and was peopled by Hush or Cush, a son of Aram. Of this province Herod Philip was tetrarch, Luke 3: 1.—Calmet.

TRADITION; (Gr. paradosis;) something handed down from one generation to another. Thus the Jews pretended, that, besides their written law contained in the Old Testament, Moses had delivered an oral law, which had been conveyed down from father to son; (see CABALA;) and thus the Roman Catholics are said to value particular doctrines, supposed to have descended from the apostolic times by tradition.

In the older ecclesiastical fathers, the words paradosis and traditio are used to denote any instruction which one gives to another, whether oral or written. In the New Testament also, and in the classical writers, paradounai and tradere signify, in general, to teach, to instruct. In this wider sense, tradition was divided into written and not written, or oral. The latter, traditio oralis, was, however, frequently called traditio, by way of eminence. This oral tradition was often appealed to by Irenæus, Clemens of Alexandria, Tertullian, and others of the ancient fathers, as a test by which to try the doctrines of contemporary teachers, and by which to confute the errors of the heretics. They describe it as being instruction received from the mouth of the apostles by the first Christian churches, transmitted from the apostolic age, and preserved in purity until their own times.

Oral tradition is still regarded by the Roman church as a principium cognoscendi, or rule of faith, in theology; and they attempt to support their hypothesis respecting it by the use made of it by the fathers. But it must appear altogether futile, if due regard be paid to the difference of time. In the first period of Christianity the authority of the apostles was so great, that all their doctrines and ordinances were strictly and punctually observed by the churches which they had planted. And the doctrine and discipline which prevailed in those apostolical churches were, at the time, justly considered by others to be purely such as the apostles themselves had taught and established. This was the more common, as the books of the New Testament had not, as yet, come into general use among Christians; nor was it, at that early period, attended with any special liability to mistake. In this way we can account for it, that Christian teachers of the second and third centuries appeal so frequently to oral tradition. But in later periods of the church, the circumstances are far different. After the commencement of the third century, when the first teachers of the apostolical churches and their immediate successors had passed away, and another race sprung up, other doctrines and forms were gradually introduced, which differed, in many respects, from apostolical simplicity. And now those innovators appealed more frequently than had ever been done before to apostolical tradition, in order to give currency to their own opinions and regulations. They went so far, indeed, as to appeal to this tradition for many things not only at variance with other traditions, but with the very writings of the apostles which they had in their hands. From this time forward tradition naturally became more and more uncertain and suspicious. No wonder, therefore, that we find Augustine establishing the maxim, that it could not be relied upon, in the ever increasing distance from the age of the apostles, except when it was universal, and perfectly consistent with itself. And the reformers justly held, that tradition is not a sure and certain source of knowledge respecting the doctrines of theology, and that the Holy Scriptures are the only principium cognoscendi, or rule of faith. (See PROTESTANTS.)—Hend. Buck.

TRADUCIANI; those who hold that the souls of children, as well as their bodies, are propagated from their parents. According to Jerome, both Tertullian and Apollinaris were advocates of this opinion; and the opponents of Pelagianism, in general, have been inclined to it. Since the Reformation it has been more approved than any other in the Lutheran church, and that not by philosophers and naturalists merely, but also by divines. Luther himself, though he did not declare distinctly in its favor, was also inclined towards this theory; and in the "Formula Concordiæ" it is distinctly taught, that both soul and body are propagated by the parents in ordinary generation. What has rendered the hypothesis more acceptable to theologians, is its affording the easiest solution of the doctrine of native depravity; and it seems to receive confirmation from the psychological facts, that the natural disposition of children not unfrequently resembles that of their parents; and that the mental excellencies and imperfections of parents are inherited nearly as often by their children as any bodily attributes. But after all that can be said, we must be content to remain in uncertainty respecting the subject. "As thou knowest not what is the way of the spirit, nor how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child, even so thou knowest not the works of God who maketh all," Eccl. 11: 5.—Hend. Buck.

TRANSFIGURATION OF CHRIST. This event relates to a very remarkable occurrence in the history of our Lord's life, which is recorded by three of the evangelists, Matthew 17. Mark 9. Luke 9. 2 Pet. 1: 16—18.

This event is to be considered: 1. As a solemn confirmation of the prophetic office of Christ. 2. As designed to support the faith of the disciples, which was to be deeply tried by his approaching humiliations; and to afford consolation to the human nature of our Lord himself, by giving him a foretaste of "the joy set before him." 3. As an emblem of humanity glorified at the resurrection. 4. As declaring Christ to be superior to Moses and Elias, the giver and the restorer of the law. 5. As an evidence to the disciples of the existence of a separate state, in which good men consciously enjoy the felicity of heaven. 6. As a proof that the bodies of good men shall be so refined and changed, as, like Elias, to live in a state of immortality, and in the presence of God. 7. As exhibiting the sympathy which exists between the church in heaven and the church on earth, and the instruction which the former receives from the events which take place in the latter: Moses and Elias conversed with our Lord on his approaching death, doubtless to receive, not to convey information. 8. As maintaining the grand distinction, the infinite difference, between Christ and all other prophets: he is "THE SON." "This is my beloved Son, hear him." It has been observed, with much truth, that the condition in which Jesus Christ appeared among men, humble, weak, poor, and despised, was a true and continual transfiguration; whereas, the transfiguration itself, in which he showed himself in the real splendor of his glory, was his true and natural condition.—Watson.

TRANSLATION, in the ecclesiastical sense of the word, is the removing of a bishop from one see to another. It is also used for the version of a book or writing into a different language from that in which it was written.

In translating the Scriptures, great knowledge and caution are necessary. Dr. Campbell lays down three fundamental rules for translating: 1. The translation should give a complete transcript of the ideas of the original. 2. The style and manner of the original should be preserved. 3. The translation should have all the ease of original composition. He observes, that the difficulties found in translating the Scriptures arise, 1. From the singularity of Jewish customs. 2. From the poverty (as appears) of their native language. 3. From the fewness of the books extant in it. 4. From the symbolical style of the prophets. 5. From the excessive influence which a previous acquaintance with translations have occasioned. And, 6. From prepossessions, in what way soever acquired, in regard to religious tenets.

Notwithstanding these difficulties, however, the divines employed by king James to translate the Old and New Testaments have given us a translation which, with a very few exceptions, can scarcely be improved. These divines were profoundly skilled in the learning as well as in the languages of the East; whilst some of those who have presumed to improve their version, seem not to have possessed a critical knowledge of the Greek tongue, to have known still less of the Hebrew, and to have been absolute strangers to the dialect spoken in Judea in the days of our Savior, as well as to the manners, customs, and peculiar opinions of the Jewish sects. "Neither," as one observes, "metaphysical acuteness, nor the most perfect knowledge of the principles of translation in general, will enable a man who is ignorant of these things to improve the authorized version either of the gospels or epistles; for such a man knows not accurately, and therefore cannot give a complete transcript of the ideas of the original work." (See BIBLE.) Mr. Tytler's Essay on the Principles of Translation; and Dr. Campbell's Preliminary Dissertations to his Translation of the Gospels.—Hend. Buck.

TRANSPORTATION; in Scotland, the removing or translation of a minister from one parish or congregation to another.—Hend. Buck.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION; the conversion or change of the substance of the bread and wine in the eucharist into the body and blood of Jesus Christ, which the Romish church suppose to be wrought by the consecration of the priest.

Nothing can be more contradictory to Scripture, or to common sense, than this doctrine. It must be evident to every one who is not blinded by ignorance and prejudice, that our Lord's words, "This is my body," are merely figurative expressions; besides, such a transubstantiation is so opposite to the testimony of our senses, as completely to undermine the whole proof of all the miracles by which God hath confirmed revelation. According to such a transubstantiation, the same body is alive and dead at once, and may be in a million of different places whole and entire at the same instant of time; accidents remain without a substance, and substance without accidents; and that a part of Christ's body is equal to the whole. It is also contrary to the end of the sacrament, which is to represent and commemorate Christ, not to believe that he is corporeally present, 1 Cor. 9: 21, 25. But we need not waste time in attempting to refute a doctrine which, by its impious consequences, refutes itself. See Smith's Errors of the Church of Rome, dial. 6; A Dialogue between Philotheus and Benevolus; Kidder's Messiah, part iii. p. 80; and Brown's Compendium, p. 613.—Hend. Buck.

TRAVAIL; the pains of childbearing. The word is applied metaphorically to any severe suffering, especially if endured for the good of others, Isa. 53: 11. 66: 7, 8. Gal. 4: 19.

TREASURE; any thing collected together, in stores. So a treasure of corn, of wine, of oil; treasures of gold, silver, brass; treasures of coined money. Snow, winds, hail, rain, waters, are in the treasures of God, Ps. 135: 7. Jer. 51: 16. We say also, a treasure of good works, treasures of iniquity, to lay up treasures in heaven, to bring forth good or evil out of the treasures of the heart. Paul (Rom. 2: 5.) speaks of heaping up a treasure of wrath against the day of wrath.—Calmet.

TREAT, (SAMUEL,) first minister of Eastham, Massachusetts, was graduated at Harvard college, in 1669. He was ordained in 1672, a church having been established for more than twenty years. Soon after his settlement he studied the Indian language, and devoted to the Indians in his neighborhood much of his time and attention. Through his labors many of the savages were brought into a state of civilization and order, and not a few of them were converted to the Christian faith. In 1693 he wrote a letter to Increase Mather, in which he states that there were within the limits of Eastham five hundred adult Indians, to whom he had for many years imparted the gospel in their own language. He had under him four Indian teachers, who read in separate villages on every Sabbath, excepting on every fourth, when he himself preached the sermons, which he wrote for them. He procured schoolmasters, and persuaded the Indians to choose from among themselves six magistrates, who held regular courts. After having passed near half a century in the most benevolent exertions as a minister of the gospel, he died, March 18, 1717, aged sixty-eight.—Allen.

TREE. Great numbers of the Eastern trees, in their native soil, flower twice in a year, and some flower and bear ripe fruit all the year round; and it is observed of these last, that they are at once the most frequent and the most useful to the inhabitants; their fruits, which always hang on them in readiness, containing cool juices, which are good in fevers, and other of the common diseases of hot countries. The umbrageous foliage, with which the God of providence has generally furnished all trees in warm climates, affords a most refreshing and grateful shade to those who seek relief from the direct and hurtful rays of a tropical sun.—Watson.

TREE OF LIFE. (See LIFE.)

TRENCH; a military term, and denotes one description of the approaches to a fortified town. They were anciently used to surround a town, to inclose the besieged, and to secure the besiegers against attacks from them. Trenches could not be cut in a rock; and it is probable, that when our Lord says of Jerusalem, (Luke 19: 43.) "Thy enemies shall cast a trench about thee," meaning, "they shall raise a wall of inclosure," he foretold what the Jews would barely credit, from the nature of the case; perhaps what they considered as impossible; yet the providence of God has so ordered it, that we have evidence to this fact, in Josephus, who says that Titus exhorting his soldiers, they surrounded Jerusalem with a wall in the space of three days; although the general opinion had pronounced it impossible. This circumvallation prevented any escape from the city, and deterred from all attempts at relief by succors going into it.—Calmet.

TRENT, COUNCIL OF. (See COUNCIL.)

TRESPASS. (See OFFENCE, and SIN.)

TRIALS. 1. Painful circumstances into which persons are brought by divine providence, with a view to illustrate the perfections of God, bring to light the real character of those who are thus tried, or to advance their spiritual and eternal interest. (See ADVERSITY, and AFFLICTION.)

2. In Scottish ecclesiastical diction, exercises prescribed for those who are to pass an examination or trial, in order to obtain a license to preach the gospel. These exercises differ. In the case of the Rev. Ebenezer Erskine, the trials were, a homily on Isaiah 45: 22; a popular sermon on Rom. 9: 17, 18; a Latin discourse on the nature of justifying faith; to give an account of Psalm 43. in Hebrew, and the Greek New Testament, ad aperturam libri; and to answer catechetical questions.—Hend. Buck.

TRIBES, THE TEN; the tribes composing the kingdom of Israel, which were led into captivity, into Assyria and the countries about the Caspian sea, by Tiglath-pilezer, about seven hundred and forty years before Christ. Many conjectures have been hazarded with respect to their fate, some authors maintaining that they became totally extinct; others, that they exist to this day in some unknown part of the world. By one class of writers they have been found in the Afghans; by others, in the Uzbek Tartars; while a third class pretend to have discovered their descendants in the aboriginal inhabitants of North America. More recently some evidence has been furnished by the American missionaries in Burmah, to prove that they are found in the people called Karens.

Yet to others it seems more probable that they, and the captives of the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, amalgamated during their joint exile in Babylon, and that they returned together as one people, in consequence of the edicts issued by the Persian kings. To this conclusion the reader will be brought, who attentively examines the bearing of the following passages of sacred writ: Neh. 11: 3. 12: 37. Ezra 3: 1. 6: 16. 8: 35. 10: 5. Ezek. 37: 16—28. On no other principle is it easy to account for the amount of the population which is stated by Josephus as existing in Palestine in his time. (See ADAIR, and BOUDINOT.) Am. Rep. Mag., Oct. 1834.—Hend. Buck.

TRIBULATION, expresses in our version much the same as trouble or trial; importing afflictive dispensations, to which a person is subjected, either by way of punishment, or by way of experiment. For tribulation, by way of punishment, see Judg. 10: 14. Matt. 24: 21, 29. Rom. 2: 9. 2 Thess. 1: 6. For tribulation, by way of trial, see John 16: 33. Rom. 5: 3. 2 Thess. 1: 4. (See AFFLICTION; TRIAL.)—Calmet.

TRIBUNAL; the place where judicial proceedings are administered. (See JUDGE).—Calmet.

TRIBUTE. The Hebrews acknowledged the sovereign dominion of God by a tribute, or capitation of half a shekel a head, which was paid yearly, Exod. 30: 13. (See HEBREWS, GOVERNMENT OF, and KING.)

The Israelites were frequently subdued by foreign princes, who laid taxes and tribute on them, to which necessity compelled them to submit. See in Matt. 22: 17, the answer of Christ to the Pharisees, who came with insidious designs of tempting him, and asked him whether or no it was lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar. Also John 8: 33, where the Jews boast of having never been slaves to any; of being a free nation, acknowledging God only for sovereign. And note, that at the time many Jews had imbibed the principles of Judas Gaulonitis, and infused into the people their notions of independence, and a vain show of liberty. On the contrary, the apostles Peter and Paul, in their epistles, always endeavored to recommend and inculcate on Christians submission and obedience to princes, with a conscientious discharge of their duty in paying tribute, Rom. 13: 1—8. 1 Pet. 2: 13.—Calmet.

TRICHOTOMY; the theory according to which man is divided into three parts, body, soul, and spirit. This theory, supposed to derive support from 1 Thess. 5: 23, was common among the early fathers of the church, but was opposed by Tertullian and other writers of the Western church. It was held by Luther, as it still is by the more evangelical part of the Lutheran church. The reformers, however, did not consider spirit and soul as different substances, but only as different attributes or operations of the same spiritual essence. (See ADAM; MAN; PHYSIOLOGY; PNEUMATOLOGY; SOUL).—Hend. Buck.

TRISTERS; a society of ministers, with some others, chosen by Cromwell to sit at Whitehall. They were mostly Independents, and Baptists, though some were Presbyterians. They had power to try all that came for institution and induction as pastors; and without their approbation none were admitted. They examined all who were able to come up to London; but if any were unable or of doubtful qualifications, they referred them to some minister in the country where they lived.

According to Baxter, they did abundance of good to the church. They saved many a congregation from ignorant, ungodly, drunken teachers; that sort of men who intended no more in the ministry than to say a sermon, as readers say their common prayers, and to patch up a few good words together; to talk the people asleep on Sunday, and all the rest of the week go with them to the alehouse, and harden them in their sin; and that sort of ministers, who either preached against a holy life, or preached as men that never were acquainted with it. All those who used the ministry but as a common trade to live by, and were never likely to convert a soul, they usually rejected, and in their stead they admitted persons of any denomination, who were able, serious preachers, and lived a godly life. Neal; Jerinney.—Hend. Buck.

TRIMMER, (SARAH), an active and intelligent female, the daughter of Kirby, who wrote on Perspective, was born, in 1741, at Ipswich, and died December 15, 1810. She wrote several useful works to promote the diffusion of education. Howe's Chris. Reg. 1817.—Davenport.

TRINITARIANS; those who believe in the Trinity. See next article, and lecture 162 of Doddridge, where the reader will find a statement of the opinions of the ancients on this doctrine, as likewise many of the moderns; such as Baxter, Dr. Clarke, Burnet, Howe, Waterland, Taylor, Pearson, Bull, Wallis, Watts, and Jeremy Taylor.—Hend. Buck.

TRINITY; the union of three in one; generally applied to the ineffable mystery of three persons in one God, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. The term, which might more properly be expressed by trinitium, corresponds to the trinitatis unitas of Tertullian. It was less properly expressed by the Greek fathers by the word trias, a term which had been employed by certain Platonic philosophers, when they spoke of the many triads in the Deity, but was first introduced in application to the Christian doctrine by Theophilus of Antioch, in the second century. This Tertullian rendered into Latin by trinitas.

The doctrine of the Trinity is rejected by some because it is incomprehensible; but, as Dr. Scott observes, if distinct personality, agency, and divine perfections, be in Scripture ascribed to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit, no words can more exactly express the doctrine, which must unavoidably be thence inferred, that those commonly used on this subject, viz. that there are three distinct persons in the Unity of the Godhead. The sacred oracles most assuredly teach us, that the one living and true God is, in some inexplicable manner, trinitæ, for he is spoken of as one in some respects, and as three in others, Gen. 1: 26. 2: 6, 7. Isa. 48: 16. 34: 16. 2 Cor. 13: 14. John 14: 23. Matt. 28: 19. 2 Thess. 3: 3. Acts 5: 3, 4.

The Trinity of persons in the Deity consists with the Unity of the divine essence; though most Trinitarians pretend not to explain the modus of it, and deem those reprehensible who have attempted it; as the modus in which any being subsists, according to its distinct nature and known properties, is a secret to the most learned naturalists to this present day, and probably will always continue so. But if the most common of God's works, with which we are the most conversant, be in this respect incomprehensible, how can men think that the modus existendi (or manner of existence) of the infinite Creator can be level to their capacities?

The doctrine of the Trinity is indeed a mystery, but no man hath yet shown that it involves in it a real contradiction. Many have ventured to say, that it ought to be ranked with transubstantiation, as equally absurd. But archbishop Tillotson has shown, by the most convincing arguments imaginable, that transubstantiation includes the most palpable contradictions; and that we have the evidence of our eyes, feeling, and taste, that what we receive in the Lord's supper is bread, and not the body of a man; whereas we have the testimony of our eyes alone that the words, "This is my body," are at all in the Scriptures. Now this is intelligible to the meanest capacity; it is fairly made out and perfectly unanswerable; but who ever attempted thus to prove the doctrine of the Trinity to be self-contradictory? What testimony of our senses, or what demonstrated truth, does it contradict? Yet till this be shown, it is neither fair nor convincing to exclaim against it as contradictory, absurd, and irrational. See articles JESUS CHRIST, and HOLY GHOST; also Oneus, Watts, Jones, S. Braune, Fawcett, A. Taylor, J. Scott, Simpson, and Wesley's pieces on the subject; Abhædic on the Divinity of Christ; Sauria's Sermons; Bull's Defensio Fidei Nicæna; Dr. Alli's Testimonies of the Jewish Church; Display of the Trinity by a Layman; Scott's Essays; Priestley and Horsley; Wardlaw and Yates; Channing and Stuart on the Trinitarian Controversy; Hall's Thoughts on the Trinity; Dean Milner's do.; Worcester's Sermon on the Practical Uses of the Doctrine; Kidd on the Trinity; Norton's Reasons; Cheever's Review of Norton; Winslow on the Trinity; Fuller's Works; Works of Robert Hall; Morris' Life of Hall; Benedict's History of all Religions.—*Hend. TRITHEISTS; a sect of the sixth century, whose chief was John Ascanage, a Syrian philosopher, and at the same time a Monophysite. This man imagined in the Deity three natures or substances absolutely equal in all respects, and joined together by no common essence; to which opinion his adversaries gave the name of Tritheism. One of the warmest defenders of this doctrine was John Philoponus, an Alexandrian philosopher and grammarian of the highest reputation; and hence he has been considered by many as the author of this sect, whose members have consequently derived from him the title of Philoponists.—Hend. Buck.

TRUMPET, MILITARY. The Hebrews, under the direction of inspired prophets, celebrated their victories by triumphal processions, the women and children dancing, and playing upon musical instruments, and singing hymns and songs of triumph to the living and true God. The song of Moses at the Red sea, which was sung by Miriam and the women of Israel to the dulcet beat of the timbrel, is a majestic example of the triumphal hymns of the ancient Hebrews.

The Roman conquerors used to carry branches of palm in their hands when they went in triumph to the capitol; and sometimes wore the toga palmata, a garment with the figures of palm-trees upon it, which were interwoven in the fabric. In the same triumphant attitude, the apostle John beheld in vision those who had overcome by the blood of the Lamb, standing "before the throne, clothed with robes, and palms in their hands," Rev. 7: 9. The highest military honor which could be obtained in the Roman state, was a triumph, or solemn procession, in which a victorious general and his army advanced through the city to the capitol. He set out from the Campus Martius, and proceeded along the Via Triumphalis, and from thence through the most public places of the city. The streets were strewn with flowers, and the altars smoked with incense. First went a numerous band of music, singing and playing triumphal songs; next were led the oxen to be sacrificed, having their horns gilt, and their heads adorned with fillets and garlands; then, in carriages, were brought the spoils taken from the enemy; also golden crowns sent by the allied and tributary states. The titles of the vanquished nations were inscribed on wooden frames; and images or representations of the conquered countries and cities were exhibited. The captive leaders followed in chains, with their children and attendants; after the captives came the victors, having their faces wreathed with laurel, followed by a great company of musicians and dancers, dressed like satyrs, and wearing crowns of gold; in the midst of whom was a pantomime, clothed in a female garb, whose business it was, with his looks and gestures, to insult the vanquished; a long train of persons followed, carrying perfumes; (see SAVOR;) after them came the general, dressed in purple, embroidered with gold, with a crown of laurel on his head, a branch of laurel in his right hand, and in his left an ivory sceptre, with an eagle on the top, his face painted with vermilion, and a golden ball hanging from his neck on his breast; he stood upright in a gilded chariot, adorned with ivory, and drawn by four white horses, attended by his relations, and a great crowd of citizens, all in white. His children rode in the chariot along with him; his lieutenants and military tribunes, commonly by his side. After the general, followed the consuls and senators, on foot; and the whole procession was closed by the victorious army drawn up in order, crowned with laurel, and decorated with the gifts which they had received for their valor, singing their own and their general's praises. The triumphal procession was not confined to the Romans; the Greeks had a similar custom; for the conquerors used to make a procession through the middle of their city, crowned with garlands, repeating hymns and songs, and brandishing their spears; the captives followed in chains, and all their spoils were exposed to public view.

The great apostle of the Gentiles alludes to these splendid triumphal scenes in his epistle to the Ephesians, where he mentions the glorious ascension of his Redeemer into heaven: "When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men," Eph. 4: 8. Ps. 68: 17—19. Knowing the deep impression which such an allusion is calculated to make on the mind of a people familiarly acquainted with triumphal scenes, the apostle returns to it in his epistle to the Colossians, which was written about the same time: "Having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it," Col. 2: 15. After obtaining a complete victory over all his enemies, he ascended in splendor and triumph into his Father's presence on the clouds of heaven, the chariots of the Most High, thousands of holy angels attending in his train; he led the devil and all his angels, together with sin, the world, and death, as his spoils of war and captives in chains, and exposed them to open contempt and shame, in the view of all his angelic attendants, triumphing like a glorious conqueror over them, in virtue of his cross, upon which he made complete satisfaction for sin, and by his own strength, without the assistance of any creature, destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the devil. And as mighty princes were accustomed to scatter largesses among the people, and reward their companions in arms with a liberal hand, when, laden with the spoils of vanquished nations, they returned in triumph to their capital; so the Conqueror of death and hell, when he ascended far above all heavens and sat down in the midst of the throne, shed forth blessings of his grace and Holy Spirit upon people of every tongue and of every nation.—Watson.

TROAS; a city of Phrygia, or of Mysia, upon the Hellespont, having the old city of Troy to the north, and that of Assos to the south. Sometimes the name of Troas is put for the province wherein the city of Troy stood; Acts 20: 5, 6. 2 Cor. 2: 14. 2 Tim. 4: 13.—Watson.

TROSSE, (GEORGE,) was born in Exow, (England,) the 25th October, 1631. His early life was dissolute; but, at the age of thirty-five, he was converted, and was solemnly set apart to the work of the ministry, the blessed functions of which office he performed for upwards of twenty years, in the midst of the most violent persecution. He was a man of great abilities, natural and acquired.—Middleton, vol. iv. p. 172.

TRUCE OF GOD; a scheme set on foot for the purpose of quelling the violence and preventing the frequency of private wars, occasioned by the fierce spirit of the barbarians in the middle ages. In France, a general peace and cessation from hostilities took place, A. D. 1032, and continued for seven years, in consequence of the methods which the bishop of Aquitaine successfully employed to work upon the superstition of the times. A resolution was formed, that no man should in time to come attack or molest his adversaries during the season set apart for celebrating the great festivals of the church, or from the evening of Thursday in each week to the morning of Monday in the week ensuing, the intervening days being consecrated as particularly holy; our Lord's passion having happened on one of those days and his resurrection on another. A change in the dispositions of men so sudden, and which proposed a resolution so unexpected, was considered as miraculous; and the respite from hostilities which followed upon it was called the truce of God. This cessation from hostilities during three complete days every week, allowed a considerable space for the passions of the antagonists to cool, and for the people to enjoy a respite from the calamities of war, and to take measures for their own security.—Hend. Buck.

TRUMBULL, (JOHN,) the author of M'Fingal, was born in Connecticut, in 1750, and was educated at Yale college, where he entered at a very early age. He made an early profession of piety. In 1772 he published the first part of his poem, the Progress of Dulness. In the following year, he was admitted to the bar in Connecticut, and, removing to Boston, continued his legal studies in the office of John Adams. He returned to his native state in 1774, and commenced practice at New Haven. The first part of M'Fingal was published at Philadelphia, in 1775; the poem was completed and published in 1782 at Hartford, where the author at that time lived. More than thirty editions of this work have been printed. In 1789 he was appointed state attorney for the county of Hartford, and in 1801 was appointed a judge of the superior court of errors, and held this appointment till 1819. In 1820 a collection of his poems was published, in two volumes octavo. In 1825 he removed to Detroit, where he died, enjoying the consolations of Christian faith, in May, 1831.—Davenport; Allen.

TRUMBULL, (BENJAMIN, D. D. ;) an historian, minister of North Haven, Connecticut. He was a native of Hebron, and lived long in the family of Dr. Wheelock. He graduated at Yale college in 1759; was ordained December 25, 1760; and died February 2, 1820, aged eighty-five. His historical works are valuable. He published Essays in favor of the claim of Connecticut to the Susquehanna country, in the Journal, 1774; Sermon at a thanksgiving, 1783; a Treatise on Divorces, 1788; at the ordination of Mr. Holt, 1789; a Century Sermon, 1801; Address on Prayer and Family Religion, 1804; Twelve Discourses on the Divine Origin of the Scriptures; History of Connecticut, vol. i. octavo, 1797; vol. ii. 1818; History of the United States, to 1765, vol. i. 1819.—Allen.

TRUMPET. (See Music.)

TRUST IN GOD, signifies that confidence in, or dependence we place on him. This trust ought to be, 1. Sincere and unreserved, not in idols, in men, in talents, riches, power, in ourselves part, and him part, Prov. 3: 5, 6. 2. Universal; body, soul, circumstances, 1 Pet. 5: 7.

3. Perpetual, Isa. 26: 4. 4. With a lively expectation of his blessing, Mic. 7: 7.

The encouragement we have to trust in him arises, 1. From his liberality, Rom. 8: 32. Ps. 84: 11. 2. His ability, James 1: 17. 3. His relationship, Ps. 103: 13. 4. His promise, Isa. 33: 16. 5. His conduct in all ages to those who have trusted him, Gen. 48: 15, 16. Ps. 37: 25.

The happiness of those who trust in him is great, if we consider, 1. Their safety, Ps. 125: 1. 2. Their courage, Ps. 27: 1. 3. Their peace, Isa. 26: 3. 4. Their character and fruitfulness, Ps. 1: 3. 5. Their end, Ps. 37: 37. Job 5: 26. Gill's Divinity; Newton's Works.—Hend. Buck.

TRUTH; a term used in opposition to falsehood, and applied to propositions which answer or accord to the nature and reality of the thing whereof something is affirmed or denied. Natural or physical truth is said to be the agreement of our sentiments with the nature of things. Moral truth is the conformity of our words and actions to our sentiments.

Evangelical or gospel truth is taken for Christ; the doctrines of the gospel; substance or reality, in opposition to the shadows and ceremonies of the law, John 1: 17. For this truth we ought to be sincere in seeking, zealous in defending, and active in propagating; highly to prize it, constantly to rejoice in it, and uniformly to be obedient to it.

The love of the truth is among the noblest characters of the Christian; and as genuine piety, wherever it prevails, will banish falsehood, so we find a real love of truth, the comparison of a man's conduct with the regulations of truth, and a conformity to those regulations, are always among the most desirable, the most favorable, and the most decisive proofs of genuine religion; which being itself a system of truth, delights in nothing more than in truth, whether of heart, discourse, or conduct. Of this the apostle John is an instance, who expresses to the lady Electa his delight at seeing her children walk in the truth. See LYING; SINCERITY; Tatham's Scale of Truth; Locke on the Understanding; Beattie on Truth; Dr. Stenmet's Sermon on propagating the Truth; Saurin's Sermons; Mrs. Opie's Illustrations of Lying; Mrs. Opie on Detraction; Dwight's Theology; and Fuller's Works.—Hend. Buck; Calmet.

TRYPHO; an eminent man, who was seized as a Christian and imprisoned at Nice, about A. D. 50, in company with another, named Respicus. They were soon after put to the rack, which they bore with admirable patience for three hours, and uttered the praises of the Almighty the whole time. They were then exposed naked to the severity of the open air, which benumbed all their limbs, as it was in the very depth of winter.—Fox.

TSCHIRNER, (HENRY THEOPHILUS), an eminent German theologian, and highly esteemed as a pulpit orator, was born in 1778, in the vicinity of Chemnitz; was professor of theology at Wittenberg; and died February 17, 1828. He wrote the Fall of Paganism; Christian Apologetics; a Treatise on Catholicism and Protestantism. considered in a political point of view; the System of Reaction; and other works.—Davenport.

TSCHORNABOLTSI; a Russian sect, the members of which refuse to take an oath, hold it unlawful to shave the beard, and do not pray for the emperor and imperial family according to the prescribed form. They have many things in common with the other sects, and believe that the end of the world is at hand.—Hend. Buck.

TUBAL; fifth son of Japhet, who is commonly united with Meshech; whence it is thought that they peopled countries bordering on each other. Bochart is very copious to prove, that by Meshech and Tubal are intended the Muscovites and the Tibarenians.—Calmet.

TUBAL-CAIN; son of Lamech, the bigamist, and of Zillah, Gen. 4: 22. Scripture calls him the father, that is, inventor, or master, of the art of forging and managing iron, and of making all kinds of iron-work. It has been thought that he gave occasion to the Vulcan of the heathen.—Calmet.

TUCKER, (ABRAHAM), a metaphysical writer, born in 1705, in London, was the son of a merchant, and was educated at Bishop Stortford school, and Merton college, Oxford. He studied for a while at the Inner Temple, but was not called to the bar. He died in 1771. His great work is the Light of Nature pursued, in seven volumes, octavo, of which the first half was published by himself, under the fictitious name of Edward Search.—Davenport.

TUCKER, (JOSIAH), an acute writer on politics and political economy, was born in 1712, at Laugharn, in Caermarthenshire; was educated at St. John's college, Oxford; and was, successively, curate of All Saints, Bristol, rector of St. Stephens, in the same city, minor canon and prebendary in the cathedral, and dean of Gloucester. During the American war he published many pamphlets, and strenuously recommended the separation of the colonies from the mother country. In his Treatise on Civil Government he controverts the doctrines of Locke. He died in 1799. Among his works are, Sermons; Elements of Commerce; and an Apology for the Church of England.—Davenport.

TURLUPINS; a denomination which appeared about the year 1372, principally in Savoy and Dauphiny. They taught that when a man is arrived at a certain state of perfection, he is freed from all subjection to the divine law. It is said they often went naked, and they allowed of no prayer to God but mental. These however are the reports of their enemies. They called themselves the fraternity of the poor.—Hend. Buck.

TURTLE; (tur, trugōn, Gen. 14: 9. Lev. 1: 14. 5: 7, 11. 12: 6, 8. 14: 22, 30. 15: 14, 29. Num. 6: 10. Ps. 74: 19. Cant. 2: 12. Jer. 8: 7; trugōn, Luke 2: 24.) We have the authority of the Septuagint, the Targum, and of all the ancient interpreters, for understanding this of the turtle, or turtle-dove. Indeed, it is one of those evident instances in which the name of the bird is by onomatopæia formed from its note or cry.

The turtle is mentioned among migratory birds by Jeremiah, (8: 7.) and in this sense differs from the rest of its family, which are all stationary. The fact to which the prophet alludes is attested by Aristotle in these words: "The pigeon and the dove are always present, but the turtle only in summer; that bird is not seen in winter." And in another part of his work, he asserts that the dove remains, while the turtle migrates. Varro, and other ancient writers, make the like statement. Thus Solomon (Cant. 2: 12.) mentions the return of this bird as one of the indications of spring: "The voice of the turtle is heard in the land." (See DOVE).—Watson.

TWISSE, (WILLIAM, D. D.); a learned and laborious divine of the English church. About the year 1604, after having spent sixteen years at Oxford, in the study of logic, philosophy, and divinity, he entered into holy orders, and became a diligent and successful preacher. He did not seek after riches or preferment, but modestly refused them when offered; preferring the enjoyment of a small estate, while his fame was great abroad in all the reformed churches, to a court life. In the beginning of the year 1643, the parliament, designing to reform ecclesiastical affairs, called an assembly of learned divines to advise and assist them thereto; who, when convened, unanimously chose Dr. Twisse to be the prolocutor, in which laborious office he continued till his last sickness. He was particularly celebrated for his writings against the Arminians.—Middleton, vol. iii. p. 160.

TYCHICUS; a disciple employed by the apostle Paul to carry his letters to several churches. He was of the province of Asia, and accompanied Paul in his journey from Corinth to Jerusalem, Acts 20: 4. He carried the epistle to the Colossians, that to the Ephesians, and the first to Timothy. The apostle calls him his dear brother, a faithful minister of the Lord, and his companion in the service of God; (Eph. 6: 21, 22. Col. 4: 7, 8.) and had intentions of sending him into Crete, to reside there in the absence of Titus, Tit. 3: 12. It is thought also, that he was sent to Ephesus, while Timothy was at Rome, when he carried a letter to the Ephesians from this apostle. The Greeks make him one of the seventy, and bishop of Colophon in the province of Asia.—Calmet.

TYPE. This word is not frequently used in our version of Scripture; but what it signifies is very frequently implied. We usually consider a type as an example, pattern, or general similitude to a person, event, or thing which is to come : and in this it differs from a representation, memorial, or commemoration of an event, &c., which is past. The Spirit of God has adopted a variety of means to indicate his perfect foreknowledge of all events, and his power to control them. This is sometimes declared by express verbal prophecy ; sometimes by specific actions performed by divine command ; and sometimes by those peculiar events in the lives of individuals, and the history or religious observances of the Israelites, which were caused to bear a designed reference to some parts of the gospel history.

The main point, says Chevallier, in an inquiry into these historical types, is to establish the fact of a preconceived connexion between the two series of events. No similarity, in itself, is sufficient to prove such a correspondence. Even those recorded in Scripture are recorded under very different circumstances. If the first event be declared to be typical, at the same time when it occurs, and the second correspond with the prediction so delivered, there can be no doubt that the correspondence was designed. If, before the occurrence of the second event, there be delivered a distinct prophecy that it will happen, and will correspond with some previous event, the fulfilment of the prophecy furnishes an intrinsic proof, that the person who gave it spake by divine inspiration. It may not, from this fact, follow, that the two events were connected by a design formed before either of them occurred ; but it certainly does follow, that the second event, in some measure, had respect to the first ; and that whatever degree of connexion was, by such a prophet, assumed to exist, did really exist. If, again, no specific declaration be made respecting the typical character of any event or person until after the second event has occurred, which is then declared to have been prefigured, the fact of preconceived connexion will rest solely upon the authority of the person who advances the assertion. But, if we know, from other sources, that his words are the words of truth, our only inquiry will be, if he either distinctly asserts, or plainly infers, the existence of a designed correspondence. The fact, then, of a preconceived connexion between two series of events, is capable of being established in three ways ; and the historical types may be accordingly arranged in three principal divisions. Some of them afford intrinsic evidence, that the Scriptures, which record them, are given by inspiration of God ; the others can be proved to exist only by assuming that fact : but all, when once established, display the astonishing power and wisdom of God ; and the importance of that scheme of redemption, which was ushered into the world with such magnificent preparations.

In contemplating this wonderful system, we discern one great intention interwoven, not only into the verbal prophecies and extraordinary events of the history of the Israelites, but into the ordinary transactions of the lives of selected individuals, even from the creation of the world. Adam was "the figure of him that was to come," Rom. 5: 14. Melchizedek was "made like unto the Son of God," Heb. 7: 3. Abraham, in the course of events in which he was engaged by the especial command of Heaven, was enabled to see Christ's day, (John 8: 56.) and Isaac was received from the dead "in a figure," Heb. 11: 19. At a later period, the paschal lamb was ordained to be sacrificed, not only as a memorial of the immediate deliverance which it was instituted to procure and to commemorate, but also as a continued memorial of that which was to be "fulfilled in the kingdom of God," Luke 22: 16. Moses was raised up to deliver the people of Israel ; to be to them a lawgiver, a prophet, a priest ; and to possess the regal authority, if not the title of king. But, during the early period of his life, he was himself taught, that one great prophet should be raised up like unto him ; before his death he delivered the same prophecy to the people ; and, after that event, the Israelites continually looked for that faithful prophet, who should return answer to their inquiries, 1 Macc. 4: 46. 14: 41. Their prophets all pointed to some greater lawgiver, who should introduce a new law into their hearts, and inscribe them upon their minds, Jer. 31: 33. Besides, their religious ordinances were only "a figure for the time then present," Heb. 8: 5. 9: 9. The illustration, then, to be derived from the historical types of the Old Testament, is found diffused over the whole period which extends from the creation of the world to the time when vision and prophecy were sealed. And all the light which emanates from so many various points, is concentrated in the person of Christ.—Watson ; Hend. Buck ; M'Ever on the Types.

TYRE, or TYRUS, was a famous city of Phœnicia. Its Hebrew name signifies a rock. The city of Tyre was allotted to the tribe of Asher, (Josh. 19: 29.) with the other maritime cities of the same coast ; but it does not appear that the Asherites ever drove out the Canaanites. Isaiah (23: 12.) calls Tyre the daughter of Sidon, that is, a colony from it. Homer never speaks of Tyre, but only of Sidon. Josephus says, that Tyre was built not above two hundred and forty years before the temple of Solomon ; which would be in A. M. 2760, two hundred years after Joshua.

Tyre was twofold, insular and continental. Insular Tyre was certainly the most ancient ; for this it was which was noticed by Joshua : the continental city, however, as being more commodiously situated, first grew into consideration, and assumed the name of Palætyrus, or Old Tyre. Want of sufficient attention to this distinction, has embarrassed both the Tyrian chronology and geography. Insular Tyre was confined to a small rocky island, eight hundred paces long, and four hundred broad, and could never exceed two miles in circumference. But Tyre, on the opposite coast, about half a mile from the sea, was a city of vast extent, since, many centuries after its demolition by Nebuchadnezzar, the scattered ruins measured nineteen miles round, as we learn from Pliny and Strabo. Of these, the most curious and surprising are the cisterns of Roseleyan, designed to supply the city with water ; of which there are three still entire, about one or two furlongs from the sea, so well described by Maundrell, for their curious construction and solid masonry. Old Tyre withstood the mighty Assyrian power, having been besieged in vain, by Shalmaneser, for five years ; although he cut off their supplies of water from the cisterns ; which they remedied by digging wells within the city. It afterwards held out thirteen years against Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, and was at length taken ; but not until the Tyrians had removed their effects to the insular town, and left nothing but the bare walls to the victor, which he demolished. What completed the destruction of the city was, that Alexander afterwards made use of these materials to build a prodigious causeway, or isthmus, above half a mile long, to the insular city, which revived, as the phœnix, from the ashes of the old, and grew to great power and opulence as a maritime state ; and which he stormed after a most obstinate siege of five months.

Pococke observes, that "there are no signs of the ancient city ; and as it is a sandy shore, the face of every thing is altered, and the great aqueduct is in many parts almost buried in the sand." Thus has been fulfilled the prophecy of Ezekiel : "Thou shalt be built no more : though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again," Ezek. 26: 21. The fate of insular Tyre has been no less remarkable. When Alexander stormed the city, he set fire to it. This circumstance was foretold. "Tyre did build herself a strong hold, and heaped up silver as the dust, and fine gold as the mire of the streets. Behold, the Lord will cast her out, and he will smite her power in the sea, and she shall be devoured with fire," Zech. 9: 3, 4. After this terrible calamity, Tyre again retrieved her losses. Only eighteen years after, she had recovered such a share of her ancient commerce and opulence, as enabled her to stand a siege of fourteen months against Antigonous, before he could reduce the city ; but after this, Tyre fell alternately under the dominion of the kings of Syria and Egypt, and then of the Romans, until it was taken by the Saracens, about A. D. 639, retaken by the crusaders, A. D. 1124, and at length sacked and razed by the Mamelukes of Egypt, with Sidon, and other strong towns, that they might no longer harbor the Christians, A. D. 1289.

The final desolation of Tyre was thus foretold : "I will scrape her dust from her, and make her like the top of a rock ; it shall be a place for the spreading of nets in the midst of the sea; for I have spoken it, saith the Lord God." "I will make thee like the top of a rock; thou shalt be a place to spread nets upon; thou shalt be built no more; for I the Lord have spoken it, saith the Lord God." Nothing can be more literally and astonishingly executed than this sentence. Maundrell, who visited the Holy Land, A. D. 1697, describes it thus: "This city, standing in the sea upon a peninsula, promises, at a distance, something very magnificent; but when you come to it, you find no similitude of that glory for which it was so renowned in ancient times, and which the prophet Ezekiel describes, 26, 27, 28. On the north side it has an old Turkish ungarrisoned castle; besides which, you see nothing here but a mere Babel of broken walls, pillars, vaults, &c.; there being not so much as one entire house left! Its present inhabitants are only a few poor wretches, harboring themselves in the vaults, and subsisting chiefly by fishing; who seem to be preserved in this place by divine Providence, as a visible argument how God has fulfilled his word concerning Tyre, namely, that it should be as the top of a rock; a place for fishers to dry their nets upon, Ezek. 26: 14." Keith's Evidence of Prophecy—Watson.

UBIQUITARIANS; (formed from ubique, "everywhere;") in ecclesiastical history, a sect of Lutherans which rose and spread itself in Germany; and whose distinguishing doctrine was, that the body of Jesus Christ is everywhere, or in every place.

Brentius, one of the earliest reformers, is said to have first broached this error in 1560. Luther himself, in his controversy with Zuinglius, had thrown out some unguarded expressions that seemed to imply a belief of the omnipresence of the body of Christ; but he became sensible afterwards that this opinion was attended with great difficulties, and particularly that it ought not to be made use of as a proof of Christ's corporeal presence in the eucharist. However, after the death of Luther, this absurd hypothesis was renewed, and dressed up in a specious and plausible form, by Brentius, Chemnitzius, and Andreas, who maintained the communication of the properties of Christ's divinity to his human nature. It is, indeed, obvious that every Lutheran who believes the doctrine of consubstantiation, whatever he may pretend, must be an Ubiquitarian.—Hend. Buck.

UBIQUITY; omnipresence; an attribute of the Deity, whereby he is always intimately present to all things. (See OMNISCIENCE.)—Hend. Buck.

UCKEWALLISTS; a sect which derived its denomination from Ucke Wallas, a native of Friesland, who published his sentiments in 1637. He entertained a favorable opinion of the eternal state of Judas, and the rest of Christ's murderers. His argument was this: that the period of time which extended from the birth of Christ to the descent of the Holy Ghost, was a time of deep ignorance, during which the Jews were destitute of divine light; and that, of consequence, the sins and enormities which were committed during this interval were in a great measure excusable, and could not merit the severest displays of the divine justice. This denomination strictly adhered to the doctrine of the Mennonites.—Hend. Buck.

USTHAZANS; an aged eunuch, who suffered martyrdom in the latter part of the fourth century, during the persecutions of the Christians under Sapores.—Fox.

ULAI; a river which runs by the city Shushan, in Persia, Dan. 8: 2, 16. (See SAUSHAN.)

ULPHILAS, or WULFILAS; a Gothic bishop, who flourished about the middle of the fourth century. He was deputed by the Goths, in 377, to obtain leave from the emperor Valens to settle in one of the Roman provinces. His decease is supposed to have taken place in the following year. He translated the gospels, and some other parts of the Scriptures, into the Gothic language.—Davenport.

ULRICK; professor of ethics, and minister of the orphan house at Zurich, in Switzerland; born in the year 1683, and died the 25th of May, 1731. He was a pious preacher, and author of several valuable works.—Midleton.

UNBELIEF; the refusing assent to testimony. It is often taken for distrust of God's faithfulness, but more particularly for the discrediting the testimony of God's word concerning his Son, John 3: 18, 19. 16: 9. "It includes," says Dr. Guise, "disaffection to God, disregard to his word, prejudices against the Redeemer, readiness to give credit to any other than him, inordinate love to the world, and preferring of the applause of men to the approbation of God."—"Unbelief," says the great Charnock, "is the greatest sin, as it is the foundation of all sin; it was Adam's first sin; it is a sin against the gospel, against the highest testimony; a refusal to accept of Christ upon the terms of the gospel. It strikes peculiarly at God; is the greatest reproach of him, robs him of his glory, is a contradiction to his will, and a contempt of his authority." The causes of unbelief are Satan, ignorance, pride, and sensuality. The danger of it is great; it hardens the heart, fills with presumption, creates impatience, deceives with error, and finally exposes to condemnation, John 3: 11. Charnock's Works, vol. ii. p. 601; Case's Sermons, ser. 2; Bishop Porteus's Sermons, vol. i. ser. 2; Dr. Owen's Reasons of Faith; Hannam's Compendium, vol. ii. p. 26; Churchill's Essay on Unbelief; Fuller's Works; Wardlaw on Unbelief; Erskine on Faith; Dwight's Theol.—Hend. Buck.

UNBELIEVERS are of three sorts.—1. Those who, having heard the gospel, reject it.—2. Those who verbally assent to it, yet know not to what they assent, or why they believe.—3. They who, whatever knowledge they may have of certain speculative points of divinity, yet obey not the truth, but live in sin. (See INFIDELITY.)

The following is a striking description, given by Massillon, of an unbeliever: (ser. i. vol. iii. Engl. trans.) "He is a man without morals, probity, faith, or character; who owns no rule but his passions, no law but his iniquitous thoughts, no master but his desires, no check but the dread of authority, no God but himself; an unnatural child, since he believes that chance alone hath given him fathers; a faithless friend, seeing he looks upon men merely as the wretched fruits of a wild and fortuitous concurrence, to whom he is connected only by transitory ties; a cruel master, seeing he is convinced that the strongest and the most fortunate have always reason on their side. Who could henceforth place any dependence on such? They no longer fear a God; they no longer respect men; they look forward to nothing after this life: virtue and vice are merely prejudices of education in their eyes, and the consequences of popular credulity. Adulteries, revenge, blasphemies, the blackest treacheries, abominations which we dare not even name, are no longer in their opinion but human prohibitions established through the policy of legislators. According to them the most horrible crimes or the purest virtues are all equally the same, since an eternal annihilation shall soon equalize the just and the impious, and forever confound them both in the dreary mansion of the tomb. What monsters, then, must such be upon the earth!"—Hend. Buck.

UNCHANGABLENESS OF GOD. (See FAITHFULNESS AND IMMUTABILITY OF GOD.)

UNCLEANNESS is either physical; (Matt. 23: 27.) or ceremonial; (Lev. 15: 31.) or moral, i. e. all kinds of sin; (Ezek. 36: 29.) and particularly all the various forms of lewdness, which marriage was ordained to prevent, Eph. 5: 3. Col. 3: 5. 2 Pet. 2: 10. 1 Cor. 7: 2.—Brown; Jones; Dwight's Theology; Sandeman on Marriage.

UNCTION, in matters of religion, is used for the character conferred on sacred things by anointing them with oil. Unctions were very frequent among the Hebrews. They anointed both their kings and high-priests at the ceremony of their inauguration. They also anointed the sacred vessels of the tabernacle and temple, to sanctify and consecrate them to the service of God.

Extreme unction, or the anointing persons in the article of death, the Romish church has advanced to the dignity of a sacrament. It is administered to none but such as are affected with some mortal disease, or in a decrepit age. It is refused to impenitent persons, as also to criminals. The parts to be anointed are, the eyes, the ears, the nostrils, the mouth, the hands, the feet, and the reins. The laity are anointed in the palms of the hands, but priests on the back of them, because the palms of their hands have been already consecrated by ordination.

The passage in St. James respecting the anointing with oil, has been a source of difficulty to some pious minds; but, in order to understand it, it is necessary to observe, that anointing with oil was an ordinance for the miraculous cure of sick persons, Mark 6: 13. But since those extraordinary gifts are ceased, as being no longer necessary for the confirmation of the gospel, of course there is no warrant now for using that ceremony.—Hend. Buck.

UNCTION, in preaching, is that insinuating tenderness of spirit, that sweet, affectionate, and winning mode of address, which impregnates the soul with feelings of sacred delight, and soothes and draws it into a ready compliance with the divine will. It derives its name from its being supposed to flow from a peculiar influence of the Holy Spirit on the heart, 1 John 2: 20. Blair's Lectures; Works of Robert Hall.—Hend. Buck.

UNDER; (1.) Beneath in respect to place; so things on the earth are under the sun, under the heavens, Judg. 1: 7. Deut. 4: 11. (2.) Beneath, in respect of condition, state, power, authority. Hence we read of being under foot, Rom. 16: 20. Under sin, under the law, under grace, under the curse; i. e. under the impression, influence, and reign thereof, Rom. 3: 9, 6: 14. Men are under God when subject to his laws, Hos. 4: 13. (3.) Beneath, in respect of protection; thus the saints are under the shadow, feathers, or wings of God in Christ, Sol. Song 2: 3. Matt. 23: 37. Ps. 90: 1—3. (4.) Beneath, in respect of effectual support; so the arms of God and Christ are under his people to uphold them under every burden, Sol. Song 8: 3. Deut. 33: 27. (5.) Ready to be brought forth; so good and bad language is under the tongue when in the heart and ready to be uttered, Sol. Song 4: 11. Ps. 140: 3.—Brown.

UNDERGIRD. To undergird a ship is to bind her round with ropes, that she may not be torn asunder, Acts 27: 17.—Brown.

UNDERSTANDING; the faculty of perceiving things distinctly, or that power of the mind by which we arrive at a proper idea or judgment of things. (See JUDGMENT; MIND; SOUL.)

A people of no understanding are persons ignorant, and unwilling to learn, Isa. 27: 11. My understanding is unfruitful; what I say, however sensible and well understood by me, is useless to others, if I speak in an unknown tongue, 1 Cor. 14: 14. To love God with the understanding or mind is to love him judiciously from a real and spiritual knowledge of his excellence and kindness, Mark 12: 33. A fool hath no delight in understanding, but that his heart may discover itself; he is not earnest and diligent in the study of solid knowledge and wisdom; but his great study and pleasure is to vent his own foolishness, being slow to hear and swift to speak, Prov. 18: 2.—Hend. Buck; Brown.

UNGODLINESS; wickedness in general; but it particularly comprehends all sins against the first table of the law, as ignorance, atheism, idolatry, superstition, blasphemy, neglect of the worship of God, &c. Tit. 2: 11.—Brown.

UNHOLY; (1.) Common, as the blood of a beast unsanctified. Men so account of Christ's blood when they look on him as an impostor, or plead his righteousness to encourage them in sinful practices, Heb. 10: 29. (2.) Not sanctified according to the ceremonial law, Lev. 10: 10. (3.) Without renewing grace, wicked, 2 Tim. 3: 2.—Brown.

UNICORN; (Heb. reem;) Num. 23: 22. 24: 8. Deut. 23: 17. Job 39: 9, 10. Ps. 22: 21. 29: 6. 92: 10. Isa. 34: 7. The derivation of the word, both in Hebrew and Ethiopic, says Mr. Bruce, seems to be from erectness or standing straight. This is certainly no particular quality in the animal itself, who is not more, or even so much erect as many other quadrupeds, for its knees are rather crooked; but it is from the circumstance and manner in which his horn is placed. The horns of all other animals are inclined to some degree of parallelism with the nose, or os frontis. The horn of the rhinoceros alone is erect or perpendicular to this bone, on which it stands at right angles; thereby possessing a greater purchase or power, as a lever, than any horn could possibly have in any other position.

This situation of the horn is very happily alluded to in the sacred writings: "My horn shalt thou exalt like the horn of the reem," Ps. 92: 10. And the horn here alluded to is not wholly figurative, but was really an ornament worn by great men in the days of victory, preference, or rejoicing, when they were anointed with new, sweet, or fresh oil: a circumstance which David joins with that of erecting the horn.

It is difficult to imagine why some writers have been induced to consider the unicorn as being of the deer or antelope kind, since this is of a genus whose very character is fear and weakness, quite opposite, as Mr. Bruce remarks, to the qualities by which the REEM is described in Scripture. Besides, it is plain that the reem is not of the class of clean quadrupeds; and a late modern traveller very whimsically takes him for the leviathan, which certainly was a fish. Balaam, a native of Midian, and so in the neighborhood of the haunts of the rhinoceros, and intimately connected with Ethiopia, (for they themselves were shepherds of that country,) in a transport, from contemplating the strength of Israel, whom he was brought to curse, says, they had as it were "the strength of the reem," Num. 23: 22. Job makes frequent allusions to his great strength, ferocity, and indolence, ch. 39: 9, 10. He asks, "Will the reem be willing to serve thee, or to abide at thy crib?" That is, Will he willingly come into thy stable, and eat out of thy manger? and again: "Canst thou bind the reem with a band in the furrow, and will he harrow the valleys after thee?" In other words, Canst thou make him to go in the plough or harrow?

The principal reason for translating the word reem, unicorn, and not rhinoceros, is from a prejudice that he must have but one horn. But this is by no means so well founded, as to be admitted an argument for establishing the existence of an animal which never has appeared after the search of so many ages. Scripture, as we have seen, speaks of the horns of the unicorn; so that, even from this circumstance, the reem may be the rhinoceros, as the Asiatic and part of the African rhinoceros may be the unicorn.

In addition to these particulars, Mr. Bruce informs us, that the rhinoceros does not eat hay or grass, but lives entirely upon trees; he does not spare the most thorny ones, but rather seems to be fond of them; and it is not a small branch that can escape his hunger, for he has the strongest jaws of any creature known, and best adapted to grinding or bruising any thing that makes resistance. But, besides the trees capable of most resistance, there are in the vast forests which he inhabits, trees of a softer consistence, and of a very succulent quality, which seem to be destined for his principal food. For the purpose of gaining the highest branches of these, his upper lip is capable of being lengthened out, so as to increase his power of laying hold with this, in the same manner as the elephant does with his trunk. With this lip, and the assistance of his tongue, he pulls down the upper branches, which have most leaves, and these he devours first; having stripped the tree of its branches, he does not therefore abandon it, but placing his snout as low in the trunk as he finds his horn will enter, he rips up the body of the tree, and reduces it to thin pieces, like so many laths; and when he has thus prepared it, he embraces as much of it as he can in his monstrous jaws, and twists it with as much ease as an ox would a root of celery.

Such is the description which this intelligent writer gives of the animal he supposes to be the reem of the sacred writers; and the objections urged against his opinion possess very little weight. Those who desire to see them examined and refuted, may find it done in the Natural History of the Fragments to Calmet.

Next to the elephant, the rhinoceros is said to be the most powerful of animals. It is usually found twelve feet long, from the tip of the nose to the insertion of the tail; from six to seven feet high; and the circumference of its body is nearly equal to its length. It is, therefore, equal to the elephant in bulk; and the reason of its appearing so much smaller to the eye than that animal, is, that its legs are much shorter. Words, says Goldsmith, can convey but a very confused idea of this animal's shape; and yet there are few so remarkably formed. But for its horn, which we have already described, its head would have the appearance of that part of a hog. The skin of the rhinoceros is naked, rough, knotty, and lying upon the body in folds, in a very peculiar manner; the skin, which is of a dirty brown color, is so thick as to turn the edge of a scimitar, and to resist a musket-ball.

Such is the general description of an animal that appears chiefly formidable from the horn growing from its snout; and formed rather for war, than with a propensity to engage. The elephant, the boar, and the buffalo, are obliged to strike transversely with their weapon; but the rhinoceros, from the situation of his horn, employs all his force with every blow; so that the tiger will more willingly attack any other animal of the forest than one whose strength is so justly employed. Indeed, there is no force which this terrible animal has to apprehend; defended on every side by a thick horny hide, which the claws of the lion or the tiger are unable to pierce, and armed before with a weapon that the elephant does not choose to oppose. Travellers have assured us that the elephant is often found dead in the forests, pierced with the horn of a rhinoceros.—Calmet; Watson; Harris; Carpenter; Dr. J. M. Good on Job.—Abbott.

UNIFORMITY; regularity; a similitude or resemblance between the parts of a whole. The word is particularly used for one and the same form of public prayers, administration of sacraments, and other rites, &c., of the church of England, prescribed by the famous stat. 1 Eliz., and 13, 14 Carol. II. cap. 4, called the Act of Uniformity.—Hend. Buck.

UNIGENITUS, THE BULL; the instrument issued by pope Clement XI. in 1713, against the French translation of the New Testament, with notes, by Pasquier Quesnel, priest of the Oratory, and a celebrated Jansenist. The book, having occasioned considerable disputes, had already been condemned by the court of Rome, in 1708; but this step being found ineffectual, Clement, who had privately spoken of it in terms of rapture, declaring it to be an excellent book, and one which no person resident at Rome was capable of writing, proceeded to condemn one hundred and one propositions of the notes; such as—Grace, the effectual principle of all good works; faith, the first and fountain of all the graces of a Christian; the Scriptures should be read by all, &c. This bull, procured by Louis and the Jesuits, occasioned terrible commotions in France. Forty Gallican bishops accepted it; but it was opposed by many others, especially by Noailles, archbishop of Paris. Many of the prelates, and other persons eminent for piety and learning, appealed on the subject from the papal authority to that of a general council, but in vain. A persecution was raised against those who espoused the principles of Quesnel, and many of them were obliged to flee their country. By these means the interests of the Romish church were greatly injured. Not only did they confirm Protestants in their separation from her communion, but they strengthened the party of the Jansenists, and produced a sympathy in their favor on the part of numbers who had previously felt no interest in the dispute.—Hend. Buck.

UNION HYPOSTATICAL is the union of the human nature of Christ with the divine, constituting two natures in one person. Not substantially, as the three persons in the Godhead; nor physically, as soul and body united in one person; nor mystically, as is between Christ and believers; but so as that the manhood subsists in the second person, yet without making confusion, both making but one person. (See JESUS CHRIST.) It was miraculous, Luke 1: 31, 35. Complete and real: Christ took a real human body and soul, and not in appearance. Inseparable, Heb. 7: 25. (See INCARNATION.) For the reasons of this union, see article MEDIATOR.—Hend. Buck.

UNION TO CHRIST is considered, 1. As visible, consisting in outward profession of Christian faith, John 13: 2, 6. 2. Virtual, resting only in the divine purpose from eternity, Eph. 1: 4. 3. Vital or spiritual, formed in the moment of our regeneration, John 17: 26. 1 John 4: 13.

It is represented in the Scripture by the strongest expressions language can admit of, and even compared to the union between the Father and the Son, John 17: 11, 21, &c. It is also compared to the union of a vine and its branches, John 15: 4, 5. To the union of our food with our bodies, John 6: 56, 57. To the union of the body with the head, Eph. 4: 15, 16. To the conjugal union, Eph. 5: 23, 30. To the union of a king and his subjects, Matt. 25: 34, 40. To a building and its foundation, 1 Pet. 2: 4, 5. Eph. 2: 21, 22. It is also represented by an identity of spirit, 1 Cor. 6: 17. By an identity of body, 1 Cor. 12: 12, 27. By an identity of interest, Matt. 25: 40. John 20: 17.

This union must be considered not as a mere intellectual union only in opinions; nor a physical union, as between the head and the members; nor as an essential union, or union with the divine nature; but as a cordial spiritual union, Eph. 5: 32. Honorable union, 1 John 3: 1, 2. Supernatural union, 1 Cor. 1: 30. Holy, 1 John 3: 24. Necessary, John 15: 4. Inviolable, Rom. 8: 38, 39.

Some state it thus: 1. An union of natures, Heb. 2: 11. —2. Of actions, his obedience being imputed to us, and our sins reckoned to him, 2 Cor. 5: 21.—3. Of life, Col. 3: 4.—4. Of sentiment, 2 Cor. 5: 17.—5. Of interest, Matt. 25: 34, &c.—6. Of affection, 2 Cor. 5: 14.—7. Of residence, John 17: 21.

The advantages of it are knowledge, Eph. 1: 18. Fellowship, 1 Cor. 1: 9. Security, John 15. Felicity, 1 Pet. 1: 8. Spirituality; (John 15: 8.) and, indeed, all the rich communications of blessings here and hereafter, Col. 1: 22.

The evidences of union to Christ are, light in the understanding, 1 Pet. 2: 9. Affection to him, John 14: 21. Frequent communion with him, 1 John 1: 3. Delight in his word, ordinances, and people, Ps. 27: 4. 119. Submission to his will, and conformity to his image, 1 John 2: 5.—Dickinson's Letters, let. 17; Flavel's Method of Grace, ser. 2; Polhill on Union; Bronn's Compend., b. 5. ch. 1; Hall's Help to Zion's Travellers.—Hend. Buck.

UNITARIANS; a name assumed by those who confine the glory and attributes of divinity to the Father, and refuse them to the Son and Holy Spirit. As the unity of the Godhead is not distinctly a tenet of that body, but is held by Trinitarians as strenuously as by them, the legitimate use of the term has never been conceded to them. (See UNITY OF GOD, and TRINITY.) For a greater length of time, and more appositely, they have been called SOCINIANS, which see.—Hend. Buck.

UNITARIANS;* a class of religionists who hold to the personal unity of God, in opposition to the doctrine of the Christian Trinity.

The Unitarian faith appears first to have been avowed (after the Reformation) by Martin Cellarius, a native of Stuttgart, who was just finishing his studies at Wittenberg, where Luther was professor, when the latter began to set himself in opposition to the authority of the Roman Catholic church. Michael Servetus was burned for this heresy at Geneva, in 1553. In 1546, the same movement of opinion appeared in Italy. Several persons of rank and learning were put to death at Vicenza; the rest effected their escape, among whom was Lælius Sozzini, or the elder Socinus. His sentiments spread into different parts of Europe, especially in Poland. A large portion of the reformed clergy of Poland embraced his views as early as 1565, in which year they were separated from the communion of the Calvinists and Lutherans. In every part of the kingdom they had churches, and among their adherents were numbers of the principal nobility. The most accessible monument which remains of the abilities and erudition of their writers, is in the collection called Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum, in eight volumes folio. In the dispersion of the Polish Brethren, which followed the edict of 1660, some went to England, some to different states of Germany, some to Holland, (where the Bibliotheca, above mentioned, was published, and where before long they became merged in the body of Remonstrants,) and some to Transylvania. The Unitarian still remains one of the four communions recognised by the Austrian government of Transylvania. Their number is about fifty thousand. To mention no other names than those of Episcopus, Grotius, Le Clerc, and Wetstein, there has probably been always a large number of Unitarians among the Remonstrants of Holland. But they have been at all times a depressed sect.

Unitarianism in England dates almost as far back as the earliest translation of the Bible. Strype, in his Memoirs of Archbishop Cranmer, says, "There were other heresies now (1548) vented abroad, as the denial of the Trinity, and the Deity of the Holy Ghost;" and, two years after, the same writer reports, "Arianism now showed itself so openly, and was in such danger of spreading farther, that it was thought necessary to suppress it by using more rugged methods than seemed agreeable to the merciful principles of the profession of the gospel." In Cromwell's time they seem generally to have had milder treatment. Bidle, their leader, was at last, however, thrown by the Protector into prison, where he died in 1662. (See BIDDLE.) Milton (as appears from his posthumous work published in 1825) adopted their sentiments. (See MILTON.) In the latter part of the seventeenth and the beginning of the eighteenth century, besides other names of the first distinction, their claim to which is disputed, we find among avowed English Unitarians those of Firmin, Emlin, Whiston, Samuel Clarke, and Lardner; and to go higher, of Locke and Newton. (See those articles.) Towards the close of the last century, several clergymen of the establishment (Lindsey, Jebb, Wakefield, Disney, and others, which see) resigned their benefices, in consequence of having adopted Unitarian views, while at the same time, among numerous converts from the dissenting sects, appeared the names of Drs. Priestley, Price, Aikin, Rees, and others of scientific and literary note. Of the Old Connexion of General Baptists, a majority are acknowledged Unitarians. The Presbyterian churches, also, throughout England, are understood to be, with scarcely an exception, occupied by congregations of this sort. Their number is reckoned at more than two hundred.

In the north of Ireland, the Unitarians compose several presbyteries. There are also congregations of this character in Dublin, and in other southern cities of the kingdom. In Scotland there are Unitarian chapels in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and other principal places.

Among the leading periodical publications devoted to this cause in Great Britain, are the Monthly Repository, printed in London; the Christian Reformer and Reflector, at Liverpool; and the Christian Pioneer, at Glasgow. There is a Scottish Unitarian association lately formed; and the British and Foreign Unitarian association, meeting annually at London, serves for a bond of union for the professors of the belief throughout the three kingdoms. The principal supply of ministers is from Manchester college, at York; others come from the Scotch universities, and from that of Dublin.

In British India, a native society of Unitarian Christians has existed for several years at Madras. But a much more remarkable development of opinion of this kind occurred at Calcutta, in the case of the distinguished Bramin, Rammohun Roy. (See Appendix, RAMMOHUN ROY.)

As early as 1690, some English ministers complained to a synod convened at Amsterdam of the growing heterodoxy of the Genevan church. Now the twenty-seven pastors of the established church of the canton are understood, with two or three exceptions, to hold Unitarian opinions.

In France, many of the Protestant clergy reject the Trinitarian scheme of Christian doctrine. The tone of their principal publication, the Revue Protestante, is hostile to it; and the principal sources of supply for the ministry of the French churches are the schools of Geneva and Montauban, where the Unitarian system has ascendancy. A society was formed in 1831, called the Unitarian Association in France.

In America, Unitarian opinions appear (president Adams' letter to Dr. Morse) to have been extensively adopted in Massachusetts as early as the middle of the last century.

In 1756, Emlin's Humble Inquiry into the Scripture Account of Jesus Christ was published in Boston, chiefly, it is said, by the agency of Dr. Mayhew, of the West church, and came into wide circulation. In 1785 one of the three Episcopal churches of the city adopted a liturgy excluding the recognition of the Trinity. In 1805, attention was extensively drawn to the subject by several publications, occasioned by the appointment of a distinguished Unitarian to the divinity chair of the university of Cambridge. In 1816, the controversy was revived by a re-publication, in this country, of a chapter from Mr. Belsham's Life of Lindsey, with the title American Unitarianism. Up to this time, the doctrine had been hardly discussed out of New England, though a small society, dating from the visit of Dr. Priestley in 1794, existed in Philadelphia. In 1819, a congregation was gathered in Baltimore; and others now exist in New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Charleston, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, and other principal cities of the Union. The number of churches organized according to the Congregational form is reckoned at from one hundred and seventy to two hundred. Their ministers are chiefly furnished from the divinity college of the university of Cambridge, in Massachusetts.

Unitarians profess to derive their views from Scripture, and to make it the ultimate arbiter in all religious questions, thus distinguishing themselves from the Rationalists (otherwise called Anti-Supernaturalists) of Germany. They undertake to show that, interpreted according to the settled laws of languages, the uniform testimony of the sacred writings is, that the Holy Spirit has no personal existence distinct from the Father, and that the Son is a derived and dependent being, whether, as some believe, created in some remote period of time, or as others, beginning to live when he appeared on earth. Three of the passages of the New Testament which have been relied on to prove the contrary, (1 John 5: 7. 1 Tim. 3: 16. and Acts 20: 28.) they hold with other critics to be spurious. Others (as John 1: 1, &c. Rom. 9: 5.) they maintain to have received an erroneous interpretation. They insist that ecclesiastical history enables them to trace to obsolete systems of heathen philosophy the introduction of the received doctrine into the church, in which, once received, it has been sustained on grounds independent of its merits; and they go so far as to aver that it is satisfactorily refuted by the biblical passages, when rightly understood, which are customarily adduced in its support. According as their distinguishing doctrine has been professed in different times and places, it has been found in connexion with various others which have been prominent subjects of controversy in the church, as those which respect the proper subjects of baptism, philosophical liberty and necessity, the methods of Christ's mediation, &c. The Unitarians (sometimes called Socinians) of Poland held to the obligation of invoking Christ, a view which no Unitarians of the present day, out of Transylvania, are believed to entertain. In America, Unitarian opinions are much divided upon the point of Christ's pre-existence; while, on the other hand, the rejection of the tenet of his vicarious suffering, (or suffering as men's substitute,) along with that of his supreme Deity, appears to be universally characteristic of the sect.

Among the periodicals which announce their views are the Christian Examiner and the Christian Register, published in Boston; the Unitarian Monitor, at Concord, New Hampshire; and the Unitarian Essayist at Meadville, Pennsylvania. The tracts and annual reports of the American Unitarian Association, the government of which is established in Boston, circulate information concerning the progress of the doctrine.

Besides the Congregational Unitarians, the Universalists generally, and the denomination called Christians, maintain Unitarian opinions; and they are understood also to prevail in the large sect of Reformed Baptists, or Disciples of Christ, (sometimes called Campbellites.) UNITY; oneness, whether of sentiment, affection, or behavior, Ps. 133: 1. The unity of the faith is an equal belief of the same great truths of God, and the possession of the grace of faith in a similar form and degree, Eph. 4: 13. The unity of the Spirit is that union between Christ and his saints by which the same divine Spirit dwells in both, and they have the same disposition and aims; and that unity of the saints among themselves by which, being joined to the same Head, and having the same Spirit dwelling in them, they have the same graces of faith, love, hope, &c., and are rooted and grounded in the same doctrine of Christ, and have a mutual affection to and care for one another, Eph. 4: 3.—Brown.

UNITY OF GOD; a term made use of to denote that there is but one God or self-existent Being. The unity of God is argued from his necessary existence, self-sufficiency, perfection, independence, and omnipotence; from the unity of design in the works of nature; and from there being no necessity of having more gods than one; but the Scriptures set it beyond all doubt, Gen. 1: 1. Ps. 86: 10. Isa. 43: 10. Mark 12: 29. John 17: 3. Rom. 3: 30. 1 Cor. S: 4, 6. 1 Tim. 2: 5. UNIVERSALISTS.* The grand distinguishing characteristic of this class of Christians is their belief in the final holiness and happiness of the whole human family. Some of them believe that all punishment for sin is endured in the present state of existence, while others believe it extends into the future life; but all agree that it is administered in a spirit of kindness, is intended for the good of those who experience it, and that it will finally terminate, and be succeeded by a state of perfect and endless holiness and happiness.

Doctrine.—The following is the "Profession of Belief," adopted by the General Convention of Universalists in the United States, at the session holden in 1803; it has never been altered, and it is perfectly satisfactory to the denomination.

"ART. I. We believe that the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments contain a revelation of the character of God, and of the duty, interest, and final destination of mankind.

"ART. II. We believe that there is one God, whose nature is love; revealed in one Lord Jesus Christ, by one Holy Spirit of grace; who will finally restore the whole family of mankind to holiness and happiness.

"ART. III. We believe that holiness and true happiness are inseparably connected; and that believers ought to be careful to maintain order, and practise good works; for these things are good and profitable unto men."

History.—Universalists claim that the salvation of all men was taught by Jesus Christ and his apostles. It was also taught and defended by several of the most eminent Christian fathers; such as Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, &c.† In the third and fourth centuries, this doctrine prevailed extensively, and for aught which appears to the contrary, was then accounted orthodox. It was at length condemned, however, by the fifth general council, A. D. 553; after which, we find few traces of it through the dark ages, so called. See Ballou's Ancient History of Universalism.

It revived at the period of the Reformation, and since that time has found many able and fearless advocates:—in Switzerland, Petipierre and Lavater; in Germany, Seigvolk, Everhard, Steinbart, and Semler; in Scotland, Purves, Douglass, and T. S. Smith; in England, Coppin, Jeremy White, Dr. H. More, Dr. T. Burnet, Whiston, Hartley, bishop Newton, Stonehouse, Barbauld, Lindsey, Priestley, Belsham, Carpenter, Rely, Vidler, Scarlett, and many others. See Whittemore's Modern History of Universalism.

At the present day, Universalism prevails, more extensively than elsewhere, in England, Germany, and the United States.

In England, the Unitarian divines, generally, believe in the final salvation of all men. Dr. Lant Carpenter says: "Most of us, however, believe that a period will come to each individual, when punishment shall have done its work, when the awful sufferings with which the gospel threatens the impenitent and disobedient will have humbled the stubborn, purified the polluted, and eradicated malignity, impiety, hypocrisy, and every evil disposition; that a period will come, (which it may be the unspeakable bliss of those who enter the joy of their Lord to accelerate, which, at least, it will be their delight to anticipate,) when he who 'must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet' shall have put down all rule, and all authority, and power.' 'THE LAST ENEMY, death, shall be DESTROYED.' 'Every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father,' 'who wills that all men should be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth,' that truth which sanctifies the heart, that knowledge which is life eternal; and God shall be ALL IN ALL." Carpenter's Reply to Magee, edit. 1820, p. 42.

In Germany, nearly every theologian is a believer in the final salvation of all men. Speaking of professor Tholuck, professor Sears says: "The most painful disclosures remain yet to be made. This distinguished and excellent man, in common with the great majority of the evangelical divines of Germany, though he professes to have serious doubts, and is cautious in avowing the sentiment, believes that all men and fallen spirits will finally be saved." Mr. Dwight, in his recent publication, says: "The doctrine of the eternity of future punishments is almost universally rejected. I have seen but one person in Germany who believed it, and but one other whose mind was wavering on this subject." Universalism may therefore be considered the prevailing religion in Germany. [See RESTORATIONISTS.]

In the United States, Universalism was little known until about the middle of the last century; and afterwards it found but few advocates during several years. Dr. George de Benneville, of Germantown, (Penn.,) Rev. Richard Clarke, of Charleston, (S. C.,) and Jonathan Mayhew, D. D., of Boston, were, perhaps, the only individuals who publicly preached the doctrine before the arrival of Rev. John Murray, in 1770. Mr. Murray labored almost alone until 1780, when Rev. Elhanan Winchester, a popular Baptist preacher, embraced Universalism, though on different principles. About ten years afterwards, Rev. Hosea Ballou embraced the same doctrine, but on principles different from those advocated by Mr. Murray or Mr. Winchester. To the efforts of these three men is to be attributed much of the success which attended the denomination in its infancy. Although they differed widely from each other in their views of punishment, yet they labored together in harmony and love, for the advancement of the cause which was dear to all their hearts. The seed which they sowed has since produced an abundant harvest.

Clergy, Statistics, &c.—"The ministry of the Universalist denomination in the United States hitherto has been provided for, not so much by the means of schools, as by the unaided but irresistible influence of the gospel of Christ. This has furnished the denomination with its most successful preachers. It has turned them from forest and fields, and from secular pursuits of almost every kind, and driven them, with inadequate literary preparation, to the work of disseminating the truth. This state of things has been unavoidable, and the effect of it is visible. It has made the ministry of the Universalist denomination very different from that of any other sect in the country; studious of the Scriptures, confident in the truth of their distinguishing doctrine, zealous, firm, industrious; depending more on the truths communicated for their success, than on the manner in which they were stated. It has had the effect too to give the ministry a polemic character,—the natural result of unwavering faith in the doctrine believed, and of an introduction into the desk without scholastic training. But the attention of the denomination in various parts of the country has of late been turned to the education of the ministry; and conventions and associations have adopted resolves, requiring candidates to pass examinations in certain branches of literature. The same motives have governed many in their effort to establish literary and theological institutions. The desire to have the ministry respectable for literary acquirements is universal." Universalist Expositor, vol. iii. p. 68.

* This article was prepared for the Encyclopædia by the Rev. Lucius R. Paige, of Cambridgeport, a distinguished minister of the denomination.

† The real sentiments of these fathers may be seen in an article on the Alexandrian school, in No. XVI. of Robinson's Biblical Repository.—Ed. † Dr. Mayhew was not an avowed Universalist; yet he plainly and forcibly advocated the doctrine in a thanksgiving sermon, delivered Dec. 9, 1762, from Pa. 145: 9.—L. R. P.

They have recently engaged in this work. They have now, however, only four literary institutions under their sole superintendence; these are located in Clinton, (N. Y.), Philomath, (Ind.), Westbrook, (Me.), and Norwich, (Vt.) Universalists have encountered much opposition; yet, considering the disadvantages under which they have labored, their success has exceeded their own most sanguine expectations.

In 1801, there were only twenty-two avowed Universalist preachers in the United States; at the present time, (1834,) there are about three hundred.

In 1779, the first Universalist society was organized at Gloucester, (Mass.) There are now about seven hundred societies professing the same faith.

In 1799, the General Convention (organized in 1785) was the only association of the clergy. There are, now, the General Convention of the United States, nine state conventions, and more than thirty associations.

The first Universalist newspaper in the United States (the "Universalist Magazine") was commenced in Boston, July 3, 1819, with less than one thousand subscribers. There are now seventeen periodicals of this description, with an aggregate list of about thirty thousand subscribers.

The following list embraces the principal works which have been published in America in defence of Universalism; to which the reader is referred for a more particular account of the doctrine and history of the denomination.

Previous to 1800:—Seigvolk's Everlasting Gospel; Chauncey's Works, two or three publications; William Pitt Smith's Universalist; Townsend's Gospel News; Young's Calvinism and Universalism contrasted; Pettipierre on Divine Goodness; and Huntington's Calvinism Improved.

Since 1800:—Murray's Life, and Works; Winchester's Dialogues; Ballou's Treatise on Atonement, Notes on the Parables, Lecture Sermons, Select Sermons, and Examination of the Doctrine of Future Retribution; Balfour's Inquiries, Essays, Letters, Reply to Sabine, Letters to Stuart, and Reply to Stuart's Essays; Ancient History of Universalism, by Rev. H. Ballou, 2d; Whittemore's Modern History of Universalism, and Notes on the Parables; Universalist Expositor; Rayner's Lectures; Smith on Divine Government; Mitchell's Christian Universalist; Streeter's Familiar Conversations; W. Skinner's Essays; D. Skinner's Letters; Dod's Sermons; Morse's Sermons; and Paige's Selections from eminent Commentators. To this list may be added their periodicals, and large and frequent editions of hymn books.

A few years since, a small number separated from the denomination, and adopted the appellation of Restorationists. They have published Hudson's Letters to Ballou, and Reply to Balfour; Pickering's Lectures; and Dean's Sermons. To prevent misapprehension it may be repeated, that although a few have thus seceded, yet a difference of opinion in regard to the duration of punishment has not disturbed the harmony of the denomination generally, nor is it regarded as sufficient cause for breach of fellowship, or alienation of heart and affection. [See articles RESTORATIONISTS; MURRAY, JOHN; JUDGMENT, DAY OF; HELL; ATON; RETRIBUTION, FUTURE.]

UNIVERSAL RESTORATIONISTS. (See RESTORATIONISTS.)

UNLEARNED; such as are but little instructed in science; (Acts 4: 13.) or little acquainted with the mind of God and the teaching of his Spirit, 2 Pet. 3: 16. Unlearned questions are such as minister no true and substantial knowledge, 2 Tim. 2: 23.—Brown.

UNPARDONABLE SIN. (See SIN.)

UNPROFITABLE; (useless, tending to no real advantage, but hurt, Job 15: 3. Wicked men are unprofitable, are spiritually unfruitful, and abominable to God, neither studying his glory nor the real good of themselves or others, Ps. 14: 3. Philen. 11. The ceremonial law was unprofitable; it could not really remove the guilt or power of sin by the observance of all its rites, Heb. 7: 18. The grieving of ministers is unprofitable to their people, as it mars their studies, and the discharge of their office leads them to complain of the injury to God, who will not fail to punish it in this or in the world to come, Heb. 13: 17.—Brown.

UNWORTHY; not meet, not deserving, 1 Cor. 6: 2. The Jews judged themselves unworthy of everlasting life when they acted as if they were set upon ruining themselves, Acts 13: 46. Men eat and drink unworthily at the Lord's table when they do it in an unworthy state of voluntary subjection to sin and Satan, and while under the broken law, in an unworthy frame of spirit, ignorant, unbelieving, impenitent, envious, malicious, and with an unworthy end of self-applause, self-righteousness, or to qualify for a civil office; and when the elements are used as if they were common provision, not as the symbols of Jesus' person, righteousness, and blessing, 1 Cor. 11: 27, 29.—Brown.

UPHOLD; to sustain by power, by providence, (Heb. 1: 3.) by promise, or by spiritual influence, Isa. 42: 1. Ps. 119: 16.—Brown.

UPPER ROOM. The principal rooms anciently in Judea were those above, as they are to this day at Aleppo; the ground floor being chiefly made use of for their horses and servants. "The house in which I am at present living," says Jowett, "gives what seems to be a correct idea of the scene of Eutychus' falling from the upper loft while St. Paul was preaching, Acts 20: 6—12. According to our idea of houses, the scene is very far from intelligible; and, besides this, the circumstance of preaching generally leaves on the mind of cursory readers the notion of a church. To describe this house, which is not many miles distant from the Troad, and perhaps, from the unchanging character of Oriental customs, nearly resembles the houses then built, will fully illustrate the narrative. On entering my host's door, we find the first floor entirely used as a store: it is filled with large barrels of oil, the produce of the rich country for many miles round: this space, so far from being habitable, is sometimes so dirty with the dripping of the oil, that it is difficult to pick out a clean footing from the door to the first step of the staircase. On ascending, we find the first floor, consisting of an humble suite of rooms, not very high; these are occupied by the family for their daily use. It is on the next story that all their expense is lavished: here my courteous host has appointed my lodging: beautiful curtains and mats, and cushions to the divan, display the respect with which they mean to receive their guest. Here, likewise, their splendor, being at the top of the house, is enjoyed by the poor Greeks with more retirement, and less chance of molestation from the intrusion of the Turks; here, when the professors of the college waited upon me to pay their respects, they were received in ceremony, and sat at the window. The room is both higher and also larger than those below; it has two projecting windows; and the whole floor is so much extended in front beyond the lower part of the building, that the projecting windows considerably overhang the street. In such an upper room, secluded, spacious, and commodious, St. Paul was invited to preach his parting discourse. The divan, or raised seat, with mats or cushions, encircles the interior of each projecting window; and I have remarked that when the company is numerous, they sometimes place large cushions behind the company seated on the divan; so that a second tier of company, with their feet upon the seat of the divan, are sitting behind, higher than the front row. Eutychus, thus sitting, would be on a level with the open window; and, being overcome with sleep, he would easily fall out from the third loft of the house into the street, and be almost certain, from such a height, to lose his life. Thither St. Paul went down, and comforted the alarmed company by bringing up Eutychus alive. It is noted that "there were many lights in the upper chamber." The very great plenty of oil in this neighborhood would enable them to afford many lamps; the heat of these and so much company would cause the drowsiness of Eutychus, at that late hour, and be the occasion, likewise, of the windows being open." —Watson.

UR; the birthplace of Abraham. (See ABRAHAM, and CHALDEA.)

URIM AND THUMMIM. The high-priests of the Jews, we are told, consulted God in the most important affairs of their commonwealth, and received answers by the urim and thummim. What these were, is disputed among the critics. Josephus, and some others, imagine the answer was returned by the stones of the breastplate appearing with an unusual lustre when it was favorable, or in the contrary case dim. Others suppose, that the urim and thummim were something inclosed between the folding of the breastplate; this some will have to be the tetragrammaton, or the word Jehovah. Christophorus de Castro, and after him Dr. Spencer, maintain them to be two little images shut up in the doubling of the breastplate, which gave the oracular answer from thence by an articulate voice. Accordingly, they derive them from the Egyptians, who consulted their lares, and had an oracle, or teraphim, which they called Truth. This opinion, however, has been sufficiently confuted by the learned Dr. Pococke, and by Witsius. The more common opinion among Christians concerning the oracle by urim and thummim, and which Dr. Prideaux espouses, is, that when the high-priest appeared before the veil, clothed with his ephod and breastplate, to ask counsel of God, the answer was given with an audible voice from the mercy-seat, within the veil; but it has been observed, that this account will by no means agree with the history of David's consulting the oracle by Abiathar; (1 Sam. 23: 9, 11. 30: 7, 8.) because the ark, on which was the mercy-seat, was then at Kirjath-jearim; whereas David was in the one case at Ziklag, and in the other in the forest of Hareth. Braunius and Hottinger have adopted another opinion: they suppose, that when Moses is commended to put in the breastplate the urim and thummim, signifying lights and perfections in the plural number, it was meant that he should make choice of the most perfect set of stones, and have them so polished as to give the brightest lustre; and, on this hypothesis, the use of the urim and thummim, or of these exquisitely polished jewels, was only to be a symbol of the divine presence, and of the light and perfection of the prophetic inspiration; and, as such, constantly to be worn by the high-priest in the exercise of his sacred function, especially in consulting the oracle.—Watson; Hend. Buck.

URQUHART, (JONAS), graduate of the university of St. Andrews, Scotland, a youth of singular promise, piety, and missionary ardor, was born in the town of Perth, June 7, 1808. His parents, who were both pious, endeavored faithfully to bring him up "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." He was sent also to the Sabbath school at five years of age, where his mind was richly stored with divine truth, though the full benefit of it did not appear till some years afterwards. At the grammar-school, where he studied under Mr. Dick, he won several prizes for his intellectual superiority. The same success marked his course at the academy in Perth, under Messrs. Anderson and Forbes. The first year also of his university course, at the age of fourteen, he carried off the first bursary (a prize which secures eight pounds a session for the whole university course) from thirty-three competitors; besides gaining the highest prizes in the Greek, Latin, and mathematical classes.

In April, 1824, he made a decided profession of piety, consecrating his fine powers entirely and cheerfully to the service of his Redeemer. He united with the Independent church at St. Andrews, under the Rev. W. Lothian. At the end of the next session and of the two following he again gained the best prizes in the branches pursued. At the third session, beginning November, 1821, he was introduced to Dr. Chalmers as a member of the moral philosophy class, and ever afterwards enjoyed his particular friendship. A missionary society was the same year formed in the university, of which he became the most active and efficient, as he was the most eloquent member. During the last session he was intrusted by Dr. Chalmers with the care of his Sabbath school. He left the university in 1826, though then only seventeen years of age, with the reputation of being "far the most eminent of his class," able and numerous as it was. He had decided on becoming a missionary to the heathen; but on account of his youth, was induced for a time to act as a tutor to the son of lord Rosslyn. Here, his health gave way, and he died at Glasgow, January 10, 1827, at the age of eighteen, being in the full enjoyment of the blessed hopes of the gospel. See his Memoirs, Letters, and Select Remains, by the Rev. Mr. Orme.

URSULINES; an order of nuns, founded originally by St. Angela, of Brescia, in the year 1537, and so called from St. Ursula, to whom they were dedicated.

At first, these religious did not live in community, but abode separately in their fathers' houses; and their employment was to search for the afflicted, to comfort them; for the ignorant, to instruct them; and for the poor, to relieve them; to visit the hospitals, and to attend upon the sick; in short, to be always ready to do acts of charity and compassion. In 1544, pope Paul III. confirmed the institution of the Ursulines. Sir Charles Borromeo brought some of them from Brescia to Milan, where they multiplied to the number of four hundred. Pope Gregory XIII. and his successors Sixtus V. and Paul V. granted new privileges to this congregation. In process of time, the Ursulines, who before lived separately, began to live in community, and embrace the regular life. The first who did so were the Ursulines of Paris, established there in 1604, who entered into the cloister in the year 1614, by virtue of a bull of pope Paul V. The foundress of the Ursulines of France was Madame Frances de Bermont, who, in 1574, engaged about twenty-five young women of Avignon to embrace the institute of Angela of Brescia. The principal employ of the Ursulines, since their establishment into a regular order, was to instruct young women; and their monasteries were a kind of schools, where young ladies of the best families received their education.—*Hend. US. God sometimes uses this plural, to denote, as many learned men suppose, there being more than one person in the Godhead, Gen. 1: 26. 3: 22. 11: 7. Isa. 6: 8. (See TRINITY).—Brown.

USHER, (JAMES, D. D.), archbishop of Armagh, and author of the common chronology of the Bible, was born at Dublin, January 4, 1580. His father, Arnold Usher, was one of the six clerks of the chancery in Ireland, and a man of parts and learning. His uncle, Henry Usher, was highly celebrated for wisdom and knowledge, and was raised to the archiepiscopal see of Armagh. In 1593, and in the thirteenth year of his age, he was admitted into the college of Dublin; where he began to study the Greek and Hebrew tongues, in both of which he afterwards excelled, as well as in many sciences. At fourteen years of age he began to make extracts from all the historical books he could meet with, in order to fix the facts more firmly in his memory; and between fifteen and sixteen, he had made such proficiency in chronology, that he had drawn up, in Latin, an exact chronicle of the Bible, as far as the book of Kings, not much differing from his Annals, which have since been published, and received with the highest esteem. About the seventeenth year of his age Usher had read several of the fathers, with other authors, both practical and polemical, upon the subject of divinity; and even at this early age he became critically acquainted with the whole Romish controversy. At the age of eighteen he entered the lists with Henry Fitz-Symonds, a learned Jesuit, then prisoner in the castle of Dublin, who had given a general challenge to defend Bellarmine's principles against any opposer.

In 1600, Mr. Usher was appointed proctor, and chosen catechetical lecturer of the university. In 1601, he entered into holy orders, and was soon after appointed afternoon preacher, on Sundays, before the state, at Christ church, Dublin. In the year 1607 he obtained the degree of bachelor of divinity, and was chosen professor of that faculty in his college; he was also promoted to the chancellorship of the cathedral of St. Patrick the same year. In a visit to England he attended at the libraries in both the universities, and contracted an acquaintance with most of the literati of the day. Thus eager in the pursuit of knowledge, he declined the provostship of his college, to which he was elected in 1610. In 1613, at London, he published his first treatise, "De Ecclesiarum Christianarum Successione et Statu." It was presented by archbishop Abbot to king James, as the eminent first-fruits of the Dublin university.

In 1615, Dr. Usher drew up articles of religion for the church of Ireland, which being entirely Calvinistic, a handle was made of this step to effect the ruin of his interest with king James, by representing him as inclined to Puritanism; but the impotent malice turned (as is not unusual in such cases) greatly to his advantage. The bishopric of Meath being then vacant, his majesty, of his own accord, nominated him thereto in 1620. In 1622 he published, at Dublin, his Treatise concerning the Religion of the ancient Irish and Britons. In 1623 he was constituted a privy counsellor of Ireland, and went soon after to England, by his majesty's special command, in order to carry on a work, which he had begun some time before, concerning the antiquity of the British churches. This business detained him there till the death of Dr. Christopher Hampton, archbishop of Armagh, in January, 1624, made way for his advancement to that see.

Being now at the head of the Irish church, he omitted nothing which might either reform the abuses, or relieve the wants of it, both in regard to doctrine and discipline. Observing the daily growth and increase of Arminianism, which was looked on by him as a very dangerous doctrine, he employed some time in searching into the original of the predestinarian controversy; and, meeting with a work upon that subject, he published it in 1631, at Dublin, in quarto: it is entitled, "Goteschalci et Predestinarianæ Controversiæ ab eò Motæ Historiæ." He published also another in 1632, concerning the ancient Irish church. The title of this piece is, "Veterum Epistolarum Hiberniarum Sylloge," containing a choice collection of letters out of several ancient MSS. and other authors, and to and from Irish bishops and monks, from A. D. 592 to 1180, concerning the affairs of the Irish church; which show the great esteem, as well for learning as piety, in which the bishops and clergy of that church were held both at Rome, France, England, and elsewhere. All this time he maintained a correspondence in all countries for the advancement of learning; by which, among other things, he had procured, in 1634, a very good copy of the Samaritan Pentateuch from the East, besides one of the Old Testament, in Syriac, and other valuable MSS.

In the beginning of 1640 he came into England with his family, intending to return in a few years. About 1648 he was sent for to the isle of Wight, by his majesty, to assist him in treating with the parliament, upon the point of episcopacy; when he proposed an expedient, which he called Presbyterian and Episcopal government conjoined, which the king approved, as the best means of reconciling the then differences. In 1650 he published the first part of his "Annals of the Old Testament." In 1652 appeared his "Epistola ad Ludovicum Capellum de variantibus Textus Hebraici Lectionibus," at London, quarto. In 1655 he published his last piece, "De Græca Septuaginta Interpretum verum Septagma." He died March 20, 1655-6, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. His last words were, "O Lord forgive me, especially my sins of omission." Thus humbly died one of the best of men.

He was easy, affable, and cheerful in conversation, and extremely charitable. He envied no man's happiness, nor censured or condemned any man upon reports only. Though he could reprove sharply in the cause of virtue and religion, yet he was not easily provoked to passion. USURY; the gain taken for the loan of money or wares. The Jews were allowed to lend money upon usury to strangers; (Deut. 23: 20.) but were prohibited to take usury from their brethren of Israel, at least if they were poor, Exod. 22: 25. Lev 25: 35, 37.

From the Scriptures speaking against the practice of usury, some have thought it unlawful, Ps. 15: 5. Prov. 28: 8. Ezek. 18: 8. But it is replied, that usury there only means immoderate interest, or oppression, by taking advantage of the indigent circumstances of our neighbor; and that it seems as lawful for a man to receive interest for money, which another takes pain with, improves, but runs the hazard of in trade, as it is to receive rent for our land, which another takes pain with, improves, but runs the hazard of in husbandry.—Hend. Buck.

UZ, the eldest son of Aram, and grandson of Shem, is thought to have peopled Trachonitis, a province beyond Jordan, having Arabia Deserta east, and Batanea west. The ancients say that Uz founded the city of Damascus; and the Arabians affirm, that Uz had Ad for a son, who was father of a people called Adites, in Arabia Felix.—Calmet.

UZ, LAND OF. (See JOB.)

UZAL, the sixth son of Joktan, (Gen. 10: 27. 1 Chron. 1: 21.) is commonly placed in Arabia Felix.—Calmet.

UZZAH; son of Abinadab, 2 Sam. 6. 1 Chron. 15: 13. Critics are divided about the occasion of the death of Uzzah; and as the history, being related very succinctly, is liable to be misunderstood, it may be proper to notice,

1. That the law (Exod. 25: 14.) ordered the ark to be carried on the shoulders of Levites, whereas, in this instance, it was drawn by oxen, on a cart, (1.) as if this carriage by beasts were good enough for it: (2.) it was hereby assimilated to the processions of the heathen, who drew their gods about in carriages: (3.) if it had been borne by Levites, would Uzzah have been one to bear it? did he think this too much trouble? the distance too great, &c.?
2. The ark ought to have been enveloped, wholly concealed, by the priests, before the Levites approached it; whereas, (1.) no priest attended this procession: (2.) it was carried openly, exposed to view, as it was by the Philistines? 1 Sam. 6: 13-19. Uzzah, being a Levite, ought to have known these rules; and being the principal in conducting the procession, and, as may be supposed, the elder brother, he was principally guilty: Ahio being subordinate to him.—Calmet.

V.

VALENTINIANS; a sect who sprung up in the second century, and were so called from their leader Valentinus. The Valentinians were only a branch of the Gnostics, who realized or personified the Platonic ideas concerning the Deity, whom they called Pleroma or Plentitude. Their system was this: the first principle is Bythos, i. e. Depth, which remained many ages unknown, having with it Ennoe or Thought, and Sige or Silence; from these sprung the Nous or Intelligence, which is the only Son, equal to, and alone capable of comprehending the Bythos. The sister of Nous they called Aletheia or Truth; and these constituted the first quaternity of æons, which were the source and original of all the rest; for Nous and Aletheia produced the world and life; and from these two proceeded man and the church. But besides these eight principal æons, there were twenty-two more; the last of which, called Sophia, being desirous to arrive at the knowledge of Bythos, gave herself a great deal of uneasiness, which created in her Anger and Fear of which was born Matter. But the Horos or Bounder stopped her, preserved her in the Pleroma, and restored her to Perfection. Sophia then produced the Christ and the Holy Spirit, which brought the æons to their last perfection, and made every one of them contribute their utmost to form a Savior. Her Enthusiasm or Thought, dwelling near the Pleroma, perfected by the Christ, produced every thing that is in this world by its divers passions. The Christ sent into it the Savior, accompanied with angels, who delivered it from its passions without annihilating it; from thence was formed corporeal matter.

In this allegorical manner did they romance concerning God, nature, and the mysteries of the Christian religion. (See Gnostics.)—Hend. Buck.

VANE, (Sir HENRY), the younger; a conspicuous character in the time of Charles I. and the commonwealth. He was born about 1612, and educated at Westminster; and being much indisposed towards the English liturgy and church government, he emigrated to New England about 1635. Notwithstanding his youth, he was elected governor of Massachusetts; but, becoming involved in religious disputes, he soon after returned to England, and was appointed to office. He was chosen to parliament, and yet kept on such terms with the royal party as to obtain knighthood; but the spirit of the times, however, soon led him to take prominent part against the court. He had, however, no immediate concern in the king's trial or death, but was one of the council of state appointed to supreme power after that event. He continued a strenuous adversary to Cromwell during the whole progress of that leader to sovereignty; on which account the latter found means to imprison and otherwise oppress him. Notwithstanding this opposition, he continued to exert himself to establish a republican government, until the restoration put an end to future contest. On this event, he considered himself in no danger; but he was committed to the Tower, and although Charles promised that his life should be spared, yet he broke his word, and Sir Henry Vane was brought to trial for high treason. Although accused only of transactions after the king's death, he was declared guilty, notwithstanding a very able defence, in which he pleaded that if complying with the existing government was a crime, all the nation had been equally criminal. He further observed that he had, in every change, adhered to the commons, as the root of all lawful authority. He was beheaded in June, 1662. Sir Henry Vane mingled much religious devotion, somewhat unctured by the errors of the age, with an extraordinary degree of acuteness and good sense. His theological writings display much power. Among them are the Retired Man's Meditations, 1655; the Face of the Times, 1662; and his Meditations on Life, Government, Friendship, Enemies, Death, 1662. It must not be forgotten that his history has been written by his enemies.—Amer. Ency.

VANISTES, the followers of Sir Harry Vane. (See VANE, SIR HENRY.)—Hend. Buck.

VANITY; emptiness. It is often applied to the man who wishes you to think more highly of him than what he really deserves; hence the vain man flatters in order to be flattered; is always fond of praise; endeavors to bribe others into a good opinion of himself by his complaisance, and sometimes even by good offices, though often displayed with unnecessary ostentation. (See PRIDE.)

The term is likewise applied in Scripture to this world, as unsatisfactory; (Ecc. 1: 2.) to lying; (Ps. 4: 2.) to idols; (Deut. 32: 21.) to whatever disappoints our hopes, Ps. 60: 11.—Hend. Buck.

VAN RENSSLAER, (PHILIP S.,) mayor of Albany, was elected in 1798, and amidst all the changes of party was annually re-elected, excepting in two years, till 1823. For twenty-three years he was a faithful chief magistrate of the city, assiduous in promoting its moral and political interests. He died September 25, 1821, aged fifty-eight.

He was a much respected and useful citizen. Of the Albany Bible society he was at the time of his death the president, and a trustee of Union college. He was the principal founder of the Albany academy, and of the Lancaster School society. His fortune and talents were employed for the promotion of benevolent objects. In his death, while the poor lost their best friend, the church was deprived of an exemplary member.—Allen.

VARIK, (Colonel RICHARD,) third president of the American Bible society, was born in 1752. In 1783 he was one of Washington's military family, being recording secretary. He was a mayor of the city of New York in 1789; also so late as 1801, when he was removed and Edward Livingston appointed in his place. After Mr. Jay, who succeeded Mr. Boudinot, he was elected president of the Bible society. He died at Jersey city, July 30, 1831, aged seventy-nine. For many years he was a member of a Christian church. His life was upright. In his manners he was dignified, and fixed in his principles, political and religious.—Allen.

VEDAS; the sacred books of the Hindoos, believed to be revealed by God, and called immortal. They are considered as the fountain of all knowledge, human and divine, and are four in number. The principal part of them is that which explains the duties of man in methodical arrangement. The fourth book contains a system of divine ordinances. See the first volume of the Asiatic Researches.—Hend. Buck.

VEIL, (radid.) Women were wont to cover their faces with veils in token of modesty, of reverence, and subjection to their husbands, Gen. 24: 65. 1 Cor. 11: 3, &c.

In modern times, the women of Syria never appear in the streets without their veils. These are of two kinds, the furrugi and the common Aleppo veil; the former being worn by some of the Turkish women only, the latter indiscriminately by all. The first is in the form of a large cloak, with long straight sleeves, and a square hood hanging flat on the back; it is sometimes made of linen, sometimes of a shawl or cloth. This veil reaching to the heels, conceals the whole of the dress, from the neck downwards; while the head and face are covered by a large white handkerchief over the headdress and forehead, and a smaller one tied transversely over the lower part of the face, hanging down on the neck. Many of the Turkish women, instead of the smaller handkerchief, use a long piece of black crape stiffened, which, sloping a little from the forehead, leaves room to breathe more freely. In this last way, the ladies are completely disguised; in the former, the eyes and nose remaining visible, they are easily known by their acquaintances. The radid is a species of veil, which Calmet supposes is worn by married women, as a token of their submission and dependence, and descends low down on the person. To lift up the veil of a virgin is reckoned a gross insult; but to take away the veil of a married woman is one of the greatest indignities that she can receive, because it deprives her of the badge which distinguishes and dignifies her in that character, and betokens her alliance to her husband, and her interest in his affections. This is the reason why the spouse so feelingly complains: "They took away my veil (radid) from me," Cant. 5: 7. When it is forcibly taken away by the husband, it is equivalent to divorce, and justly reckoned a most severe calamity; therefore, God threatened to take away the ornamental dresses of the daughters of Zion, including the radidim, the low-descending veils: "In that day the Lord will take away the changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the fine linen, and the hoods, and the veils," Isa. 3: 18, &c.

The ordinary Aleppo veil is a linen sheet, large enough to cover the whole habit from head to foot, and is brought over the face in a manner to conceal all but one eye. This is perhaps alluded to by the bridegroom in these words: "Thou hast ravished my heart with one of thine eyes," Cant. 4: 9. In Barbary, when the ladies appear in public, they always fold themselves up so closely in their lykes, that, even without their veils, one can discover very little of their faces. But, in the summer months, when they retire to their country seats, they walk abroad with less caution; though, even then, on the approach of a stranger, they always drop their veils, as Rebecca did on the approach of Isaac. But, although they are so closely wrapped up that those who look at them cannot see even their hands, still less their face, yet it is reckoned indecent in a man to fix his eyes upon them; he must let them pass without seeming at all to observe them. When a lady of distinction, says Hanway, travels on horseback, she is not only veiled, but has generally a servant, who runs or rides before her to clear the way; and on such occasions the men, even in the market-places, always turn their backs till the women are past, it being thought the highest ill manners to look at them. A lady in the East considers herself degraded when she is exposed to the gaze of the other sex, which accounts for the conduct of Vashti in refusing to obey the command of the king. Their ideas of decency, on the other hand, forbid a virtuous woman to lay aside or even to lift up her veil in the presence of the other sex. She who ventures to disregard this prohibition inevitably ruins her character, 1 Cor. 2. From that moment she is noted as a woman of easy virtue, and her act is regarded as a signal for intrigue. Pits informs us that in Barbary the courtesan appears in public without her veil; and, in Prov. 7: 13, 14, the harlot exposes herself in the same indecent manner: "So she caught him, and kissed him, and with an impudent face," a face uncovered and shameless, "said unto him, I have peace-offerings with me; this day have I paid my vows." But it must nevertheless be remarked, that, at different times, and in different parts of the East, the use, or partial use of the veil has greatly varied.—Watson.

VENERATION; an affection compounded of awe and love, and which, of all others, becomes creatures to bear toward their infinitely perfect Creator. (See DEVOTION, and ADORATION).—Hend. Buck.

VENIAL SINS. According to a distinction invented by the schoolmen, and adopted in the church of Rome, some sins are pardonable, others not. To the former they give the name of venial, to the latter, that of mortal sins. Thomas Aquinas, and his followers, lay down seven distinctions between them, but they are most frivolous, as EXETER has shown in the fourteen arguments which he has employed in their confutation. It is most certain that, as the smallest sins contain in them rebellion against the supreme authority of God, they must be in their own nature mortal, or deserving of death; while, on the other hand, there is no sin so great that it will not be forgiven, in repentance and faith in the atonement. (See SIN).—Hend. Buck.

VERACITY OF GOD, is his truth, or an exact correspondence and conformity between his word and his mind. Moses says, "He is a God of truth." He is true in and of himself; he truly and really exists; he is the true and living God: all his perfections are true and real; truth is essential to him; it is pure and perfect in him; it is the first and original in him; he is the fountain of truth: all his works in creation, providence, and grace, are according to truth. (See TRUTH, and FAITHFULNESS OF GOD).—Hend. Buck.

VERSCHORISTS; a sect that derived its denomination from Jacob Verschoor, a native of Flushing, who, in the year 1680, out of a perverse and heterogeneous mixture of the tenets of Cocceius and Spinoza, produced a new form of religion, equally remarkable for its extravagance and impiety. His disciples and followers were also called Hebrews, on account of the zeal and assiduity with which they all, without distinction of age or sex, applied themselves to the study of the Hebrew language. Their sentiments were nearly the same as the Haatemists. (See HAATEMISTS).—Hend. Buck.

VERTABETS, among the Armenian Christians, are such as have acquired a degree corresponding to that of doctor in divinity among us. This degree is conferred with the same solemnities as holy orders; and those who receive it are appealed to in all religious debates; they preach in the churches; reconcile differences; and exert themselves to maintain the purity of the Armenian creed. They are supported by the voluntary contributions of their hearers, or of those who apply to them for the decision of any religious question.—Hend. Buck.

VERGERIO, (PETER PAUL;) bishop of Istria. He was originally a determined opposer of the gospel, but, having been converted to the Protestant faith, he preached partly among the Grisons and partly in the Valteline, for several years. He afterwards went to Tubingen, where he died in the year 1566.—Middleton.

VETIUS. (See AGATHUS VETIUS.)

VIAL. (See CENSER.)

VICAR; a priest of a parish, the predial tithes whereof are inappropriate or appropriated; that is, belong either to a chapter, religious house, &c., or to a layman, who receives them, and only allows the vicar the small tithes, or a convenient salary.—Hend. Buck.

VICE; a fault: the opposite of virtue. (See SIN.)

VIGIL; the eve or day before any solemn feast, because then Christians were wont to watch, fast, and pray in their churches.—Hend. Buck.

VINCENT, a Spanish Christian of the fourth century, was ordained deacon at Saragossa by Valerius. When the persecution under Galerius reached Spain, Dacian ordered Vincent to renounce his opinions, but upon his finally persisting in the faith, levelled the shafts of persecution against him. He was put to the rack, burnt upon the gridiron, and then remanded to a dungeon, the floor of which was strewn with sharp flints and broken glass.

This, however, he survived, and before being again tortured, yielded up his spirit to its preserver, in the words of Fox, with as much calmness as if he had only sunk into a gentle slumber, on January 28, A. D. 304.—Fox, p. 47.

VINCENT DE PAUL, (Saint,) a French divine and philanthropist, was born, in 1576, at Ranquines, and closed in 1660 a life which had been devoted to acts of benevolence. He was considered as "the father of the poor and the steward of Providence." France is indebted to him for the institution of the daughters of charity, and of various other establishments to alleviate the sufferings of his fellow-creatures. He was canonized in 1773.—Davenport.

VINE; (gephen, Gen. 40: 9; ampelos, Matt. 26: 29. Mark 14: 25. Luke 22: 18. John 15: 4, 5. James 3: 12. Rev. 14: 19.) a noble plant of the creeping kind, famous for its fruit, or grapes, and the liquor they afford. The vine is a common name, or genus, including several species under it; and Moses, to distinguish the true vine, or that from which wine is made, from the rest, calls it gephen hayagin, the wine vine, Num. 6: 4. Some of the other sorts were of a poisonous quality, as appears from the story related among the miraculous acts of Elisha, 2 Kings 4: 39, 41. (See GRAPES.)

The expression of "sitting every man under his own vine," probably alludes to the delightful eastern arbors, which were partly composed of vines. Captain Norden, in like manner, speaks of vine-arbors as common in the Egyptian gardens; and the Prænestine pavement in Dr. Shaw gives us the figure of an ancient one. Plantations of trees about houses are found very useful in hot countries, to give them an agreeable coolness. The ancient Israelites seem to have made use of the same means, and probably planted fruit-trees, rather than other kinds, to produce that effect. "It is their manner in many places," says Sir Thomas Rowe's chaplain, speaking of the country of the Great Mogul, "to plant about and amongst their buildings trees which grow high and broad, the shadow whereof keeps their houses by far more cool: this I observed in a special manner, when we were ready to enter Amadavar; for it appeared to us as if we had been entering a wood rather than a city." "Immediately on entering," says Turner, "I was ushered into the courtyard of the aga, whom I found smoking under a vine, surrounded by horses, servants, and dogs, among which I distinguished an English pointer."

Dr. Russell states, that it is very common to cover the stairs leading to the upper apartments of the harem with vines. This fully explains the beautiful metaphor in Psal. 128: "Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine by the sides of thine house," with which Mr. Harmer is so much embarrassed.

There were in Palestine many excellent vineyards. Scripture celebrates the vines of Sorek, of Sebamah, of Jazer, of Abel. Profane authors mention the excellent wines of Gaza, Sarepta, Libanus, Saron, Ascalon, and Tyre. Jacob, in the blessing which he gave Judah, "Binding his foal unto the vine, and his ass's colt unto the choice vine; he washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes." (Gen. 49: 11.) showed the abundance of vines that should fall to his lot, and the immense size of them. In Persia some of them are so large that a man can hardly compass their trunks in his arms. (See GRAPES.)

"Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well, whose branches hang over the wall," Gen. 49: 22. "To the northward and westward," says Morier, "are several villages, interspersed with extensive orchards and vineyards, the latter of which are generally inclosed by high walls. The Persian vine-dressers do all in their power to make the vine run up the wall, and curl over on the other side, which they do by tying stones to the extremity of the tendrils. The vine, particularly in Turkey and Greece, is frequently made to entwine on trellises around a well, where, in the heat of the day, whole families collect themselves, and sit under the shade."

Noah planted the vine after the deluge, and is supposed to have been the first who cultivated it, Gen. 9: 20. Many are of opinion that wine was not unknown before the deluge; and that this patriarch only continued to cultivate the vine after that event, as he had done before it: but the fathers think that he knew not the force of wine, having never used it before, nor having ever seen any one use it. He was the first that gathered the juice of the grape, and preserved it till by fermentation it became a potable liquor. Before him men only ate the grapes like other fruit. The law of Moses did not allow the planters of vineyards to eat the fruit before the fifth year, Lev. 19: 24, 25. The Israelites were also required to indulge the poor, the orphan, and the stranger, with the use of the grapes on the seventh year. A traveller was allowed to gather and eat the grapes in a vineyard as he passed along, but he was not permitted to carry any away, Deut. 23: 24.

The VINTAGE followed the wheat harvest and the thrashing, (Lev. 36: 5. Amos 9: 13.) about June or July, when the clusters of the grapes were gathered with a sickle, put into baskets, (Jer. 6: 9.) and carried and thrown into the wine-vat, or wine-press, where they were probably first trodden by men, and then pressed, Rev. 14: 18—20. It is mentioned as a mark of the great work and power of the Messiah, that he had trodden the figurative wine-press alone; and of the people there was none with him, Isa. 63: 3. Rev. 19: 15. The vintage was a season of great mirth. Of the juice of the squeezed grapes were formed wine and vinegar. (See WINE.)

The scarcity of fuel, especially wood, in most parts of the East, is so great, that they supply it with every thing capable of burning; cow-dung dried, roots, parings of fruits, withered stalks of herbs and flowers, Matt. 6: 30. Vine twigs are particularly mentioned as used for fuel in dressing their food, by D'Arvieux, La Roche, and others: Ezekiel says, in his parable of the vine, used figuratively for the people of God, "Shall wood be taken thereof to do any work? Or will men take a pie of it to haug any vessel thereon? Behold, it is cast into the fire for fuel," Ezek. 15: 3, 4. "If a man abide not in me," saith our Lord, "he is cast forth as a branch" of the vine, "and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned," John 15: 6.

In the TEMPLE at Jerusalem, says Rosenmueller, above and round the gate, seventy cubits high, which led from the porch to the holy place, a richly carved vine was extended, as a border and decoration. The branches, tendrils, and leaves, were of the finest gold; the stalks of the bunches were of the length of the human form, and the bunches hanging upon them were of costly jewels. Herod first placed it there; rich and patriotic Jews from time to time added to its embellishment, one contributing a new grape, another a leaf, and a third even a bunch of the same precious materials. If to compute its value at more than twelve millions of dollars be an exaggeration, it is nevertheless indisputable, that this vine must have had an uncommon importance and a sacred meaning in the eyes of the Jews. With what majestic splendor must it likewise have appeared in the evening, when it was illuminated by tapers!

If, then, Jesus in the evening, after having celebrated the passover, again betook himself to the temple with his disciples, what is more natural than, as they wandered in it to and fro, that above every thing this vine blazing with gold and jewels should have attracted their attention? that, riveted by the gorgeous magnificence of the sight, they were absorbed in wonder and contemplation respecting the real import of this work of art? Let us now conceive, that Jesus at this moment, referring to this vine, said to his disciples, "I am the true vine;" how correct and striking must his words then have appeared! how clearly and determinately must then the import of them have been seen! The intention of the similitude is that which it is most important for us to attend to and understand; which is, that no fruit can be expected from professing Christians, either in their personal or official character, but by perseverance in the appointed way, and in communion by faith and love with him who is the source of all that is good in man.—Calmet; Watson.

VINEGAR; (chenets, Num. 6: 3. Ruth 2: 14. Ps. 69: 21. Prov. 10: 26. 25: 20.; ozos, Matt. 27: 48. Mark 15: 36. John 19: 29, 30.) an acid produced by a second fermentation of vinous liquors. The law of the Nazarite was that he should "separate himself from wine and strong drink, and should drink no vinegar of wine, nor vinegar of strong drink, nor any liquor of grapes." This is exactly the same prohibition that was given in the case of John the Baptist, (Luke 1: 15.) "wine and sikera he shall not drink." Any inebriating liquor, says Jerome, is called sikera, whether made of corn, apples, honey, dates, or other fruits. One of the four prohibited drinks among the Mohammedans in India is called sakar, which signifies inebriating drink in general, but especially date wine. From the original word, probably, we have our term cider or sieder, which, among us, exclusively means the fermented juice of apples.

Vinegar was used by harvesters for their refreshment. Boaz told Ruth that she might come and dip her bread in vinegar with his people. Pliny says, "Aceto summa vis in refrigerando." It made a very cooling beverage. It was generally diluted with water. When very strong, it affected the teeth disagreeably, Prov. 10: 26. In Proverbs 25: 20, the singing of songs to a heavy heart is finely compared to the contrariety or collocation between vinegar and nitre; and untempered mirth to one in anxiety serves only to exasperate, and as it were put into a ferment by the intrusion.

The emperor Pescennius Niger gave orders that his soldiers should drink nothing but vinegar on their marches. That which the Roman soldiers offered to our Savior at his crucifixion, was, probably, the vinegar they made use of for their own drinking. Constantine the Great allowed them wine and vinegar alternately, every day. This vinegar was not of that sort which we use for salads and sauces; but it was a tart wine called pesca or sera. They make great use of it in Spain and Italy, in harvest-time. They use it also in Holland, and on ship-board, to correct the ill taste of the water.—Watson.

VIPER; (aphoah, Job 20: 16. Isa. 30: 6. 59: 5; chidni, Matt. 3: 7. 12: 34. 23: 33. Luke 3: 7. Acts 28: 3.) a serpent famed for the venomousness of its bite, which is one of the most dangerous poisons in the animal kingdom. So remarkable, says Dr. Mead, has the viper been for its venom, that the remotest antiquity made it an emblem of what is hurtful and destructive. Nay, so terrible was the nature of these creatures, that they were very commonly thought to be sent as executioners of divine vengeance upon mankind, for enormous crimes which had escaped the course of justice. An instance of such an opinion as this we have in the history of St. Paul, Acts 28.—Watson.

VIRET, (PÈRE), a celebrated French Protestant divine was born at a small town, in the district of Berne, near Burgundy, in France, and educated at Paris, where he first became acquainted with Farel. From Paris he went to Lausanne, and was chosen pastor there, where he spent many years of his time, with great success, in preaching and writing. But when Calvin was sent to the conference at Worms, in the year 1541, and from thence to Ratisbon, he obtained orders from the senate of Lausanne, that Viret should supply his place at Geneva till his return. Calvin was so well satisfied with Viret's abilities and conduct during his absence, that he endeavored, by every possible means, to persuade him to continue with him at Geneva, declaring how much he thought the church there would be benefited by his preaching; but he could not prevail on him, as Viret had determined to return to Lausanne, his former charge. Notwithstanding, the French churches earnestly entreated him, with better success than Calvin, to go to Lyons; where, in the midst of civil wars, and the pestilence which followed, he, with his colleagues, presided over that church with great prudence. But at length the Jesuits obtained a proclamation to be made in the year 1563, that not any but such as were natives of France should be preachers in the Protestant churches. Viret, being obliged to leave Lyons in consequence of the above proclamation, took up his residence at a small town near the Pyrenean mountains, at the request of the queen of Navarre, where he continued to the time of his death, which was in 1571, and in the sixtieth year of his age.

His death was much regretted by the wise and good. His disposition was most amiable; he was remarkable for meekness and gentleness, and for the moderation of his language and temper. His preaching was eminently successful, not only in promoting the spread of the Protestant church, but in the conversion of sinners, and the edification of saints. His auditory in general were so charmed with his eloquence, that they always wished he would preach longer. When he was at Lyons, he used to preach in the open air, in so powerful and successful a way, that some thousands were converted to the Christian faith. He devoted no time to the idle amusements of the world, but spent his life in getting good and doing good. In works of mercy and deeds of benevolence, both public and private, he spent a laborious and useful life; and, like his coadjutor, Farel, benefited the world and the church by his example, his precepts, his preaching, and his prayers. He wrote many books of great use to the faithful of his time, in preserving them from popish superstitions and in furnishing them with arguments against their adversaries. Melchior Adam has preserved a long list of his principal publications.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

VIRGIN, (almah.) properly signifies an unmarried woman, who has preserved her chastity inviolate.

The authors of the books of the Maccabees and Ecclesiasticus, speaking of the young unmarried women, give them the epithets, kept in, secluded, hidden, to distinguish them from married women, who occasionally appear in public; and Jerome preserves a distinction between bethula, a young woman, and almah, a virgin, in that the latter is one who never has been seen by men. This is its proper signification, in the Punic or Phœnician language, which, as is well known, is the same as the Hebrew. In this sense, it occurs in the famous passage of Isaiah 7: 14.—“Behold, a virgin [almah] shall conceive and bear a son.” The Chaldee paraphrast and the Septuagint here translate almah, virgin. Akiba, the famous rabbin, a great enemy to Christ and Christians, who lived in the second century, understands it thus; the apostles and evangelists, and the Jews of our Savior's time, explained it thus, and expected a Messiah born of a virgin; and, further, Mohammed and his followers acknowledge the virginity of the mother of our Lord. (See ALMAH.)—Calmet.

VIRGINITY, PENETRATIVE; such an extraordinary or perfect gift of chastity, to which some have pretended, that it overpowered those by whom they have been surrounded, and created in them an insensibility to the pleasures of the flesh. The virgin Mary, according to some Romanists, was possessed of this gift, which made those who beheld her, notwithstanding her beauty, to have no sentiments but such as were consistent with chastity.—Hend. Buck.

VIRGINITY, PERPETUAL, is ascribed to the mother of our Lord by the Eastern or Greek church, which calls her Aiparthenos, and by the Roman, which calls her Semper Virgo. In every age of the church, however, there have been those who have maintained that she only continued a virgin till the nativity of Christ. Epiphanius, and after him Augustine, gives such the name of Antidicomarianite. Bishop Pearson maintains the affirmative, on the following very unsatisfactory grounds: her peculiar eminence and unparalleled privilege; the special honor and reverence due to her son, and ever paid by her; the regard of the Holy Ghost that came upon her, and the power of the Highest which overshadowed her; and the singular goodness and piety of Joseph, her husband. By an accommodation of Ezek. 44: 2, he, and many others, are inclined to support the same side of the question. With respect to Matt. 1: 25, where it is said, “Joseph knew her not until she had brought forth her first-born Son,” it has generally been considered equivocal; but Campbell, Whithy, Bloomfield, and other critics, regard the phrase as favoring the contrary opinion, that she did not continue a virgin. See especially Whithy's note; and we may well acquiesce in the sentiment of Basil, there quoted: “what she was afterwards (after the birth of our Savior) let us leave undiscussed, as being of small concern to the mystery.”—Hend. Buck.

VIRTUE; a term used in various significations. Some define it to be “living according to nature;” others, “universal benevolence to being.” Some, again, place it “in regard to truth;” others, in “the moral sense.” Some place it in “the imitation of God;” others, “in the love of God and our fellow-creatures.” Some, again, think it consists “in mediocrity,” supposing vice to consist in extremes; others have placed it in “a wise regard to our own interest.” Dr. Smith refers it to the principle of sympathy; and Paley defines it to be the doing good to mankind, in obedience to the will of God, and for the sake of everlasting happiness.

Some of these definitions are certainly objectionable. Perhaps those who place it in the love of God and our fellow-creatures may come as near to the truth as any. See Edwards and Jameson on Virtue; Groove's and Paley's Moral Phil.; Cumberland's Law of Nature, cap. i. § 4; Beattie's Elements of Moral Science; Dr. Watts' Self-Love and Virtue Reconciled; Dwight's Theology—Hend. Buck.

VISION; the act of seeing; but, in Scripture, it generally signifies a supernatural appearance, either by dream or in reality, by which God made known his will and pleasure to those to whom it was vouchsafed, Acts 9: 10, 12. 16: 9. 26: 13. 2 Cor. 12: 1. Thus, in the earliest times, to patriarchs, prophets, and holy men God sent angels, he appeared to them himself by night in dreams, he illuminated their minds, he made his voice to be heard by them, he sent them ecstasies, and transported them beyond themselves, and made them hear things that eye had not seen, ear had not heard, and which had not entered into the heart of man. The Lord showed himself to Moses, and spoke to him when he was at the mouth of the cave. Jesus Christ manifested himself to his apostles, in his transfiguration upon the mount, and on several other occasions after his resurrection. God appeared to Abraham under the form of three travellers; he showed himself to Isaiah and Ezekiel in the splendor of his glory. Vision is also used for the prophecies written by the prophets.

The beatific vision denotes the act of angels and glorified spirits beholding in heaven the unveiled splendors of the Lord Jehovah, and privileged to contemplate his perfections and plans in and by himself.—Watson.

VISIT; (1.) To go to see, and meet with, Acts 7: 23. 15: 36. (2.) To take a view of, in order to redress grievances, and do service; so magistrates and ministers ought to visit their people, Jer. 23: 2. God visits men either in mercy, when he manifests his presence, grants them their requests, delivers them from distress, and upholds and comforts them; (Zech. 10: 3. Luke 7: 16. Gen. 21: 1. 1 Sam. 2: 21.) or in wrath, when he visits their iniquities in chastising or punishing for them, Exod. 20: 5. Jer. 6: 6. Isa. 26: 14. Ezek. 38: 8. Christ, the day-spring from on high, visited men when he assumed our nature, and when he sends his Word and Spirit that we may have fellowship with him, and share of his blessings, Luke 1: 78. To visit the fatherless and widow, or the sick and imprisoned members of Christ, is to show them regard and pity, and to help them according to their need and our ability, Jam. 12: 7. Matt. 25: 36, 43.—Brown.

VISITATION; the survey or inspection performed by a bishop in his diocese, to examine into the state of the church. In the Scriptures, it is taken either for a signal communication of divine love, or for any period of signal calamity affecting a nation.—Hend. Buck.

VITALIS, the servant and convert of the martyr Agri-cola, of the fourth century, was seized and put to death upon the same account with his master. (See AGRICOLA.)—Fox.

VITELIUS, the censor, father of the emperor A. Vitellius, was made governor of Syria at the expiration of his consulate, A. D. 35, and the same year, or the year following, he came to Jerusalem at the feast of the passover, and was very magnificently entertained. He released the city from a tax on fruits, committed to the care of the Jews the high-priest's habit, with the pontifical ornaments, which Herod and the Romans had kept till then in the tower Antonia. He deposed Joseph Caiaphas from the high-priesthood, and put in his place Jonathan, son of Ananus; but deprived him of his dignity two years afterwards, and conferred it on Theophilus, his brother.—Calmet.

VITUS, a Sicilian of considerable family in the fourth century, was brought up a Christian, and suffered martyrdom when but little more than twelve years of age.—Fox.

VOCATION, or CALLING, in theology, is a gracious act of God in Christ, by which, through his word and Spirit, he calls forth sinful men, who are liable to condemnation and placed under the dominion of sin, from the condition of the animal life, and from the pollutions and corruptions of this world, (2 Tim. 1: 9. Mat. 11: 28. 1 Pet. 2: 9, 10. Gal. 1: 4. 2 Pet. 2: 20. Rom. 10: 13—15. 1 Pet. 3: 19. Gen. 6: 3.) unto "the fellowship of Jesus Christ," and of his kingdom and its benefits; that, being united unto him as their head, they may derive from him life, sensation, motion, and a plenitude of every spiritual blessing, to the glory of God and their own salvation, 1 Cor. 1: 9. Gal. 2: 20. Eph. 1: 3, 6. 2 Thess. 2: 13, 14. (See CALLING.)—Watson.

VOET, or VOETIUS, (GISEBERT,) a Dutch theologian, was born, in 1593, at Heusden; became professor of theology and the Oriental languages at Utrecht; and distinguished himself by his intolerance against the Arminians, and his hostility to Cocceius and Descartes, the latter of whom he accused of being a disguised Jesuit and an atheist. His partisans were called Voetians, in opposition to the Cocceians, who espoused the cause of Cocceius. He died in 1677. His numerous works are now nearly forgotten.—Davenport.

VOID; (1.) Empty; without inhabitants or furniture, Gen. 1: 2. (2.) Destitute of; quite wanting, Deut. 32: 28. (3.) Clear from, Acts 24: 16. (4.) Of no force or effect; hence vows are said to be made void when they are broken, Num. 30: 12—15.

God's law is made void when men break it, and live as if it had no obligation upon them; (Rom. 3: 31. Ps. 119: 126.) and faith is made void when it is useless; as all the promises of God, and our faith that embraces them, would be, if justification and happiness could come by the works of the law, Rom. 4: 14.—Brown.

VOLNEY, (CONSTANTINE FRANCIS CHASSEBEUF, Count de,) an eminent atheistical French writer, was born, in 1757, at Craon, in Brittany. He was educated at Angers, and for three years studied medicine at Paris; but coming into possession of a small estate, he was enabled to indulge his ardent desire of travelling. He spent three years in Syria and Egypt; and on his return published, in 1787, his Travels, which established his reputation. He was elected a member of the states general; and was confined for ten months during the reign of terror; was appointed professor of history at the Normal school in 1791; and in 1795 made a voyage to the United States, whence he did not return till 1798. Napoleon created him a senator and a count. In all circumstances, however, Volney was a friend of freedom. His testimony to the fulfilment of Scripture prophecy, of which there are many instances in this volume, is the more valuable because undesigned. He died April 25, 1820. Among his principal works are, the Ruins; Travels; Lectures on History; and New Researches on Ancient History.—Davenport.

VOLTAIRE, (MARIE FRANCIS AROUET DE,) the most universal of French writers, but an atheist, was born, February 20, 1694, at Chatenay, near Sceaux, and was educated with great care at the Jesuits' college at Paris. One of his tutors predicted that he would be the Coryphæus of deism in France; and the society which the youthful poet frequented, elegant, but licentious and irreligious, did not tend to falsify the prediction. His father destined him for the magistracy, but the literary propensity of the son was unconquerable. In his twenty-second year he was sent to the Bastille, by the regent, on an unfounded suspicion of his being the author of a libel, and, while he was in prison, he formed the plan of the Henriade, and completed the tragedy of Œdipus. The tragedy was represented in 1718 with distinguished success. Two others, by which it was succeeded, were less fortunate. A second unjust confinement in the Bastille induced him to take up his residence in England for three years, where he was favorably received by many illustrious characters, and obtained a large subscription for the Henriade. In 1728 he returned to France, and between that year and 1749 he produced his tragedies of Zara, Alzira, Mahomet, Merope, and many other works; was admitted into the French academy; and was appointed gentleman of the king's chamber in ordinary, and historiographer of France. In 1750 he accepted the invitation of the king of Prussia to Berlin. For a while the sovereign and the poet were on the most amicable terms; but in 1753 their friendship was broken, and Voltaire quitted the Prussian dominions. Paris, in consequence of the intrigues of his enemies, being no longer an eligible abode for him, he lived for short periods at Geneva and other places, and at length purchased an estate at Ferrey, in the Pays de Gex, on which he finally settled. There, in possession of a large fortune, and surrounded by friends, he gave free scope to his indefatigable pen. In April, 1778, he went once more to Paris, after an absence of nearly thirty years. He was received with enthusiasm, his bust was crowned on the stage, and was placed by the academicians next to that of Corneille; but he did not long enjoy these honors, for he expired on the 30th of May; and his death is supposed to have been hastened by an overdose of laudanum, which he took to calm the pain occasioned by strangury, and to procure sleep, of which he had long been deprived.

His death-bed is said to have been a scene of remorse, despair, and indescribable horror. His collected works, in the edition of Beaumarchais, form seven volumes "He was," says a French author, "one of our greatest poets; the most brilliant, the most elegant, the most fertile of our prose writers. There is not, in the literature of any country, either in verse or in prose, an author who has written on so many opposite kinds of subjects, and has so constantly displayed a superiority in all of them." Posterity has reversed this last sentence, and the progress of science has detected innumerable errors and shallow sophisms in his writings, which have destroyed much of their credit with thinking men. Vanity, and not the love of truth, was his ruling passion through life. (See Philosophists.) Douglas on Errors regarding Religion; Fulter's Works; Works of H. More.—Davenport.

VOLUNTARY ASSOCIATIONS. "A new influence," observes the eloquent Douglas, "is arising on the world—the power of voluntary association. There is no object to which this power cannot adapt itself; no resources which it may not ultimately command; and a few individuals, if the public mind is gradually prepared to favor them, can lay the foundations of undertakings which would have baffled the might of those who reared the pyramids; and the few who can divine the tendency of the age before it is obvious to others, and perceive in which direction the tide of public opinion is setting in, may avail themselves of the current, and concentrate every breath that is favorable to their course. The exertions of a scanty number of individuals may swell into the resources of a large party, which, collecting at last all the national energies into its aid, and availing itself of the human sympathies that are in its favor, may make the field of its labor and of its triumph as wide as humanity itself. The elements being favorably disposed, a speck of cloud collects vapors from the four winds, which overshadow the heavens; and all the varying and conflicting events of life, and the no less jarring and discordant passions of the human breast, when once the channel is sufficiently deepened, will rush into one accelerating torrent, and be borne towards their destined end. The power of voluntary association, though scarcely tried as yet, is of largest promise for the future; and when extended upon a great scale, is the influence most removed from the shock of accidents and the decay of earthly things, renewing its youth with renewed generation, and becoming immortal through the perpetuity of the kind.

"The associations which have sprung up so numerous during the last twenty years, and which have struck their roots through every part of the country, and have drawn from the contributions of persons of all ranks a sum which formerly would have been deemed incredible, have been chiefly religious; and it is a happy omen that religion will be predominant in time to come, when it is thus found early awake, and beforehand with other pursuits, in availing itself of the new-born influences which have sprung up in the moral world."

It is indeed a delightful fact that the Spirit of him who went about doing good, who came to seek and to save that which was lost, and therefore explored the wants and the wretchedness of man, that he might relieve them, has beamed forth more brightly in his followers within a few years past than at any preceding period of the world. It has seen that men were to a deplorable extent ignorant of the gospel, and it has set on foot missions to carry to them the tidings of great joy. It has seen them destitute of the word of God, and it has originated Bible societies to supply them. It has found that missionaries and Bibles could not be multiplied fast enough to meet the exigencies of the case, and it has established tract societies to act as pioneers in the great work of preaching the gospel to every creature. It has looked on neglected childhood, and opened Sabbath schools for Christian instruction; on inquisitive but unfurnished youth, and instituted Bible classes to assist in the investigation of the oracles of God. It has learned that knowledge is power, and talents a trust to be occupied and increased for purposes of Christian usefulness, and it has therefore provided means for giving the rising ministry a superior education. It has looked on the fatal ravages of intemperance, and arrayed a powerful public sentiment for its suppression. It has organized peace societies, to prevent, if possible, the evils and barbarities of war. It has looked on the corruptions of the abandoned prisoner, and, by means of prison discipline societies, spread them with all their dreadful circumstances of aggravation, and the only effectual means of cure, before the eyes of a startled world. It has remembered the forgotten seaman, and opened Bethels, and Christian boarding houses, and savings banks, for his benefit; it has thought at last of the unhappy slave, and taken measures for his emancipation, and elevation in the scale of social, intellectual, and moral being. All this has been done by means of voluntary association.

"About forty years ago," says the Christian Spectator, "a few individuals, members of a Baptist ministerial association, in the interior of England, began to feel the duty which rested on them as members of the human family, and as followers of the Redeemer of men, to be doing something for the conversion of the unevangelized nations. Some of them offered to go abroad in this work; others, who staid at home, formed themselves into an association to aid in their support. This was the beginning of the Baptist missions in the East. Out of this has grown all that the world has heard of Serampore, with its schools, its presses, its colleges, its translations of the Scriptures, and its subordinate and sister stations, all operating for the overthrow of that kingdom of darkness to which the millions of the East have been so long subjected." There was originated, and acted upon, the maxim, now so well known as the motto of the Christian world, "Expect great things; attempt great things." "That simple arrangement made in October, 1792, by which it was agreed that Thomas and Carey should go to India, and that their friends in England should contribute for their support, marks a new era in the history of the Christian religion."

In the same spirit the London Missionary society was formed in 1795, by the union of members of the Congregational churches with evangelical members of the church of England. Its missionaries are now numbered by hundreds; and to visit its stations is to penetrate almost every climate, and to circumnavigate the globe. Soon after (1800) rose the Church Missionary society, and the Wesleyan Missionary society, (1814,) founded on the same principle of free consent, directed to the same benevolent object, and crowned with similar success.

The principle of voluntary combination has been in like manner applied both in Europe and America to other and collateral enterprises, to which we have already adverted above. "The story of what all these institutions have accomplished directly, in the prosecution of their several enterprises, if it were fairly and fully told, might well astonish those philosophers and statesmen who in estimating the forces that are moving upon the world, overlook, as insignificant, all the efforts and influences of Christian benevolence. The bare statistics of the presses employed, of the Bibles and other books thrown out upon the world in various languages, of the schools established and in successful operation, of the myriads of children subjected to the gentle but mighty discipline of Sabbath schools, and of the hands and minds at work for the instruction and reformation of the nations—these statistics alone, in the most naked form, would be enough to convince any intelligent and reflecting man, that under such a system of means great changes must ere long be effected in the moral aspect of the world." Douglas on the Advancement of Society; London Quarterly Review, 1825; Christian Spectator, 1832; Benedict's History of All Religions; Harbinger of the Millennium; Reports and Publications of the various Benevolent Societies.

VOLUNTARY PRINCIPLE; a phrase much employed by the Dissenters in England, to designate the proper basis on which religion should rest and be supported; in opposition to the compulsory system incident to a legal church establishment.—Lon. Bap. Mag.

VOW; a gratuitous, solemn, and religious promise or oath. (See ОАТН.) It is more particularly taken for a solemn promise made to God, in which we bind ourselves to do or forbear somewhat for the promoting of his glory. Under the Old Testament dispensation, vows were very common, Judges 11. Num. 30. (See ЖЕРТВАХА.)

But in the New Testament there is no command whatever for the observation of them. Hence it is supposed that vows belong more to the ceremonial law than to the gospel; and that we are to be more dependent on divine grace to keep us, than to make resolutions and vows which we do not know that we shall be able to perform; and we certainly ought not to vow any thing but what we are able to perform.—Hend. Buck.

VOSSIUS, (GERARD JOHN,) an eminent critic and philologist, was born, in 1577, near Heidelberg; studied at Dort and Leyden; was removed from the professorship of rhetoric and chronology at Leyden, in consequence of his favoring the Remonstrants; obtained a prebend in Canterbury cathedral, through the influence of Laud, with a dispensation from residence in England; and died in 1633, professor of history at Amsterdam. His works form six volumes folio.—Davenport.

VOSSIUS, (ISAAC,) son of the foregoing, was born, in 1618, at Leyden, and acquired reputation by publishing, at the age of twenty-one, an edition of the Periplus of Scylax, with a Latin version and notes. After having resided for some time at Stockholm, to which capital he was invited by Christiana, and subsequently in his own country, he settled in England, in 1670, and was made canon of Windsor. He died in 1688. His works are numerous, and bear ample testimony to his learning. He was rude in his manners, sceptical as to religion, but of boundless credulity in all other matters. Charles II. said of him that he believed every thing but the Bible.—Davenport.

WAHABEES; a modern Mohammedan sect, founded by sheik Mohammed, the son of Abd el Waheb, in honor of whom they bear the name. They profess to have reformed Islamism and reduced it to its primitive simplicity. They reject the worship of the prophet as gross idolatry, and adhere strictly to the Koran. They otherwise observe all the religious rites of the Mohammedans, the number of prayers, the genuflections, the fast of the Ramadan, and abstinence from wine and all spirituous liquors. They inflict death on all Mussulmans who do not renounce the worship of Mohammed. The Jews and Christians they leave unmolested.

They originated in the small tribe of Nedshi, in Yemen; but their founder undertook an expedition into Syria, and the regions bordering on the Euphrates; and having collected a number of tribes from the Arabian desert, who became converts to his views, he formed them into a distinct nation, under the government of Eben Send, as their civil governor, and himself as their inman, or spiritual ruler. This appears to have taken place soon after the middle of last century; but no measures were taken against the Wahabees by the Porte till the year 1798, when they were attacked by the pasha of Bagdad, but without effect, which emboldened them to leave the desert; and in 1801 and 1802 they met with signal success, took great booty from the neighboring Mohammedans, and captured Mecca itself, where they established their power in lieu of that of the grand sultan, in virtue of which he had hitherto been regarded as the head and protector of the faithful. The residence of Send was now fixed at Dreich, where he had a palace, and lived in all the pomp and splendor of an eastern prince. In 1803 and 1804 he made unsuccessful attacks on Bagdad and Bassorah, but took Medina in 1804, and in 1805 Jidda, which had formerly baffled all his attempts to subdue it. The Porte was now obliged to pay a heavy tribute for permission to send an escort from Damascus with the caravans of pilgrims that annually proceeded to Mecca; and these caravans were no longer allowed to have weapons, flags, or music, or to enter the holy city on carpets, as formerly. In 1807, the Wahabees stood in the zenith of their power; since which time they have been repeatedly repulsed, but they still continue to form a powerful body, to the great annoyance of the Turkish government, and to the terror of the pilgrims who proceed from all parts of the East to visit the tomb of the prophet.—*Hend. WAKE, (WILLIAM, D. D.) archbishop of Canterbury, a prelate of distinguished learning and ability, as well as of exemplary morals, was born at Blandford, in Dorsetshire, in 1657. He commenced his university education at Oxford, on a studentship at Christchurch, in 1672, and graduated there as master of arts, in 1679. Espousing the Protestant side of the question, he distinguished himself by the zeal with which he wrote in its defence; and, consequently, rose high in favor with William the Third, after the revolution. In 1689, he became chaplain to the king, and deputy clerk of the closet, with a canonry in his college in the course of the same year. To this piece of preferment the rectory of St. James', Westminster, was added in 1693, which he held about eight years, and then vacated it, on being promoted to the deanery of Exeter. In 1705, he was raised to the episcopal bench, as bishop of Lincoln; and, after presiding over that diocese till the beginning of 1716, he was translated to the primacy. Few prelates have conducted themselves in the discharge of this high office with greater dignity, firmness, moderation, or Christian benevolence, than archbishop Wake. His controversial writings, which are numerous, though nervously written, betray no acrimony. The principal of these are, a Reply to the celebrated Bossuet's Exposition of the Doctrine of the Catholic Church, printed in 1686; an English version of the Genuine Epistles of Apostolic Fathers, 1693, octavo; "The State of the Church and Clergy of England considered," folio, 1697; three volumes of Sermons; a variety of tracts against the Doctrines and Practice of the Church of Rome; "An Exposition of the Catechism of the Church of England," which has gone through many editions. This eminent prelate died on the 24th of January, 1737, at Lambeth palace, and his remains were interred at Croydon. Biog. Brit.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

WAKEFIELD, (GILBERT,) a scholar and critic, was born, in 1756, at Nottingham, and was educated at Jesus college, Oxford. After having been a curate at Stockport, and also near Liverpool, he quitted the church, and became classical tutor at the Warrington Dissenting academy. In 1790, he was appointed to the same office in Hackney college, but held it only a year. Being a warm friend to the French revolution, and as warmly hostile to the war against the republic, he took a decided part in the angry politics of that disturbed period. In 1798, he was prosecuted for a Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff's Address to the People of Great Britain, and was sentenced to an imprisonment of two years in Dorchester gaol. During his captivity a subscription amounting to five thousand pounds was raised for him. He died in 1801, soon after his liberation. Among his works are, his own Memoirs; a Translation of the New Testament; Sylva Critica; a Reply to Paine's Age of Reason; and editions of various classics, and of Pope's Homer.—Davenport.

WALDENSES, VALDENSES, VAUDOIS, or people of the valleys; the most celebrated body of Protestant Dissenters during the middle ages. The history of these churches of persecuted saints, these "meek confessors," this "noble army of martyrs," this "most ancient stock of religion," to use the words of Milton, is a topic which of late has been rising in popularity and interest every year. No writer appears to have laid before the public an account so thoroughly digested, accurate, and comprehensive, as Mr. Jones, whose History of the Christian Church, the second volume of which is almost wholly devoted to this subject, has already gone through eight or ten editions. We have endeavored, however, to collect every ray of light from other quarters in making out the following summary view of their history.

1. Origin. It seems to be a serious mistake into which some popular writers have fallen, who represent the Waldenses as originating in France about the year 1170, and deriving their name from the celebrated Peter Waldo. The evidence is now ample, that so far from being a new sect at that period, they had existed under various names as a distinct class of dissenters from the established churches of Greece and Rome in the earliest ages. It is an egregious error to suppose that when Christianity was taken into alliance with the state, by the emperor Constantine, in the beginning of the fourth century, all the orthodox churches were so ignorant of the genius of their religion as to consent to the corruption of a worldly establishment.

Crantz (in his History of the United Brethren) says, "These ancient Christians, who, besides the several names of reproach given them, were at length denominated Waldenses, from one of their most eminent teachers, Peter Waldo, date their origin from the beginning of the fourth century; when one Leo, at the great revolution in religion under Constantine the Great, opposed the innovations of Sylvester, bishop of Rome."

The Cathari, or Puritan churches of the Novatians, also, had at that very period (about A. D. 325) been flourishing as a distinct communion for more than thirty years all over the empire; maintaining, by the acknowledgment even of their enemies the self-styled Catholics, the integrity of the true faith; together with the purity of discipline and the power of godliness, which had generally disappeared from the Catholic churches. (See NOVATIANS.) These Puritans, being exposed to severe and sanguinary persecutions for dissent, from age to age were compelled to shelter themselves from the desolating storm in retirement; and when at intervals they reappear on the page of contemporary history, and their principles are propagated with new boldness and success, they are styled a new sect, and receive a new name, though in reality they are the same people.

The same great principles of attachment to the word of God and determined adherence to the simplicity of its doctrine, discipline, institutions, and worship, in opposition to the innovations of a secular spirit and policy on the one hand, and of false philosophy or of pretended apostolic traditions on the other, may be traced under the name of Novatians, Donatists, Luciferians, and Ærians, from the third to the seventh centuries. They reappear in the Paulicians, who have been falsely accused of Manichæism, but who, from the middle of the seventh to the end of the ninth century, worthily sustained by their preaching, their lives, and their martyrdoms, their claim of being the genuine descendants of the primitive churches. (See PAULICIANS.) From Asia Minor they spread themselves over Europe, through Thrace, Macedonia, Epirus, Bulgaria, Slavonia, Sicily, Lombardy, Liguria, and Milan; whence, about the beginning of the eleventh century, they entered into France. The first discovery of a congregation of this kind in that country was at Orleans, A. D. 1017. A Catholic council was immediately convened, and the Paulician missionaries, with their converts, among whom were many respectable citizens and several of the regular clergy, were all burnt alive. Other advocates of the doctrine were discovered in Languedoc, others in Picardy, and Suabia. They were called in France Bougres or Bulgarians, Tisserands or Weavers, Bos Homos or Good Men.

They soon spread through Germany, where they were called by the old name of Cathari, or, by corruption, Gazari, i. e. Puritans. In Italy the same people were called Paterines, Josephists, Arnoldists, and Fratricelli. As early as the year 1100, it appears they began to be called Waldenses: sixty years before Peter Waldo. Their principles were powerfully advocated, and extended among the most intelligent classes in Languedoc and Provence, from 1110 to 1168, by the celebrated Peter de Bruys, and Henry, his successor; from whom they received the name of Petrobrusians and Henricians. (See BRUYS, PETER DE; and HENRICIANS.) From the places where they flourished they were called Toulousians, Albigenes, and afterwards Poor Men of Lyons, and Leonists. They were condemned by a council at Toulouse in 1119, and again by the great Lateran council at Rome, in 1139. In 1160, some of them crossed from Gascony to England, where they were called Pophicians and Publicans, corruptions of the original name, Paulicians. (See PUBLICANI, and LOLLARDS.) About this time arose the celebrated Peter Waldo, of Lyons, whose labors, learning, zeal, and liberality, greatly extended their principles; in consequence of which many writers, both Catholic and Protestant, have most erroneously regarded him as the parent and founder of the proper Waldenses. (See WALDO, PETER.) Mr. Robinson, however, has shown that this name had a much earlier origin, that it signifies "inhabitants of the valleys," and that it was applied to the persecuted people of whom we have spoken, simply for the reason that great multitudes of them made their residence in the valleys of the Alps and of the Pyrenees, where, age after age, they found an asylum from the tyranny of the church of Rome. This view of the matter, also, is supported by the testimony of their own historians, Pierre Gilles, Ferrin, Leger, Sir Samuel Morland, and Dr. Allix. The names imposed on them by their adversaries, they say, have been intended to vilify and ridicule them, or to represent them as new and different sects.

Their enemies confirm their great antiquity. Reinerius Saccho, the inquisitor, admits that the Waldenses flourished five hundred years before Peter Waldo. This carries us back to the year 660, the time of the appearance of the Paulicians, or rather of their great revival and increase under the labors of Constantine Sylvanus. Indeed, there is not wanting evidence to show that churches of the Puritan faith existed at that time in the West as well as in the East. In the year 553, nine bishops of Italy and Switzerland openly refused communion with the pope of Rome, and the churches under their care persisted in their dissent. To say nothing of the labors of those noble reformers in the bosom of the Catholic church, Paulinus of Aquileia, in the eighth century, Claude of Turin in the ninth, the council of Rheims in the tenth, and Berengarius, archdeacon of Angers, in the eleventh, which yet exerted a powerful influence in opening the eyes of men to the corruptions of Rome; if we will believe the testimony of the suffering Waldenses themselves, their doctrine and discipline had been preserved in all its purity and efficacy from the days of the primitive martyrs, in Spain, France, Germany, Italy, and especially in the valleys of Piedmont.

He earned Dr. Allix, in his "History of the Churches of Piedmont," gives this account:—"That for three hundred years or more, the bishop of Rome attempted to subjugate the church of Milan under his jurisdiction: and at last, the interest of Rome grew too potent for the church of Milan, planted by one of the disciples; inasmuch that the bishop and the people, rather than own their jurisdiction, retired to the valleys of Lucerne and Angrogne, and thence were called Vallenses, Wallenses, or The People in the Valleys."

M. Sismondi, in his late History of the Crusades against the Albigenes, says, "Those very persons who punished the sectaries with frightful torments, have alone taken it upon themselves to make us acquainted with their opinions; allowing at the same time that they had been transmitted in God from generation to generation, almost from the origin of Christianity. We cannot be astonished (he adds) if they have represented them to us with all those characters which might render them the most monstrous, mingled with all the fables which would serve to irritate the minds of the people against those who professed them. Nevertheless, amidst many puerile and calumnious tales, it is still easy to recognise the principles of the Reformation of the sixteenth century among the heretics who are designated by the name of Vaudois or Albigois." Dr. Allix, speaking of the Paterines, some of whom, disciples of Gundulf, one of their teachers, went from Italy to the Netherlands, where they were thrown into prison, says, "Here, then, we have found a body of men in Italy before the year 1026, five hundred years before the Reformation, who believed contrary to the opinions of the church of Rome, and who highly condemned their errors." Mr. Jones adds, "Atto, bishop of Verceulli, had complained of such people eighty years before, and so had others before him, and there is the greatest reason to believe they had always existed in Italy. It is observable that those alluded to by Dr. Allix were brought to light by mere accident." About the year 1040, the Paterines had become very numerous at Milan, which was their principal residence; and in 1259, some of their churches in other Italian cities, we are informed by Reinerius the inquisitor, contained from five to fifteen hundred members. Their churches were organized into sixteen compartments, or associations. They had no connexion with the Catholic church, which they regarded as Antichrist from the time of pope Sylvester. Now, when we reflect that the Paterines, as well as the Paulicians, both in principles and practice, were the same people as the Waldenses, or Poor Men of Lyons, we shall not wonder at the following remarkable words of Reinerius concerning the latter.

"Of all the sects which have been, or now exist, none is more injurious to the church, (i. e. of Rome,) for three reasons: 1. Because it is more ancient. Some aver their existence from the time of Sylvester; others, from the very time of the apostles. 2. Because it is so universal. There is scarcely any country into which this sect has not crept. And, 3. Because all other heretics excite horror by the greatness of their blasphemies against God; but these have a great appearance of piety, as they live justly before men, believe rightly all things concerning God, and confess all the articles which are contained in the creed; only they hate and revile the church of Rome, and in their accusations are easily believed by the people."

Such a concession, from such a source, speaks volumes. Here then is a succession of faithful men, whose apostolic origin, perpetuity, universal though often hidden diffusion, general orthodoxy, evangelical simplicity, and sanctity of character, is admitted by the church of Rome herself; a succession of faithful men, organized, too into Christian churches, claiming to be the true successors of the apostles, protesting against all the corruptions of the patriarchate and the papacy, and for this reason subject to continual persecution from both, through the hands of the secular powers to which they are allied; a church built not on St. Peter alone, but on the entire foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone, and against which the gates of hell have not been able to prevail. May we not say then, in the language of Revelation, "Here is the patience of the saints? These are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus?" Rev. 14: 12.

It also appears that the recesses of the Alps and the Pyrenees were distinguished retreats of these persecuted Christians in the darkest ages of the church. Or, as Mr. Robinson observes, in his Ecclesiastical Researches, "Greece was the parent, Spain and Navarre the nurses, France the step-mother, and Savoy (i. e. Piedmont) the jailer, of this class of Christians called Waldenses."

Principles.—Hence it is hardly to be wondered at, that the Waldenses, like the Scriptures, have been resorted to by all parties of Protestants, in defence of their peculiar sentiments. The papists accused the Protestants of being a new sect, whose principles had no existence till the days of Luther. This charge they all denied, and each party sought to find predecessors, and to trace a line of succession up to the apostles. The perversions of heresy on the one hand, and the corruptions of popery on the other, left no alternative but to find that succession among the Waldenses. The researches of many learned men of different communities, induced by this circumstance, have furnished much important evidence that might otherwise have been lost in oblivion; but the natural consequence has been, that all have been tempted to mould the character of the Waldenses to the support of their own particular views, instead of collecting into one point all the light of history, and calmly abiding the issue. For, after all, an uninterrupted succession, however gratifying it may be to be able to trace it, is necessary only to a church which regulates its practice by tradition, and not by the pure word of God. But such certainly was not the doctrine of the Waldenses, in the times of their purity.

It is necessary here that we distinguish between the ancient and modern Waldenses. It appears from all the accounts we gather of them before the Reformation, that their principles and practice were more pure and scriptural than since that period. From the united attestation of their enemies and their own confessions of faith, we learn that the ancient Waldenses were distinguished chiefly by the following points:—

1. Their attachment to the Scriptures.—They held that the Holy Scriptures are the only source of faith and religion, without regard to the authority of the fathers and tradition. Although they principally used the New Testament, yet, as Usher proves, they regarded the Old also as canonical Scripture. “They translated the Old and New Testament,” says Reinerius, “into the vulgar tongues, and spake and taught according to them.” From their greater use of the New Testament, however, as Venema observes, their adversaries took occasion to charge them with despising the Old. “Hence whatever a doctor of the church teaches,” says Reinerius, “which he does not prove from the New Testament, they consider it as entirely fabulous—contrary to the doctrine of the (Romish) church.” He adds, “I have heard and seen a certain unlearned rustic, who recited the book of Job, word by word, and many who perfectly knew the New Testament.” This is high praise.

2. Their scriptural simplicity, and soundness of belief.—Their adversaries frequently acknowledge this; see the testimony of the inquisitor above. It is amply confirmed also by their own authentic monuments and confessions of faith, of which several are printed at length in Jones’ History of the Church. This is high praise.

From a confession of their faith, in 1120, we extract the following particulars:—(1.) That the Scriptures teach that there is one God, almighty, all-wise, and all-good, who made all things by his goodness; for he formed Adam in his own image and likeness: but that by the envy of the devil sin entered into the world, and that we are sinners in and by Adam. (2.) That Christ was promised to our fathers, who received the law: that so, knowing by the law their unrighteousness and insufficiency, they might desire the coming of Christ, to satisfy for their sins, and accomplish the law by himself. (3.) That Christ was born in the time appointed by God the Father; that is to say, in the time when all iniquity abounded, that he might show us grace and mercy, as being faithful. (4.) That Christ is our life, truth, peace, and righteousness; as also our pastor, advocate, and priest, who died for the salvation of all who believe, and is risen for our justification. (5.) That there is no mediator and advocate with God the Father, save Jesus Christ. (6.) That after this life there are only two places, the one for the saved and the other for the damned. (7.) That we ought to honor the secular powers by subjection, ready obedience, and paying of tribute.

3. Their purity and excellence of life and manners.—Though often accused of the most abominable crimes, the whole evidence goes to show that these accusations were vile calumnies, invented for party purposes by their malignant enemies, the papal priests. Indeed, an ancient inquisitor confesses that “these heretics are known by their manners and conversation, for they are orderly and modest in their behavior and deportment. They avoid all appearance of pride in their dress; they neither indulge in finery, nor are they mean and ragged. They avoid commerce that they may be free from deceit and falsehood. They get their livelihood by manual industry. They are not anxious about amassing riches, but content themselves with the necessaries of life. They are chaste, temperate, and sober. They abstain from anger. Even when they work, they either learn or teach, &c.” Seisselinus, archbishop of Turin, also admits, “Their heresy excepted, they generally live a purer life than other Christians.”

4. Their enlightened fervor, courage, and zeal.—Reinerius assigns as one cause of their great increase, their great zeal. “All of them, men and women, night and day, never cease from teaching and learning. The first lesson,” he adds, “which the Waldenses teach those whom they bring over to their party, is to instruct them what manner of persons the disciples of Christ ought to be; and this they do by the doctrine of the evangelists and apostles, saying that those only are the followers of the apostles who imitate their manner of life.” Hence,

5. Their steady opposition to all corruptions and antichristian usurpations.—“The first error of the Waldenses,” says an ancient inquisitor, “is, that they affirm that the church of Rome is not the church of Jesus Christ, but an assembly of ungodly men, and that she has ceased from being the true church from the time of pope Sylvester, at which time the poison of temporal advantages was cast into the church.” They rejected images, crosses, relics, legends, traditions, anular confessions, indulgences, absolutions, clerical celibacy, orders, titles, tithes, vestments, monkery, masses, and prayers for the dead, purgatory, invocation of saints, and of the virgin Mary, holy water, festivals, processions, pilgrimages, vigils, Lent, pretended miracles, exorcisms, consecrations, confirmations, extreme unction, canonization, and the like. They condemned the use of liturgies, especially in an unknown tongue. They condemned the mystical or allegorical interpretations of Scripture. They condemned, most of all, the wicked lives of both people and clergy in the worldly communion of Rome. (See ANTICHRIST.)

6. Their enlightened views of liberty of conscience.—“They affirm,” says the inquisitor, “that no man ought to be forcibly compelled in matters of faith.” On this point, as also on the next, they were far in advance of the reformers, Luther and Calvin.

7. Their just ideas of the nature and character of a church of Christ.—“That is the church of Christ which hears the pure doctrine of Christ, and observes the ordinances instituted by him, in whatever place it exists.” “The sacraments of the church of Christ are two, baptism and the Lord’s supper: and in the latter Christ has instituted the receiving in both kinds, both for priests and people.” “We consider the sacraments as signs of holy things, or as the visible emblems of invisible blessings. We regard it as proper, and even necessary, that believers use these symbols when it can be done. Notwithstanding which, we maintain that believers may be saved without these signs, when they have neither place nor opportunity of observing them.” Hence Seisselinus remarks, “They say that they alone observe the evangelic and apostolic doctrine, on which account, by an intolerable impudence, they usurp the name of the Catholic church.” Reinerius also observes, “They declare themselves to be the apostles’ successors, to have apostolical authority, and the keys of binding and loosing.—They say that a man is then first baptized when he is received into their community. Some of them hold that baptism is of no advantage to infants, because they cannot actually believe.” On the whole it is evident that they were, and that too on principle, dissenters, not from the church of Rome only, but from all national established churches. Their church officers, Reinerius says, were bishops, elders, and deacons; but the distinction between their bishops and other elders seems to have been only that the former were the official pastors of the churches.

That they understood and practised immersion as baptism is evident, but whether they generally practised infant baptism has been long a matter of dispute. The words of Reinerius seem to imply that in his time (1250) they were of different opinions on this point. The modern Waldenses in the valleys of Piedmont do practise it; but they have so changed in many points, since their amalgamation with the Calvinists at the Reformation, having also received their pastors from them since 1603, that nothing decisive can be hence inferred. Dr. Murdock thinks that the followers of Peter Waldo universally practised infant baptism; but he gives us no authority for this opinion. The only one of their ancient writings which sanctions it is the Spiritual Calendar, but this, if genuine, is of doubtful date. On the contrary, all their other writings, from the Noble Lesson, in 1100, down to their Confession of Faith, in 1655, Dr. Gill affirms to be in favor of the baptism of believers only. It appears certain that the Cathari, the Paterines, the Berengarians, the Arnoldists, Petrobrusians, and Henricians, i. e. the earlier Waldenses, as far as history testifies, vehemently opposed infant baptism. That there were, on the other hand, many among them in after years who adopted the practice, is, in view of all the facts, highly probable. Mr. Jones, in the preface to the fifth edition of his History, says, that the Waldenses were Anti-pedobaptists. Mr. Milner, after saying, "I cannot find any satisfactory proofs that the Waldenses were in judgment Anti-pedobaptists strictly," concludes thus: "I lay no great stress on the subject; for the Waldenses might have been a faithful, humble, and spiritual people, as I believe they were, if they had differed from the general body of Christians on this article."

However this point may be decided, it is now generally acknowledged that the Waldenses were the witnesses for the truth in the dark ages, and that they gave the first impulse to a reform of the whole Christian church, so called. (See WALDO, PETER.)

Persecutions, &c.—For bearing this noble testimony before the church of Rome, these pious people were for many centuries the subjects of a most cruel persecution; and in the thirteenth century the pope instituted a crusade against them, and they were pursued with a fury perfectly diabolical. Their principles, however, continued unsubdued, and at the Reformation their descendants, in number eight hundred thousand, were reckoned among the Protestants, with whom they were in doctrine so congenial.

Some united with the Lutherans, others with the Calvinists, and others still with the Anabaptists of the better sort, afterwards called Mennonites. "The modern Mennonites," says Mosheim, "not only consider themselves as the descendants of the Waldenses, who were so grievously oppressed and persecuted by the despotic heads of the Romish church, but pretend, moreover, to be the purest offspring of those respectable sufferers." Mosheim partially concedes this claim, though Dr. Murdock contests it, by some bold and, we think, unwarrantable assertions. (See MENNONITES.)

In the seventeenth century, the flames of persecution were again rekindled against them by the cruelty of Louis XIV., in 1655 and 1685. In the last, at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, about fifteen thousand perished in the prisons of Pignerol, beside great numbers who perished among the mountains. (See PERSECUTION.) They received, however, the powerful protection and support of England under William III. But still the house of Saxony continued to treat them as heretics, and they were oppressed by a variety of cruel edicts.

When Piedmont was subjected to France, in 1800, the French government (Buonaparte being first consul) placed them on the same footing of toleration with the rest of France; but on the return of the king of Sardinia to Genoa, notwithstanding the intercession of lord William Bentinck, the old persecuting edicts were revived in the end of 1814; and though they have not been subjected to fire and fagot as aforetime, their worship has been restrained, and they were not only stripped of all employments, but by a most providential circumstance only saved from a general massacre.

Recently they have been visited by some pious and benevolent individuals; and the number of the Waldenses (or Vaudois) has been taken at nineteen thousand seven hundred and ten, besides about fifty families residing at Turin; in all twenty thousand. WALDO, (PETER;) a distinguished reformer of the twelfth century, who flourished about the year 1170. He was a citizen and rich merchant of Lyons. Whilst several of the principal citizens, among whom was Waldo, were conversing together, one of them was struck with death before their eyes. This event so impressed him with a sense of human frailty and of the divine wrath, that he renounced the world from that moment, and gave himself up entirely to meditation upon the word of God, and to the promotion of piety. He first began with his own family, and then, as his fame increased, admitted and instructed others, and also translated the Scriptures into the vernacular language of Gaul. That he was not destitute of erudition, as some maintain, Flaccius Illyricus asserts from evidence derived from ancient writings. The clergy of Lyons, when these proceedings came to their knowledge, opposed and prohibited his domestic instructions; but so far was this from proving an obstacle, that he inquired the more diligently into the opinions of the clergy, and into their religious rites and customs, and opposed them the more openly and ardently. Since he taught for four or five years at Lyons, and made many disciples, some think they were from him called Waldenses; but others suppose that the name was derived from Christians of his sect, who had from ancient times inhabited the valleys of Piedmont. The valleys are called Vaux, whence Vaudois; and Peter is said to have borne the name of Waldo because he was a follower of that sect. That the name was used before his time appears from that it is found in a Confession brought to light by Pictetus.

It happened indeed that when the Waldenses were persecuted and banished by the archbishop of Lyons, and Waldo and his companions fled to other regions, from that time they were scattered through Gaul, Italy, Germany, England, and Spain. Some fixed themselves in Narbonne Gaul, which contains the provinces of Provence, Dauphiny, and Savoy; others fled to the Alps and settled colonies in Piedmont and Lombardy. Peter Waldo, having left his country, came to Belgium, and in Picardy, as it is now called, obtained many followers; he afterwards passed into Germany, and having long journeyed through the cities of the Vandals, at last settled in Bohemia. This is confirmed by Dubrarius, in his History of Bohemia, who relates that he arrived there about 1184. The Waldenses themselves, in a conference with the Bohemians, declared that they had been dispersed through Lombardy, Calabria, Germany, Bohemia, and other regions, ever since the year 1160. WALK. This word, in Hebrew, says Mr. Taylor, signifies not merely to advance, step by step, steadily, but to augment a moderate pace till it acquires rapidity. Under this idea, he examines Isa. 40: 31.

It often signifies the conduct of life, the general course of a party, his deportment, demeanor, &c. To worship and serve God truly, is to walk before him: Euoch walk ed with God, maintained and increased in piety towards him; so did Noah: God promises to walk with his people, and his people desire his influence, that they may walk in his statutes. To walk in darkness, (1 John 1: 6, 7.) is to be involved in unbelief and misled by error; to walk in the light, is to be well informed, holy, and happy; to walk by faith, is to expect the things promised or threatened, and to maintain a conduct accordingly; to walk after the flesh, is to gratify fleshly appetites; to walk after the Spirit, is to pursue spiritual objects, to cultivate spiritual affections, to be spiritually minded, which is life and peace.—Calmet.

WALKER, (ROBERT,) commonly called the Wonderful Robert Walker, was born at Seathwaite, England, 1709. Having by his own industry qualified himself for taking holy orders, he was ordained and appointed curate of Seathwaite, with a salary of but five pounds per annum; this salary was afterwards augmented to better than eighteen pounds. Shortly after his appointment as curate he married and received with his wife forty pounds. Like his predecessors in this cure, he was schoolmaster as well as clergyman. He had a family of nine children; one he maintained at Dublin college; yet, at his death, in 1802, he left two thousand pounds. This gives us a striking example of what may be done by perseverance and industry. With all this he was much respected, was remarkagly noticed for his piety; he even refused on principle the adjoining curacy of Upha. He strictly observed the Sabbath, and on this day kept open house for his parishioners; he was strictly economical, and luxury was a stranger in his house.

It might have been concluded, his biographer says, that no one could thus as it were have converted his boy into a machine of industry for the humblest uses, and kept his thoughts so frequently bent upon secular concerns, without grievous injury to the more precious parts of his nature. How could the powers of intellect thrive or its graces be displayed in the midst of circumstances apparently so unfavorable, and when to the direct cultivation of the mind so small a portion of time was allotted?

But in this extraordinary man, things in their nature adverse were reconciled; his conversation was remarkable, not only for being chaste and pure, but for the degree in which it was fervent and eloquent; his written style was correct, simple, and animated. Nor did his affections suffer more than his intellect; he was tenderly alive to all the duties of his pastoral office; the poor and needy he never sent empty away; the stranger was fed and refreshed in passing that unfrequented vale; the sick were visited; and the feelings of humanity found further exercise among the distresses and embarrassments in the worldly estate of his neighbors, with which his talents for business made him acquainted; and the disinterestedness, impartiality, and uprightness which he maintained in the management of all affairs confided to him, were virtues seldom separated in his own conscience from religious obligations. See his Life by Wordsworth; Penny Magazine.

WALKER, (ROBERT.) This talented and richly evangelical preacher of the church of Scotland was born in the Canongate, Edinburgh, where his father was minister, in 1716. He received a regular education at the university of Edinburgh, and was licensed to preach the gospel in 1737; during the following year he was ordained minister at Straiton. He continued here for nine years, and was then transferred to the second charge of South Leith. In 1754, he was again removed to one of the collegiate charges of the high church, Edinburgh. In this interesting post he continued till April 4, 1783, when, in the language of his colleague, Dr. Blair, "the garment of mortality dropped easily off, and this servant of God fell asleep in the Lord."

Seldom, continues Dr. Blair, have any been endowed with a more just discernment of what is beautiful in composition and discourse, or with a more accurate sensibility to what is becoming in manners and behavior. Possessing these talents, he was at the same time modest, unassuming, and unpretending. By the elegance, neatness, and chaste simplicity of composition in his sermons, and by the uncommon grace and energy of his delivery, he rose to a high and justly acquired reputation. But mere reputation was not his object. His whole ambition centered in acting his part with the dignity and propriety that become the sacred character of a Christian minister, and to declare in his preaching all the counsel of God. He published two volumes of Sermons, which, in the judgment of many, are regarded as the best models for ordinary pulpit composition in the English language. See Memoir prefixed to his Sermons.

WALL; an inclosure for defence or separation. The Lord tells the prophet Jeremiah, (1: 18. 15: 20.) that he will make him as a wall of brass, to withstand the house of Israel. Paul says, (Eph. 2: 14.) that Christ, by his death, broke down the partition-wall that separated us from God, or rather the wall that separated Jew and Gentile; so that these two people, when converted, may make but one.—Calmet.

WALLIS, (JOHN,) an eminent mathematician and divine, was born, in 1616, at Ashford, in Kent; was educated at Emmanuel college, Cambridge; obtained, in 1643, the living of St. Gabriel, Fenchurch street; was chosen, in 1649, Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford; was made keeper of the archives there, in 1658; retained his offices at the restoration, and was appointed one of the royal chaplains; was one of the earliest members of the Royal society; and died in 1703. Wallis had consummate skill in the art of deciphering, and his talents were much called into use by the republican and succeeding regal governments. He was also one of the first who gave the power of speech to the deaf and dumb. As a mathematician his fame stands high both in England and on the continent. His mathematical works form three volumes, and his theological a fourth.—Davenport.

WALTER, (NEHEMIAH,) minister of Roxbury, Massachusetts, was born in Ireland, in December, 1663. His father, who settled in Boston, brought him to this country as early as 1679; he was graduated at Harvard college in 1684. He soon afterwards went to Nova Scotia, and lived in a French family. Thus acquiring a correct knowledge of the French language, he was enabled in the latter periods of his life to preach to a society of French Protestants in Boston, in the absence of their pastor. After his return he pursued his studies for some time at Cambridge, where he was appointed a fellow of the college. He was ordained at Roxbury, October 17, 1688, as colleague with the apostolic Eliot. After a ministry of more than sixty-eight years, he died in peace and hope, September 17, 1750, aged eighty-six.

It was a maxim with him, that those religious principles might well be suspected which could not be introduced in an address to heaven; and he was pleased in observing that those who, in their preaching, opposed the system of Calvin, were wont to pray in accordance with it. His whole life was devoted to the great objects of the Christian ministry. He presented a bright example of personal holiness. He published the Body of Death anatomized; an Essay on Indwelling Sin, duodecimo, 1707; on Vain Thoughts; the Great Concern of Man; the Wonderfulness of Christ, 1713; a Convention Sermon, 1723; Unfruitful Hearers Detected and Warned, 1754; a posthumous volume of Sermons on the 55th chapter of Isaiah, octavo, 1755.—Allen.

WALTER, (THOMAS,) minister of Roxbury, Massachusetts, the son of the preceding, was born December 7, 1696, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1713. He was ordained colleague with his father, October 29, 1718, but died January 10, 1725, aged twenty-eight. He was one of the most distinguished scholars and acutest disputants of his day. He was a champion of the doctrines of grace. He said, when dying, "I shall be a most glorious instance of sovereign grace in all heaven." He published a Sermon at the lecture for promoting good singing, 1722; the Scriptures the only Rule of Faith and Practice, 1723; and two other Sermons.—Allen.

WALTON, (ISAAC,) was born in 1593, at Stafford, and kept a linen draper's shop in London, first in the Royal Exchange, and lastly in Fleet street, at the corner of Chancery lane. About 1643 he quitted the metropolis, and he died at Winchester, in 1683. His Complete Angler has long afforded delight not only to those who are fond of angling, but to general readers of taste, and has passed through numerous editions. Walton was a man of piety. His Lives of Hooker, Sanderson, Wotton, Donne, and Herbert, exhibit him in a highly favorable light as a biographer. Wordsworth says of them,

The feather whence the pen
Was shaped that traced the lives of these good men Dropped from an angel's wing.

At a very advanced age Walton published, under the name of Chalkhill, Thealma and Clearchus, a pastoral history.—Davenport.

WALTON, (BRIAN, D. D.,) a divine and oriental scholar, was born in 1600, at Seymour in Cleveland, Yorkshire; was educated at Peter house, Cambridge; obtained considerable ecclesiastical preferment, of which he was deprived during the civil wars; but afterwards, with the assistance of several learned men, published, in 1657, his Polyglott Bible. (See BIBLE, POLYGLOTT.) He was made bishop of Chester at the restoration, but died shortly after, in 1661. He wrote Introductio ad Lectionem Linguarum Orientalium; a Defence of the Polyglott Bible; and a pamphlet on tithes. Brit. Biog.; Jones' Chris. Biog.—Davenport.

WAR, or WARFARE; the attempt to decide a contest or difference between princes, states, or large bodies of people, by resorting to extensive acts of violence, or, as the phrase is, by an appeal to arms. The Hebrews were for-terly a very warlike nation. The books that inform us of their wars display neither ignorance nor flattery; but are writings inspired by the Spirit of truth and wisdom. Their warriors were none of those fabulous heroes or professed conquerors, whose business it was to ravage cities and provinces, and to reduce foreign nations under their dominion, merely for the sake of governing, or purchasing a name for themselves. They were commonly wise and valiant generals, raised up by God, ar.d, under a peculiar commission, executing "his strange work" of judgment. Such were Joshua, Caleb, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, David, Josiah, and the Maccabees, whose names alone are their own sufficient encomiums. Their wars were not undertaken upon slight occasions, or performed with a handful of people. Under Joshua the affair was of no less importance than to make himself master of a vast country which God had given to Abraham; to root out several powerful nations that God had devoted to death; and thus to vindicate an offended Deity, and human nature, which had been debased by a corrupt people, who had filled up the measure of their iniquities to the brim. Under the judges, the matter was to assert their liberty by shaking off the yoke of powerful tyrants, who kept them in subjection. Under Saul and David the same motives prevailed to undertake war.

Indeed all wars not sanctioned by a miraculous commission to execute justice on guilty nations, or by the legitimate exercise of that power which God has intrusted to magistrates for purposes of peace and justice, not of wrong, are totally unjustifiable on the principles of Christianity. In the latter times of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, we observe their kings bearing the shock of the greatest powers of Asia, of the kings of Assyria and Chaldea, Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, and Nebuchadnezzar, who made the whole East tremble. Under the Maccabees a handful of men opposed the whole power of the kings of Syria, and against them maintained the religion of their fathers, and shook off the yoke of their oppressors, who had a design both against their religion and liberty. In still later times, with what courage, intrepidity, and constancy, did they sustain the war against the Romans, who were then masters of the world.

The kings of the Hebrews went to the wars in person, and, in earlier times, fought on foot, as well as the meanest of their soldiers; no horses being used in the armies of Israel before David. The officers of war among the Hebrews were the general of the army, and the princes of the tribes or of the families of Israel, besides other princes or captains, some of a thousand, some of a hundred, some of fifty, and some of ten men. They had also their scribes, who were a kind of commissaries that kept the muster-roll of the troops; and these had others under them who acted by their direction.

Previously to commencing war the heathen nations consulted oracles, soothsayers, necromancers, and also the lot, which was ascertained by shooting arrows of different colors, 1 Sam. 28: 1—10. Isa. 41: 21—24. Ezek. 25: 11. The Hebrews, to whom things of this kind were interdicted, were in the habit, in the early part of their history, of inquiring of God by means of urim and thummim, Judg. 1: 1. 20: 27, 28. 1 Sam. 23: 2. 28: 6. 30: 8. After the time of David, the kings who reigned in Palestine consulted, according to the different characters which they sustained, and the feelings which they exercised, sometimes true prophets, and sometimes false, in respect to the issue of war, 1 Kings 22: 6—13. 2 Kings 19: 2, &c. Sacrifices were also offered, in reference to which the soldiers were said to consecrate themselves to the war, Isa. 13: 3. Jer. 6: 4. 51: 27. Joel 3: 9. Obad. 1. There are instances of formal declarations of war, and sometimes of previous negotiations; 2 Kings 14: 8. 2 Chron. 25: 27. Judg. 11: 12—26.) but ceremonies of this kind were not always observed, 2 Sam. 10: 1—12. When the enemy made a sudden incursion, or when the war was unexpectedly commenced, the alarm was given to the people by messengers rapidly sent forth, by the sound of warlike trumpets, by standards floating on the loftiest places, by the clamor of many voices on the mountains, that echoed from summit to summit, Judg. 3: 27. 6: 34. 7: 22. 19: 29, 30. 1 Sam. 11: 7, 8. Isa. 5: 26. 13: 2. 18: 3. 30: 17. 49: 2. 62:

10. Military expeditions commonly commenced in the spring, (2 Sam. 11: 1.) and were continued in the summer; but in the winter the soldiers went into quarters. The firm persuasion that God fights for the good against the wicked discovers itself in the Old Testament, and accounts for the fact, that, not only in the Hebrew, but also in the Arabic, Syriac, and Chaldaic languages, words which originally signify justice, innocence, or uprightness, signify likewise victory; and that words whose usual meaning is injustice or wickedness, also mean defeat or overthrow. The same may be said in respect to words which signify help or aid, inasmuch as the nation which conquered received aid from God, and God was its helper, Ps. 7: 9. 9: 20. 6: 26. 1: 35. 24: 43. 1: 44. 5: 75. 3: 76. 13: 78. 9: 82. 8: 1 Sam. 14: 45. 2 Kings 5: 1. Isa. 59: 17. Hab. 3: 8.

The attack of the Orientals in battle has always been, and is to this day, characterized by vehemence and impetuosity. In case the enemy sustain an unaltered front, they retreat, but it is not long before they return again with renewed ardor. It was the practice of the Roman armies to stand still in the order of battle, and to receive the shock of their opposers. To this practice there are allusions in the following passages: 1 Cor. 16: 13. Gal. 5: 1. Eph. 6: 14. Phil. 1: 27. 1 Thess. 3: 8. 2 Thess. 2: 15. The Greeks, while they were yet three or four furlongs distant from the enemy, commenced the song of war; something resembling which occurs in 2 Chron. 20: 21. They then raised a shout, which was also done among the Hebrews, 1 Sam. 17: 52. Josh. 6: 6. Isa. 5: 29, 30. 17: 12. Jer. 4: 19. 25: 30. The war-shout in Judges 7: 20 was as follows: "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon." In some instances it seems to have been a mere yell or inarticulate cry. The mere march of armies with their weapons, chariots, and trampling coursers, occasioned a great and confused noise, which is compared by the prophets to the roaring of the ocean, and the dashing of the mountain torrents, Isa. 17: 12, 13. 27: 2. The descriptions of battles in the Bible are very brief; but although there is nothing especially said in respect to the order in which the battle commenced and was conducted, there is hardly a doubt that the light-armed troops, as was the case in other nations, were the first in the engagement. The main body followed them, and, with their spears extended, made a rapid and impetuous movement upon the enemy. Hence swiftness of foot in a soldier is mentioned as a ground of great commendation, not only in Homer, but in the Bible, 2 Sam. 2: 19—24. 1 Chron. 12: 8. Ps. 18: 33. Those who obtained the victory were intoxicated with joy; the shout of triumph resounded from mountain to mountain, Isa. 42: 11. 52: 7, 8. Jer. 1: 2. Ezek. 7: 7. Nahum 1: 15. The whole of the people, not excepting the women, went out to meet the returning conquerors with singing and with dancing, Judg. 11: 34—37. 1 Sam. 18: 6, 7. Triumphal songs were uttered for the living, and elegies of the dead, 2 Sam. 1: 17, 18. 2 Chron. 35: 25. Judg. 5: 1—31. Exod. 15: 1—21. Monuments in honor of the victory were erected, (2 Sam. 8: 13. Ps. 60: 1.) and the arms of the enemy were hung up as trophies in the tabernacle, 1 Sam. 31: 10. 2 Kings 11: 10. The soldiers who conducted themselves meritoriously were honored with presents, and had the opportunity of entering into honorable matrimonial connexions, Josh. 14: 1 Sam. 17: 25. 28: 17. 2 Sam. 18: 11. WARBURTON, (WILLIAM,) an eminent prelate and writer, was born in 1698, at Newark. After having been educated at Oskham and Newark schools, he served his clerkship to an attorney, and was admitted to practice. Being, however, of the law, he turned to the church, and took deacon's orders in 1723. To the peculiar education of Warburton may be ascribed most of the peculiarities of his character; himself, at first an obscure provincial attorney, undisciplined in the court of academical study, and refused, when he had even risen to celebrity, a common academical honor, he cherished, in after life, a great dislike to the regular disciplinarians of learning; and it was at once his delight and pride to confound the followers of the beaten path in study, by reconduce erudition, and to dazzle and astound the supporters of established principles and maxims, by combating them with a force of reason and strength of logic which was unexampled as it was audacious. His learning and his mental powers were equally established without assistance, and he loved to show how his inbred mental vigor had triumphed over difficulties. From the same source arose both the excellencies and defects of his character.

In 1726 he obtained the vicarage of Greasley, and in 1729 the rectory of Brant Broughton. Between 1723 and 1729 he published Miscellaneous Translations; an Inquiry into the Causes of Prodiges and Miracles; and a Treatise on the Legal Judicature of Chancery. These were preludes to his great works, the Alliance between Church and State, which appeared in 1738, and the first volume of his Divine Legation, which was given to the world in 1738. His Vindication of Pope's Essay on Man acquired for him the friendship of that poet, who introduced him to Mr. Allen, of Bath, and thus laid the foundation of his fortune. He rose successively to be king's chaplain, prebend of Durham, dean of Bristol, and bishop of Gloucester; to the last of these dignities he attained in 1759. He died in 1779. His original works were collected in six quarto volumes by his friend bishop Hurd.

"He was," says Johnson, "a man of vigorous faculties; a mind fervid and vehement; supplied, by incessant and unlimited inquiry, with wonderful extent and variety of knowledge, which yet had not oppressed his imagination, nor clouded his perspicacity. To every work he brought a memory full fraught, together with a fancy fertile of original combinations, and at once exerted the powers of the scholar, the reasoner, and the wit. But his knowledge was too multifarious to be always exact, and his pursuits were too eager to be always cautious. His abilities gave him a haughty consequence, which he disdained to conceal or mollify; and his impatience of opposition disposed him to treat his adversaries with such contemptuous superiority as made his readers commonly his enemies, and excited against the advocate the wishes of some who favored the cause. He seems to have adopted the Roman emperor's determination, 'oderint dum metuant;' he used no allurements of gentle language, but wished to compel, rather than to persuade. His style is copious without selection, and forcible without neatness; he took the words that presented themselves; his diction is coarse and impure, and his sentences are unmeasured."

It is necessary, however, to observe, that while Warburton's temper and spirit was not always such as adorned the gospel of Jesus Christ, yet that his personal piety was indubitable; his conscience tender and vigorous; his religion habitual; his faith in Christ active, permanent, and sincere; his benevolence considerable; and his anxiety to promote the spread of Christianity but seldom surpassed. WARD, (СЕТЬ,) a prelate and mathematician, was born in 1618, at Buntingford; was educated at Sidney college, Cambridge; became Savilian professor of astronomy; was made bishop of Exeter in 1662, whence, in 1677, he was translated to Salisbury, and died in 1689. He wrote various mathematical works; Sermons; a Treatise against Hobbes; and a Philosophical Essay on the Being and Attributes of God, the Immortality of the Soul, &c.—Davenport.

WARD, (WILLIAM,) missionary to Eastern India, was born at Derby, England, October 20, 1769. In his youth he was remarkable for a steadiness and desire of improvement very rarely observed in young persons; and, from these and other singular traits in his character, many of his associates were impressed with an idea that he would fill an important station in the world.

On leaving school, he was apprenticed to Mr. Drewry, printer and bookseller, of Derby; and after the expiration of his time, he remained with him two years; during which period he was engaged in conducting the publication of the Derby Mercury. From Derby he removed to Stafford, where he commenced the publication of a newspaper, the property of another branch of Mr. Drewry's family. After this he went to Hull, where he followed his business, and was for some time editor of the Hull Advertiser. While at Hull, he joined the Baptist church, under the pastoral care of Mr. Beaton, for whom he continued to entertain sentiments of the highest esteem and affection. About this time he was introduced to Mr. Fishwick, then of Newcastle, on Tyne, a very liberal gentleman, who encouraged the desire which Mr. Ward felt to devote himself to the ministry, and undertook to defray the expenses of his preparatory studies. In thus leaving his pursuits for this work, he could not be supposed to be influenced by motives of worldly interest, as his prospects in life were then improving; and he relinquished them for an employment both more laborious and uncertain.

In August, 1797, he went to Ewood hall, near Halifax, in Yorkshire, an academy kept by Dr. John Fawcett, a man in every respect qualified for the important duty of preparing young men for the ministry. While at Ewood hall, Mr. Ward had frequent opportunities of preaching in the neighborhood, and he established a lecture in a village called Midsley, about half a mile distant. At the village of Gildersome he preached very frequently; and was so much liked by his hearers that he was earnestly solicited to take the charge of the church there; but Providence designed him for a wider field.

On the 7th of May, 1799, he was set apart to the office of a missionary, at Olney, in Bucks; and embarked for India on the 24th of May, accompanied by two or three of his friends. After a voyage of about twenty weeks, they arrived off Calcutta, but were prevented landing there by an order of government; they were, therefore, obliged to land at Serampore, where they were kindly received by the governor. Here he and his friends were shortly joined by Dr. Carey, who, finding that they would not be permitted to join him, removed to them. Mr. Ward, from this time, took upon himself the superintendance of the printing department for the mission, in which station he was eminently useful. Though he was much engaged in these labors, he preached occasionally in the neighboring places, and at Calcutta, as well as in the interior parts of the country. From this time Mr. Ward was actively engaged in printing translations of the Scriptures, making journeys into the interior of the country, and establishing stations in different parts.

The missionaries about this period were much inconvenienced and impeded in their labors by the executive government in those parts; they were prohibited preaching and distributing tracts; and some who had arrived from England were refused permission to proceed to Serampore. Attempts were made to prejudice the British cabinet against them; but, through the exertions of their friends in England, and particularly of the distinguished Andrew Fuller, they were unsuccessful; and the missionaries were allowed to go on in their work.

Mr. Ward was now more actively employed than ever, as the stations increased and new openings presented themselves. A chapel had been erected at Calcutta, which required constant supplies, and Mr. Ward took his share of these engagements, together with the correspondence and other incidental avocations. In the year 1812 one of his children died, a little girl about six years of age; this loss he felt very severely; and in the same year an accident happened, which was very destructive to the mission, and afflicting particularly to Mr. Ward; this was the loss of their printing office, occasioned by fire, and the destruction of the types of the Scriptures, which had been printed, to the amount of about ten thousand pounds; it was feared that this would put a stop to the printing business entirely; but they were able to recover some moulds uninjured, by which they cast new types; and their friends in England contributed very largely to their assistance; thus they were enabled to recommence the printing in a few months, and push it more vigorously than ever.

In 1819, Mr. Ward, who was then much indisposed, resolved on visiting England. He was encouraged in this project by the hope of raising subscriptions in England and America for a college, which was about to be built at Serampore. He, accordingly, embarked, and arrived at Liverpool in June, 1819, in a very weak state; he was, however, soon recovered sufficiently to make several journeys in the interior counties of England; after which he passed over to Holland, and the north of Germany; on his return from the continent he again embarked for New York, where he was kindly received, and much forwarded in his undertaking. He then returned to England, but made only a short stay, as he was anxious to get to India.

After having collected a considerable sum for the college, he left England for India in May, 1821, accompanied by Mrs. Marshman. He was spared but a short time after his return to Serampore; and though his friends had hoped that his health was re-established, he was very ill soon after his arrival, and died rather suddenly, from an attack of the cholera, in March, 1821. He published "A View of the History, Literature, and Religion of the Hindoos," &c., four volumes, octavo, and "Farewell Letters to his friends in England and America."—Jones' Chris. Biog.

WARREN, (EDWARD,) a missionary to Ceylon, was born in 1786; graduated at Middlebury college in 1808; and studied theology at Andover. He sailed for Ceylon in October, 1812. After a residence of some years, falling into the consumption, he for his health sailed with Mr. Richards, in April, for Cape Town, where he died, August 11, 1818, aged thirty-two. Archdeacon Twistleton said of him and Mr. Richards, "Men of more amiable manners and purer lives I never saw."—Allen.

WARWICK, (MARY, the right honorable countess of,) distinguished for her piety and virtue, was born in 1624, and was the daughter of Richard Boyle, the first earl of Cork, and of Catharine, only daughter of Sir Geoffrey Fenton. In the early part of her life she gave no evident signs of conversion, but entered into the gayeties and dissipations of the world; and partaking of too many of its follies, till by affliction and retirement, united to the lessons of religion and virtue, she learned, that to enjoy an eternity of happiness in heaven, preparation on earth was necessary; and therefore, before time had dimmed the lustre of her eye, or age had changed the dimple to the wrinkle, she chose Mary's part, and, like her, found it never could be taken from her; it was her comfort while living, and her hope in death.

She was exalted by birth, rank, and fortune; but she required neither borrowed shades nor reflective lights to illumine her path; she moved in her own grandeur, and the lustre of her virtues remained untarnished, by the unsullied purity of her excellent mind. She frequently assured her friends, that she had no cause to repent the exchange of the shadowy and unsubstantial pleasures of this world for the solid and satisfactory joys she found in religion.

She read and wrote much; and two years before her death, she began to keep a diary, in which she faithfully recorded her most secret imperfections; for which purpose she rose earlier in the morning. As a wife, she was affectionate and obedient to her husband; in health she was his companion, in sickness his nurse, and in affliction his adviser and friend. She was an incomparable mother, which appeared in the education of her children, which reflected honor upon her head and heart, and particularly in that of her son, the young lord Rich, who died some time before her, and whose death she bore with that pious fortitude which marked her character. She was a kind and indulgent mistress, taking care of the souls of her servants, which appeared in the earnestness with which she exacted their constant attendance on the public worship of God, and by her personal instruction and admonition. She died on the 12th of April, 1678, in the fifty-fourth year of her age; an eminent pattern of zeal for the glory of God, and charity for the good of men. She died in the actual exercise of prayer, according to her own desire; for there were many that could witness that they had often heard her say, "that if she might choose the manner and circumstances of her death, she would die praying."—Jones' Chris. Biog.

WASHING, purification. (See BATHING, and BAPTISM.)
WASHING OF FEET. The Orientals used to wash the feet of strangers who came off a journey, because they commonly walked with their legs bare, their feet being defended by sandals only. See Gen. 18: 4. 24: 32. 43: 24. This office was commonly performed by servants and slaves. Abigail answers David, who sought her in marriage, that she should think it an honor to wash the feet of the king's servants, 1 Sam. 25: 41. When Paul recommends hospitality, he would have a widow, assisted by the church, to be one who had washed the feet of saints, 1 Tim. 5: 10. In a moral sense, to wash the feet signifies to purify from earthly and carnal affections.

Our Savior, after his last supper, gave his last lesson of humility by washing his disciples' feet: (John 13: 5, 6.) "Then cometh he to Simon Peter; and Peter saith unto him, Lord, dost thou wash my feet? Jesus answered him, If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me. Simon Peter saith unto him, Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head."—Calmet.

WASHINGTON, (GEORGE,) the illustrious founder of American independence, was born in 1732, in the county of Fairfax, in Virginia, where his father was possessed of great landed property. He was educated under the care of a private tutor, and paid much attention to the study of mathematics and engineering. He was first employed officially by general Dinwiddie, in 1753, in remonstrating to the French commander on the Ohio for the infraction of the treaty between the two nations. He subsequently negotiated a treaty of amity with the Indians on the back settlements, and for his honorable services received the thanks of the British government. In the unfortunate expedition of general Braddock he served as aid-de-camp; and on the fall of that brave but rash commander, he conducted the retreat to the corps under colonel Dunbar in a manner that displayed great military talent. He retired from the service with the rank of colonel; but while engaged in agriculture at his favorite seat of Mount Vernon, he was elected senator in the national council for Frederic county, and afterwards for Fairfax. At the commencement of the revolutionary war, he was selected as the most proper person to take the chief command of the provincial troops. From the moment of taking upon himself this important office, in June, 1775, he employed the great powers of his mind to his favorite object, and by his prudence, his valor, and presence of mind, he deserved and obtained the confidence and gratitude of his country, and finally triumphed over all opposition. The record of his services is the history of the whole war. When the independence of his country was established by the treaty of peace, Washington resigned his high office to the congress, and, followed by the applause and the grateful admiration of his fellow-citizens, retired into private life.

His high character and services naturally entitled him to the highest gifts his country could bestow, and on the organization of the government he was called upon to be the first president of the states which he had preserved and established. It was a period of great difficulty and danger. The unsubdued spirit of liberty had been roused and kindled by the revolution of France, and many Americans were eager that the freedom and equality which they themselves enjoyed should be extended to the subjects of the French monarch. Washington anticipated the plans of the factions, and by prudence and firmness subdued insurrection and silenced discontent, fill the parties which the intrigues of Genet, the French envoy, had roused to rebellion, were convinced of the wisdom of their measures, and of the wisdom of their governor. The president completed, in 1796, the business of his office by signing a commercial treaty with Great Britain, and then voluntarily resigned his power, at a moment when all hands and all hearts were united again to confer upon him the sovereignty of the country.

Restored to the peaceful retirement of Mount Vernon, he devoted himself to the pursuits of agriculture; and though he accepted the command of the army in 1798, it was merely to unite the affections of his fellow-citizens to the general good, and was one more sacrifice to his high sense of duty. He died, after a short illness, on the 14th of December, 1799. He was buried with the honors due to the noble founder of a happy and prosperous republic.

History furnishes no parallel to the character of Washington. He stands on an unapproached eminence; distinguished almost beyond humanity for self-command, intrepidity, soundness of judgment, rectitude of purpose, and deep, ever-active piety. Washington was a man of prayer. His exalted character was formed under the influence of Christian principles. In his Farewell Address to the People of the United States, which ought to be engraved on their hearts, he gives his own deep conviction of the value of RELIGION and MORALITY as the elements of national prosperity. "In vain," he observes, "would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these GREAT PILLARS of HUMAN HAPPINESS, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens." See Marshall, Bancroft, Ramsay, and Sparks' Life of Washington. Also a smaller work published by the American Sunday School Union, in which his religious character is more fully developed from authentic sources.—Davenport.

WATCH; a period of time. (See HOUR.)

WATCHERS. (See ΑCOEΜΕΤΕ.)

WATCHFULNESS; vigilance, or care to avoid surrounding enemies and dangers. We are to watch against the insinuations of Satan; the allurements of the world; the deceitfulness of our hearts; the doctrines of the erroneous; and, indeed, against every thing that would prove inimical to our best interests. We are to exercise this duty at all times, in all places, and under all circumstances. 1 Cor. 16: 13. Luke 12: 37.

To watch, is also to wait for and expect: thus we are, 1. To watch the providence of God. 2. The fulfilment of the prophecies. 3. God's time for our deliverance from troubles, Ps. 130. 4. We are to watch unto prayer, Eph. 6: 18. 5. For death and judgment, Mark 13: 37. Flavel on Keeping the Heart; R. Walker's Sermons.—Hend. Buck.

WATER. In the sacred Scriptures, bread and water are commonly mentioned as the chief supports of human life; and to provide a sufficient quantity of water, to prepare it for use, and to deal it out to the thirsty, are among the principal cares of an Oriental householder. The Moabites and Ammonites are reproached for not meeting the Israelites with bread and water; that is, with proper refreshments, Dent. 33: 4.

To furnish travellers with water is, even in present times, reckoned of so great importance, that many of the Eastern philanthropists have been at considerable expense to procure them that enjoyment. The nature of the climate, and the general aspect of the Oriental regions, require numerous fountains to excite and sustain the languid powers of vegetation; and the sun, burning with intense heat in a cloudless sky, demands for the fainting inhabitants the verdure, shade, and coolness, which vegetation produces. Hence fountains of living water are met with in the towns and villages, in the fields and gardens, and by the sides of the roads and of the beaten tracks on the mountains; and a cup of cold water from these wells is no contemptible present. "Fatigued with heat and thirst," says Carne, "we came to a few cottages in a palm wood, and stopped to drink of a fountain of delicious water. In this northern climate no idea can be formed of the luxury of drinking in Egypt: little appetite for food is felt; but when, after crossing the burning sands, you reach the rich line of woods on the brink of the Nile, and pluck the fresh limes, and, mixing their juice with Egyptian sugar and the soft river water, drink repeated bowls of lemonade, you feel that every other pleasure of the senses must yield to this. One then perceives the beauty and force of those similes in Scripture, where the sweetest emotions of the heart are compared to the assuaging of thirst in a thirsty land."

It is still the proper business of the females to supply the family with water. From this drudgery, however, the married women are exempted, unless when single women are wanting. The young women of Guzerat daily draw water from the wells, and carry the jars upon the head; but those of high rank carry them upon the shoulder. In the same way Rebecca carried her pitcher; and probably for the same reason, because she was the daughter of an Eastern prince, Gen. 24: 45.

Water sometimes signifies the element of water; (Gen. 1: 10.) and, metaphorically, trouble and afflictions, Ps. 69: 1. In the language of the prophets, waters often denote a great multitude of people, Isa. 8: 7. Rev. 17: 15. Water is put for children or posterity; (Num. 24: 7. Isa. 48: 1.) for the clouds, Ps. 104: 3. Waters sometimes stand for tears; (Jer. 9: 1, 7.) for the ordinances of the gospel, Isa. 12: 3. 35: 6, 7. 55: 1. John 7: 37, 38. "Stolen waters" denote unlawful pleasures with strange women, Prov. 9: 17. The Israelites are reproached with having forsaken the fountain of living water, to quench their thirst at broken cisterns; (Jer. 2: 13.) that is, with having quitted the worship of the all-sufficient God, for the worship of vain and helpless idols. And this is now the guilt and folly of every sinner. "Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this!"—Watson.

WATERLAND, (DANIEL, D. D.) a learned divine and controversialist, was born in 1683, at Waseley, in Lincolnshire, and was educated at Lincoln free school, and at Magdalen college, Cambridge, of the last of which seminaries he became master. He died in 1740, chancellor of York, archdeacon of Middlesex, canon of Windsor, and vicar of Twickenham. Among his works are, a History of the Athanasian Creed; Scripture Vindicated; a Defence of Christ's Divinity; a Review of the Doctrine of the Eucharist; and Remarks on Dr. Clarke's Exposition of the Church Catechism.—Davenport.

WATSON, (RICHARD, D. D.) an eminent prelate and writer, was born in 1737, at Haversham, in Westmoreland. He commenced his education under his father, who was master of the free grammar-school at his native place, and he completed it at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he studied with unremitting application. In 1764 he was chosen professor of chemistry, and, in 1771, regius professor of divinity. In politics he was of the liberal school, and he made a full avowal of his opinions in a sermon, called the Principles of the Revolution vindicated, which he preached before the university in 1776, and which excited much comment. In the same year he published his Apology for Christianity, in answer to Gibbon. In 1782 he was made bishop of Llandaff; but George III. having imbibed a prejudice against him, he obtained no further promotion. He died July 4, 1816. Among his other works are, an Apology for Christianity, in answer to the scepticism of Gibbon; Chemical Essays; Apology for the Bible, in answer to Thomas Paine; and his own Memoirs.—Davenport.

WATSON, (RICHARD,) a late eminent Wesleyan Methodist minister, was born at Barton, on the Humber, Lincolnshire, February 22, 1781. His father was a respectable saddler of Barton, and a freeman of the city of Lincoln. Mr. Watson is to be ranked with the mournful number of great minds which have been united, throughout life, with weak bodily frames. From childhood he was of delicate health, and subject at an early period to such frequent fits of drowsiness as to fall asleep in the streets. A passionate fondness for books soon, however, overcame the obstacles to his indulgence; and while yet a youth he concealed the bar of his father's shop-door, that, under the pretext of watching against thieves, he might have the opportunity of sitting up all night to read a favorite author. His parents appear to have observed his superior talents; and gave, what in their time and circumstances was no small proof of it, their consent to his learning Latin. At school, being "a fine reader," it was prognosticated of him that he would be a preacher.

Few young men have pressed through greater difficulties in a ministerial course. The English dissenters, (Independents, we believe,) among whom his father ranked, possessed at this period neither half their present disposition, nor present means of educating candidates for the ministry. At fourteen years of age, therefore, Richard Watson was apprenticed to a carpenter. He was as remarkably tall in person, we are told, as precocious in mind, and playful in disposition even to mischievousness.

We can discover, we think, the embryo polemic in the youth of fifteen; for he owed, at this period, his conversion to his hatred of Calvinism. The worthy helpmate of a watchmaker, his particular friend and assistant in mathematical studies, was of this obnoxious school, "talkative and violent." To provide himself with arguments against her attacks, young Watson first sought the Methodists; and "the word," says Mr. Jackson, "came with power to his heart." He was now no longer solicitous for controversy, but for a better acquaintance with himself; and "not many days elapsed after he was convinced of sin, before he was made a happy partaker of pardoning grace." We can neither doubt that he largely partook this grace, nor that he was in after years one of the ripest and ablest advocates of it in England; but who, on the other hand, can dispute the powerful influence of the female polemic's unbappy temper on the thwarted young mathematician? Mr. Watson, in particular passages of his printed works, discovers an antipathy to the name and forms of Calvinistic argument, which has, we confess, often surprised us. It is singularly unlike the ordinary march of his majestic mind and the style of his latter preaching, as reported to us. Will not a Christian philosophy detect in many a personal anecdote of this kind a very obvious source of prejudices not otherwise to be accounted for?

Before quite fifteen he attempted to call his fellow-men to repentance, and first publicly preached, February 23, 1796, at Boothby, near Lincoln. His master readily agreeing to cancel his indentures, we soon after find him a regular local Wesleyan preacher. Like Robert Hall, he is said to have stopped short on one occasion for want of "acceptable words." His first controversy was with a countryman of our own, Elhanan Winchester, at this time on a visit to England; against whose system of universal restoration he delivered a sermon at Barrow, which produced a correspondence between the parties. At the age of nineteen he printed "An Apology for the People called Methodists, by Richard Watson, Preacher of the Gospel." A treatise of Dr. Watts, on the Glory of Christ, now falling in his way, is said so far to have warped his sentiments, as to induce him to use some loose expressions in conversation respecting our Lord's divinity. Orthodox zealots interfered, and whispered away his reputation; so that when he went to the accustomed place of village worship to preach, not only was the door shut against him, but a night's lodging refused. In a temper which he afterwards condemned, on this he withdrew from his public work; entered for a short time into business; and was not agate reconciled to the system of his first friends for sixteen years.

In this interval, he labored very successfully among the Methodists of the New Connexion. We cannot here trace the particulars of his diversified and brilliant career. In 1812 he resumed his station in the older Wesleyan body; and his history comprehends from this period with the usual details of Methodist removals, proof abundant of the gradual expansion of his heart and mind; of his happy manner of addressing the conscience of all classes; and his noble superiority to the sectarianism of many of his associates. He attracted everywhere the notice of the liberal and intelligent; was wisely appointed to the English cities and larger towns; became the senior secretary of the Wesleyan Missionary society; and was ranked among the first of the evangelical preachers of his country. He was, altogether, as a divine, one of the most able of modern evangelical Arminians.

As an author Mr. Watson is chiefly known by his Exposition on Matthew, &c., Theological Institutes, and Biblical and Theological Dictionary. To the latter work, we cheerfully repeat our acknowledgments for much valuable matter in the composition of this. He also ably replied to the reflections upon Methodism in Mr. Southey's Life of Wesley, and to his colleague, Dr. A. Clarke, on the Sonship of Christ. His piece on this latter topic induced the conference to resolve on admitting no new minister of the opposite sentiment into the Wesleyan connexion. As a principal agent of missions, we may add, he was at once distinguished by the affection and wisdom of his counsels, and the efficiency of his plans. He was also the powerful and respected advocate with the British government of the moral and spiritual interests of the colonies; and an earnest promoter of the anti-slavery cause.

The death of this great and good man, which took place January 8, 1833, was occasioned by the complete obliteration of the gall-duct, a case of rare occurrence, and one during which he must have suffered far more, according to the testimony of his medical friends, than many victims of death by fire. But his mind, fortified by the principles of Christianity, rose superior to pain, and bequeathed to sym-thizing and admiring survivors the noblest lessons of the power of faith. See Life of Rev. R. Watson, by Mr. Jackson.

WATTS, (DR. ISAAC,) was born at Southampton, the 17th of July, 1674. His father, Mr. Isaac Watts, was the master of a very flourishing boarding-school in that town, which was in such reputation that gentlemen's sons were sent to it from America and the West Indies for education. He was a most pious, exemplary Christian, and an honorable deacon of the church of Protestant Dissenters assembling in that place. He was imprisoned more than once for his non-conformity; and during his confinement, his wife was known to sit on a stone near the prison door, suckling her son Isaac. He began to learn Latin at four years old, in the knowledge of which, as well as the Greek language, he made such progress under the care of the Rev. Mr. Pinhorn, a clergyman of the establishment, that he became the delight of his friends, and the admiration of the neighborhood. In 1690 he was sent to London for academical education, under the Rev. Mr. Thomas Rowe; and, in 1693, in his nineteenth year, he joined in communion with the church under the pastoral care of his tutor.

Dr. Watts was early attached to the composition of poetry; and indeed he stated that he had amused himself with verse from fifteen years old to fifty. In his early years, he took great pains in the acquisition of knowledge. The works he read he generally abridged, and thus impressed more deeply on his mind the knowledge he attained. His Latin Theses, written when young, were very excellent.

After the doctor had finished his academical studies, at the age only of twenty years, he returned to his father's house at Southampton, where he spent two years in reading, meditation, and prayer; in reading, to possess himself of ampler knowledge; in meditation, by which he might take a full survey of useful and sacred subjects, and make what he had acquired by reading his own; and prayer, to engage the divine influences to prepare him for that work to which he was determined to devote his life, and the importance of which greatly affected his mind. Having thus employed two years at his father's, he was invited by Sir John Hartopp, Bart., to reside in his family at Stoke Newington, near London, as tutor to his son, where he continued five years, and by his behavior procured himself such esteem and respect, as laid the foundation of that friendship which subsisted between him and his pupil during the whole of his life. But while he assisted Mr. Hartopp's studies, he did not neglect his own; for not only did he make further improvement in those parts of learning in which he instructed the young gentleman, but he applied himself to reading the Scriptures in the original tongues, and the best commentators, critical and practical.

The doctor began to preach on his birthday, 1698, at twenty-four years of age, and was the same year chosen assistant to Dr. Isaac Chauncy, pastor of the church then meeting at Mark lane, London. But his public labors, which met with general acceptance, were interrupted by a threatening illness of five months, which was then thought to have originated from the fervor of his zeal in preaching the gospel. However, his sickness did not discourage him from renewing his delightful work, as soon as Providence was pleased to restore him to health. In January, 1701-2, the doctor received a call from the church above mentioned, to succeed doctor Chauncy in the pastoral office, which he accepted the very day king William died, on the 8th of March, 1701-2, notwithstanding the discouraging prospect which that event particularly gave to non-conformist ministers, and the fears with which it filled the hearts of dissenters in general. But he had set his hand to the plough, and would not look back; and accordingly he was solemnly ordained to the pastoral office, on the 18th of March following. But the joy of the church, in their happy settlement in so able and excellent a pastor, was quickly after sadly damped by his being seized with a painful and alarming illness, which laid him aside for some time, and from which he recovered but by slow degrees; upon which the church saw it needful to provide him with a stated assistant; and accordingly the Rev. Samuel Price was chosen to that service, in July, 1703.

But notwithstanding the doctor's public labors were by these means considerably relieved, yet his health remained fluctuating for some years. He went on without any considerable interruption in his work, and with great success and prosperity to the church, till the year 1712, when, in September, he was seized with a violent fever, which injured his constitution, and left such weakness upon his nerves as continued with him, in some degree, during the remainder of his life. In March, 1713, Mr. Price was chosen by the church to be co-pastor with him, in consequence of the continued indisposition of Dr. Watts. Dr. Watts, some time afterwards, removed into Sir Thomas Aboey's family, and continued there till his death, a period of no less than thirty-six years. In the midst of his sacred labors for the glory of God and the good of his generation, he was seized with a most violent and threatening fever, which left him oppressed with great weakness, and put a stop at least to his public services for four years; but here he enjoyed the uninterrupted demonstration of the truest friendship. Though the doctor cultivated every kind of learning, and, perhaps, was the most universal scholar of his age; and though he possessed extraordinary abilities as a poet; yet not entertainment, but benefit, and that in the most sacred and direct sense, to the church and world, evidently appeared to be the end which he kept constantly in view.

The far greater part of his works are theological, and devoted to the most important and useful subjects. Children, in early age, had no small share of his exertions for their good, as his songs and catechisms for their particular service, in the most easy and condescending language, abundantly prove. Those prime and radical constituents of a truly good character, truth and sincerity, were very conspicuous in the doctor. He never discovered, in his behavior or conversation, any thing like a high opinion of himself. He by no means treated his inferiors with disdain; there was nothing overbearing or dogmatism in his discourse. His aspect, motion, and manner of speech betrayed no consciousness of his superior abilities. Great as his talents were as a poet, and extraordinary as the approval of his works was in the world, he spoke concerning his compositions in verse in the humblest language: "I make no pretences," says he, "to the name of a poet, or a polite writer, in an age where in so many superior souls shine, in their works, through the nation."

When he appeared in the pulpit he had a very respectable and serious auditory. Though he had little or no action, yet there was such a rich vein of good sense and profitable instruction; there was such propriety, ease, and beauty in his language; such a freedom, and, at the same time, correctness in his pronunciation, accompanied with an unaffected solemnity in the delivery of the most sacred and momentous truths, that his ministry was much attended; and he had a considerable church, and crowded congregation.

In the year 1728 the universities both of Edinburgh and Aberdeen, in a most respectful manner, without his knowledge, conferred the degree of doctor of divinity upon him.

In 1748 the life of Dr. Watts appeared to be drawing to a close. In his last illness he proved the excellence of his principles and the greatness of his piety by his patience and serenity of mind, and by the evident satisfaction with which he contemplated his approaching dissolution. The doctor was interred in a very handsome manner, amidst a vast concourse of people, in the burial-ground in Buehill Fields, London.

The prose writings of Dr. Watts are various and superior. His work "On the Improvement of the Mind" is one of the first publications in the English or any other language; and his catechisms and sermons have ever been extensively read and most generally admired. The doctor's poetical writings are numerous, and all of them have merit. They are numerous, as appears from his large collection of Lyric Poems, his Book of Hymns, his Imitation of the Psalms, his Songs for Children, and several pieces of poetry in his Miscellaneous Thoughts.

Since his decease his numerous publications have been collected and printed, in six volumes quarto, and also in seven volumes royal octavo. See Life of Dr. Watts, by Dr. Johnson, in his Lives of the Poets; also, Life of Dr. Watts, by Thomas Gibbons, D. D.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

WAUGH, (ALEXANDER, D. D.) was born at East Gordon, in Berwickshire, on the 16th of August, 1754. After passing through the necessary course of preliminary and domestic instruction, he entered the grammar-school of Erskine, in his native county, on the 1st of January, 1766, where he obtained a liberal education; after which he was sent to the university in 1769, where he prosecuted his studies under professors Hunter and Stuart. From Edinburgh he proceeded to Haddington, in 1774, where he spent two years in the study of divinity under the Rev. John Brown, professor of theology to the Burgher Secession; from whence, attracted by the fame of doctors Campbell and Beattie, he went, in the winter of 1776, to the university of Aberdeen, where he completed his studies.

He was licensed to preach on the 28th of June, 1779, soon after which he repaired to London, where he supplied for a short time at Well street, which laid the foundation of that attachment which subsequently led to his settlement in the metropolis. His first settlement, however, was at Newtown, in the parish of Melrose, Roxburghshire, where he was ordained in 1780; but the death of Mr. Hall, which happened two years afterwards, having occasioned a vacancy in Well street, Oxford street, London, Mr. Waugh was translated thither by the Synod of Edinburgh, on the 9th of May, 1782; and on the 14th of June following he arrived in the metropolis, and commenced his stated ministry, where he continued to the time of his death, viz. on the 14th of December, 1827, a period of forty-six years.

He was one of the fathers of the London Missionary society, and his active exertions in supporting it brought him into a much greater degree of popularity than he had previously obtained. Dr. Waugh did not distinguish himself much as an author, but he greatly excelled in the pulpit; he was a most interesting preacher, and highly esteemed by an extensive circle of acquaintance.—*Jones' Chris. WAX; (dux, Ps. 22: 14. 68: 2. 97: 5. Micah 1: 4.) Thus the LXX. throughout, κέρως, and Vulgate cera; so there is no room to doubt but this is the true meaning of the word; and the idea of the root appears to be, soft, melting, yielding, or the like, which properties are not only well known to belong to wax, but are also intimated in all the passages of Scripture in which this word occurs.—Watson.

WAYFARING MEN. In the primitive ages of the world there were no public inns or taverns. In those days the voluntary exhibition of hospitality to one who stood in need of it was highly honorable. The glory of an open-hearted and generous hospitality continued even after public inns or caravansaries were erected, and continues to this day in the East, Job 22: 7. 31: 17. Gen. 18: 3—9. 19: 2—10. Exod. 2: 20. Judg. 19: 2—10. Acts 16: 15. 17: 7. 28: 7. Matt. 25: 35. Mark 9: 41. Rom. 12: 13. 1 Tim. 3: 2. 5: 10. Heb. 13: 2. Buckingham, in his "Travels among the Arab Tribes," says, "A foot-passenger could make his way at little or no expense, as travellers and wayfarers of every description halt at the sheik's dwelling, where, whatever may be the rank or condition of the stranger, before any questions are asked him as to where he comes from, or whether he is going, coffee is served to him from a large pot always on the fire; and a meal of bread, milk, oil, honey, or butter, is set before him, for which no payment is ever demanded or even expected by the host, who, in this manner, feeds at least twenty persons on an average every day in the year from his own purse; at least, I could not learn that he was remunerated in any manner for this expenditure, though it is considered as a necessary consequence of his situation, as chief of the community, that he should maintain this ancient practice of hospitality to strangers. We had been directed to the house of Eesa, or Jesus. Our horses were taken into the court-yard of the house, and unburdened of their saddles, without a single question being asked on either side; and it was not until we had seated ourselves that our intention to remain here for the night was communicated to the master of the house; so much is it regarded a matter of course, that those who have a house to shelter themselves in, and food to partake of, should share those comforts with wayfarers."

The passage in Isaiah, (35: 8.) "The wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein," receives elucidation from some of the accounts of modern travellers. "It was on the 24th of March," says Hoste, "that I departed from Alexandria for Rosetta: it was a good day's journey thither, over a level country, but a perfect desert, so that the wind plays with the sand, and there is no trace of a road. We travel first six leagues along the coast; but when we leave this, it is about six leagues more to Rosetta, and from thence to the town there are high stone or bark pillars, in a line, according to which travellers direct their journey."—Watson.

WAYS, in Scripture, mean either the rules, or the ordinary habits of a man's life: for example: "Make your paths straight." The paths of the wicked are crooked. To forsake the ways of the Lord, is to forsake his laws. "All flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth," Gen. 6: 12. 19: 31. Jer. 32: 19. The way of the Lord expresses his conduct to us: "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord," Isa. 55: 8. We find through the whole of Scripture this kind of expression: The way of peace, of justice, of iniquity, of truth, of darkness. To go the way of all the earth, (Josh. 23: 14.) signifies dying and the grave. A hard way represents the way of sinners, a way of impiety, Judg. 2: 19. Jesus Christ is called the way, (John 14: 6.) because it is by him alone that believers obtain eternal life and an entrance into heaven.

The Psalmist says, "Thou wilt show me the path of life;" (Ps. 16: 11.) that is, Thou wilt raise my body from death to life, and conduct me to the place and state of everlasting happiness.

When a great prince in the East sets out on a journey, it is usual to send a party of men before him, to clear the way. The state of those countries in every age, where roads are almost unknown, and, from the want of cultivation, in many parts overgrown with brambles and other thorny plants, which renders travelling, especially with a large retinue, very inconvenient, requires this precaution. (See CAUSEY.)—Watson.

WEAVING. The combined arts of spinning and weaving are among the first essentials of civilized society, and we find both to be of very ancient origin. The fabulous story of Penelope's web, and, still more, the frequent allusions to this art in the sacred writings, tend to show that the fabrication of cloth from threads, hair, &c. is a very ancient invention. It has, however, like other useful arts, undergone a vast succession of improvements, both as to the preparation of the materials of which cloth is made and the apparatus necessary in its construction, as well as in the particular modes of operation by the artist.

Weaving, when reduced to its original principle, is nothing more than the interlacing of the weft or cross-threads into the parallel threads of the warp, so as to tie them together, and form a web or piece of cloth. This art is doubtless more ancient than that of spinning; and the first cloth was what we now call matting, that is, made by weaving together the shreds of the bark, or fibrous parts of plants, or the stalks, such as rushes and straws. This is still the substitute for cloth amongst most rude and savage nations. When they have advanced a step farther in civilization than the state of hunters, the skins of animals become scarce, and they require some more artificial substance for clothing, and which they can procure in greater quantities. When it was discovered that the delicate and short fibres which animals and vegetables afford could be so firmly united together by twisting as to form threads of any required length and strength, the weaving art was placed on a very permanent foundation. By the process of spinning, which was very simple in the origin, the weaver is furnished with threads far superior to any natural vegetable fibres in lightness, strength, and flexibility; and he has only to combine them together in the most advantageous manner.

In the beautiful description which is given, in the last chapter of Solomon's Proverbs, of the domestic economy of the virtuous woman, it is said, "She seeketh wool and flax, and worketh willingly with her hands: she layeth her hands to the spindle and her hands hold the distaff. She maketh herself coverings of tapestry," &c. Such is the occupation of females in the East in the present day. Not only do they employ themselves in working rich embroideries, but in making carpets filled with flowers and other pleasing figures. Dr. Shaw gives us an account of the last: "Carpets, which are much coarser than those from Turkey, are made here in great numbers, and of all sizes. But the chief branch of their manufactures is, the making of hykes, or blankets, as we should call them. The women alone are employed in this work, (as Andromache and Penelope were of old,) who do not use the shuttle, but conduct every thread of the wool with their fingers."

Hezekiah says, "I have cut off like a weaver my life," Isa. 38: 12. Mr. Harmer suggests whether the simile here used may not refer to the weaving of a carpet filled with flowers and other ingenious devices; and that the meaning may be, that, just as a weaver, after having wrought many decorations into a piece of carpeting, suddenly cuts it off, while the figures were rising into view fresh and beautiful, and the spectator expecting he would proceed in his work; so, after a variety of pleasing transactions in the course of life, it suddenly and unexpectedly comes to its end. Harmer's Observations.—Watson.

WEDDING. (See MARRIAGE; and MARRIAGE CEREMONY.)

WEDNESDAY, ASH; the first day of Lent, when, formerly, in the Catholic church, notorious sinners were put to open penance thus: They appeared at the church-door barefooted and clothed in sackcloth, where, being examined, their discipline was proportioned according to their offences; after which, being brought into the church, the bishop singing the seven penitential psalms, they prostrated themselves, and with tears begged absolution; the whole congregation having ashes on their heads, to signify that they were both mortal, and deserved to be burnt to ashes for their sins.—Hend. Buck.

WEEK; a period of seven days. Under the usual name of a week, shabbat, is mentioned as far back as the time of the deluge, Gen. 7: 4, 10. 8: 10, 12. 29: 27, 28. It must, therefore, be considered a very ancient division of time, especially as the various nations among whom it has been noticed, for instance, the Nigri in Africa, appear to have received it from the sons of Noah. The enumeration of the days of the week commenced at Sunday. Saturday was the last or seventh, and was the Hebrew Sabbath, or day of rest. The Egyptians gave to the days of the week the same names that they assigned to the planets. From the circumstance that the Sabbath was the principal day of the week, the whole period of seven days was likewise called shabat, in Syriac shabta, in the New Testament sabbaton and sabbata. The Jews, accordingly, in designating the successive days of the week, were accustomed to say, the first day of the sabbath, that is, of the week; the second day of the sabbath, that is, Sunday, Monday, &c., Mark 16: 2, 9. Luke 24: 1. John 20: 1, 19. In addition to the week of days, the Jews had three other seasons denominated weeks: (Lev. 25: 1—17. Deut. 16: 9, 10.) 1. The week of weeks. It was a period of seven weeks, or forty-nine days, which was succeeded on the fiftieth day by the feast of Pentecost, (see PENTECOST.) Deut. 16: 9, 10. 2. The week of years. This was a period of seven years, during the last of which the land remained untilled, and the people enjoyed a Sabbath or season of rest. 3. The week of seven sabbatical years. It was a period of forty-nine years, and was succeeded by the year of jubilee, Lev. 25 1—22. 26: 34. (See YEAR.)—Watson; Calmet; Jones.

WEIGHTS. The Hebrews weighed all the gold and silver they used in trade. (See MONEY.) The shekel, the half-shekel, the talent, are not only denominations of moneys, of certain values, in gold and silver, but also of certain weights.

The following are the Jewish weights reduced to Troy :

	lbs.	oz.	dwt.	gr.
The Gerah, the 20th part of a shekel,	0	0	0	12.
The Bekah, half a shekel,	0	0	5	0.
The Shekel,	0	0	10	0.
The Maneh, 60 shekels,	2	6	0	0.
The Talent, 60 mane, or 3000 shekels,	125	0	0	0.

° The weight of the sanctuary, or weight of the temple, (Exod. 30: 13, 24. Lev. 5: 5. Num. 3: 50. 7: 19. 18: 16, &c.) was probably the standard weight, preserved in some apartment of the temple; and not a different weight from the common shekel, 1 Chron. 23: 29. Neither Josephus, nor Philo, nor Jerome, nor any ancient author, speaks of a distinction between the weights of the temple and those in common use.

Besides, the custom of preserving the standards of weights and measures in temples is not peculiar to the Hebrews. The Egyptians, as Clemens Alexandrinus informs us, had an officer in the college of priests, whose business it was to examine all sorts of measures, and to take care of the originals; the Romans had the same custom. Fannius, de Amphora, and the emperor Justinian decreed, that standards of weights and measures should be kept in Christian churches.

A weight of glory, of which Paul speaks, (2 Cor. 4: 17.) is opposed to the lightness of the evils of this life. The troubles we endure are really of no more weight than a feather, or of no weight at all, if compared to the weight or intensity of that glory which shall be hereafter a compensation for them. In addition to this, it is probable the apostle had in view the double meaning of the Hebrew word chabod, which signifies not only weight, but glory: glory, that is, splendor, is in this world the lightest thing in nature; but in the other world it may be real, at once substantial and radiant.—Calmet.

WELCH, (JOHN,) was born about the dawn of the reformation in Scotland, A. D. 1570. He was a monument of free and sovereign grace; but the night preceded the day; for he had been a most hopeless and extravagant youth. He entered upon his ministerial labors at Selkirk, a dark and rude country, where he enjoyed the reputation of being a strict copier of his great exemplar, Jesus Christ. During the troubles in Scotland consequent upon the attempt of James I. to establish episcopacy, he suffered much persecution.—Middleton, vol. ii. p. 408.

WELLS, or SPRINGS, are frequently mentioned in Scripture. The Hebrews call a well beer; whence this word is often compounded with proper names: as Beersheba, Beerath-bene-jaakan, Beerath, Beerah, &c. (See WATER.)

How little, says Mr. Taylor, do the people of England (the same is true of this country) understand feelingly those passages of Scripture which speak of want of water, of paying for that necessary fluid, and of the strife for such a valuable article as a well! So we read, "Abraham reproved Abimelech because of a well of water, which Abimelech's servants had violently taken away," Gen. 21: 25. So ch. 26: 20: "The herdsmen of Gerar did strive with Isaac's herdsmen; and he called the well Ezek, contention." To what extremities contention about a supply of water may proceed, we learn from many modern travellers, who show that it not seldom issues in bloodshed.—Calmet.

WELLS, (EDWARD,) a theologian and scholar, was born in 1663, at Corsham, in Wiltshire; was educated at Winchester, and at Christchurch, Oxford; became Greek professor, and rector of Cotesbach, in Leicestershire; and died in 1727. His principal works are, a Paraphrase, with Annotations, on the Old and New Testament; Historical Geography of the Old and New Testament; and the Young Gentleman's Mathematics.—Davenport.

WELSH INDIANS, or PAIDOCAS; a colony supposed to have emigrated from Wales in the twelfth century, (three hundred years before Columbus,) under prince Madoc; and whose descendants still reside on the borders of the Missouri, far to the westward of the Mississippi. Several accounts are to be found in Welsh and other histories, and various letters have appeared at different times in the Gentleman's and Monthly Magazines. The fact was confirmed in conversations with general Bowles, the Indian chief, when in England; by Mr. Chesholm, from the Creek Indians, also, in his visit to Philadelphia; and by Mr. Heckewelder, a Moravian gentleman at Bethlehem; and some farther confirmation was received from Dr. Rogers, of Philadelphia, and Dr. Morse, of Charlestown.

The substance of all the above accounts is, that there is a nation of Indians of so much lighter complexion as to indicate an European origin; that their language is Welsh, at least radically so; that they have sacred books in that language, (which have been seen by native Britons,) though they have lost the art of reading; and that there are vestiges of the European arts among them, particularly remnants of earthen-ware, &c. Several natives of Wales, and some descendants from that nation in America, have expressed a great desire to go in search of this very distant country, and to commence a mission among them, which indeed was the express object of Mr. Burder's pamphlet, but has not yet been attempted. Burder's Welsh Indians, 8vo, 1797; Dr. J. Williams' Inquiry into the Truth of the Discovery of America by Prince Madoc, and farther Observations on ditto, 1792; Weekly Register, 1798, pp. 32, 297.—Williams.

WESALIA, (JOHN DEJ,) was persecuted by the inquisition for adopting the opinions of Wickliffe, not many years after the martyrdom of Huss and Jerome of Prague. He boldly testified for the truth, but, being bowed down by age and infirmities, and insulted with menaces, he was prevailed upon to sign a recantation, into which he was trepanned, A. D. 1479. It is plain that this recantation was not considered sincere, from his being condemned to perpetual confinement and penance in a monastery of the Augustines, where he died soon after, about the time of the birth of Luther.—Middleton, vol. i. p. 58.

WESLEY, (SAMUEL,) a divine and poet, was born, in 1662, at Whitechurch, in Dorsetshire; was educated at Exeter college, Oxford; obtained the living of South Ormsby, and subsequently the rectories of Epworth and Wroote; and died in 1735. He wrote a volume of poems, with the title of Maggots; the Life of Christ, in verse; the Histories of the Old and New Testament, in verse; Elegies on Queen Mary, and Archbishop Tillotson; and Dissertations on the Book of Job. (See further particulars in WESLEY, JOHN.)—Davenport.

WESLEY, (JOHN,) the founder of the sect called the Wesleyan Methodists, was born at Epworth, in Lincolnshire, on the 17th of June, 1703. His father, Samuel Wesley, was a clergyman of the church of England, and held the living at Epworth. His parishioners were very profligate, and the zeal with which he discharged his duties excited in them a spirit of hatred so violent, that they set his house on fire. Mr. Wesley was then roused by a cry of fire from the street; but little imagining that it was in his own house, he opened the door, and found it full of smoke, and that the roof was burnt through. Directing his wife and the two eldest girls to rise and shift for their lives, he burst open the nursery door, where the maid was sleeping with five children. She snatched up the youngest, and bade the others follow her: the three eldest did so; but John, the subject of the present memoir, who was then six years old, was not awakened, and, in the alarm, was forgotten. The rest of the family escaped; and some through the windows, some by the garden door; and Mrs. Wesley, to use her own expression, "waded through the fire." At this time, John, who had not been remembered till that moment, was heard crying in the nursery. The father ran to the stairs, but they were so nearly consumed that they would not bear his weight; and being utterly in despair, he fell upon his knees in the hall, and in agony commended the soul of the child to God. John had been awakened by the light, and finding it impossible to escape by the door, climbed upon a chest which stood near the window, and he was then seen from the yard. There was no time for procuring a ladder, but one man was hoisted on the shoulders of another, and thus he was taken out. A moment after, the whole roof fell in. When the child was carried out to the house where his parents were, the father cried out, "Come, neighbors, let us kneel down; let us give thanks to God! he has given me all my eight children: let the house go; I am rich enough." John Wesley remembered this providential deliverance through life, with the deepest gratitude.

John was educated at the Charterhouse, where, for his quietness, regularity, and application, he became a favorite with the master, Dr. Walker. At the age of seventeen he was removed from the Charterhouse to Christchurch, Oxford. Before he went to the university he had acquired some knowledge of Hebrew, under his brother Samuel's tuition. At college he continued his studies with great diligence, and was noticed there for his attainments, and especially for his skill in logic. He was ordained in the autumn of the year 1725, by Dr. Potter, then bishop of Oxford, and afterwards primate. In the ensuing spring he offered himself for a fellowship at Lincoln college. The strictness of his religious principles was now sufficiently remarkable to afford subject for satire, and his opponents hoped to prevent his success by making him ridiculous. Notwithstanding this kind of opposition, he attained the object in view, and was elected fellow in March, 1726.

From this time Mr. Wesley began to keep a diary, and during a life of incessant occupation he found time to register, not only his proceedings, but his thoughts, his studies, and his occasional remarks upon men and books; and not infrequently upon miscellaneous subjects, with a vivacity which characterized him to the last. Eight months after his election to a fellowship, he was appointed Greek lecturer and moderator of the classes. At that time disputations were held six times a week at Lincoln college. He now formed for himself a scheme of studies. Mondays and Tuesdays were allotted for the classics; Wednesdays, to logic and ethics; Thursdays, to Hebrew and Arabic; Fridays, to metaphysics and natural philosophy; Saturdays, to oratory and poetry, but chiefly to composition in those arts; and the Sabbath to divinity. It appears by his diary, also, that he gave great attention to mathematics.

The elder Mr. Wesley was now, from age and infirmity, become unequal to the duty of both his livings: John, therefore, went to Wroote, and officiated there as his curate; but, after two years, was summoned to his college, upon a regulation that the junior fellows who might be chosen moderators should attend in person the duties of their office. It was while he held this curacy that he obtained priest's orders.

On his return to college, Mr. Wesley began to prosecute his studies with extraordinary application, and also prevailed upon two or three undergraduates, whose inclinations and principles coincided with his own, to form an association, not so much for the purposes of study as for religious improvement. To carry this into effect, they lived by rule, and held meetings for devotional purposes. This, in process of time, drew on them the observation of their fellow-students, and excited their ridicule; and finally issued in their obtaining the name of Methodists.

Two of the early members of this society afterwards acquired celebrity:—James Hervey, the author of the Meditations, and George Whitfield, who subsequently seceded from Wesley, on Calvinistic grounds. They were now about fifteen in number: when first they began to meet, they read divinity on Sunday evenings only, and pursued their classical studies on other nights; but religion soon became the sole business of their meetings: they now regularly visited the prisoners and the sick, communicated once a week, and fasted on Wednesdays and Fridays.

The elder Mr. Wesley for some years had been declining; and he was very solicitous that the cure in which he had faithfully labored should be obtained for his son John, from an anxious desire that the good which he had effected might not be lost through the carelessness of a lukewarm successor; and that his wife and daughters might not be dispossessed of their home. John, however, would not consent to this arrangement: more good, he averred, was to be done to others by his continuance at Oxford; the schools of the prophets were there: was it not a more extensive benefit to sweeten the fountain than to purify a particular stream? Besides, the parish contained two thousand souls; and he said, "I see not how any man can take care of a hundred." The latter opinion, however, he greatly changed.

In 1735, the elder Wesley died: one of his latest desires was, that he might complete his work on Job. This wish seems to have been nearly, if not wholly accomplished; and John was charged to present the volume to queen Caroline. Going to London on this commission, he found that the trustees of the new colony of Georgia were in search of persons who would preach the gospel there to the settlers and the Indians, and that they had fixed their eyes upon him and his associates. At first he peremptorily refused to go upon this mission, but at last determined to refer the case to his mother, thinking she would not consent: in this he was mistaken. On the 14th of October, 1735, John and Charles Wesley, in company with Mr. Oglethorpe, the founder of the colony, embarked for Georgia. On board the same vessel there were twenty-six Moravians, going to join a party of their brethren, from Herrnhut, who had gone out the preceding year, under the sanction of the British government. On their arrival at the Savannah the brothers separated. Charles went with Benjamin Ingham (one of the Oxford society) to Frederica; John took up his lodging at Savannah, with the Germans who had emigrated from Herrnhut.

The commencement of his ministry was pleasing; the people crowded to hear him, and the congregation, which was at first very gay, dressed plainly, in conformity to his exhortations. These favorable appearances would probably have increased, had Mr. Wesley been less attached to rigid and impracticable discipline; but his extraordinary rigor entailed upon him a train of distressing consequences, which a little prudence might have avoided, and obliged him to return home.

Mr. Whitfield sailed from the Downs for Georgia a few hours only before the vessel which brought Mr. Wesley back from thence cast anchor there. Charles Wesley had come over to procure assistance, and John had written to invite Mr. Whitfield to Georgia. The latter had become popular at Bristol and London during Mr. Wesley's absence, and would probably have given birth to Methodism had the Wesleys never existed. Mr. Wesley now became intimately connected with the Moravians in London, particularly with Peter Boehler; and by him, "in the hands of the great God," says Mr. Wesley, "I was clearly convinced of unbelief, of the want of that faith whereby alone we are saved." A scruple immediately occurred to him, whether he ought not to leave off preaching; for how could he preach to others who had not faith himself? Boehler was consulted, whether he should leave it off, and answered, "By no means." "But what can I preach?" said Mr. Wesley. The Moravian replied, "Preach faith till you have it; and then, because you have it, you will preach faith." Accordingly he began to preach this doctrine, though, he says, his soul started back from the work. This was his state till Wednesday, May 24, 1738, a remarkable day in the history of Methodism; for upon that day he dates his conversion; a point, say his official biographers, of the utmost magnitude, not only with respect to himself, but to others. On the evening of that day he went, very unwillingly, to a society in Aldersgate street, where one of the assembly was reading Luther's preface to the epistle to the Romans. What followed may best be given in his own words. "About a quarter before nine, while he was describing the change which God works in the heart, through faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warmed; I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone, for salvation; and an assurance was given me that he had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death." Yet Mr. Wesley's religious opinions were not quite fixed; and to put an end to painful uncertainty, he resolved to visit the Moravians at Herrnhut. Returning to England, he went to Bristol, and was there received by Mr. Whitfield, who had returned from Georgia, and had introduced the practice of field-preaching. This Mr. Wesley at first thought very strange, but he soon complied with the innovation, and practised it himself. The congregations became numerous; the first Methodist chapel was built, and the society divided into bands after the Moravian plan.

These events took place in the year 1739. This may be considered as the foundation of Methodism; its progress can only be briefly noticed. During Mr. Wesley's stay at Bristol, Charles Wesley, and the immediate followers of Mr. Wesley, in London, had constant disputations with the Moravians; in consequence of which Mr. Wesley was summoned to town. The breach widened, and Mr. Wesley, foreseeing a division inevitable, took a large building in Moorfields, which had been a foundery for cannon during the civil wars. This building retained the name of "Foundery," after which it was used as a place of worship. The separation took place, and the seceders were found to be but about twenty-five men and twice that number of women. Methodism had yet a greater shock to encounter. Mr. Whitfield became a decided Calvinist, and Mr. Wesley equally strenuous in support of Arminian doctrines. These two good men could no longer co-operate, and the former withdrew from his connexion with Mr. Wesley, taking with him those of the society who united with him in opinion. This took place in the years 1740 and 1741.

Methodism gradually acquired shape and consistency. Mr. Wesley was yet, in many respects, a high churchman; but, driven by the current of events, he was constantly introducing innovations. Most clergymen refused him their pulpits; this drove him to field-preaching. But field-preaching is not for all weathers, in a climate like that of England; prayer-meetings also were a part of his plan: and thus it became expedient to build meeting-houses. Meeting-houses required funds; they required ministers, too, while he was itinerating. Few clergymen could be found to co-operate with him; and though at first he abhorred the thought of admitting uneducated laymen to the ministry, lay preachers were soon forced upon him, by their own zeal, which was too strong to be restrained, and by the plain necessity of the case. When the meeting-house was built at Bristol, Mr. Wesley had made himself responsible for the expenses of the building. As, however, it was for their public use, the Methodists at Bristol properly regarded the debt as public also; and one of the members proposed, that every person in the society should contribute a penny a week, till the whole was paid. It was observed, that many of them were poor, and could not afford it. "Then," said the proposer, "put eleven of the poorest with me, and if they can give any thing, well; I will call on them weekly, and if they can give nothing, I will give for them as for myself." Thus began the contribution of class money, and the same accident led to a perfect system of inspection. The leaders, or persons who had undertaken for a class, as these divisions were called, were next directed to inquire after the conduct and spiritual welfare of those under their care. And, finally, the leaders, instead of calling weekly on their flock, for greater convenience, assembled them at a given time and place. Thenceforth, whenever a society of Methodists was formed, this arrangement was followed.

Mr. Wesley had preached at Bristol, Moorfields, Blackheath, and Kingswood. He next proceeded to Newcastle, being inclined to try that scene of action, because of the success which he had found among the colliers in Kingswood. On his journey he called at Birstall, and found there a preacher and a large congregation, raised up without his interference. The name of this preacher was John Nelson. He had heard Mr. Wesley at Moorfields, and being impressed by his discourses, when he returned to Birstall (his native place) began first to exhort his neighbors in his own house, and when that was too small, in the open air. Had Mr. Wesley been still doubtful whether the admission of lay preachers should make a part of his plan, this must have decided him. At Newcastle Mr. Wesley was shocked at the profligacy of the populace. At seven on Sunday morning, however he walked to Sand-gate, the poorest part of the town, and there began to sing the hundredth psalm. This soon brought a crowd about him, which continued to increase till he had done preaching. At five in the evening of the same day he preached again, and his congregation was so large that it was not possible for one half to hear. "After preaching," said Mr. Wesley, "the poor people were ready to tread me under foot, out of pure love and kindness." He could not then remain with them, but his brother soon came and organized them; and in a few months he returned, and began to build a room for public worship.

Mr. Wesley had now meeting-houses in Bristol, London, Kingswood, and Newcastle; and societies were rapidly formed in other places by means of itinerancy, which was now become a regular system, and by the co-operation of lay preachers, who sprung up daily among his followers. In the course of his regular itinerancy, he called at Epworth, and being denied the use of the church, he stood upon his father's tombstone, and cried, "The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." Seven successive evenings he preached upon that tombstone, and in no place did he ever preach with greater effect. Mr. Wesley and his preachers were now exposed to the attacks of various mobs in London, Bristol, Cornwall, and particularly at Wednesbury. Where the magistrates did their duty these outrages were soon suppressed; but in some parts the mob was incited by the clergy, and connived at by the magistrates. At Wednesbury advantage was taken of the popular cry against the Methodists to break open their doors and plunder their houses; but greater personal barbarities were exercised in other places. Some of the preachers received serious injury; others were held under water till they were nearly dead; and of the women who attended them, some were so treated by the cowardly and brutal populace, that they never thoroughly recovered. In some places they daubed the preacher all over with paint. The progress of Methodism was rather furthered than impeded by this kind of persecution. In every instance the preachers displayed that fearlessness which, when the madness of the moment was over, made even their enemies respect them. At first there was no regular provision for the lay preachers. They were lodged and fed by some of the society wherever they went; and when they wanted clothes, if they were not supplied by individual friends, they represented their necessity to the stewards. But a small stated allowance was soon found necessary. A school was also erected at Kingswood, for the education of the sons of the preachers. The limits of this volume preclude further details of the advancement of Methodism. In brief, it may be stated, that it spread through England, Wales, and Ireland. In Scotland it was not equally successful. (See METHODISTS, WESLEYAN.)

Messrs. Coke and Moore, referring to the year 1785, say, "From this time Mr. Wesley held on his way without interruption. The work of God increased every year. New societies were formed, in all of which the same rules were observed. Though now declining in the vale of years, he slackened not his pace. He still rose at four in the morning, preached two, three, or four times a day, and travelled between four and five thousand miles a year, going once in two years through Great Britain and Ireland." In his eighty-fourth year he first began to feel decay; and upon commencing his eighty-fifth, he observes, "I am not so agile as I was in times past; I do not run or walk so fast as I did; any sight is a little decayed; and I am not conscious of any decay in writing sermons, which I do as readily, and, I believe, as correctly as ever." At the beginning of the year 1790, he writes, "I am now an old man, decayed from head to foot. However, blessed be God! I do not slack my labors: I can preach and write still." On the 17th of February, 1791, he took cold, after preaching at Lambeth. For some days he struggled against an increasing fever, and continued to preach till the Wednesday following, when he delivered his last sermon. From that time he became daily weaker and more lethargic. He died in peace, on the second of March, 1791, being in the eighty-eighth year of his age, and the sixty-fifth of his ministry. He was buried at City Road chapel, London. His works are published in sixteen volumes, octavo. He also published the "Christian Library; or, Extracts and Abridgments, &c., from various Writers," fifty volumes, duodecimo; "The Arminian Magazine," a monthly publication, now continued under the title of "The Methodist Magazine," &c. &c. &c. He left no other property behind him than the copyright and current editions of his works; and this he bequeathed to the use of the connexion after his debts were paid. *Life of Wesley, by Southey and by Watson.—Hend. WESLEYANS. (See METHUINISTS.)

WEST, (SAMUEL, D. D.), minister of New Bedford, Mass., was born in Yarmouth, March 4, 1730, and was early occupied in the labors of husbandry. Discovering traits of genius, a few intelligent and good men resolved to give him a liberal education. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1754, having gained a rank among the most distinguished of his class. About the year 1764, he was ordained at New Bedford. He was a member of the convention for forming the constitution of Massachusetts, and of the United States; and was chosen honorary member of the Academy of Sciences at Philadelphia, and a member of the Academy at Boston. He died at Tiverton, September 24, 1807, aged seventy-seven years, and was buried at New Bedford.

Though not a polished or popular preacher, Dr. West possessed an original mind of vigorous powers. During the last thirty years of his life he used no notes in preaching. It was his practice, when he was not in his own pulpit, to discourse upon any text which was pointed out to him; and sometimes the most difficult passages would be given him, for the purpose of trying his strength. His most important publication was a volume of Essays on Liberty and Necessity, in which the arguments of president Edwards and others for necessity are considered; the first part in 1793, the second in 1795. To these essays Dr. Edwards, the son of the president, wrote an answer, and Dr. West left behind him a reply almost completed. (See EDWARDS, JONATHAN.)—Allen.

WEST, (STEPHEN, D. D.), minister of Stockbridge, Mass., was born in Tolland, Conn., in 1736; was graduated at Yale college in 1755; and ordained June 13, 1759. He died May 13, 1819, aged eighty-three. During his ministry of nearly sixty years five hundred and four persons were admitted to the church, of whom twenty-two were Indians. He is principally known for his Essay on Moral Agency, published in 1772, in which his metaphysical doctrine is the antipode of that of Dr. Samuel West. He published also a Treatise on the Atonement, 1785; Life of Dr. Hopkins, 1805; and about twenty occasional Sermons and Tracts.—Allen.

WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY; a name given to the synod of divines called by parliament in the reign of Charles I., for the purpose of settling the government, liturgy, and doctrine of the church of England. They were confined in their debates to such things as the parliament proposed. Some counties had two members, and some but one. And because they would seem impartial, and give each party the liberty to speak, they chose many of the most learned episcopal divines; but few of them came, because it was not a legal convocation, the king having declared against it. The divines were men of eminent learning and godliness, ministerial abilities, and fidelity. Many lords and commons were joined with them, to see that they did not go beyond their commission. Six or seven Independents were also added to them, that all sides might be heard. This assembly first met July 1, 1643, in Henry the Seventh's chapel. The most remarkable hints concerning their debates are to be found in the Life of Dr. Lightfoot, before his works in folio, and in the preface to his Remains, in octavo.

There is a publication which is commonly, but unjustly, ascribed to this assembly, viz.: "The Annotations on the Bible." The truth is, the same parliament that called the assembly employed the authors of that work, and several of them were members of the assembly. See the Assembly's Confession of Faith; Neal's History of the Puritans; and article DIRECTORY, in this work.—Hend. Buck.

WHALE; (tan and tammim, Gen. 1: 21, Job 7: 12, Ezek. 32: 2; ketos, Matt. 12: 40.) the largest of all the inhabitants of the water. A late author, in a dissertation expressly for the purpose, has proved that the crocodile, and not the whale, is spoken of in Gen. 1: 21. The word in Job 7: 12. must also be taken for the crocodile. It must mean some terrible animal, which, but for the watchful care of divine providence, would be very destructive. (See CROCODILE, and LEVIATHAN.)

Merrick supposes David, in Psalm 74: 13, to speak of the tunnie, a kind of whale, with which he was probably acquainted; and Eobart thinks it has its Greek name thinnos from the Hebrew thanot. The last-mentioned fish is undoubtedly that spoken of in Psalm 104: 26. We are told, that, in order to preserve the prophet Jonah, when he was thrown overboard by the mariners, "the Lord prepared a great fish to swallow him up." What kind of fish it was, is not specified; but the Greek translators take the liberty to give us the word ketos, whale; and though St. Matthew (12: 40.) makes use of the same word, we may probably conclude that he did so in a general sense; and that we are not to understand it as an appropriated term, to point out the particular species of fish. It is notorious that sharks are common in the Mediterranean.—Watson.

WHATELY, (WILLIAM, A. M.), a pious, laborious, and successful preacher, was born in 1583, at Banbury, in Oxfordshire. He entered Christ college, in Cambridge, where he was reckoned a good logician and philosopher, an able disputant, and an excellent orator.

He had not been long ordained before he was chosen lecturer of Banbury, which he performed with so much approbation and success for four years, that he was then chosen vicar of the same church, and discharged that office with the utmost fidelity till his death. Humility and heavenly-mindedness were remarkably apparent in the latter part of his life. In the words of his biographer, "He lived much desired, and died much lamented, on Friday, October 10, 1639, aged fifty-five." His works are, Exposition on the Ten Commandments, and several others.—Middleton, vol. iii. p. 95.

WHEAT; (chetah, Gen. 30: 14, Deut. 8: 8; sitos, Matt. 13: 25, Luke 16: 7, 1 Cor. 15: 37.) the principal and the most valuable kind of grain for the service of man. (See BARLEY, CORN, and FRYCHES.) In Lev. 2, directions are given for oblations, which in our translation are called meat-offerings; but as meat now means flesh, and all kinds of offerings there specified were made of wheat, it had been better to render it "wheaten offerings." Calmet has observed, that there were five kinds of these: simple flour, oven-cakes, cakes of the fire-plate, cakes of the frying-pan, and green ears of corn. The word ber, translated corn, (Gen. 41: 35.) and wheat, in Jer. 23: 28, Joel 2: 24, Amos 3: 11, &c., is undoubtedly the barry, or wild corn, of the Arabs, mentioned by Forskhal. (See CORN.)—Watson.

WHEATLEY, (PHILLIS,) a poet, was a native of Africa, and was brought to America in 1761, when she was between seven and eight years old. She soon acquired a knowledge of the English language, and made some progress in Latin. While she was a slave in the family of John Wheatley, in Boston, she wrote a volume of poems. Africa may well boast, that one of her daughters, not twenty years of age, should produce the following lines. They are extracted from the poem on Imagination.

"Though winter frowns, to fancy's raptured eyes
The fields may flourish, and gay scenes arise;
The frozen deeps may break their iron bands,
And bid their waters murmur o'er the sands;
Fair Flora may resume her fragrant reign,
And with her flowery riches deck the plain;
Sylvanus may diffuse his honors round,
And all the forest may with leaves be crowned;
Showers may descend, and dews their gems diademe,
And nectar sparkle on the blooming rose."

She afterwards was married to Mr. Peters, and died at Boston, December 5, 1791, aged forty-one. She published, besides other separate pieces, Poems on various Subjects, religious and moral, 8vo, London 1773.—Allen.

WHEELOCK, (ELEAZAR, D. D.), first president and founder of Dartmouth college, was born in Windham, in April, 1711; was graduated at Yale college in 1733; and was ordained, in 1735, the minister of the second society in Lebanon, where his labors were attended with a remarkable blessing. During the revival about 1740, he preached with great zeal and effect in many towns of New England. In consequence of the education of Occom, (See Occom, SAMSON,) Dr. Wheelock was induced, in 1754, to form the plan of an Indian missionary school. He conceived that educated Indians would be more successful than whites as missionaries among the red men. Joshua Moor, a farmer at Mansfield, having made a donation of a house and two acres of land in Lebanon, contiguous to Dr. Wheelock's house, the institution received the name of Moor's Indian Charity school. Of this school several gentlemen were associated with Dr. Wheelock as trustees; but, in 1764, the Scotch society appointed a board of correspondents in Connecticut, who, in 1765, sent out white missionaries and Indian school-masters to the Indians in New York. As the school increased, Dr. Wheelock determined to remove it to a more favorable location, nearer to the Indians, and to establish in connexion with it a college for instruction in all the branches of science. In 1770, he procured a dismission from his people, of whom he had been the faithful minister about thirty-five years, and removed his school to Hanover, on the western border of New Hampshire, and there also laid the foundations of the college. The school was not merged in the college, as has been supposed, but it ever has been and is still distinct, with a separate incorporation, obtained at a subsequent period from New Hampshire. The patriarch and his family, pupils and dependents, consisting of about seventy souls, resided at first in log houses; but the frame of a small two story college was soon set up. The first commencement in the college was held in 1771, when four students graduated, one of whom still lives. At this period the number of his scholars destined for missionaries was twenty-four, of whom eighteen were whites and only six Indians. This alteration of his plan was the result of experience. He had found, that of forty Indian youth, who had been under his care, twenty had returned to the vices of savage life. The celebrated Brandt was one of his pupils. After being at the head of the college about nine years, he died in Christian peace, April 21, 1779, aged sixty-eight.

Dr. Wheelock was one of the most interesting, eloquent, and successful ministers in New England. For enlarged views, and indomitable energy, and persevering and most arduous toils, and for the great results of his labors in the cause of religion and learning, perhaps no man in America is more worthy of being held in honor than Eleazar Wheelock. It was a noble Christian spirit, and not a selfish zeal, which governed him. His Memoirs, by Drs. McClure and Parish, were published, 8vo, 1811, with extracts from his correspondence.—Allen.

WHEELWRIGHT, (JOB,) the founder of Exeter, New Hampshire, after being a minister in England, was induced, in consequence of the impositions of the established church, to come to Massachusetts soon after its first settlement. He was a brother-in-law to the famous Mrs. Hutchinson, and partook of her antinomian zeal. Sentence of banishment was passed upon him at Boston, in November, 1637. In the year 1638, accompanied by several persons from Braintree, where he had been a preacher, and which was a part of Boston, he went to New Hampshire, and laid the foundation of the church and town of Exeter. The next year, thinking themselves out of the jurisdiction of Massachusetts, they combined into a separate body politic; but in 1642, when Exeter was annexed to Essex county, Mr. Wheelwright being still under the sentence of banishment, removed with a part of his church to Wells, in the district of Maine. In 1644, he was restored to the freedom of the colony upon his making an acknowledgment. In 1647, he removed to Hampton, where he was minister for several years. In 1658, he was in England, and in favor with Cromwell. After the restoration he returned to America, and settled at Salisbury, New Hampshire, where he died, November 15, 1679, probably between eighty and ninety years of age. He was the oldest minister in the colony, and was a man of learning, piety, and zeal.—Allen.

WHIPPERS. (See FLAGELLANTS.)

WHIRLWIND, a wind which rises suddenly from almost every point, is exceedingly impetuous and rapid, and imparts a whirling motion to dust, sand, water, and occasionally to bodies of great weight and bulk, carrying them either upwards or downwards, and scattering them about in different directions. Whirlwinds and water-spouts are supposed to proceed from the same cause; their only difference being, that the latter pass over the water, and the former over the land. Both of them have a progressive as well as a circular motion, generally rise after calms and great heats, and occur most frequently in warm latitudes. The wind blows in every direction from a large surrounding space both towards the water-spout and the whirlwind; and a water-spout has been known to pass, in its progressive motion, from sea to land, and, when it has reached the latter, to produce all the phenomena and effects of a whirlwind. There is no doubt, therefore, of their arising from a similar cause, as they are both explicable on the same general principles.

In the imagery employed by the sacred writers, these frightful hurricanes are introduced as the immediate instruments of the divine indignation:—"He shall take them away as with a whirlwind, both living and in his wrath," Ps. 58: 9. "The Lord hath his way in the whirlwind and in the storm, and the clouds are the dust of his feet," Nahum 1: 3. Isa. 17: 13. All these are familiar images to the inhabitants of eastern countries, and receive some elucidation from the subjoined descriptions of English travellers. "On the 25th," says Bruce, "at four o'clock in the afternoon, we set out from the villages of the Nuba, intending to arrive at Barsbock, where is the ferry over the Nile; but we had scarcely advanced two miles into the plain, when we were inclosed in a violent whirlwind, or what is called at sea the water-spout. The plain was red earth, which had been plentifully moistened by a shower in the night time. The unfortunate camel that had been taken by Cohala seemed to be nearly in the centre of its vortex; it was lifted and thrown down at a considerable distance, and several of its ribs broken. Although, as far as I could guess, I was not near the centre, it whirled me off my feet, and threw me down upon my face, so as to make my nose gush out with blood: two of the servants, likewise, had the same fate. It plastered us all over with mud, almost as smoothly as could have been done with a trowel. It took away my sense and breathing for an instant; and my mouth and nose were full of mud when I recovered. I guess the sphere of its action to be about two hundred feet. It demolished one-half of a small hut, as if it had been cut through with a knife, and dispersed the materials all over the plain, leaving the other half standing." And Burchell remarks: "The hottest days are often the most calm; and at such times the stillness of the atmosphere was sometimes suddenly disturbed in an extraordinary manner. Whirlwinds, raising up columns of dust to a great height in the air, and sweeping over the plains with momentary fury, were no unusual occurrence."—Watson.

WHISTON, (WILLIAM,) an eminent divine and mathematician, was born in 1667, at Norton, in Leicestershire, and was educated at Tamworth school, and at Clare hall, Cambridge. In 1698, he obtained the living of Lowestoffe, in Suffolk, which he resigned in 1703, when he succeeded Sir Isaac Newton in the mathematical professorship at Cambridge. At length he adopted Arian principles, in consequence of which he was expelled from the university in 1710, lost his offices of professor and catechetical lecturer, and was even prosecuted as a heretic. Late in life he became a Baptist. He died in 1752. Among his works are, a Theory of the Earth; Sermons-Primitive Christianity revived; and a Translation of Josephus.—Davenport.

WHITAKER, (JEREMIAH;) a pious man, an eminent linguist, and a laborious preacher. He was educated at Cambridge, and in 1626 took holy orders. Mr. Leigh describes him as a man mighty in the Scriptures, of a humble, melting spirit, laborious in his ministerial functions, zealous for God's glory, and wonderfully patient under the most heavy afflictions.—Middletown.

WHITBY, (DAVID, D. D.,) a learned divine of the English church, was born in 1658, at Rushden, in Northamptonshire, and was educated at Trinity college, Oxford. His controversial zeal against the Catholics gained for him the patronage of bishop Ward, who gave him a prebend of Salisbury and the rectory of St. Edmund in that city, with the precentorship. In his latter days he became an Arian. He died in 1726. His greatest work is a Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament.—Davenport.

WHITE, (THOMAS,) a divine, was born, in the sixteenth century, at Bristol, and was educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford; obtained considerable church preferment, among which were a prebend of St. Paul's, and canonicries of Christchurch and Windsor; and died in 1623. He founded Sion college, in the metropolis, and a hospital at Bristol, and was a benefactor to Magdalen college, Oxford.—Davenport.

WHITE, (JOSEPH,) an eminent divine and oriental scholar, the son of a weaver, was born in 1716, at Stroud, in Gloucestershire, and received his education at Gloucester school and Wadham college, Oxford. In 1775 he was appointed Laudian professor of Arabic, and in 1783 he delivered the Bampton lecture. In the composition of the lectures he was assisted by Dr. Parr and Mr. Badcock. He obtained a prebend of Gloucester, and the rectory of Melton, in Suffolk; and died in 1814. Among his works are, Ægyptiaca; Diatessaron; and editions of the Philoxenic Syrian versions of the four Gospels, and of Griesbach's Greek Testament.—Davenport.

WHITE, (HENRY KIRKE,) a Christian poet, born in 1785, at Nottingham, was the son of a butcher. His delicate health protected him from being brought up to his father's trade, and he was placed with a stocking weaver, but was subsequently removed to an attorney's office. He produced several prose and verse compositions at an early age, and devoted his leisure hours to reading, and to the study of Greek and Latin. At the same time he felt and cultivated the spirit of Christian piety. To obtain a university education, for the purpose of entering into the church, was the main object of his wishes. By the generosity of Mr. Wilberforce and some other friends, he was at length enabled to become a student at St. John's college, Cambridge. His progress was rapid, but his intense application destroyed the vital powers, and he died October 19, 1806. He published Clifton Grove, with other poems imbued with the spirit of Christianity; and his Remains were edited by Southey.—Davenport.

WHITE BRETHREN. (See BRETHREN, WHITE.)

WHITFIELD, (GEORGE,) was born at Gloucester, on the 16th of December, 1714. His father, who was a publican in Gloucester, died when he was very young, leaving him under the superintendance of a wise and tender mother, who, considering him to be under her peculiar guardianship, from the tenderness of his age, made him the object of her fondest solicitude. From his youth he was endowed with extraordinary talents. Between the age of twelve and fifteen he made great progress in the classics. Owing to the pecuniary difficulties of his mother, his education was at this moment arrested, and he was deprived of that instruction which was fitting him for future usefulness. At the age of seventeen he received the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and became a decidedly pious and devout Christian. In the following year he was sent to Pembroke college, Oxford, Mr. Charles Wesley being at that time a student of Christ Church college. Mr. Whitfield there became acquainted with him, and, under his ministry, he received much benefit.

Having arrived at the age of twenty-one, on Sunday morning, the 20th of June, 1736, he was solemnly ordained by the bishop of Gloucester. On the Sunday following he preached a celebrated sermon on "The Necessity and Benefit of Religions Society." This sermon made so strong an impression, that it was slanderously reported he had driven fifteen of his hearers mad!

The following week he left Gloucester for Oxford, and there took his bachelor's degree. A very short time after, he received an invitation to visit London, where he continued two months, having taken up his lodgings in the Tower, reading prayers, catechising, and preaching alternately, in the chapel of the Tower, Wapping chapel, and at Ludgate prison, every Tuesday. At this time he felt anxious to join the Wesleys and Ingham, who had gone out as missionaries to a new colony at Georgia; and shortly afterwards received letters from thence, containing an invitation to him to labor there. He considered this as a call from Providence; and, after having taken leave of his friends in Gloucester and Bristol, in the year 1737, he left the shores of Britain for the continent of America, attended by the blessings and the prayers of thousands for his safety and usefulness. After a tedious voyage, he arrived at Savannah on the 7th of May, 1738, and after having labored four months at Georgia, he was obliged to return to England, to receive priest's orders, and to collect funds to enable him to lay the foundation of an orphan school at Georgia. On the 6th of September, 1738, he again embarked on board a vessel bound from Charleston to London, where he arrived, after a perilous and fatiguing voyage. On the 14th of January he was ordained priest at Oxford, by bishop Benson, and was afterwards exposed to much persecution for preaching the word of life; and was denied the use of those pulpits in which he had been in the habit of preaching. Moorfields, Kennington, and Blackheath, were the places in which he preached to thousands in the open air, with great success, though not without opposition.

After having made collections, which amounted to upwards of a thousand pounds, for the orphan house at Georgia, he sailed the second time for America, where he arrived, after a passage of nine weeks, and was immediately invited to preach in the churches, which were soon filled with immense audiences. When he arrived at Savannah, he chose a spot of ground for the orphan school; and on the 25th of March, 1740, laid the first brick, naming it Bethesda; i. e. a house of mercy. That institution afterwards became eminently useful, and many an orphan's prayer was presented to heaven for its illustrious founder. During his fatiguing journeys from town to town, he was much exhausted, and sometimes nearly overcome with anxiety; but the success which attended his exertions at Georgia gave him great pleasure and inspired him with zeal and hope. Again, however, he sailed for England, and arrived on the 14th of March at Falmouth. Immediately on his arrival in his native country he travelled to London, and preached the following Sunday on Kensington common, to a large and impressed congregation.

Having been earnestly solicited to visit Scotland, he voyaged from London to Leith, where he arrived July 30, 1741, and was most cordially received at Dunfermline and Edinburgh. After preaching in many places, and collecting five hundred pounds, he left Scotland to go through Wales, in his way to London. At Abergavenny, in Wales, he married Mrs. James, a widow between thirty and forty years of age, to whom he was much attached. On his arrival in London, and resuming his "labor of love," he found the weather would not permit him to preach in the open air in Moorfields. Some dissenters, therefore, procured the loan of a piece of ground, and built thereon a large temporary shed, which he called a tabernacle; and his congregation became exceedingly large. In the beginning of August, 1744, Mr. Whitfield, though in an infirm state of health, embarked again for America, and, after a tedious passage, arrived at New York. At that place he was taken exceedingly ill, and his death was apprehended; but, through the providence of God, he gradually recovered, and resumed his arduous and important duties. After his illness he was very much inconvenienced with pains in his side; for which, and the general recovery of his health, he was advised to go to the Bermudas. Such advice he adopted, and there he landed, on the 15th of March, 1748. At the Bermudas he met with the kindest reception, and traversed the island from one end to the other, preaching twice every day, and by that means was eminently and extensively useful. His congregations were large; and on seeing so many persons ignorant of Christianity, he was frequently much affected. He there collected upwards of one hundred pounds for his orphan school. That sum he transmitted to Georgia; and, as he feared a relapse in his disorder if he returned to America, he took his passage in a brig, and arrived in safety at Deal, and the next evening set off for London, after an absence of four years.

On the return of Mr. Whitfield, he found his congregation at the tabernacle very much scattered, and his own pecuniary circumstances declining, having sold all his household furniture to pay the orphan house debt. His congregation now, however, began to contribute, and his debt was slowly liquidating. At this time lady Huntingdon sent for him to preach at her house to several of the nobility, who desired to hear him; among whom was the earl of Chesterfield, who expressed himself highly gratified; and lord Bolingbroke told him he had done great justice to the divine attributes in his discourse. In September he visited Scotland a third time, and was joyfully received. His thoughts were now wholly engaged in a plan for making his orphan house (which was at first only intended for the fatherless) a seminary of literature and academical learning. In February, 1749, he made an excursion to Exeter and Plymouth, where he was received with enthusiasm, and in the same year he returned to London, having travelled about six hundred miles in the west of England; and in May he went to Portsmouth and Portsea, at which places he was eminently useful: many of that time, by the instrumentality of his preaching, being "turned from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God." In the month of September he went to Northampton and Yorkshire, where he preached to congregations of ten thousand people, who were peaceable and attentive; and only in one or two places was he treated with unkindness. In 1751 Mr. Whitfield visited Ireland, and was gladly received at Dublin. He expressed himself much pleased with the size and the attention of the congregations assembled to hear him; and his labors were, as usual, very useful. From Ireland he proceeded to Scotland, where he also met with great encouragement to proceed in his indefatigable work. On the 6th of August he set out from Edinburgh for London, in order to embark for America. Having taken leave of his friends at home, he again set sail in the Antelope for Georgia, and on the 27th of October arrived at Savannah, and found the orphan school in a flourishing condition. Having suffered formerly from the climate, he determined not to spend the summer in America, but re-embarked for London, where he arrived in safety, after a tolerable voyage.

His active mind, ever forming some new plan for the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom, now turned towards the tabernacle. He formed a plan for the erection of a new one; and in the course of the following summer it was completed. The foundation was laid March 1, 1753, and was opened on Sunday, June the 10th, 1754. After preaching in it a few days, he again left England for Scotland, embracing every opportunity of preaching on his road till he arrived at Edinburgh; and, after travelling twelve hundred miles, he returned home, on the 25th of November, and opened the tabernacle at Bristol, after which he returned to London, and, in September, 1756, opened his new chapel in Tottenham Court road. His labors were immense. He preached fifteen times a week; hundreds of persons went away from the chapel who were not able to gain admittance. By his unremitting attention to his congregation, at the two chapels in London, his strength was much reduced, and he became debilitated and weak. In the latter end of the year, finding his health improved, he, however, determined on again visiting America. Accordingly, in the latter end of November, he left England, and arrived at Boston in safety the beginning of January; and, on writing to his friends in England, expressed himself much gratified with the evident improvement in the orphan house. After spending the winter pleasantly and usefully in America, he once more embarked for his native shores; and after a passage of twenty-eight days, landed in England, and on the 6th of October, 1765, opened the countess of Huntingdon's chapel at Bath. Shortly after his arrival in London, Mrs. Whitfield was seized with an inflammatory fever, and became its victim on the 9th of August; and on the 14th he delivered her funeral sermon, which was distinguished for its pathos, yet manly and pious eloquence.

He now prepared for his seventh and last voyage to America. He embarked at the beginning of September, and, on the 30th of November, arrived in safety, after a perilous and trying passage. But his sphere of activity was now drawing rapidly to a close; his career of usefulness was soon to be concluded; the sand in his hourglass was fastly running through; and this venerable and distinguished man was soon destined to enjoy the felicities of heaven. His complaint, which was an asthma, made rapid strides upon his constitution, and though it had several times threatened his dissolution, it was at last sudden and unexpected. From the 17th to the 20th of September, this faithful laborer in the vineyard of Christ preached daily at Boston; and, though much indisposed, proceeded from thence on the 21st, and continued his work till the 29th, when he delivered a discourse at Exeter, New Hampshire, in the open air, for two hours; notwithstanding which, he set off for Newburyport, where he arrived that evening, intending to preach the next morning. His rest was much disturbed, and he complained of a great oppression at his lungs; and, at five o'clock on the Sabbath morning, the 30th of September, 1770, at the age of only fifty-six, he entered into that rest prepared for the people of God. According to his own desire, Mr. Whitfield was interred at Newburyport. On the 2d of October, at one o'clock all the bells in the town were tolled for an hour, and the vessels in the harbor gave their proper signals of mourning. At two o'clock the bells tolled a second time; and at three they repeated their mournful tolling during the time of the funeral.

Mr. Whitfield was not a learned man, like his contemporary, Wesley; but he possessed an unusual share of good sense, general information, knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, and an accurate acquaintance with the human heart. Few ministers have been equally useful since the days of the apostles. The sermons of Mr. Whitfield were impassioned, and generally addressed to the hearts of his congregations. He was benevolent and kind, forgiving and gentle; but he was zealous and firm, and seldom allowed his feelings to overcome his judgment. He was eminently useful in having excited a greater degree of attention to religion than can be well conceived; and millions have, doubtless, blessed his name, as tens of thousands revere his memory. See his Life by Gillies.—Hend. Buck.

WHITSUNDAY; a solemn festival observed on the fiftieth day after Easter, in memory of the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the apostles in the visible appearance of fiery cloven tongues, and of those miraculous powers which were then conferred upon them.

It is called Whitsunday, or White Sunday, because this being one of the stated times for baptism in the ancient church, after Constantine, those who were baptized put on white garments, as types of that spiritual purity they received in baptism. As the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the apostles happened on that day which the Jews called Pentecost, this festival retained the name of Pentecost among the Christians.—Hend. Buck.

WICKED; vicious, sinful. "The wicked one," taken absolutely, is generally put for the devil: "Deliver us from the wicked or evil one," Matt. 6: 13. "Then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart," Matt. 13: 19. The evil day (Eph. 6: 13.) is the day of temptation or trial; the day in which one is most in danger of doing evil.—Calmet.

WICKEDNESS. (See Sin.)

WICKLIFFE, (JOHN) the celebrated reformer, was born in the year 1324, near Richmond, in Yorkshire. Of his parents and his early years, nothing is certainly known; but when young he was distinguished for his genius; and, when but sixteen, was admitted commoner of Queen's college, Oxford; and soon afterwards removed to Merton college, where he was first probationer, and afterwards fellow. Whilst in that college, he was distinguished for his learning and application, and was regarded as a man of profound knowledge. The study of the Holy Scriptures, however, afforded him the most delight. He wrote notes, and expositions, and homilies on several parts of them; and by such means acquired the title of Dr. Evangelicus, or the Gospel Doctor. In 1360, he distinguished himself by his wise and zealous opposition to the encroachments of the begging friars, and shortly afterwards by a controversy on the subject of the poverty of Christ. In 1361 he was advanced to be master of Baliol college, Oxford, and, four years afterwards, to be warden of Canterbury hall, which had been then recently founded.

At this time he had acquired general esteem, and the affection and respect of the highest dignitaries of the church. In consequence of some conscientious scruples and manly dignified conduct, he was, however, in 1370, expelled, by a bull from the pope, from the latter situation which had been bestowed on him. At this time pope Urban had given notice to king Edward, that he intended, by process, to cite him to his court, then at Avignon, to answer for his default in not performing the homage which king John's predecessor acknowledged to the see of Rome for his realm of England and dominion of Ireland, and for refusing to pay the tribute granted to that see. Such claim the king had determined to resist, and the parliament had approved the determination, when a monk had the effrontery to vindicate the pope, and insist on the equity of his claim. Against that writer Wickliffe presented himself as an able and zealous antagonist.

In 1372, having taken his degree of doctor of divinity, he publicly professed and read lectures on theology, to the unqualified satisfaction of the schools. He again directed his attention to the exposition of the abuses which had at that period crept into the church; and, a few years afterwards, in a celebrated tract, he charged the friars with holding fifty heresies and errors, which, in that publication, he enumerated. The papal power, which had been gradually increasing, was now greater than ever; and the pope disposed of ecclesiastical benefices and dignities as he thought fit. On Italians, Frenchmen, and other aliens, totally ignorant of the English language, he bestowed the most lucrative benefices; of which the parliament had made complaints to the king, and to the pope himself. Notwithstanding these complaints, they could not meet with redress; and, at length, the king sent ambassadors to pope Gregory XI. to require of him that he would forbear any further interference with a reservation of benefices. The result of this commission was very unsatisfactory, and the commons, in parliament, therefore renewed the request, that "remedy be provided against the provisions of the pope, whereby he reaps the first-fruits of ecclesiastical dignities, the treasure of the realm being thereby conveyed away, which they cannot bear;" and an act was passed, that cathedral churches should enjoy their own elections; and that, for the future, the king should not write against the persons so elected, but rather, by his letters, endeavor their confirmation, if there should be occasion. Such measure being, however, unsatisfactory, the king issued out a commission for taking a survey of all benefices which were then in the hands of aliens; and their number appearing to be very great, in 1374, the king appointed other ambassadors to go to the pope, to treat with him on the same affairs on which he had sent ambassadors to him the year before: one of those ambassadors was Wickliffe. In the treaty with the pope, which lasted two years, he was much engaged; and it was at length concluded, that, for the future, the pope should desist from making use of reservations of benefices, and that the king should no more confer benefices by his writ; though, in the following year, notwithstanding such treaty, the pope did make reservation of benefices elective. By being concerned in this treaty, Wickliffe was made more sensible than he was before of the pride, covetousness, and ambition of the pope; and, on his return home, everywhere exposed him. Against the doctrine of indulgences he wrote; and by his zealous opposition to the church of Rome, he met with much trouble. The pride and covetousness of the clergy be reprov'd, as also their neglect to preach Christ's gospel.

In 1376 the king presented him with the rectorship of Lutterworth. Wickliffe, by his endeavors to reform a corrupt age, made himself many enemies, who waited for opportunities to gratify their revenge; and, as soon as he began, in his public lectures, to oppose the papal powers, nineteen articles were exhibited against him to the pope. When the pope had received those articles, he despatched various bulls to England, directing the matter to be investigated, Wickliffe to be imprisoned, and, if guilty, to be punished. Before the bulls reached England, king Edward was dead; but the archbishop and bishop of London proceeded to execute the pope's bulls; and not being able to get Wickliffe delivered up to them by the university of Oxford, they issued out their mandate to the chancellor of the university and the diocese of England, commanding them to direct him to appear before them on the 19th of February. On the appointed day, Wickliffe, accompanied by John, duke of Lancaster, and Henry Piercy, earl-marshal, attended at St. Paul's, when, in consequence of a quarrel between the bishop of London and the earl-marshal, the court broke up without adopting any measures. In June, 1378, the delegates sat again for the execution of their commission; when the queen-mother sent for Louis Clifford, to forbid them to proceed to any definitive sentence against Wickliffe. At that meeting Wickliffe attended, and delivered an able and interesting paper, in which he assigned reasons for the statements he had made, and for which he had been cited; but his explanations being unsatisfactory to the delegates, they commanded him no more to repeat such propositions, either in the schools or in his sermons. By the death of pope Gregory XI. in this year, an end was put to the commission of the delegates, and Wickliffe appeared before them no more.

In 1378 Wickliffe published his book on the Truth of the Scriptures; and in 1379, in consequence of the fatigues he endured, he was seized dangerously ill, and appeared to be on the point of death; but from that attack he recovered, to the inexpressible joy of the reformed church. In 1380, in his lectures, sermons, and writings, Wickliffe exposed the Romish court, and the vices of the clergy, both religious and secular. At the same period he was also engaged, with other pious and learned men, in translating the Holy Scriptures into English. For labors so important, he, however, received not the gratitude and respect which he deserved, but opposition and reproach. The wicked clergy perceived that such a measure would strike at the root of ignorance and superstition, and, like the Ephesians of old, they trembled for their craft. This translation was attacked, and he ably defended it; and, what was yet more important, the right of the people to read the Scriptures was questioned, but such right he reasserted, and wisely upheld. In this and the following year he strenuously and ably opposed the popish doctrine of transubstantiation, or the real presence of Christ's body in the sacrament of the altar. Such opposition to a doctrine which had been received for nearly a thousand years by the Catholic church, necessarily occasioned and excited the malice of his enemies, and he was censured by the chancellor of Oxford, and some doctors of the university. Wickliffe appealed from this decree of the chancellor to the king. Archbishop Sudbury, about this time, being beheaded by the rebels, William Courtney, bishop of London, was translated to the see of Canterbury by the pope's bull, who, in 1382, in a court of certain select bishops, held in the month of May, in the monastery of the preaching friars, condemned several of the opinions of Wickliffe and his followers, as pernicious, heretical, and repugnant to the doctrines of the church. It does not appear that Wickliffe was at all cited to appear at this court; but the condemnation which was then passed Courtney required the chancellor of Oxford to publish. Unsatisfied with even such measures, Courtney obtained letters patent from the king, directing that Wickliffe, with other excellent men, should be expelled from the university of Oxford; and ordering that the publications of Wickliffe should be everywhere seized and destroyed.

Thus persecuted, Wickliffe long withstood the tide of opposition and fury, till, at length, overcome by force, he was obliged to quit his professor's place, and retire to Lutterworth. Forced to leave the university and retire to his parsonage, he still continued his studies, and endeavored to promote the reformation of those corruptions which, he was convinced, were everywhere prevalent. Against a popish crusade he published an able and interesting tract; and shortly afterwards his celebrated book, entitled, "The great Sentence of the Curse expounded;" and his "Treatise on the improper Distribution of Benefices." Wickliffe, soon after his removal to Lutterworth, was seized with a fit of the palsy, of which he shortly recovered, and was again able to resume his duties. By pope Urban he was cited to appear before him, but he returned a letter of excuse, saying, that Christ had instructed him to the contrary, and taught him to obey God rather than man. Wickliffe's health now began gradually to decline, yet he preached the word of God in season and out of season; till at length, on St. Innocent's day, 1384, he was attacked with another fit of the palsy, and shortly afterwards expired. After his death his bones were dug up and burnt by his enraged enemies.

The writings of Wickliffe were numerous and learned; his doctrines were generally those of the reformed church, though in regard to baptism he is said to have agreed with the Baptists; his followers increased, and he assisted greatly in bringing about that reformation, by which all wise and good men have been delighted, and the history of which is so interesting and important. Wickliffe was a man who seems to be placed as much above praise as he is above envy. He had well studied all the parts of theological learning; was skilled in the canon of civil and municipal laws; was grave, yet cheerful, and, above all things, loved God with all his heart, and his neighbors as himself. WIDOW. Widowhood, as well as barrenness, was a kind of shame and reproach in Israel. Isaiah (54: 4) says, "Thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth, [passed in celibacy and barrenness,] and shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more." It was presumed that a woman of merit and reputation might have found a husband, either in the family of her deceased husband, if he died childless, (see LEVIRATE), or in some other family, if he had left children.

God frequently recommends to his people to be very careful in relieving the widow and orphan, Exod. 22: 22. Deut. 10: 18. 14: 29. He even calls himself the husband of the desolate one, and says, "Let your widows trust in me." Paul would have us honor widows that are widows indeed, and desolate; (1 Tim. 5: 3, &c.) that is, we should have a great regard for them, and supply them in their necessity; for this is often signified by the verb to honor.

Formerly there were widows in the Christian church, who, because of their poverty, were placed on the list of persons to be provided for at the expense of the church. There were others, who had certain employments in the church; as, to visit sick women, to assist women at baptism, and to do several things which decency would not permit to the other sex. Paul did not allow any woman to be chosen into this number, unless she were threescore years old, at least, 1 Tim. 5: 9.—Calvat.

WIGGLESWORTH, (EDWARD, D. D.,) first Hollis professor of divinity in Harvard college, was graduated at Harvard college in 1710. After he commenced preaching, his services were enjoyed in different places. So conspicuous were his talents, and so exemplary was he for every Christian virtue, that when the professorship of divinity in Harvard college was founded by T. Hollis, he was unanimously appointed first professor, and was inducted into this office October 24, 1722. He died, conscious of the failings of life, yet hoping for pardon through Jesus Christ, January 16, 1765, aged seventy-two.—Allen.

WILBERFORCE, (WILLIAM;) a man who, when piety was universally stigmatized in the aristocratical circles of England, and its professors banished from fashionable society, exerted himself, with a courage and consistency worthy an apostle, by his writings and by his example, to work a moral reform in the sphere in which he moved; a statesman who shone with brilliancy in the British senate, even when men were dazzled with the splendor of Pitt and Fox; and a philanthropist who devoted successfully his best powers and his best days to the abolition of the slave-trade. He was born at Hull, August 24, 1759.

Distinguished as he was in other respects, the reputation of Wilberforce was the result chiefly of his labors in behalf of oppressed Africa. It was in 1788 that he first drew the attention of parliament to the subject. A resolution passed the house that it would in the next session proceed to consider the state of the slave-trade, and the measures it might be proper to adopt with respect to it. In accordance with the terms of this resolution, on 12th of May, 1789, Mr. Wilberforce again brought the question before the house, introducing it with one of those powerful and impressive speeches which have justly classed him among the most eloquent men of his day. The usual evasion of calling further evidence was successfully practised by his opponents, and the subject was delayed to the next session. In 1790, he revived the subject, but the plea for further evidence was continued; and the question was again postponed. In the following year, Mr. Wilberforce opened the debate with a copious and energetic argument. Pitt, Fox, William Smith, and other members, came forward to support him, but in vain. His motion was lost by a majority of seventy-five.

Mr. Wilberforce was not to be discouraged. He renewed the attempt in 1792, 1794, 1795, 1796, 1798, 1799, and as often failed. It was not until 1804 that he again attempted to arouse parliament to its duty. His bill passed the third reading in the house, but in the lords was postponed to the ensuing session. This was the last time Mr. Wilberforce took the lead on this great question. On the 10th of June, 1806, Mr. Fox, being then in office, brought it forward at Mr. Wilberforce's special request. He calculated rightly on the superior influence of ministerial power. The bill, under the auspices of government, passed the lower house, by a majority of one hundred and fourteen to fifteen, and through the efforts of lord Grenville was at length triumphant in the lords. But the triumph was fairly given to Mr. Wilberforce. He was hailed with enthusiastic acclamations on re-entering the house after his success; and the country re-echoed the applause from shore to shore. Mr. Wilberforce died in the holy triumph of a Christian, July 28, 1833. His remains were deposited in Westminster abbey.

We dare not presume, says an English writer, to describe the character of this illustrious servant of God. Nor is it necessary; every one among us, high or low, rich or poor, has been more or less familiar with his virtues; for, in private or public, the man was still the same. He had formed a little paradise around him, and it attended him wherever he went. The protection of the negro was only an emanation from that principle of love which seemed to govern every action and every thought; a brighter coruscation of that light which radiated in all directions, and spread warmth and comfort on all within its rays.

In 1797 Mr. Wilberforce published his celebrated "Practical View," a work which has been translated into most European languages, and of which about fifty editions have been printed in Great Britain and America.—London. Chr. Observer, 1833; Am. Bap. Mag., 1834.

WILBERNESS. (See DESERT.)

WILHELMINIANS; a denomination in the thirteenth century, so called from Wilhelmina, a Bohemian woman, who resided in the territory of Milan. She persuaded a large number that the Holy Ghost was become incarnate in her person, for the salvation of a great part of mankind. According to her doctrines, none were saved by the blood of Jesus but true and pious Christians; while the Jews, Saracens, and unworthy Christians, were to obtain salvation through the Holy Spirit which dwelt in her; and that, in consequence thereof, all which happened in Christ during his appearance upon earth in the human nature, was to be exactly renewed in her person, or rather in that of the Holy Ghost, which was united to her.—Hend. Buck.

WILKINSONIANS; the followers of Jemima Wilkinson, who was born in Cumberland, in America. In October, 1776, she asserted that she was taken sick, and actually died, and that her soul went to heaven, where it still continues. Soon after her body was reanimated with the spirit and power of Christ, upon which she set up as a public teacher; and declared she had an immediate revelation for all she delivered, and was arrived to a state of absolute perfection. It is also said she pretended to foretell future events, to discern the secrets of the heart, and to have the power of healing diseases; and if any person who had made application to her was not healed, she attributed it to his want of faith. She asserted that those who refused to believe these exalted things concerning her will be in the state of the unbelieving Jews, who rejected the counsel of God against themselves; and she told her hearers that it was the eleventh hour, and the last call of mercy that ever should be granted them: for she heard an inquiry in heaven, saying, "Who will go and preach to a dying world?" or words to that import; and she said she answered, "Here am I; send me;" and that she left the realms of light and glory, and the company of the heavenly host, who are continually praising and worshipping God, in order to descend upon earth, and pass through many sufferings and trials for the happiness of mankind. She assumed the title of the universal friend of mankind; and hence her followers distinguished themselves by the name of Friends. This vile impostor died in 1819.—Hend. Buck.

WILKINS, (JONN, D. D.,) bishop of Chester, was born in 1614, at Fawley, near Daventry, in Northamptonshire. Such was his early proficiency, that at thirteen years of age he was admitted a member of the university at Oxford, being entered a student of New Inn, in Easter term, 1627; but after a short stay there, he was removed to Magdalen college, and placed under the tuition of Mr. John Tombes, B. D., a man of learning and uncommon acuteness as a disputant, but still more remarkable for his having adopted the opinions of the Baptists, and done more to propagate them by his writings, even when connected with the university, than any one man of these times. Mr. Wilkins took the degree of master of arts in 1634. He was now twenty-one years of age, and entering into holy orders, was appointed chaplain to lord Say and Seal, and afterwards to Charles, count palatine of the Rhine, during the residence of that prince in England. On the breaking out of the civil wars, he made no scruple of taking the covenant, and both in his opinions and discourses manifested his adherence to the popular party. On the success of the side he had espoused, his conduct was rewarded by the headship of Wadham college, Oxford. He married the sister of Oliver Cromwell, who was then in the zenith of his power, and the Protector hesitated not to give his brother-in-law a dispensation, which prevented his losing his preferment.

In 1659 he removed to the sister university, where he was presented to the headship of Trinity college; but the restoration of monarchy, in the following year, not only put a stop to his hopes of farther preferment from the republican party, but his connexion with the family into which he had married was the cause of his being ejected from his situation. He obtained the appointment of preacher to the society of Gray's inn, and having succeeded in gaining the esteem of Villiers, duke of Buckingham, the sunshine of court favor again opened upon him. He was presented to the rectory of St. Lawrence, Old Jewry, which was succeeded by the deanery of Ripon, till, in 1668, he was elevated to the episcopal bench, and constituted bishop of Chester. He did not enjoy his preferment long, for he fell a martyr to the stone, on the 19th of November, 1672, ending his days at the house of his friend, Dr. Tilotson, in Chancery lane, London.

Wood, as different as his complexion and principles were from those of Wilkins, has been candid enough to say, that "he was a person endowed with rare gifts: he was a noted theologian and preacher, a curious critic in several matters, an excellent mathematician and experimenter, and one as well seen in mechanisms and new philosophy, of which he was a great promoter, as any of his time." Burnet declares "he was a man of as great a mind, as true a judgment, as eminent virtues, and of as good a soul as any he ever knew. He was a lover of mankind, and delighted in doing good." His works are numerous and varied: the principal of his theological productions are, "Ecclesiastes; or, a Discourse of the Gift of Preaching, as it falls under the Rules of Art," 1646; "A Discourse concerning the Beauty of Providence, and all the rugged Passages of it," 1649; "Discourse concerning the Gift of Prayer, showing what it is, wherein it consists, and how far it is attainable by Industry, &c.," 1653; "Sermons on Several Occasions;" and "Of the Principles and Duties of Natural Religion," both in octavo. See Middleton, vol. iii. pp. 397.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

WILKS, (MATTHEW,) was born in 1746, at Gibraltar, where his father, an officer in the army, was then quartered. He discovered no traces of a religious character until he attained the age of twenty-five. In the year 1771
